"Dear Sir,—My poor daughter lies dangerously wounded, and perhaps at the point of death. She cries for her brother. He must come down to us instantly, with the bearer of this. Send one of your people with him if you like. But it is not necessary. I inclose a blank check, signed, which please fill at your discretion.

"I am, with thanks,
"Yours in deep distress,
"Richard Hardie."

RUNNING THE BLOCKADE.

"Is Miss Bessie in?"

"Yes, Sir."

Without further question the speaker entered the house with the air of an accustomed visitor. The room into which he was ushered was furnished with a degree of elegance which betokened alike wealth and good taste. The young man threw himself upon a sofa, and taking from his pocket a telegram just received, read it with sparkling eyes. Certainly it must have contained good news, to judge by the expression of his face. He was interrupted in his occupation by a soft hand upon his shoulder.

"Mr. Mordaunt, I protest against your converting my drawing-room into an office. Is your letter, then, of absorbing interest?"

"I beg your pardon, Bessie," said the young man, coloring slightly; "you entered so softly that I did not hear you."

"Is that all you have to say to me?" inquired the young lady, playfully. "I begin to think it was scarcely worth while to come down."

"No, Bessie," said the young man, taking her hand, "it is not all I have to say to you. I have come to ask you to reconsider your decision postponing our marriage for six months. What good reason is there for it?"

"It is my guardian's wish, Frederic," said Bessie, more gravely. "He thinks I am so young that we can well afford to wait. After all it is but a short time. Six months will pass away very quickly."

"To you, perhaps," returned the lover, half reproachfully.

"And why not?" she retorted, playfully. "For think, Frederic, they are the last six months of my independence. From that time I am to be subject to the whims and caprices of a husband. I am afraid they are all sad tyrants. On second thoughts, it would perhaps be better to name a year."

"Would you have me commit suicide?"

"As if you were capable of it," she retorted, laughing merrily.

"You don't know what I am capable of," said young Mordaunt, shaking his head.

"Perhaps if I did know I should be unwilling to marry you at all," said Bessie, with a saucy smile.

Frederic Mordaunt's face flushed slightly, as if a sudden thought had crossed his mind, but a moment afterward he responded in the same vein.

Half an hour afterward the young man rose to go. Bessie Graham followed him to the door, and then with slow and meditative steps re-entered the drawing-room. As she passed the mirror a hasty glance was perhaps natural. Rarely has mirror reflected back a more pleasing face or more graceful figure. Neither perhaps was faultless, but the face had a wonderful power of expression. A smile fairly lighted it up, leaving it absolutely radiant. Yet there was something about the mouth that smiled so sweetly which would have assured a careful observer that Miss Bessie had a will of her own when she chose to exert it. The eyes were clear and truthful. Purity and sincerity were reflected in these mirrors of the soul. Frederic Mordaunt was not the only one who had been won by the charms of the young heiress. For Bessie was an heiress, and a wealthy one. Not that she thought of it. The two hundred thousand dollars which constituted her fortune were a poor substitute in her eyes for the tender love of her father, who had been snatched from her three years since by a sudden distemper.

Bessie was about to leave the room when her attention was suddenly drawn to a loose sheet of paper which lay on the carpet at the foot of the sofa on which her late visitor had been sitting. Picking it up, a glance informed her that it was a telegram, and dated at Halifax. Her eyes rested upon it a moment, and almost unconsciously she took in its contents. The blood rushed to her cheeks, and she exclaimed, impetuously, "Good Heavens! can Frederic have acted so base a part?"

The expression of her face was completely changed. There was a deep earnestness in her eyes, but lately sparkling with a merry light. "This must be inquired into without delay," she resolved. "If it be as I suspect, all is over between us. Yes," she repeated, in a slow and resolute tone, "henceforth and forever all is over between us."

She wrote two lines upon a sheet of note-paper, and ringing the bell hastily, said to the servant who answered her summons, "Do you know Mr. Mordaunt's office?"

"Yes, Miss Bessie."

"You will convey this note thither immediately, and place it in his own hand. If he is absent wait for him."

"Yes, Miss Bessie."

Mr. Mordaunt had walked quickly back to his office, having important business awaiting his attention. He was a young merchant who had the reputation of great shrewdness in business matters. Some said that he had never done a better stroke of business than in securing the affections of the young heiress. Perhaps he thought so himself. He had not been returned five minutes when Bessie's messenger arrived.

"A note from Miss Bessie."

"Indeed," said the young merchant, graciously. "Give it to me."

His face assumed a perplexed expression after he had read this brief missive:

"Will Mr. Mordaunt favor me with a call at his earliest convenience on a matter of great moment?

"B. G."

"What can this mean?" thought Mordaunt. "I left her but a moment ago as cordial as usual. Yet nothing can be colder than this strange note. Your mistress is well?" he inquired of the servant.

"Yes, Sir, quite well."

Not a little disturbed at this summons, which thoroughly mystified him, Frederic Mordaunt, leaving business to take care of itself, hastily returned to the house which he had just quitted. He was shown without delay into the presence of Bessie.

"Why, Bessie," he commenced, "you have fairly frightened me with the suddenness of your summons. What—"

A glance at the grave face of the young lady arrested the words upon his lips. "I hope you are not ill," he said, in a changed voice.

"You left something behind you," said Bessie, quietly, "which I thought might be of importance. I have therefore judged it best to send for you that I might return it in person."

She extended the telegram.

Frederic Mordaunt turned suddenly pale. He mechanically reached out his hand and took the paper.

"I have an apology to make," Bessie continued, in the same cold tone. "Not aware that it was of importance, I accidentally let my eye rest upon it."

The young man's paleness was succeeded by a crimson flush, but he still remained silent.

"Frederic!" Bessie burst forth, in a changed tone, "is this dreadful thing true? Have you really been false to your country, and deliberately engaged in furnishing aid and comfort to the enemy? I gather from this telegram that, through an agent in Halifax, you have fitted out cargoes to run the blockade. Is this so?"

The young man's eye quailed before her searching glance. "Forgive me, Bessie," he entreated, "and I will faithfully engage never again so to forget myself."

"Forgive you! It is not me you have offended, but your country."

"I will give half the proceeds to the Sanitary Commission—nay, the whole," said Frederic, deprecatingly.

"That can not repair the evil."

"You are hard upon me, Bessie," said the young man, a little resentfully. "I am not the only one who has engaged in this business. It is wrong, I admit, but it is not the worst thing a man can do."

"Very nearly," returned Bessie, gravely. "Listen, Frederic Mordaunt," she continued, rising, and looking down upon him like an accusing angel. "Three months ago word came to me that a cousin, who was my early play-fellow and always dear to me, fell upon the battle-field fighting bravely. Do you think, in my sorrow for him, that I have not remembered with indignation those who caused and who perpetuate this unhappy war? Yet I could almost envy him his fate. He never proved recreant to honor and false to his country. His memory will ever be held sacred in my heart. Think, Frederic Mordaunt, how many thousands have fallen like him—how many a heart has been made desolate—how many a fireside is wrapped in sadness."

"That is true; but am I responsible for all this?"

"Their blood is upon your hands, Frederic Mordaunt," said Bessie, sternly. "You, and such as you, who betray your country for a little paltry gain—who furnish the rebels with the means of prolonging their unrighteous contest—are guilty of all the extra bloodshed and suffering which must necessarily result. Shame on you, Frederic Mordaunt! And you call yourself loyal! I have more respect for an open enemy than for a secret traitor."

"Bessie," said the young man, thoroughly humiliated, "I will not seek to defend myself. I will make any reparation that you may require. Only do not be too hard upon me."

"I hope you will make such reparation as your conscience exacts. For me I will not venture to dictate. You are not responsible to me any farther than you are to all who have the welfare of their country at heart."

"Surely yes," said the young man, his heart sinking with a new apprehension. "The relation between us will justify you in any demand. You have only to express your wishes."

"The relation to which you refer has ceased," said Bessie, coldly. "I give you back your promise."

"You can not mean it," said young Mordaunt, in accents of earnest entreaty. "Say that you do not mean it."

"It is best so," said Bessie. "I was mistaken in you. I thought you a man of the strictest honor. I did not think— But what need to proceed? Providence has willed that my eyes should be opened. Let the past be forgotten."

"Do not cast me off without a moment's reflection," urged Frederic, more and more desperately. "Give me time, and I will satisfy you of my sincere repentance."

"I heartily hope you will, Frederic. The interest that I have felt in you will not permit me to say less. But if you have a thought that any change which time will bring will shake my resolution, put it away at once. Where I have once lost my respect I can no longer love. Within the last hour the whole plan of my life seems to have changed. My love for you has gone, never to return. It is best that you should know it. I sincerely hope that you may awake to a full sense of the disgrace in which you have involved yourself, and may seek as far as possible to repair it. Should such be the case, my good opinion of you may in time be restored. Do not seek for more."

Frederic Mordaunt took his hat slowly, and left the room. He felt that it would be useless to urge his suit further. There was that in the expression and tone of Bessie Graham which warned him that it would be in vain. Even in that hour, perhaps, the loss of the fortune which the heiress would have brought him was not the least bitter ingredient in his cup of humiliation. Yes, even in a pecuniary view his speculation had failed miserably. He had gained five thousand dollars and lost two hundred thousand.

As for Bessie, she did not grieve much for the lover she had dismissed. It was as she had said. All her love for him had passed away when she awoke to a sense of his unworthiness. She has firmly resolved that whenever her hand is given, it shall be to one who has devoted himself heart and hand to the service of his country.

THE PRISONS AT RICHMOND.

We reproduce on pages 668 and 669 several drawings by Captain Wrigley, of the Topographical Engineers, illustrating the Libey Prison at Richmond, and the Place of Confinement for Union Troops at Belle Isle. Captain Wrigley was several months in the Libey Prison, and had ample leisure to make drawings and observations. He also sends us (and we publish on the same pages) portraits of Captains Sawyer and Flynn, the two officers who were selected by Jeff Davis to be murdered in retaliation for the execution by General Burnside of two rebel spies. The despot of the Slave Confederacy has not yet carried his threat into execution; but the sentence of death still hangs over the two officers, and must be hard to bear. Captain Wrigley has written us the following account of his observations:

"The military prison at Richmond, Virginia, is situated on the corner of Twentieth and Cary streets, directly on the canal and James River. A fine view of the river, its beautiful islands, and the distant hills is obtained from the south and west windows. The tents on Belle Isle, where our soldiers are kept, just peer above the long railroad bridge leading to Petersburg. This bridge is nearly half a mile in length, and built of timber on stone piers. Two and four hundred yards this side are two other bridges, one for the Danville Road, the other for foot travel. Below them the river eddies furiously between huge rocks and hundreds of beautiful little islands, covered in every available inch with trees, bushes, small flowers, and verdure of all kinds. Just at the bend of the river, about a mile below the prison, is that part of Richmond known as the 'Rocketts'—formerly a village of that name, but now connected with the city by straggling tobacco factories, warehouses of all kinds, and tenements usually found in the suburbs.

"Richmond lies, as it were, in an amphitheatre of hills, facing the river, on whose bank is the prison, and from which a fine view of the town is obtained from the north and west windows. Far up on the hill stands the Confederate capitol—a plain, unpretending building, very similar to the ordinary American church, as seen in its full glory in some of our country villages. Comparatively few people are seen in the streets, an able-bodied man without a uniform being a rara avis of the first class; and the few ladies who walk out appear to be living, as it were, backwards on the finery and fashion of other days.

"The name Libey, generally spelled 'Libby,' which is applied to the military prison, is derived from the proprietors, Messrs. Libey & Son, ship-chandlers and grocers, who formerly carried on there an extensive business. It is really a row of three buildings, three stories high, and having each one room on a floor, each room being 105 feet in length and 45 feet wide, making nine rooms in all—three in each story. On the first floor, the west room contains the quarters of the Confederate officers and the offices connected with the place. It is in this room that the prisoner first enters; and from it he is ushered to his future dreary abode. The east rooms of the first and second floors form the hospital of the building; the three upper rooms, together with the west room of the second story, communicate and form the officers' quarters; the two remaining ones are used to receive temporarily, for the night, small squads of captured prisoners, previous to sending them over to Belle Isle. All these apartments have bare, unplastered, white-washed beams and walls.

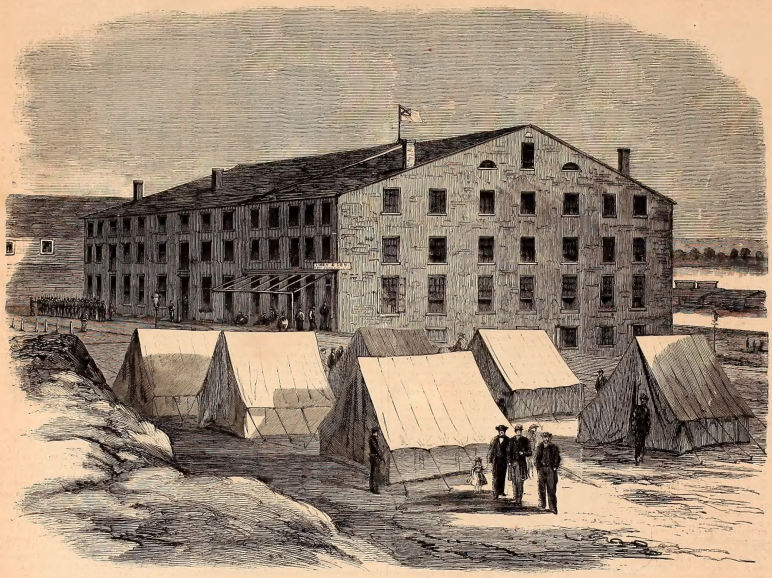
"THE OFFICERS' QUARTERS.

"Two of the four rooms allotted to them are partly used as kitchens—a portion of the room being partitioned off, and large cooking stoves, of a huge, square pattern, set up in them. The cooking is all done by the officers themselves; they form messes of whoever may be agreeable to each other, and take their proper turns in preparing the meals. The tin plates and cups taken from our captured soldiers are given to them in sufficient quantity to allow two messes to eat at one time. Many, however, purchase their own dishes, and are more independent. Two bath-tubs are placed in these rooms, and five faucets supply all the water for bathing, cooking, and washing. The ration allowed is eighteen ounces of bread and a quarter of a pound of meat per day, together with a little rice; vinegar and salt at intervals.

"Although a hearty man would not perish with this amount of food, it is not sufficient—in point of quantity, quality, or variety—to prevent a gradual disorganization of the system, and consequent total unfitness for duty.

"Most all of the officers have money with them, and, if they desire, purchase in the markets, through the Confederate steward, vegetables, fruit, eggs, meat, and butter—all these commodities, nevertheless, being enormously high; this is compensated for, however, by the value of gold and United States notes, they being worth, respectively, 14 and 11 to 1 in Confederate money.

"A few bunks in the upper west room are occupied by the first-comers of the prison, the remainder of the officers sleeping on the floor in their blankets, only two of which are allowed to each man. There are 18,900 superficial feet of floor in all these rooms; deduct 2900 for kitchens, sinks, mess-tables, etc., and it leaves but twenty-six superficial feet per man. No outdoor exercise is allowed. The place is infested with vermin of all kinds, beyond all power to drive them off.



"Our officers, even in the face of these discouraging facts, keep up good heart; earnestly hoping, however, for a speedy release. Classes in Spanish and French, the study of the law, a debating-club, and a weekly paper—The Libby Chronicle—take up all spare moments, and the ability displayed by many in these matters is truly gratifying; and if the officers there are a fair sample of our army generally, we may well be proud of the effect of our republican institutions.

"The hospital is the best conducted part of the prison. It contains 120 beds—each a straw palliasse—and pillow, sheets, and comfortable, on a wooden cot. The fare is a shade better. The surgeons (three in number) are really skillful men, and do all in their power to alleviate the condition of the sick in their charge. Stimulants of all kinds are difficult to obtain, but are furnished by the Confederates to the fullest extent of their capability. They will not, however, allow our Sanitary Commission to send any thing of the kind.

"Gold or Confederate money will alone be received by the Commissioners and handed to the prisoners; all boxes of clothing, or delicacies of any kind, will also reach them in safety.

"The writer had the pleasure of a trip through the Confederacy, from Jackson, Mississippi—where he was captured some five months since—to Richmond. If the people of the Northern States could but know and appreciate the total exhaustion of the South in this struggle, they could not fail to bend every effort at this time to trample out the few remaining embers of the rebellion.

"Their railroads and rolling-stock are in the most dilapidated condition, and they are without the men to repair them. Eight miles an hour was the average of the mail-trains on which we traveled. Locomotives of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad we saw near Atlanta, Georgia; and rolling-stock also of other roads. The stations, however, were filled with engines, but slightly out of repair, which they were unable to mend. Every bridge throughout the South was well guarded, especially so in North Carolina and Virginia; the principal manufactories of war materiel out of Richmond were in Georgia and Alabama, now within easy 'raiding' distance of our armies.

EXTERIOR VIEW OF THE LIBEY PRISON, RICHMOND, VIRGINIA.—[FROM A SKETCH BY CAPTAIN HARRY E. WRIGLEY, TOPOGRAPHICAL ENGINEERS.]

"The absence of not only luxuries, but even the conveniences of life, seems to have given the whole people a semi-barbarous air, and the almost total extinction of the genus citizen made this all the more apparent. We saw no slave who was not anxiously waiting to be free; no man whose interests would allow it who did not wish to be back in the old Union. Many would come and tell us, as we waited for the trains, how the wave that swept over the South in '61 carried them along with it, and how earnestly they would rejoice at peace. All this, too, at a time when their arms flourished, and they were exultant. Now they are downhearted beyond conception. Let not our Copperhead friends pour too much of their faith into the Confederate tub, for the bottom will be out of it ere they are aware."

Captain Wrigley is now at home.

ENCAMPMENT OF UNION PRISONERS AT BELLE ISLE, RICHMOND, VIRGINIA.—[FROM A SKETCH BY CAPTAIN HARRY E. WRIGLEY, TOPOGRAPHICAL ENGINEERS.]

INTERIOR VIEW OF LIBEY PRISON, RICHMOND, VIRGINIA, SHOWING THE QUARTERS OF THE UNION OFFICERS CONFINED THERE.—SKETCHED BY CAPTAIN HARRY E. WRIGLEY, TOPOGRAPHICAL ENGINEERS.—[SEE PAGE 667.]

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

Two countrymen seeing a naturalist in a field collecting insects, thus spoke of him. "Vot's that ere gemman?" "Vy, he's a naturalist." "Vot's that?" "Vy, vun who catches gnats, to be sure."

A gentleman in the West Indies, who had frequently promised his friends to leave off drinking without their discovering any improvement, was one morning called on early by an intimate friend, who met his negro boy at his door. "Well, Sambo," said he, "where is your master?" "Massa gone out, sure," was the reply. "And has he left off drinking rum?" rejoined the first. "Oh yes, sure," said Sambo, "massa leave off drinking—he leave off two, two time dis morning."

Antipathy to reading sermons in the pulpit is a well-known characteristic of the Scotch people. At Kirkenbright, at an inauguration, an old woman on her pulpit stairs asked one of her companions if the new minister was a reader. "Reader!" replied the other woman, "reader! weel, I'se pit my han's till't." "I'm glad to hear it," said the first speaker; "I wish they were a' like."

Lateur Maufrey lost his leg at the battle of Leipsic. After he had suffered amputation with the greatest courage, he saw his servant crying, or pretending to cry, in the other room. "Jean, Jean, Jack," said he, "none of your hypocritical tears, you dog; you know you are very glad to see I've still only lost one best to dance."

The late Dr. Thynne, so well known for his love of good eating, one day paid a visit to the eccentric Lord R——. He was shown into the dining-room, where the Scotch hospitality alone and engaged in eating a choice little dinner. After talking for some time, the Doctor, who was getting hungry at the sight, said, "My lord, I think it would be no great stretch of hospitality were your lordship to say, 'Doctor, pray do as I am doing.'" "Well, Doctor," said Lord R——, "pray do as I am doing—go home and eat your own dinner."

A merchant examining a hogshead of hardware, on completing it with the inventor found it all right except a hammer less than the invoice. "Och, don't be troubled," said the latter; "I'm sure the nagur took it out to open the hogshead with."

At the recent examination of a farmer, on his sister entering the box to be examined, the following conversation took place between her and the opposing agent: "How old are you?" said the lawyer. "Vell, you vish, I am an unmarried woman, and I dinna think it richt to answer that question." "Oh, yes, unless the gentleman's old eye aw," said the judge. "Well a week, I am fifty." "Are you not sure?" "Vell, I might be sixty." The inquisitive lawyer still further asked if she had hopes of getting married; to which she (now replied), "Well, Sir, I wunna surely tell a lie; I dinna lest hope yet." And she accordingly added, "I will na' miss marry you, for I an sick trash o' your palaver already."

Lord Norbury riding in the coach of his friend Purcell, and chancing to pass a gallows, asked, "what would you be, Purcell, if every man had his due?" "Alone in my carriage," was the reply.

"I'm bound to disturb your repose," as the storm said to the sea.

The last excuse for crinoline is, that the "weaker vessels" need ballast.

A profligate young nobleman, being in company with some sober people, desired leave to toast the devil. "Oh, certainly," said the company, "we can have no objection to toast any of your lordship's friends!"

We lately met a grammarian, says a California paper, who has just been to tour through the mines conjugating, or rather cogitating thus—"Positive, mines; comparative, minar; superlative, minus!"

A DEAR YOUNG LADY.

A young lady has said
That she no man will wed
Who's worth less than six hundred a year,
One would fancy, to keep,
A white elephant cheap,
If compared to a damsel so dear.

Full one hundred: no less,
She much need upon dress,
Every year of her congugal life;
Only consider wise
Is as rich as a Jew
Could afford to maintain such a wife.

Oh, how lovely must she
Be! sweet as much, ha!
But who prizes mere beauty's a goose.
Like the glitter of money time,
'Tis brushed off in no time,
And how dear if your wife's of no use!

What can this girl, then, do?
Can she bake? Can she brew?
Can she wash? Can she cook? Can she mend?
Or is she nothing worth
Then let her find the earth
To consume, and a fortune expend?

A good story is told of one George Shaffer, who many years ago lived in Cumberland. He had one boon companion, and was coming home with his game-bag empty, and weary, when he stopped at the toll-house for a moment's rest. "There's a fine lot of ducks back here in this pond," said he, "and I don't believe you could hurt them much. Give me your money, and you may fire." The money was paid, and, sure enough, he had gathered round, waxed back to witness George's discomfiture. He raised his gun, fired, and exclaimed, "Now, Sir, the game!" cried the toll-man. "I took the charge out of your gun." "Yes," said George, "I supposed you would. I always go double-charged."

DEFINITION.—A spare rib: a thin wife.

DO YOU GIVE IT UP?

My first relieves every care;
My second implies disdain;
But I would not be my whole for the world.
Friend-ship.

What letter in the alphabet is of most use to a deaf woman?

A, because it makes her, hear.

What is that which gives a cold, causes a cold, and pays the doctor's bill?

A draught of ale(s).

There is a thing that was three weeks old when Adam was young,
This thing it was but four weeks old when Adam was forsworn.
The moon.

Why are communities like monkeys?

They are fur-fetched and troublesome.

My first is what all mortals ought to do;
My second is what all mortals have done;
And my whole is the result of my first.
Learn-ing (learn).

Which is the heaviest bore in the world?

A tal bore (tabor).

State Fairs of 1863.

The award of the first premium over all competition to the Grover & Baker sewing machines at the Kentucky State Fair, held last week at Louisville, adds another to the many victories which these machines have achieved this year. Following the lead of the Ohio, New York State Fair, the Iowa State Fair, the Vermont State Fair, and the fairs held at Vergennes and Burlington in the latter state, the Kentucky State Fair awarded the Grover & Baker machines the highest premium for the best machine for family use, the best for manufacturing, and the best sewing machine work.—Daily World.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

TO NEWSPAPER PUBLISHERS AND PRINTERS.

The subscribers manufacture TYPE REVOLVING Double and Single Cylinder Printing Machines, Bed and Platen

POWER PRESSES,

For Book, Job, and Card Printing.

They would also call the attention of publishers of newspapers to their new

RAILWAY NEWSPAPER PRESS

and their Single

LARGE HAND CYLINDER PRINTING MACHINE,

either of which is especially designed to supply newspapers in a moderate manner with all the latest improvements in Printing Machine, capable of doing also the ordinary jobwork of an ordinary job office. They are designed to run by hand, at a speed of 700 copies an hour, and at this rate will run without any fatigue.

Circular of prices, with description, will be forwarded on application.

R. HOE & CO.,

Printers' and Bookmakers' Warehouse,

Nos 29 and 31 Gold Street,

Corner Broome, Sheriff, and Columbia Sts., New York.

And Foundry Street, Boston, Mass.

Publishers of newspapers who will favor their advertisement thirteen times in their weekly papers, with this note, previous to January 1, 1864, and forward us a copy of paper containing the same, will be paid in printing materials or purchasing four times the amount of their bill for this advertisement.

Brandreth's Pills.

This medicine often cures when all others have failed. They prevent apoplexy, they cure diseases of the heart and nervous diseases. They are a positive and reliable pill they have not their equal in the world. Employed according to directions accompanying each box of New Style, they produce no pain, inconvenience, or change of diet, generally causing only the removal of vitiated matters, which have become useless or injurious, and securing, in their combination, all the directive principles to build sound healthy materials. Thus Brandreth's Pills cause an natural increase of life where it is most wanted in the human or animal body, and a consequent reaction of the death principle. Those who use them soon recover and enjoy a remarkable share of health.

DYSENTERY CURED.

Mr. J. C. Rappelye, of Monmouth County, New Jersey, writes, March 19, 1859: "I was troubled, in January last, with costiveness for several days, and took ten grains of calomel to obtain relief. I caught cold, however; at any rate, a severe diarrhœa set in, which my medical attendant found it impossible to arrest. This was followed by dysentery. My strength I was ill. Everything I passed through me as I took it. A friend from New York, Mr. Geo. Lewis, fortunately called on me, and advised Brandreth Pills. I thought, in my weak condition, one pill would be enough: but he administered four, and the next morning four more. Much impurity came from me, and, to my surprise, the soreness and pain disappeared. One box cured me fully. I am now hearty, with a fine appetite. You are at liberty to publish this."

CASE OF ROSCOE E. WATSON.

Troy Sieve, June 23, 1863.

DR. B. BRANDRETH, New York:

SIR—I was a private in Company F, Seventeenth New York Volunteers. At the battle of Fredericksburg on the Rappahannock, near Falmouth, I and many of the company were sick with bilious diarrhœa. The army surgeon did not furnish us with any medicine, and he died. Among the company were quite a number of members who had worked in your laboratory at Sing Sing. They sent me sick, because they used Brandreth's Pills. Their men prevailed upon me and others to use the pills, and we were all cured in from two to five days. After this our men used Brandreth's Pills for every ague fever, cold, or rheumatism, and in no case did they fail to restore health. Out of gratitude to you for my good health, I send you this letter, which, if necessary, the whole company would sign. I am, respectfully yours,

ROSCOE K. WATSON.

These celebrated Pills are sold at 25 cents per box. Purchase only BRANDRETH'S PILLS, STAMPED with my private Stamp. See B. Brandreth in white letters. Principal office, Brandreth House, New York. Sold by all dealers. N. B.—Old stock cheerfully exchanged.

ALL ARTICLES FOR SOLDIERS

At Baltimore, Washington, and all places occupied by Union troops, should be sent by HARNDEN'S EXPRESS, No. 13 Broadway. Sutlers charged low rates.

Elliot's New Repeaters

Are now ready. The most rifle, compact, durable, effective, sure, and reliable Revolvers made. Carry large ball (No. 32 cartridge), are rapidly loaded and fired—conveniently carried in the vest—whole length five inches—four barrels—each rifled quite twice. The Trade supplied.

ELLIOT & BROTHERS, 374 BROADWAY, N. Y.

ENAMELED CHAMBER FURNITURE.—The best assortment of enameled Chamber Furniture, in all colors and styles, Walnut and Chestnut, Plain and Ornamental, in Suites. Wholesale and Retail. Also, Mattresses and Palliasses. WARREN WARD, No. 371 Canal St., N. Y.

Cloaks and Mantillas.

BRODIE,

The Leader of Fashions!

Opened his Fall Stock on Thursday, 8th inst.,

And as usual stands unrivaled for Style, Quality, AND VARIETY.

300 Canal Street, New York.

Soldiers' COMPANY PINS.

Constantly on hand and Engraved to Order, and sent free on receipt of Price.

Solid Silver $1. Solid Silver, $1.

Solid 18 k. Gold, $3 50 each.

Solid Silver, with Letters in GOLD Relief, $1 50.

Corps Badges

Sent free by Mail or Express on receipt of Price.

Solid Silver, $1 50. Enameled. Solid Silver, $1 50. Enameled.

Solid Gold, $6. Solid Gold, $4.

Badges for the 1st, 2d, 3d, 5th, 6th, 11th, and 12th Army Corps.

1st Division Enamelled Red, 2d Division White, 3d Division Blue.

Terms Cash in advance. Send for a Catalogue.

Address J. G. PACKARD & CO.,

938 Broadway, New York.

STERLING'S AMBROSIA

DR. STERLING'S

AMBROSIA

is a stimulating oily extract of roots, barks, and herbs. It will cure all diseases of the scalp and itching of the head; will thirty eradicate dandruff, prevents the hair from falling out or from turning prematurely gray, causing it to grow thick and long. It is entirely different from all other preparations, and can be relied on.

CERTIFICATE.

This is to certify that, about eighteen months ago, I commenced using STERLING'S AMBROSIA. My hair was short, thin, and rapidly falling out. I had tried many Hair Tonics, Invigorators, &c., without receiving any benefit. Soon after using the Ambrosia, my hair ceased falling out, and commenced growing so rapidly as to astonish me. Now my hair is thick, soft, and glossy, and is five inches long. I have also used it in several instances to the floor. This wonderful result I attribute solely to the use of STERLING'S AMBROSIA, as since I commenced using it I have applied nothing else to my hair.

MRS. L. A. BROWN, 408 Bleecker St., New York.

PRICE $1 00 PER BOX, containing two bottles.

DR. H. H. STERLING, Sole Proprietor,

Depot No. 403 Broadway.

For sale by all druggists.

National Union League, Army Corps and Regimental Badges.

We are now prepared to furnish Enamelled Badges of Army Corps and Regimental Badges of every description, in Solid Silver, Gold, and Plated. Also a large assortment of Jewelry.

R. N. FOOTE & CO., Manufacturers of Jewelry,

No. 23 Broadway, New York.

Sportsmen, Tourists, and Army and Navy Officers.

Powerful and Brilliant Double Glasses.

Portability combined with great power in Field, Marine, Tourists', Opera, and general out-door day and night double magnifying glasses, will show distinctly a person to know him at from 3 to 5 miles. Spectacles of the greatest magnifying power are invented on and improve the sight, without the distressing result of frequent changes. Catalogues sent by enclosing stamp.

SEDMOND'S, Opticians,

659 Broadway, New York.

DR. SAMUEL S. FITCH'S New and Improved TRUSSES, ABDOMINAL SUPPORTERS, BANDAGES, SHOULDER BRACES, INHALING TUBES, &c. They are patented in the UNITED STATES, ENGLAND, and SCOTLAND, and universally acknowledged to be the most perfect Instruments made. Persons requiring will do well to call and examine (or send for pamphlet) before purchasing elsewhere. 714 BROADWAY, N. Y.

Printing-Press for Sale.

One Taylor Double Cylinder, five Rollers, Table Distribution, Bed 38x51. Price $950.

Apply to HARPER & BROTHERS, 329 Pearl St., N.Y.

HUBBARD BRO'S

IMPORTERS OF WATCHES

NEW YORK.

Are offering the cheapest, most accurate, durable, and saleable Watches in the American market. They are the sole contingees in this country for the celebrated

Magic Time Observers,

The Perfection of Mechanism!

Being a Hunting, or Open Face, or Lady's or Gentleman's Watch combined, with Patent Self-winding Improvement.

A most perfect Watch. One of the prettiest, most convenient, and decidedly the best and cheapest Watches for general use ever made, as the winding mechanism is all and connected with its machinery to one winding attachment, rendering a key entirely unnecessary. The cases of this Watch are composed of two metals, the outer one being the 16 carat gold. It has the best quality lever action lever movement, and is warranted as a correct timepiece. Price, superbly engraved, per case or half dozen, $204. Sample watches in neat morocco boxes, $25. To be sent by mail, the postage is 25 cents; registering, 20 cents.

COMPOSITE

Silver Watches!

First-Class Hunting Time-Piece!

FOR ACCURACY OF MOVEMENT, BEAUTY OF MATERIAL, AND, ABOVE ALL, CHEAPNESS IN PRICE, THESE WATCHES HAVE NO EQUAL.

UNIVERSAL APPROBATION!

An imitation so faultless that it can hardly be detected from the original by the best judges of second judges. The material being alike all through, it can not be exceedingly necessary for heavy engraving, and the quality is equal to silver, but in durability, the best resemblance of Solid Sterling Silver in existence.

The sale of these watches in the army is a source of enormous profit, realizing, in many cases, from $25 to $35 and upward. Many hundred dollars can be made in a single day by any one of ordinary business talent.

AT WHOLESALE ONLY! In heavy hunting cases, beautifully engraved, and open face, with Dial and Hands, and in good running order, by the half dozen, $95; postage, $1 80; registering, 20 cts. Sold only to the trade. Can be safely sent by mail.

Our jewelers are novelties produced by no other house, combining greater accuracy as timekeepers, being more elaborately and artistically finished, and offered at prices challenging competition from all other hands.

The press in all parts of the country bears strong attest the superiority of our watches. Their encomiums are emphatic, extending directly to the point in a manner not to be misunderstood.

They are highly valuable for officers in the army, and travelers."—Frank Leslie's, Feb. 21.

"Perfect in time, and cheapest time-pieces ever offered."—N. Y. Illustrated News, Jan. 10.

"Exceed other manufactures in point of accuracy and elegance."—Philp. Army and Navy Gazette, May 9.

"An improvement on ordinary timepieces, and invaluable for railroad men."—N. Y. Am. Railroad Journal, Aug. 8.

"Elaborately and artistically finished."—N. Y. Sentinel, American Army Journ. (Government Organ, Aug. 29.

"Combine great accuracy as timekeepers."—Pittsburg, Pa., Chronicle, July 31.

"Very pretty and durable watches for the army."—N. Y. Army and Navy Journ. (Government Organ, Aug. 29.

"One of the oldest and most reliable houses in business."—Louisville, Ky., Journal, July 31.

SEE TERMS CASH; INVARIABLY IN ADVANCE. No agencies supplied. Agents and deal directly with us. A manual is sent us by express or mail in a registered letter, it is at our risk! Orders filled with the most full attention and faithful attention.

HUBBARD BROS., Sole Importers,

169 Broadway, cor. Cortlandt St., New York.

S. M. WARD. Co. B 48th N.Y.Vols.

C. E. PACE Co. I 29 N.J.Vol.

50,000 Agents Wanted.

Are required to sell the new Patent Steam Hospital, and on board every Naval Vessel. For $1, will send you as sample, rich Colored Steel Plate Full Instructions, and either a Fine Gold Pen and Pencil, or a beautiful New Style Vest Chain, or a Medallion Cameo Pin, or a Watch Chain, or an Engraved Spring Locket, or a Seal Stone, California Diamond, or Stained Ring, or a Rose Cut Diamond Pin, or a New Style Set of Jewelry, or a solid Silver Match Box, or other Army Cups, Silver Pencil Cases, &c., and Reg. handsomely engraved upon it, or a Kearney Cross in Gold Plate, and for 50 cents, will send a beautiful Union League Pin, in fine Gold Plate.

B. T. HAYWARD, Manufacturing Jeweler,

Box 4876. 208 Broadway, N. Y.

WANTED.—DISABLED AND DISCHARGED SOLdiers, and others, manned with energy and a desire of a pleasant and profitable business by addressing P. O. Box 45, Philadelphia. (Sample free for 10 cents.)

H. A. MARSHALL & CO., Manufacturers of Printers' Rollers, CARDBOARD and Yarn, Steam Packing, Wick, CARPET WARP, Twine, Bleaching Cord, Clothes Cord and Clothes Line, Writing and Wrapping PAPER, Envelopes, and Paper Bags.

Printing Office for $12.

Every Man his own Printer.

THE LOWE IMPROVED PRINTING PRESSES are the best and cheapest portable Card and Job Presses ever invented, and have been awarded Silver Medals and Diplomas. Merchants, Druggists, and others, are saving or MAKING MONEY by using them. Cards, Bill-Heads, Circulars, Labels, &c., can be printed with nothing apprentice in a few hours. Type, $3, and $10. Price of an Office, with Press, $12, 24, 35, and $45. Send for a Circular. Do not buy

LOWE PRESS CO., 13 Water Street, Boston.

MERCHANTS' AND MANUFACTURERS' PROMPTION and UNIVERSAL AGENCY, incorporated under Act of 1811.

Merchants, Manufacturers, Agents, Peddlers, and all others wishing to increase their business, should send a stamp for our Circular.

GOODWIN & CO.,

429 Broadway, N. Y.

Cristadoro's Hair Dye.

THE BEST IN THE WORLD.

Cristadoro's Hair Preservative.

Unequaled as a dressing. Both for sale everywhere, and applied at No. 6 Astor House, N. Y.

J. H. Winslow & Co.,

100,000

WATCHES, CHAINS, &c., &c.

Worth $500,000.

To be sold for One Dollar each, without regard to value, and not to be paid for till you know what you are to get.

SPLENDID LIST!!

OF ARTICLES TO BE SOLD FOR ONE DOLLAR EACH.

100 Gold Hunting Cased Watches..... $100 00 each.
100 Gold Watches..... 50 00 each.
200 Ladies' Gold Watches..... 25 00 each.
500 Ladies' and Gent's Silver Watches..... 10 00 each.
2000 Vest and Neck Chains..... 5 00 to 10 00 each.
2000 Gold Band Bracelets..... 5 00 to 10 00 each.
2000 " ..... 4 00 to 5 00 each.
2000 Cameo Brooches..... 4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Mosaic and Jet Brooches..... 4 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Lava and Florentine Brooches.. 4 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Coral, Opal, and Fan. Brooches.. 4 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Cameo Ear Drops..... 4 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Mosaic and Jet Ear Drops..... 4 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Lava and Florentine Ear Drops.. 4 00 to 6 00 each.
1000 Coral, Em., and Opal Ear Drops 4 00 to 8 00 each.
1000 Coral Sleeve Buttons..... 5 00 to 8 00 each.
1000 Watch Keys..... 2 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Felt and Ribbon Slides..... 2 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Sets of Boom Studs..... 2 50 to 6 00 each.
5000 Silver Thimbles..... 2 50 to 6 00 each.
6000 Plain Rings..... 2 50 to 5 00 each.
6000 Stone Set Rings..... 2 50 to 6 00 each.
6000 Lockets..... 2 50 to 10 00 each.
5000 Sets Ladies' Jewelry..... 5 00 to 10 00 each.
10000 Gold Pens, Silver Mounted Holders 2 00 to 5 00 each.
10000 Gold Pens, with Silver Extension Cases and Pencils..... 4 00 to 6 00 each.

All of the above list of Goods will be sold for one dollar each. Certificates of all the various articles, stating what each one is worth, are first put into envelopes, sealed up, and mixed; and when ordered, are taken out without regard to choice, and sent by mail, free, giving all a fair chance. On receipt of the Certificate, you will see what you can have, and then it is at your option to send one dollar and take the article or not.

In all transactions by mail, we shall charge for forwarding the Certificates, paying postage on the same, and the usual sales, 25 cents each, which must be inclosed when the Certificate is sent for. Five Certificates will be sent by Express for $2; thirty for $5; sixty-five for $10; and a hundred for $15.

AGENTS.—Those acting as Agents will be allowed ten cents on every Certificate ordered by them, provided their emolument amounts to one dollar. Agents will send 25 cents for every Certificate, and remit 15 cents to us, either in cash or postage stamps. Great inducements will be made by our correspondents in regard to giving their correct address, Town, County, and State. Address

J. H. WINSLOW & CO.,

269 Broadway, New York.

WEDDING CARDS.

French Note Papers, Seals and Presses. Silver Plates, etc., at J. Evans's, 308 Broadway, New York.
For Specimens by mail, send 10 cents.

J. W. EVERETT & CO.

METROPOLITAN

PURCHASING AGENCY.

We will forward to any address, on receipt of order accompanied by cash, ANY ARTICLE REQUIRED, at the LOWEST PRICES. Photographs, Albums, Stereoscopes, Publications, Music, Jewelry, Books, Playing Cards, Army Sutler Goods, or any other articles required by any one.

We will forward, on receipt of 20 cents each, Photographs of GENERALS MEADE, MCCLELLAN, HALLECK, SCOTT, BURNSIDES, SIGEL, BANKS, SHERMAN, HALPINE, SARGENT, BARNARD, ANDREAS, PARTON, PORTER, BUTLER, and many of the leading OFFICERS IN THE ARMY AND NAVY.

Premiums for the Million.

AMERICAN PAPER JEWELRY.—This excellent article, being neat, durable, and a perfect substitute for the more expensive kinds, will relieve the tedium of Jewelry Peddlers. Sent by mail, free, on receipt of price. Single sets, 15 cents, per mail; $1 50 per dozen; per hundred, $10.

Union Badge.

PER HUNDRED, $10.00

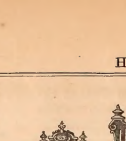
SINGLE BADGES, 15 cents.

Sent free by Express or Mail.

Address J. W. EVERETT & CO.
111 Fulton Street, or P. O. Box 1,614,
NEW YORK CITY.

Sent free by mail for 60 cents.

Dyspepsia Tablets,



FOR INDIGESTION, HEARTBURN, &c. — Manufactured only by

S. G. WELLING, No. 397 Centre St., New York.
Price 50 cents per box. Sold by Druggists generally.

EMPLOYMENT

AT YOUR OWN HOMES.—THOUSANDS CAN REALIZE A HUNDRED DOLLARS WEEKLY.—No one who requires a capital them found in every household; profits 100 per cent.; demand staple as flour. It is the greatest discovery of the age. Full particulars, and a sample to work by, sent free, on the receipt of 50 cents. Address C. MUNRO BROWN, 74 Bleecker Street, New York.

$1 VAN ANDEN'S ONE DOLLAR $1
PORTABLE COPYING PRESS
Acknowledged by all who have used it to be the best and cheapest copying press ever sent by mail. Liberal discount to agents and the trade. HANNAH & VAN ANDEN, No. 20 John St., N. Y. Room No. 1. Send 3 ct. stamp for circular.

A WORD

Meeks' Cabinet and Furniture Warehouse,

No. 699 BROADWAY, and 333 and 335 Fourth Street.

The largest assortment of rich and plain furniture in the city, made of the very best well-seasoned and selected materials, by the best workmen in the country, under the immediate supervision of the firm, whose reputation for excellence of manufacture has been established seventy years. ALSO, an assortment of superior COTTAGE FURNITURE. ☞ Goods packed and shipped to all parts of the world.

Office 429 Broadway.

The "Ridgewood" Patent Smoking Case.

Most ingenious in its combination of the Metallic Case, containing Pipe and Stem, Matches and Pipe Cleaner, with a handsome Tobacco Pouch attached, filling the Pipe by means of a valve, without use of the fingers or waste of Tobacco, the whole securing freedom from all odor, and portable as a Cigar Case. Nothing can excel its comfort and utility for Smokers. It is of various styles, at $1 50, $1 88, $2 25, $2 50, and $3 75, to $5 75 and $6 00, the two latter richly plated and engraved. It is substantially made for service, and secures what it promises for all Smokers, at Home or abroad, in the ARMY or NAVY, style, comfort, and economy. As a present to friends, nothing could be more acceptable. For the Soldier, in Camp or on the March, it is invaluable.

Also in stock

The Ridgewood Smoking Tobacco,

Of superior flavor, and equal in style and quality to any granulated Tobacco in the market. Put up in packages to fit the Pouch (about a week's smoking), or in larger packages as desired, for the general Trade. Cigarettes, Smokers, and Dealers, are invited to call and examine these Goods. Circular sent if desired.

A Liberal Discount to Dealers. Smoke Case sent by mail or Express, paid, on receipt of price and 25 cents.

The Attention of Sutlers is particularly invited to these Goods.

All orders will receive prompt attention.

RIDGEWOOD MANUFACTURING CO.,
Office 429 Broadway, cor. Howard Street, New York.

Portable

Printing Offices.

For sale by the ADAMS PRESS CO., 31 Park Row, New York. Circulars sent free. Specimen Sheets of Type, Cuts, &c., 6 cents, and 6 cents for CHASE & LEAVITT, 25 Lincoln Street, Boston, Mass.

NATIONAL BATTLE PIN.

M'Clellan, Grant, Rosecrans, Burnside, Meade, Gillmore, Burnside, Hooker, Porter, and Sigel. All are the same pattern as the cut, only differing in battle-grounds and date. Perfect photograph likeness in each pin. Plated back and front in fine gold. By enclosing $1, a sample will be sent by mail. Agents wanted in each and the army. The undersigned has the exclusive right of manufacture, and the inventor of this beautiful keepsake and patent for selling it.

LOUIS PHILIP, 609 Broadway, N. Y.

MME. DEMOREST'S MIRROR OF FASHION.—Brilliant and Valuable Novelties in the Fall number of Mme. Demorest's Mirror of Fashion. The Empress Eugenie and Her Maids of Honor. A large sheet of New Braid and Embroidery Patterns, extra-large Colored Fashion Plate, and five Full-size Patterns, with other valuable novelties. Now Ready. Single, 25 cents; yearly, $1, with valuable premiums. Address

MME. DEMOREST, 473 Broadway, N. Y.

Exterminates Catarrh. Rest and Branch, forever. Price $1. Send stamp for pamphlet. Depot, 613 Broadway, N. Y. NORTON & CO., Sole Agents.

Union Playing Cards.

Colored for King, Goddess of Liberty for Queen, and Major for Jack. 52 emanicel cards to the pack. Eagles, Shields, Stars, and Flags are the suits, and you can't tell which is which. Two packs, in case, mailed free on receipt of $1. The usual discount to the trade. Send for circulars. Address

AMERICAN CARD COMPANY,
605 Broadway, N. Y., or 195 William Street, N. Y.

AGENTS WANTED to take orders for VICTOR'S HISTORY OF THE REBELLION, the acknowledged standard, indorsed by the President, Cabinet, Members of Congress, Governors, Generals, Statesmen, and by the press generally. Two volumes are now ready, cap 8vo illustrated with steel engravings. Sold by subscription only, and exclusive territory given. Canvassers make $50 to $100 per week. Send for circular of terms, &c. Address

EDWARD F. HOVEY, 13 Spruce Street, N. Y.

Watches and Jewelry.

CHEAPEST AND BEST yet offered to the public. For list of Articles and Prices, address

PARKER COX & CO., N. Y.

AGENTS WANTED.—Call and examine, or 10 samples sent free by mail for 60 cents. Also retail for $2, urgently needed by every person, by

T. S. WOLLOTT, 191 Chatham Square, N. Y.

French Solitaire Patterns.

These fashionable goods are made of the finest Ivory, and brought to a high polish of all colors, Black, White, Red, Blue, &c., engraved with Initial Letters, Old English, &c. Complete sets $1 50, free by mail. Trade supplied.

JOHN F. PHELPS, 403 Broadway, New York.

Deafness—Sound Magnifying Tubes. Can be concealed in the ear; enables deaf persons to hear as public assemblies. Send for a descriptive pamphlet to

E. B. HASLAM, 20 Nassau St., New York.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK,

Have just published:

THE RING OF AMASIS. From the Papers of a Germ-an Physician. By Mrs. Eliot Bumer Lettice (Gwen Meredith). 12mo, Cloth, $1 00.

MARTIN POLE. By Jane Saturess, Author of "Abel Drake's Wife," &c. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

KNAPP'S FRENCH READING-BOOK; CHRESTOMATHIE FRANÇAISE: Containing I. Selections from the best French Writers, with Grammatical References to the Author's French Grammar. II. The Master-Pieces of Molière, Corneille, Racine, and Voltaire; with Explanatory Notes, a Glossary of Idiomatic Phrases, and a Vocabulary. By William I. Knapp, Professor of Modern Languages and Literature in Madison University, N. Y. 12mo, Cloth, $1 25.

ELEANOR'S VICTORY. A Novel. By M. E. Braddon, Author of "Aurora Floyd," "John Marchmont's Legacy," &c. 8vo, Illustrated, Paper, 75 cents.

HEAD'S DAILY WALK WITH WISE MEN. Daily Walk with Wise Men; or, Religious Exercises for Every Day in the Year. Selected, Arranged, and Especially Adapted, by Rev. Reuben Head. Large 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

ALCOCK'S JAPAN. The Capital of the Tycoon: a Narrative of a Three Years' Residence in Japan. By Sir Rutherford Alcock, K. C. B., Her Majesty's Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary in Japan. With Numerous Illustrations. 2 vols. 12mo, Cloth, $2 50.

THE BIVOUAC AND THE BATTLE-FIELD; or, Campaign Sketches in Virginia and Maryland. By Captain Charles D. Rhind, U. S. A. 12mo, Cloth, $1 25.

KAY'S CONDITION OF THE ENGLISH PEOPLE. The Social Condition and Education of the People in England. By Joseph Kay, LL. M., of Trinity College, Cambridge; Barrister at Law; and late Travelling Bachelor of the University of Cambridge. 12mo, Cloth, $1 00.

LIVE IT DOWN. A Story of the Light Lands. By J. C. Heywood, Author of "Olive Blake's Good Work," "Isabel; the Young Wife and the Old Love," &c. New Edition. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

ROMOLA. A Novel. By the Author of "Adam Bede," "The Mill on the Floss," "Silas Marner," and "Scenes of Clerical Life." With numerous Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, $1 25; Cloth, $1 50.

AFRICAN HUNTING FROM NATAL TO THE ZAMBESI, including Lake Ngami, Mosilikatze, and Zambesi, &c., from 1853 to 1860. By William Charles Baldwin, F. R. G. S. With Map, Fifty Illustrations, and Portrait Zwecker, and a Portrait of the Great Sportsman. Small 8vo, Cloth, $1 25.

BARRINGTON. A Novel. By Charles Lever, Author of "Charles O'Malley," "Gerald Fitzgerald," "One of Them," "The Martins of Cro' Martin," and "Maurice Tiernay," "The Dodd Family Abroad," &c., &c., &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

AURORA FLOYD. A Novel. By M. E. Braddon, Author of "Lady Audley's Secret." 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

ABEL DRAKE'S WIFE. A Novel. By John Saunders. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

FANNY KEMBLE'S GEORGIA PLANTATION. Journal of a Residence on a Georgian Plantation in 1838-1839. By Frances Anne Kemble. 12mo, Cloth, $1 25.

DRAPER'S INTELLECTUAL DEVELOPMENT OF EUROPE. A History of the Intellectual Development of Europe. By John William Draper, M.D., LL.D., Professor of Chemistry and Physiology in the University of New York. Author of "A Treatise on Human Physiology," &c., &c. 8vo, Cloth, $3 00.

☞ Any of the above Works sent by mail, post-paid, on receipt of the price.

HARPER'S

NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

TERMS.

One Copy for one Year $3 00
Two Copies for One Year 5 00
An Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of Ten Subscribers, at $2 50 each, or 1 Copy for $25 00.
HARPER'S MAGAZINE and HARPER'S WEEKLY, together, one year, $6 00.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS.

Circulation over 100,000.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

Single Copies Six Cents.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year $3 00
One Copy for Two Years 5 00
And an Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of Ten Subscribers, at $2 50 each, or 11 Copies for $25.
Terms for Advertising in HARPER'S WEEKLY, per line for inside, and One Dollar per line for outside Advertisements.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS.

PHYSIOGNOMY, PHRENOLOGY, PHYSIOLOGY, PSYCHOLOGY, ETHNOLOGY, including the various "signs of character," and how to read them, given in the PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL. A new volume, 28, commenced in July. $1 50 a year. Sample Nos. sent by first post for 15 cents.

FOWLER & WELLS, No. 308 Broadway, N. Y.

$60 A MONTH! We want Agents at $60 a month, expenses paid, to sell our Horseshoe Puzzle, Oriental Burners, and 13 other articles. Circulars sent Free. SHAW & CLARK, Biddeford, Maine.

THE PERFLEXED PIRATES.

LOUIS NAPOLEON (a Corsair). "Vell, Meestare Jonnibull! vat you see eat time you peep round ze corners ze two beeg glass?"

JOHN BULL (Another). "I see a werry suspicious looking cove a sittin' in the New York harbor, with arf-a-dozen big Roochian blood-hounds about him."

LOUIS NAPOLEON. "Hein?"

JOHN BULL. "Humph!"

Miss Kate Denin,

The celebrated actress, says: "I have used HENRY'S KALAGEN for many years and find it the most cleansing ale for keeping it in its full beauty and luxuriance that I have ever used. I can freely recommend it to every lady. It contains no oil, alcohol, or any other injurious ingredients, and is the most perfect hair-dressing in the world. Price 50 cents. Depot 46 Cliff Street, N. Y.

ATTENTION SOLDIERS!

H. BROWN & CO. 1ST N.Y. ART. — CHESTON, 1ST L. ART. NYV. — CS. BUTTUM, 4TH R.I.V. — A.K. MILLER, Co. B. 5TH N.Y.

J.C. HENRY, 5TH N.Y.V. — L. ALLEN CO. 1ST N.Y. — W. JONES, 8TH N.H.V.

JOHN CRANE, 1ST N.H.V. — WILSON & CO. 1ST N.Y. — DAVIS & CO. 1ST N.Y.

All our Badges are 1¼ inches in diameter.

Solid Silver shield, with Name, Rank, and Regiment, $1 00 each. Star, Diamond, and Clover Leaf Corps Badges, with Name, Rank, and Regiment; enamelled Red, White, or Blue, $1 00 each. Circle, Cross, and Maltese Cross, enamelled Red, White, or Blue, with Name, Rank, and Regiment, made of Solid Silver, $1 25 each. Company Pins from A to L, made of Solid Silver, with Name, Rank, and Regiment, 25 00 per dozen. Silver plated Corps Badges, with Red, White, or Blue enamel, $8 00 per dozen. Send for a circular. Address DUNN & MOORE, Manufacturing Jewelers, 208 Broadway, N. Y.

IVORY SLEEVE BUTTONS

OR STUDS—Red, White, and Black, engraved with Initials. The pair, will be sent free on receipt of the price by mail. For sale by WM. M. WELLING, manufacturer of Ivory goods, 307 Canal Street 84, N. Y., and 19 Golden Elephant. A liberal discount to the trade.

ASSORTED in the family design of the SOLDIER'S COMPANY FUND. The letter representing the COMPANY is in BOLD RELIEF, and very conspicuous.

The under-signed will forward to any soldier one of the above pins in solid silver, with name and regiment clearly engraved upon it, on receipt of One Dollar.

For CORPS BADGES, see inside.

Address J. G. PACKARD & CO., 208 Broadway, N. Y.

PHYSIOGNOMY,

OR SIGNS OF CHARACTER, and "How to Read Them." Physiology, the functions of the body; Pneumagy, the organs of the brain; Ethnology, the races of man; and Psychology, the science of the soul, are given in the PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL. Vol. 38 commenced July 1st. Single number, 10 cents, by first post. FOWLER & WELLS, 308 Broadway, N. Y.

Amalgam Bells.

Cheapest and best for Churches, Schools, Factories, &c. Equal in tone and durability to any other metal, and two-thirds less in price, or 15 cts. per lb. Send for a circular to the manufacturer, JOHN B. ROBINSON, late PRATT, ROBINSON & CO., 199 William St., N. Y.

GOLD PENS AND CASES.

Retailed at wholesale prices. 14 kt. Gold Pen, Solid Silver Case, $1 50, warranted for one year, guarantee accompanying each Pen. Send for a circular. Pens replated on receipt of 75 cents.

E. S. JOHNSON, 15 Maiden Lane, N. Y.

A Beautiful Complexion free from Tan, Pimples and Freckles, may easily be procured by using the "PALM OF THOUSAND FLOWERS." For shaving it is unsurpassed. It is composed of pain oil, honey, and other valuable articles, highly perfumed by its own ingredients, and when used for washing, night and morning, renders the skin soft and white, and free from blemish. Price 50 cents.

The Trade supplied by HOWARD, SANGER & CO., 105 and 107 Chambers Street, N. Y., and for sale by all Druggists.

The Diaphragm Filter,

Manufactured and sold by Alexander McKenzie, Plumber and Hydraulic Engineer, No. 346 4th Street, New York, is the kind of Force Filter to which I alluded in my recent report to the Croton Board. I consider the artificial sandstone which constitutes the filtering medium to be an excellent article for the purpose. The instrument is quite durable, and requires to be covered occasionally to insure its action.—New York, April 25, 1862.

JAMES R. CHILTON, M.D., Chemist.

From the N. Y. Illustrated News, Jan. 10, 1863.

"One of the prettiest, most convenient, and decidedly the best and cheapest time-piece for general and reliable use ever offered."

Magic Time OBSERVERS!

The Perfection of Mechanism,

DEING a HUNTING, OR OPEN FACE, OR LADY'S OR GENTLEMAN'S WATCH CASE-BEARER, WITH PATENT SELF-WINDING IMPROVEMENT.

A most pleasing novelty, of which we are the only consignees in this country! It has within it and connected with its machinery its own winding attachment, rendering a key entirely superfluous. The case of this watch are composed of two metals, the outer one being fine 15 carat gold. It has the improved ruby action lever movement, and is warranted an accurate time-piece. Has one is convenient, measuring but two inches across it. Price, superbly engraved, and set of half dozen, $104. Beautiful Watches in neat Morocco boxes, $25. If sent by mail, the postage is 56 cents; registering, 20 cents.

THROP, CASH, INVARIABLY IN ADVANCE.

HUBBARD BROS., Importers,

Broadway, cor. Courtlandt Street, N. Y.

GUNS, PISTOLS, Military Goods,

FRENCH and ENGLISH FANCY GOODS.

Also, a full assortment of

Jet, Coral, and Steel Goods.

Schuyler, Hartley & Graham,

19 Maiden Lane & 23 John Street, N.Y.

15 Rue d'Enghien, Paris.

47 Hampton St., Birmingham, Eng.

Shuits' Onguent, warranted to produce a full set of Whiskers in six weeks, or money refunded. Sent prepaid, for 50 cents. Address C. F. SHULTS, Troy, N. Y.

"Get the Best."

AGENTS WANTED TO SELL THISTLE & CO.'S ENTIRELY NEW 12 and 16c. FREE STATIONERY PACKAGES. They are the largest, best, and cheapest manufactured. Circular sent free. Greatest inducements to Agents. THISTLE & CO., 159 Nassau Street.

American Enamelled Metallic Collar Co.,

No. 94 Pine Street, New York,

Are now manufacturing their splendid Collars, which for shape, appearance, and durability are FAR IN ADVANCE of anything heretofore produced.

They are the inventors and manufacturers of the only real "TURN-OVER" COLLAR ever offered.

These Collars are infinitely SUPERIOR TO STEEL, being more pliable, and the material of which they are manufactured BEING A NON-CONDUCTOR, renders them free from the objectionable feature of the metal collar, viz.: the courting of that dangerous element, electricity, in the shape of lightning. Inclose $1 for a "Chelsea," or $1 50 for a genuine "half turn-over" collar, to the AMERICAN ENAMELLED METALLIC COLLAR COMPANY, Box No. 5173 New York City Post Office, and receive it by return mail.

$22 WATCHES. $22

Genuine American Lever Watches, in Coin Silver, heavy Hunting Case, warranted, for $22. Retail price $40.

Genuine Full Jewelled American Lever Watches, in 4 ounce Coin Silver Hunting Case, gold joint, the best watch for the money, warranted at equally low rates. All orders from the army must be prepaid, as the express companies will not take Bills for Collection on soldiers.

J. L. FERGUSON, Importer of Watches.
209 Broadway New York.

WATCHES FREE.

$15 Per Day Easy $15

Agents in Towns, and Soldiers in camp or discharged, are making easily $15 per day selling our GREAT NEW and WONDERFUL UNION PRIZE AND STATIONERY PACKAGES, NOVEL AND UNEQUALED, and unlike all the old style; containing All New Articles, and of first quality. Writing Materials, Games, Useful and Fancy Articles, Likeness of Heroes, Camp Companions (for the Army), rich gifts of Jewelry, &c., &c., altogether worth $1, for ONLY 25 cents. We send the watch for a present to your friend in the Army. No family should be without it. Packs immediately on quick. Soldiers in camp can make Agents, and make money fast. A SPLENDID WATCH, and other valuable and first-class Prizes presented free to all Agents. Packages in endless variety and at all prices. Sample package sent through the country. Send for NEW Circulars for 1863, containing EXTRA Inducements. Try us. Don't delay. Costs nothing on inside page.

S. C. RICKARDS & CO., 162 Nassau Street, New York, largest and oldest Gift Package House in the World.

FISK & HATCH,

Bankers and Dealers in Government Securities,

AND

AGENTS FOR THE UNITED STATES FIVE-TWENTY LOAN,

No. 38 Wall Street.

Orders received for Five-Twenty Bonds at Par, interest payable in the State of payment.

U. S. 7.30 Treasury Notes.

" One Year Certificates.

" Six per Cent. Bonds of 1881.

And all other Government Securities bought, sold, and constantly on hand.

Accounts of Banks, Bankers, and others received on favorable terms.

Special attention given to the Collection of Government Vouchers, Quartermasters' Checks, and maturing Certificates of Indebtedness.

FISK & HATCH, 38 Wall Street.

18 1 Doz. free by Mail for $1 25.

Beautiful Card Photographs for Card Photographs, to hang up or stand up. We call them the "Improved American Carte Parte."

Sold by all Booksellers, Fruit Dealers, or Fancy Goods Men

E. & H. T. ANTHONY,

501 Broadway, New York.

Manufacturers of Photographic Materials,

Photographic Albums, and Stereoscopic Views.

"Most Laughable Thing on Earth."

A game that can be played by any number, and productive of Roars of Laughter. Just the thing for Social Parties, Public Halls at Home. A rare cure for Home-Sickness, Ennui, and the Blues. Sent, post-paid, for 25 cents. ADAMS, 25 Cornhill, Boston.

Purify your Complexion—My prescription is a positive cure for freckles, tan, and pimples, in 4 weeks. Receipt sent post-paid in 1703 for 50c. Send to stamp address on receipt of 30 cts. WM. POTTER, Box 1253, Philadelphia.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

Agents, male or female, Sutlers, Canvassers, and all having some time to spare, are particularly requested, as a FAVOR, to send us their address, as we will send in return, free, information for which they will be THANKFUL. We offer extraordinary inducements, by which we can make $5 to $15 per day. Address, We want addresses from EVERY COUNTY in the U. S. and EVERY Regiment in the Army. Address in full, RICHARDS & CO., 37 and 39 Nassau Street, Box 2151, N. Y.

WANTED! WANTED!

Do you want to know how to make Cogwood for Luxuriant Whiskers or Moustaches? We will send you Gentleman Jaggery's Secret, and our Receipt and our Guarantee for $2 00, postage free. Address

H. HUTCHINSON & CO., Drawer 111, Milwaukee, Wis.

Broker's Stock of unredeemed goods for sale at $1 for each article, consisting of a varied assortment of rich and valuable goods, worth from $5 to $300 each. Agents wanted. Send 3 cents for a circular. Address

ADDERSON & CO., 319 Bowery, P. O. Box 4586, New York.

A BEAUTIFUL MICROSCOPE

For 25 cts. (coin preferred), magnifying small objects 500 times. Five of different powers for $1 00. Mailed free. Address F. C. BOWEN, Box 220, Boston, Mass.

Photograph Albums!

SUPERB STYLES, in ARABESQUE and GOLD, at ANY PRICE from $1 50 to $20 00 each. Very Elegant Albums, French Style, for 50 pictures, sent for $5 00.

Catalogue and Price List sent on receipt of Five Cents.

W. LUCAS & CO., 173 Broadway, N. Y.

Fogg's Double-Action Patent Lever Skate Buckle.

Manufactured and for sale on Straps, at wholesale, by F. STEVENS, Manufacturer of Skates, Straps, and Leather Goods, 105 Pearl Street, New York, 26 Kilby Street, Boston.

MUNN & CO.,

Solicitors of American and Foreign Patents,

And Publishers of the ILLUSTRATED SCIENTIFIC AMERICAN, 37 Park Row, N. Y. Pamphlets of information concerning Patents, rates, Specimens of the Paper, free.

$7. WATCHES. $7.

A Beautiful Engraved Gold-Plated Watch, Lever Cap, small size, Quadruple Movement, and time-keeper. Sent free by mail, in Metallic case, for only $7. A Solid Silver, same as above, $9. Each warranted to the SAINT LOUIS WATCH & CO., 32 Gaff Block, Ann Street, N. Y.

Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper, of Sept. 26, says: "Messrs. NORTON & CO. have established two very desirable things in a watch—cheapness and reliability. When it is borne in mind that for $7 a person can have an excellent timekeeper, there will be great opportunity in all the affairs of life."

DR. B. C. PERRY,

DERMATOLOGIST,

49 Bond Street, New York,

Formerly of 29 Winter Street, Boston, treats successfully all Diseases of the Scalp, Loss of Hair, and Premature Blanching. Also, removes Moth Freckles, and other Discolorations from the face, without injury to the texture or color of the skin.

For particulars enclose stamp for Circular.

A Household Word.—Buy your Housekeeping Articles at BANNISHIP'S, Cooper Institute, New York.

How to Paint Photographs.

A NEW WORK.

Just published. Price 10 cents. Sold by all principal Booksellers, Artists' supply-men, and Stock Dealers, and sent, post-paid, by the publishers.

J. E. TILTON & CO., Boston.

VINELAND.

LANDS.—TO ALL WANTING FARMS.—Large and thriving settlement, mild and healthful climate, 30 miles south of Philadelphia, by railroad. Rich soil, produces large crops, which can now be seen growing. Twenty and thirty acre tracts, at from $10 to $20 per acre, payable within four years. Good business opening for MANUFACTURERS of Furniture, Shoes, Tobacco, and pottery. It is now the most improving place East or West. Hundreds are settling and building. The beauty with which the place is laid out is unsurpassed. Letters answered. Papers containing information and giving full information will be sent free. Address CHAS. K. LANDIS, Vineland Post Office, Cumberland County, New Jersey.

From Report of Solon Robinson, Agricultural Editor of the Tribune:—It is one of the most extensive fertile tracts, in an almost level position and suitable condition for pleasant farming that we know of this side of the Western prairies.

Patent Fountain Brush, for Marking Boxes, Bundles, &c. Man fd by E. P. CLARK & CO., Northampton, Mass.

FINE DRESS SHIRTS TO ORDER. UNRIVALED

In Manufacture, Fitting, and Material. At UNION ADAMS, No. 637 Broadway.

STEEL COLLARS

AND CUFFS, ENAMULED LILY WHITE.

Having the appearance and comfort of linen, have been worn in England for the last two years in preference to any other collar, as they are vastly cleaner in use than white with a sponge.

To Military Men and Travelers they are invaluable.

Price $1 each, sent by Post to any part of the Union on receipt of $1.25.

WHOLESALE AND RETAIL.

AGENTS WANTED in every Town in the Union.

S. W. H. WARD, Sole Agent for U. S., 387 B'way, N. Y.

WARD'S PERFECT FITTING SHIRTS

Made to Measure at $24. $30, $36, & $42 PER DOZEN.

Self-Measurement for Shirts.

Printed directions for self-measurement, list of prices, and drawings of different styles of shirts and collars sent free everywhere.

FRENCH FLANNEL OVERSHIRTS,

the largest assortment in the United States, $3 75 each; all cut one yard long.

Shirts sent by mail on receipt of the cost. The cost of postage must be enclosed.—62 cents for each Shirt.

FRENCH MERINO UNDERSHIRTS AND DRAWERS, $2 00, and $2 25.

SCOTCH LAMB'S WOOL UNDERSHIRTS AND DRAWERS.

S. W. H. WARD, 387 Broadway, N. Y.

A Splendid New Book for Boys!

"The Drummer Boy

Is a story of Burnside's Expedition to North Carolina—a boy's book—full of stirring adventure and rapid incident. The life and enthusiasm of the young hero is painted in vivid colors."—New York Evening Post.

Elegantly illustrated. Price $1 00.

Just published by J. E. TILTON & CO., Boston, and sold at all book-stores.

HARPER'S WEEKLY

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. VII.—No. 356.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 24, 1863. [SINGLE COPIES SIX CENTS. $3.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1863, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

THE WAR IN EAST TENNESSEE—RECEPTION OF GENERAL BURNSIDE BY THE UNIONISTS OF KNOXVILLE.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

THE OLD FLAG IN EAST TENNESSEE.

On page 673 we illustrate one of the most interesting scenes of the recent campaign, namely, THE WELCOME TENDERED TO GENERAL BURNSIDE BY THE UNIONISTS OF EAST TENNESSEE when he entered Knoxville. It seems to have almost overpowered our brave troops. The Albany Evening Journal publishes the following letter from a son of Senator Harris, who was with Burnside:

HEAD-QUARTERS ARMY OF THE OHIO, KNOXVILLE, TENNESSEE, Sunday, September 6, 1863.

MY DEAR FATHER,—Our troops entered this place on the 2d inst., without opposition on the part of the rebels, who fled at our approach. A rapid march of 250 miles over mountain roads, made with artillery, infantry, and cavalry, was deemed next to impossible by the rebel General Buckner, and before he was aware of it our columns were precipitating themselves down the southern slopes of the mountains, with trains of supplies following almost at a trot. It was the most beautiful march of the war. We were surprised at it—the rebels still more so—they did not know where to look for us, and as we came upon them by several different roads, they overestimated our force, magnifying it to an army of from 60,000 to 100,000 men, and, without the slightest attempt at resistance, retreated southward, crossed the Holsten River, and burned the London bridge, 1800 feet long, to prevent pursuit.

From time to time during our march I have written you about our ride through Kentucky, but it was not to be compared in interest to that which we made through East Tennessee. The country is wild and unsettled until you approach Knoxville. We marched from 25 to 30 miles a day, and slept at night sometimes under a tent, sometimes under a fly, and once we bivouacked in a rain that wet us all through. General Burnside had not so much as an over-coat, but with his saddle for a pillow he lay down and we followed suit. I was fortunate enough to have my horse-blanket and the cape of my over-coat. We were so tired that we slept like bricks, as we did every night, and the first thing I saw the next morning was the General making a fire and every one of the Staff still asleep around him.

As we approached the settled part of the country we were greeted every where with shouts for the Union, cheers for the old flag, and the most unmistakable evidences of loyalty. At every house the entire family would appear, often with buckets of fresh water and fruit for the welcome Yankees, and some of the people would scarcely ask for pay for the forage which we had seized to feed our animals, although the corn we had taken was all they had to look to for their winter's food. Sometimes the Stars and Stripes would be carried out to the gate of the door-yard by one of the girls, and the General and Staff would take off their hats, while the escort following gave three cheers. Old gray-haired men would come out and seize the General's hand, bidding him God-speed, and men would flock in at every halt to be armed and join us. The sufferings of these people have been terrible. I have seen them come from the caves of the mountains, where they have been hiding from the rebels for months.

I have seen widows and orphans whose husbands and brothers and fathers have been murdered because they were Union men—no other crime being alleged. All kinds of atrocities have been committed. Death in the most horrid forms has been visited upon every man who dared show himself, in this part of the country, unarmed in the rebel cause.

"Glory be to God, the Yankees have come!" "The Flag's come back to Tennessee!" Such were the welcomes all along the road, and as we entered Knoxville it was past all description. The people seemed frantic with joy. I never knew what the Love of Liberty was before. After two years of servitude under the most tyrannical despotism, they now hold up their heads and thank God they are free. The old flag has been hidden in mattresses and under carpets. It now floats to the breeze at every staff in East Tennessee. Ladies wear it—carry it—wave it! Little children clap their hands and kiss it.

Can you imagine the effect of this on me? Suppose you walked down street, after riding 250 miles on horseback, with a sabre on one side and a pistol on the other, and every man, woman, and child would bow to you with a glad smile of welcome, or shake hands with you and say God bless you? I could go on much longer, but I can't do justice to the subject. My heart is so full, and I am so thankful to Almighty God for this bloodless and yet glorious victory, that I will not attempt to say any more on the subject.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 24, 1863.

THE OCTOBER ELECTIONS.

THE scattering returns which have thus far come in from the elections in Pennsylvania and Ohio render it probable that Governor Curtin has been re-elected over Woodward by some 10,000 to 15,000 majority, and that John Brough has been elected over Vallandigham by 50,000 to 75,000 majority. We think the full returns are rather calculated to increase than to diminish these figures.

The result is one upon which every true patriot may congratulate himself. There is no State Governor in the country whom the nation could worse spare at the present crisis than Andrew G. Curtin; and there is no man in the country or out of it whose election by a great State like Ohio to an office of power and trust, would have been so heavy a discouragement to loyal men as Clement L. Vallandigham. His defeat and Curtin's election will probably give the death-blow to Copperheadism, and will convince the ambitious demagogues of the "peace party" that they must try some other road to fortune if they desire popular favor.

An attempt was made at the last moment to relieve Judge Woodward from the charge of Copperheadism by no less a personage than Major-General George B. M'Clellan. That officer wrote a letter to be published on the morning of the election which contains the following paragraph:

I desire to state clearly and distinctly that, having some few days ago had a full conversation with Judge Woodward, I find that our views agree; and I regard his election as Governor of Pennsylvania called for by the interests of the nation.

I understand Judge Woodward to be in favor of the prosecution of the war with all the means at the command of the loyal States until the military power of the rebellion is destroyed. I understand him to be of the opinion that while the war is urged with all possible decision and energy, the policy directing it should be in consonance with the principles of humanity and civilization, working no injury to private rights and property, not demanded by military necessity and recognized by military law among civilized nations; and, finally, I understand him to agree with me in the opinion that the sole great objects of this war are the restoration of the unity of the nation, the preservation of the Constitution, and the supremacy of the laws of the country.

The people would feel obliged to General M'Clellan if he would be more definite in his charges, and specify those portions of the policy of Government which he deems not "in consonance with the principles of humanity and civilization;" and those acts which lead him to believe that the President has other "objects" in the prosecution of the war than "the restoration of the unity of the nation, the preservation of the Constitution, and the supremacy of the laws." For, in the absence of specific charges and statements of fact, the people regard these vague insinuations as a mere veil to hide hostility to the war itself. Hence, they vote Mr. Woodward out of Court pretty decisively, notwithstanding the indorsement of his military friend.

WHAT TO DO WITH MONEY.

THE papers say that every body has been growing rich out of the war. Certainly the display of wealth and fashion in the Central Park has never been equaled in this country, and compares favorably with similar scenes in the London Parks and the Champs Elysées of Paris. Houses have risen enormously in price; first-class mansions are not to be had; it is said there is not single house in the Fifth Avenue for sale or to let. Though prices of all articles of luxury have advanced from 50 to 150 per cent. within two years, the consumption of them was never so active as it is. Ball, Black, & Co. and Tiffany never sold so many diamonds and so much rich jewelry as this season; Stewart never sold so many silk dresses and laces; the great carriage-makers never built so many carriages, or the great upholsterers so much expensive furniture. Evidences of increasing wealth and increasing extravagance meet even the most unobserving eye at every turn; and it must be true, as the papers say, that some people, at all events, are growing rich out of the war.

Nor could it be otherwise. The Government of the United States has issued $400,000,000 of legal-tender money, which is in circulation, and is preparing to issue as much more. The Banks have increased their circulation likewise from $135,000,000 to probably $175,000,000, and new Banks are being authorized under Mr. Chase's Act, which will presently issue $300,000,000 more. This is besides $150,000,000 of three-year United States notes, bearing 7.30 interest; over $200,000,000 of 6 per cent. certificates of indebtedness, maturing in twelve months; nearly $100,000,000 of twenty-year 6 per cent. bonds; about $100,000,000 of 5 and 6 per cent. certificates of deposit; and about $275,000,000 of 6 per cent. bonds payable in twenty years and redeemable in five. This latter class of securities, not being currency, can not fairly come under the head of paper-money; though, as they are really paper, deriving its value from the confidence reposed in its maker, they are in effect an addition of just so much as they sell for to the apparent wealth of the nation, and contribute perhaps not less than the actual legal-tender notes to the pending inflation, and to the general development of commerce, industry, and prosperity.

This development has not been without its drawback. Gold has risen to 156, and may go still higher. It is probable that the stock of gold in the country is being diminished by export, and it is certain that hoarding has very largely diminished the stock which is offered in market. Thus the money which people make in these days, under the influence of copious issues of paper, is not the money they used to make in the old times when gold was par, but an inferior article, now only worth 75 cents to the dollar in gold, and possibly destined to fall still lower. The memorable examples of the French assignats and our own Continental money, which became valueless, and of the Confederate currency, of which it now takes ten dollars to purchase one gold dollar in Richmond, warn us that this money which speculators are now coining so fast, and which is flowing so freely into the coffers of every merchant, manufacturer, and farmer, may, some time or other, prove a very different article from that which it is now presumed to be. There are excellent reasons—which have been heretofore mentioned in this column—for believing that the fate which overwhelmed the assignats and the Continental money will never overtake our legal tenders. Thus far, there is no more money afloat than is required for the transaction of the business of the country; and if the legal tenders were called in, commerce would of necessity be compelled to substitute in their place some other kind of paper wherewith to make exchanges. But a much larger difference than now divides gold from paper may fairly be feared—especially if the war lasts much longer. And, in this point of view, people who are making money in these days are anxiously inquiring what they shall do with it, in order to protect themselves against a heavy depreciation hereafter.

For some time past there has been throughout the country an active consumption of railway stocks and bonds. It was always possible, in the old times, for a shrewd man to buy these securities so as to get 8 or 9 per cent. on his investment. Now it is hardly possible to buy any safe railway property which will yield over six per cent. on the investment, so thoroughly has the market been swept of the best class of bonds and stocks, and so enormous has been the amount of money seeking investment. A man who invests money in a good railway stock or bond, at the present time, must be content with six per cent. interest, that interest payable in paper-money. The same remark will apply to sound City, County, and State Bonds.

Real estate will yield still less. In the large cities houses and lots have advanced materially of late, and speculation in land has again broken out at the West. Allowing for the heavy amount of taxation which this kind of property will have to bear hereafter, it is questionable whether, on the average, real estate bought at present will yield its owner net five per cent., payable in paper-money.

There are those who put their money in gold and hoard it. These persons are sure of not losing all they have made. If, when they make $1500, they buy $1000 in gold, they are sure of having at last two-thirds of their means safe, in any event. But they are pretty sure of losing the other third, besides the interest on their money, for gold hoards yield no income. Many of these holders of gold argue that when it rises to "the right point" they will sell. That is precisely their mistake. When it does rise to "the right point" they will be more eager to buy than ever. Many persons who could not be persuaded to buy gold at 110, eighteen months ago, could not be driven to sell it last March, when it was 172, and only thought of parting with it when it dropped to 122, sixty days ago. And this is human nature. The more gold rises the more tenaciously people who hoard will cling to it; it is only when it has fallen heavily, and looks as if it would never go up again, that these misers will consent to sell. Thus the chances are very great that the gold which is being bought now at 140 and 150, and hoarded, will be held through fluctuation after fluctuation, and finally sold out somewhere in the neighborhood of par; having thus, as we said, insured to the hoarder the safety of two-thirds of his money at the cost of the other third—a pretty high premium of insurance.

There is, however, one investment now offered in this market which promises both a suitable income and perfect security, that is, United States 6 per cent. bonds. These bonds, which are offered at the United States Sub-Treasuries and at the various Government agencies at par in currency, yield 6 per cent. per annum, PAYABLE IN GOLD. There were $500,000,000 of them authorized by Congress to be issued; of these, $275,000,000 have already been sold, leaving $225,000,000 yet to be disposed of. The gold for the payment of interest on these bonds is received from customs duties. At the present time the receipts from customs at this port alone will average $55,000,000, and from all the ports together probably over $75,000,000—which is the interest, at 6 per cent, on $1,250,000,000. The customs duties will, in the nature of things, continue to increase so long as the prosperity of the country endures. Thus the purchaser of these United States bonds insures himself against the depreciation of the currency without running the risk which is assumed by the buyer of gold—namely, the risk of a loss on the future fall in gold, and the loss of interest. If gold rises, the income of a United States bondholder increases simultaneously, while that of every other bond or shareholder diminishes. If gold falls, United States bonds rise, and the holder can make money by selling out at the advance, while a fall in gold naturally depresses all property and stocks, United States securities alone excepted. In either event, therefore, the creditor of the United States is in a safer position than the creditor of a shareholder in any private corporation, or the holder of real estate or gold.

It is these considerations which have led to the absorption of the five-twenty bonds at the rate of nearly a million a day for nine months, and which probably insure the sale of the whole issue by New Year.

THE LOUNGER.

NOTICE.

THE Lounger receives so many applications, in various ways, for notices in these columns, that it is only fair for him to state that he must certainly disappoint most of the applicants, for he speaks only of those books and things in general which, for some reason, especially interest him. He can not comment upon every thing sent him; nor can he explain why he speaks of one thing and not of another. He prints this little notice in the fond confidence of Sairey Gamp, who says what Miss Alcott most felicitously prefixes as a motto to her most racy and delightful "Hospital Sketches"—"which no names being mentioned, no offense could be took."

THE RUSSIANS.

THE Russian fleet in the harbor of New York is a pretty and significant sight. The welcome to the Russian officers was a striking and memorable event. John Bull in the omnibus and at windows and on the corners of streets laughed at the "splendor" of the spectacle. But its meaning was not to be measured by the quantity of gold lace on the military coats; it was to be apprehended by the mind's eye, John.

At this time there are also English and French ships riding at anchor in the harbor. And what the mind's eye sees as it looks is, that England and France are the quasi enemies of this country and of Russia; that England and France have recognized the belligerent rights of the rebels, and that Russia has not; that if an English pirate, like the Florida or Alabama, should appear off the bay, the English and French ships would treat her as a commissioned vessel of war, and the Russian ships would treat her as a pirate. These are little things visible to the mind's eye, whatever the excellent John Bull may think of the "splendor" of the civic reception.

John thinks that we are absurdly bamboozled by the Russian compliments, and laughs to see us deceived by the sympathy of Muscovy. If one of the Russian officers, he says, were to express in St. Petersburg a tithe of the regard for American institutions which Americans recklessly attribute to them he would soon be in Siberia. But we are not very much deceived. Americans understand that the sympathy of France in our Revolution was not from love of us, but from hatred of England. They know, as Washington long ago told them, that romantic friendship between nations is not to be expected. And if they had latterly expected it, England has utterly undeceived them. Americans do not suppose that Russia is upon the point of becoming a republic; but they observe that the English aristocracy and the French empire hate a republic quite as much as the Russian monarchy hates it; and they remark that while the French empire imports coolies into its colonies, and winks at slavery, and while the British Government cheers a political enterprise founded upon slavery, and by its chief organs defends the system, Russia emancipates her serfs.

There is not the least harm in observing these little facts. Russia, John Bull will remember, conducts herself as a friendly power. That is all. England and France have shown themselves to be unfriendly powers. And we do not forget it. Russia treats us in our civil war as we treated England in her Crimean and Indian wars. We have no "frenzy" of gratitude for it, but we have a very distinct and permanent perception of the fact. As to the gold lace and the splendor of the civic ovation, if they were inadequate, the Russians doubtless freely forgive the want of rings upon the hand in consideration of the warmth and sincerity of the pressure.

CONSERVATISM AND RESPECTABILITY.

IN the middle of last July Abraham Franklin, a young man of this city, quiet and inoffensive, and a member of Zion African Church, went to his mother to see if he could do any thing for her safety. She said that if God willed she must die she was ready. The son knelt by her and prayed God's protection for his mother, and had scarcely risen from his knees when the crowd broke down the door, seized him, beat him with clubs, and then hung him in the presence of his mother. The soldiers drove the mob away and cut down his body. They passed on, and the mob returning suspended it again, cutting it to pieces while it hung.

The sister of Sergeant Simmons, of the Fifty-fourth Massachusetts regiment, was at home with her children. The mob broke in, seized her boy of six or seven years old; asked him whether he preferred to be hung or have his throat cut; hung the poor child and dropped him two or three times, then ran away. The abused child lingered for a few days and died of the torture and terror.

Augustus Stuart was running to the arsenal for safety. The mob pursued him, knocked him down and beat him, and he died within a week.

In a little room in Twenty-eighth Street a poor woman lay in bed with an infant born three days before. The rioters broke through the door with pickaxes. A neighbor, who was in the room with her son, fled into the yard. Scarcely had she reached it when the little infant was thrown from the window above by the rioters, and was dashed to death. The yelling mob then poured into the yard. The mother with her son were escaping over the fence. Faint with terror she fell back into the yard. Her son besought the mob to save his mother if they killed him. "Well, we'll kill you," they answered. Two ruffians seized him and held his arms apart while a third struck him upon the head with a crow-bar, and felled him like a bullock to the ground. The boy died two days after.

And these rioters, whose prejudices and passions had been inflamed to this insane hate by the talk of Horatio Seymour and his party-papers and orators, smeared with the blood of innocent children and parents, and howling vengeance upon those who pitied and defended their victims, swarm into the Park where Horatio Seymour, solemnly sworn to execute the laws against all such ruffians, calls them "My friends," while his papers describe these crimes, for which language has no term, as "a popular uprising," "a procession of the people," etc.; and John Hughes looks at them and says, "I don't see a riotous face among you." Then Horatio Seymour and his papers turn to the citizens of the State of New York, and show to them a list of candidates for whom Seymour himself and Fernando Wood will vote, and every man who hung and felled the helpless children will vote, and all the conductors and owners of the papers that incited and excused those awful crimes will vote; and for whose success every rebel in arms and every foreign foe of this country prays, and Horatio Seymour and his mob of murderers and panders to murder commend their ticket to us as "respectable and conservative." The conservatism of Cain, and the respectability of infamy!

WHO IS WHO?

IN politics names are often things. The value of a name is shown in nothing more strongly than in the history of the Democratic party. For many years there has been always a party of that name, while the opposition has been called by a score of names. Yet the "Democratic party" of to-day is no more like that of thirty years ago than Jefferson Davis is like Andrew Jackson, or Horatio Seymour like Silas Wright. The Democratic party has no single distinctive Democratic principle whatever; for the fundamental Democratic doctrine is equal rights, and the cardinal dogma of the present party of that name is privilege, and its whole policy is to deny to protect it.

The Copperhead faction in this country, upon whose success the rebels fondly count, has therefore no more right to the name of Democratic party than a toad has to the name of eagle. It was a serious error of the true Democrats, when they withdrew from the Convention in Baltimore fifteen years ago, that they did not carry the Democratic name as they did the Democratic fetish out of that Convention. When they retired they left only a congress of slaveholders and their dependents; and it was evident that they would succeed in appropriating the Government to themselves and their purposes forever, or that civil war would ensue. From that moment until the present, as the boldness of the "Democratic" mask has been detected, and in the degree that Democrats have discovered for themselves that the party retained nothing of Democracy but the name, they have been constant, by leaving it, until at length the faction which calls itself the Democratic party is merely a body of the rebellion. And even now the managers of the faction only retain some honest adherents by pretending an interest in the war for the Union against slavery.

But the great mass of loyal citizens are really bold to the fundamental Democratic doctrine of equal rights under the laws. They are therefore essentially Democrats, and Democrats are advancing the fair fame of their name from the efforts of rebels and rebel sympathizers and abettors. They are defeating the Government purpose that all wrongs can be most securely righted against those who wish to rear a new and unjust government upon its ruins. They are maintaining the Union against armed traitors, and traitors calling themselves peace men. They are defending American equality, freedom, and Democracy against Democrats. When the war is over they will rename their party name, and the great Democracy will then stand in three bitter and opposed factions: it was not Davis, nor Vallandigham, nor Shiddell, nor Fernando Wood, nor Yancey, nor Franklin Pierce, nor Buchanan, nor Judge Douglas, nor the Seymours who were true Democrats, but Lincoln, and Butler, and Dix, and Chase, and Logan, and Winter Davis, and John A. Andrew, and their friends.

KILLING OUT OF RULE.

Our domestic Jeffs and Copperheads and our foreign enemies affect to deprecate the bombardment of Charleston and General Gillmore as an atrocious possibility. What are the facts? For about three months operations have been conducted for the capture of that city, which is a strong and populous hold and port of entry. The approach of General Gillmore has been steady and irresistible. He has possessed himself of Morris Island, captured Fort Wagner and Gregg, and silenced Fort Sumter. He has summoned the city, and planted his siege-guns. Two or three months ago an obstructed channel in the harbor yet withstand him. For him, therefore, the question is simply whether he can most rapidly and surely effect his purpose of capturing the value of the place to the enemy by attacking and capturing the fort, and clearing the harbor, and thus assaulting the city, or by attacking the city at once.

It is purely a question of war. Humanity has no more to do with it than with all other warlike operations. If the people of that wretched town wish to save their lives, let them surrender. If they do not choose to surrender, let them not plead inhumanity against the military effort to compel them to surrender. Thackeray's Major O'Dowdy complained that in a certain duel somebody killed his opponent entirely out of rule. And Molière's Bourgeois Gentilhomme cries: "Mais tu me pousses en tierce avant que de me pousser en quarte, et tu n'as pas la patience de parer." You thrust out of rule, and I shall wait until I parry the blows.

General Gillmore and his soldiers have not gone to Charleston to satisfy General O'Gahagan Beauregard, nor to play a comedy. It is tragedy, for the rebellion and for rebels, upon which they are bent.

A NOMINATION "FIT TO BE MADE."

For some time since the duty of every citizen to nominate the best nominations was thundering the primary meetings. This has been done in one district of the State, in the Onondaga, where Andrew D. White is nominated for State Senator.

Mr. White, a citizen of Syracuse, and lately Professor of History in the Michigan University, is a man so unusually fitted by his character and training for public life, of such clear and strong convictions, such familiarity with our political history, and the character and wants of the State and country, and of such calm and judicial temper and maturity of mind, that his election, of which there can be little doubt, will be a benefit not only to his district but to the State and country.

THE SERGEANT'S MEMORIAL.

THIS is a beautiful biography of one of the young heroes in the war, of whom a comrade said, "He never said much but always did it." It is a modest glimpse of that rare and unsuspected manhood which the country and its ideas had trained without our knowledge. Another memorial of a pure, noble young soul spent for the life and liberty of the nation.

It is the memoir of Sergeant John H. Thompson of the One Hundred and Sixth New York Regiment, written by his father, Rev. J. P. Thompson of the Tabernacle Church. It is a portrait painted with pathetic tenderness and mournful grace. And yet no man more than the faithful father of this good soldier knows that if such a death touches us the home with sorrow that never passes away, it sheds upon it also a benediction which increases for ever and ever. It is a story for young men to ponder, and for all of us to read with a sacred pride that there are such children and such parents; and that the war which secures, with blood and treasure, the union of the States secures also the enduring union of sympathy in the thousand homes that have been smitten.

SIR EDWARD LYTTON AGAIN.

SIR EDWARD BULWER LYTTON, who two years ago made a speech to the Herts County farmers in England, and told them that the United States were gone, and it was a great blessing, because it was too large and powerful a nation for the comfort of England, has had another talk with the same farmers, and he told them "a strange story" indeed.

He said that the noble cause of national freedom is bound up with the material prosperity and moral power of England. But Mr. Roebuck had already told us that "freedom" is not a political principle; "Whatever is for the good of England is for the good of the world." In both cases it is a naive confession that the ruin of the country and the creation of a new slaveholding nation are for the good of England. But Sir Edward knows his farming friends in delightful doubt as to how the cause of national freedom is subserved by the ruin of a nation in order to benefit England.

The mysterious Zanoni proceeds to remark that not the least remarkable feature of these changes is that they "do not affect social customs or the institutions they seek to establish; and explains that he means they reject absolute Despotism and municipal self-government, and says the cornerstone of the British system is Liberty, that of the Southern is Slavery. The form of the British Government is a republic, and the form of that of the South is a State Church. The form of "the Confederate Government" is a republic, with no social distinction among those who acknowledge the same religious beliefs, and with no State Church. That is to say, in form there is no resemblance between the two. Sir Edward means that in spirit the Slave Government is like the British he makes a stupid blunder. Because, in spite of the Russian czar, the aristocrated Oriental despotism, the power residing in an oligarchy, and not in a single person. It has no other resemblance to the British system than the governments which reject the American doctrine must have to each other, from England to the King of Dahomey; but Sir Edward knows that because a crocodile is not a hippopotamus it must therefore be an eagle.

He concludes with the remark that the century may perhaps close upon a world of constitutional monarchies like England. "But it would you say, by sinful brethren," and an old Democrat in the audience, "if you should wake up and find yourself in Jefferson Davis's power?" Then the curtain of the century fall upon British monarchies to lay slavery corner-stone about the world, there is a good deal of room for the Irish question to expand. "Perhaps" is a good word. The moon may be made of green cheese. But the chances are very much against it.

England has done, and does, great service in the world; and among the chief is that her test traditions and cherished faith are distinctly opposed to such fierce barbarism as is now striving to overrun part of this continent. But Sir Edward Lytton is far more unskilful and unwise for his civilizing faith than he represents in his stories the noblest and most significant life of English gentry.

MR. BLAIR UPON THE PRESIDENT'S POLICY.

MR. POSTMASTER-GENERAL BLAIR has made another speech in Maryland, and if he be correctly reported, he says that the President's policy of reelection consists simply in the restoration of the Government and the restoration of the loyal men in the rebel section to power. Of course any plan looks this. How is the rebellion to end if the rebels are left in power?

But Mr. Blair's intention, undoubtedly, is to intimate that the policy of the Administration need not be a bugbear in the border States. If by this he means that as Maryland is excepted from the proclamation she can not complain of any unjustly of executive interference, he is right. But he means also that the President recoils from his policy, and contemplates, in any form of settlement, the enslaving of persons freed by his proclamation, he is guilty of dishonest equivocation, and our forgetting the President's Springfield letter.

The Postmaster-General, we observe, is assumed to some quarter to profess for the President, with a foolish speech, which Mr. Blair made in the summer at Concord, New Hampshire, Mr. Wendell Phillips suggested that he was not the proper organ of the Cabinet. Possibly of some one in the Cabinet he may be. But we happen to know that the President knew nothing of his Postmaster's Concord speech until long after it was delivered, and it is only fair to conclude that Mr. Blair in Maryland spoke for himself alone. Indeed, if there is one thing proved, it is that the President avoids nobody's talk or pledge so much as Mr. Blair's; he has been published in a pamphlet by H. H. Lloyd & Co., and there is no better or more timely reading.

REBEL BULLETS AND COPPERHEAD BALLOTS.

IT is well for every voter to remember that the rebels count upon Copperhead successes at the polls as equal to "Confederate" successes in the field. It matters very little to the cause of the rebellion whether it prevails by friendly ballots at the North or bullets at the South. Thus, one of the most rabid rebel sheets, the Atlanta Appeal, speaking of Bragg's battle at Chattanooga, says: "We shall now be recognized. Our securities will rise. Vallandigham will be elected. This friends of Vallandigham in New York offer a ticket opposed to the unconditional Union ticket. Shall we give the rebel Appeal reason to record the result of the election here with as much joy as it describes the battle at Chattanooga?

ONE THING CERTAIN.

THE London Times says, with the solemnity of a wolf muffled in lamb's wool and trying to baa: "We are not prepared to say that keeping the public right and national honor." If the Florida did not afford sufficient proof of this great fact, the Alabama is certainly enough to put it beyond question.

ARMY AND NAVY ITEMS.

GENERAL GRANT is able to move around.

GENERAL PARKER arrived at Cairo from below last week, en route for Washington.

GENERAL HERRON, in consequence of sickness, has been compelled to leave the command of the expedition, and is succeeded by General DANA. General HERRON arrived at New York last week in the Evening Star.

LIEUTENANT H. A. FERNALD, Twenty-second Massachusetts Volunteers, has been honorably acquitted of the charges preferred against him.

It is reported from rebel sources that Lieutenant-General POLK and Major-General MAURY have been relieved of their commands by order of General BRAGG, for their disobedience of orders.

Rear-Admiral DU PONT, on 12th, visited the Russian fleet in our harbor, and was cordially received.

The command of a squadron of cavalry, proposed to be formed from the Fifth Regiment New Jersey, has been tendered to Major T. GAINES, the Judge Advocate, long associated with General DIX's staff.

Brigadier-General MERRITT, agent for the exchange of prisoners, arrived in Washington on 12th.

Colonel HOWARD, of General BURNSIDE'S staff, has gone northward on sick furlough.

General CRAWFORD, QUARTERMASTER, and wife, were in Nashville on 13th.

On 13th inst. a magnificent banquet was given to Brigadier-General ALEXANDER K. MCCLURE, Quartermaster in Fourteenth Street, by a number of our prominent citizens.

The Secretary of War has ordered that General WADSWORTH will take him to Mississippi. His functions will be of a purely military character.

General HARTSUFF has been relieved of the command of the Ninth Army Corps, and appointed to another command.

On Sunday, 11th, Admiral MILNE and suite, with Lord ALVA and his suite, visited the Capitol, attended by the Secretary of State and others, visited Mount Vernon, and had luncheon at Willard's Hotel.

Colonel PERRY WYKOFFAN, who only a few days ago received command of a regiment of cavalry, was, much to his surprise, has received an order relieving him from all military duty.

Judge-Advocate-General HOLT's review of the evidence in the Court-martial in the case of Commodore WILKINSON by General MILROY, subtly exonerates that officer from blame, and almost from indiscretion. His review in the matter to General SCHENCK, General MILROY's superior officer, and General SCHENCK's action, are unobjectionable.

The order recently issued sending Captain PARKER, of General MARTINDALE'S Staff, to report to General BANKS, has been revoked. Captain PARKER is assigned to duty at head-quarters of the Military Governor. Colonel DELAMATER, of the Third Virginia Cavalry, is assigned to the duty of examining prisoners at the Old Capitol.

General Grant has made an impromptu exhibit of much spirit at Pittsburg on 9th. He made a stirring, patriotic speech, and was followed by other gallant men.

Commodore STRINGHAM, detached from the command of the Dacotah, has been ordered to the command of the Pontoosuc.

Lieutenant-Commander DE KRAFFT has been ordered to the command of the Dacotah on commission.

Major-General HANCOCK, writing to a friend in Washington, expresses the hope that the army will move next week. He is put lame, and not able to ride horseback, but his wound is healing.

It is very probable that Major-General HENRY HEINTZELMAN will be immediately relieved from the command of the Department of Washington, and placed in command of that of Texas. He has been very well fitted by long experience for the position, and the rebels will find, if he goes there, it is understood that either General BANKS or General GRANT will be in command, and not merely in the command of the Department. It is urged that General BANKS is just about the proper person to take charge of his fortunes in the relative strength and value of all the fortifications, as he must have been familiar with them from his point of vision as the chief engineer of the defenses of Washington, and he necessarily knows more about them than any one else.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.

It is reported that the whole rebel army has crossed the Rapidan, and that General Lee has fallen back upon the north bank of the Rappahannock. When our forces reached the Rapidan they found the ford much deeper as well as be conveniently carried away, in order to prevent them fording the river at that point. The rebels had also said to have commenced the passage of the Rapidan on 8th, moving in the direction of Orange Court House, with the evident intention of turning General Meade's right wing. Heavy cannonading was heard on the 9th, and it was supposed the rebels, who are said to be holding all the gaps in the Bull Run Mountains in force, were skirmishing with the between the cavalry and some light batteries at or near the head of the Rappahannock. Thus far, the infantry has not been engaged on either side.

THE SEDITION OF 10TH.

On Friday night, 9th inst., the morning the rebels moved out of town in a northwardly direction. A detachment of fifteen hundred men of the Second brigade of cavalry were occasionally seen by our signal-men through openings in the forest, which prevented seeing the road. The object of the movement could not at that time be determined. A scout of Kilpatrick's cavalry brigade attempted a reconnoissance on the south side of Robertson's River, when they met by a large force of Stuart's rebel cavalry. A fight ensued, continuing an hour, when our troops fell back upon the infantry reserve. After another severe contest the infantry were compelled to give way, and a considerable number of them were captured. A detachment of our cavalry then dashed upon the enemy, retaking nearly all the prisoners. Our entire force was then pushed back toward Culpeper, skirmishing on the way, and losing a number of guns.

ROSECRANS'S ARMY.

It is stated on Washington authority from Chattanooga, that the communication of General Rosecrans are complete, that the rebels who have been attacking his outposts are all dispersed, and that the condition of the army is excellent.

On 8th General Crook, with a brigade of cavalry, came up with a portion of Wharton's rebel cavalry, near Rankin. Sharp fighting ensued, the result of which was one hundred and twenty-five rebels killed and wounded, three hundred taken prisoners, and four pieces of cannon captured. The rebels fled.

RETREAT AT WORK.

Dispatches from Knoxville, Tennessee, report a brisk engagement of General Burnside's corps, near Blue Springs, on 11th inst. The rebels were attacked and severely handled. The fight was renewed on 11th, when the rebels were driven from the field. Two hundred men killed and wounded.

CHARLESTON.

Our latest news from Charleston is to the effect that there is every probability that we shall obtain a vast army and naval forces will be in readiness on the 20th inst. to attack the city. All preparations were ready for such an event at last accounts, but had not been completed.

A TORPEDO.

Serious damage was inflicted by the frigate New Ironsides on the night of the 6th inst. by the explosion of a rebel torpedo. The vessel was anchored at the time off Fort Moultrie, and the infernal machine was set adrift with the ebb tide. The guard of Sullivan's Island, where it floated rapidly down on the ebb-tide, and many believe they could be removed after its discovery. The explosion is described as having been terrific, shaking the water in a heavy volume on the vessel, putting out all the fires. It is stated that the damage was so great that Admiral Dahlgren had it under advisement whether to send the vessel North for repairs. Unfortunately no other was killed by the explosion, and only two men wounded.

QUANTRELL AT WORK.

An attack upon the staff and body-guard of General Ewing, at Sedalia, Missouri, was made by the rebel guerrilla and his band of miscreants, and in the matter they did not succeed as fully as anticipated, but what they did not achieved by them at Lawrence. Assuming the uniform of Federal soldiers they hoisted their colors and so surprised General Blunt's small party and captured seventy-eight of the one hundred men composing it. The prisoners were afterward brutally murdered, all of them having been shot in the head, besides which General Ewing's body-guard escaped, and meeting reinforcements below Otter Creek, took command of them and went in pursuit of Quantrell.

GENERAL HERRON'S EXPEDITION.

Intelligence has been received from General Herron's Expedition against guerrillas, in the vicinity of Mompox, a few miles below Port Hudson. Upon reaching the Atchafalaya River, it was found the rebels were in a strong position, and it was necessary to dislodge them before a march. At the same time, a force of some 600, under Lieutenant-Colonel Davis, from Brashear City, was thrown forward five or six miles. The rebels secretly crossed the river, and attacked Colonel D. in the rear, and were handled fully, forcing a severe fight, which lasted half an hour, when cavalry charged and the rebels surrender. The main body was hurried up, but the rebels hurried off.

JEFF DAVIS ON A TORY.

The Petersburg (Virginia) Express of Wednesday says that President DAVIS passed through Petersburg the day previous, for some profit, South, remaining in the city about an hour, and but for the fact that he is so well known by the people of the Confederate States would have gone through entirely unobserved. He was looking well, and appeared to be in excellent spirits. It is not known whether he will leave us in his way to Charleston, Chattanooga, and Mobile, on a tour of inspection, or take a wider range, and visit Georgia at these points.

INCENDIARISM IN THE WEST.

Within the last two months Jeff Davis's rebel incendiaries have set on fire and destroyed fifteen first-class Mississippi steamboats, valued at fifteen millions of a million of dollars, and count the loss of twenty-eight lives.

OCTOBER ELECTIONS.

We have at the present time but few scattering returns of the elections. But enough has been received to render it pretty certain that Curtin has been elected over Woodward by a considerable majority, and that Brough has beaten Vallandigham by 90,000 or 95,000.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

A SPEECH FROM EARL RUSSELL.

EARL RUSSELL had made an important speech on foreign affairs at Blair Athol, Scotland, on 8th inst. He said an considerable length to the American question. He justified England in recognizing the Confederate belligerents; and declared that the war was impelled on both sides by the people of the North, as well as by the Southern planters. He said that at the completion of the Southern war, which he thought would be soon, he had assured the Washington Government that England should look with the utmost severity on any attempt to make Canada pay the penalty of the war. He observed that the Government would be obliged to raise a large army and navy to carry on the war after the rebels, and explained the difficulties in the way of interference by England. He declared that the Confederate navy consisted for war purposes of steam rams, which he said were the most powerful ships afloat, and would be used without ever touching Confederate shores. He asserted that the Government was wrong in conveying the duties of neutrality required—every thing that is to give a friendly nation will be done by us, and will done to themselves; but would not yield one jot of right to the menaces of foreign powers. In conclusion the Federal Government and Mr. Seward upon the failures of this policy, have abandoned the ancient and wonted character but and there were others, including Senator Sumner, who had acted differently. He denounced the efforts of those who sought to create hostility between America and Europe; and, referring to the policy of Napoleon in Mexico, he thought that if the Mexicans approved of what was being done for them they should be allowed to do so.

THE BRITISH PIRATES.

The Cape of Good Hope mails contain some very important correspondence relative to the visits of the Alexandra, Georgia, and Theodora—formerly the bark Crenshaw—to Simon's Bay, and other ports of the coast. The Governor of the Cape Colony has sent his rebel friends eight of thousands of the colonists as she was running into Table Bay. The United States Consul protested against the seizure as having been made within a cannon-shot of the shore. He also claimed the restitution of the Theodora, as agent for her owners, on the ground that, not having been conveyed by the captors into a port of competent authority, her entry into a British port was a violation of the Queen's proclamation. The Governor has referred both these demands; wherupon the Consul protested in the name of the United States against the whole of the colonial corps of the Tuscaloosa had been sold to merchants at Cape Town, and that the cargo of the Sea Bride would be similarly disposed of. The Alabama and Georgia reported a great many captures and very profitable trips.

MEXICO.

MAXIMILIAN HAS NOT ACCEPTED.

The Archduke MAXIMILIAN has replied to the Mexican deputation that he has not accepted upon this with a direct offer of the throne, that he is willing to accept it, if sanctioned by the free, spontaneous, and unquestionable vote of the people, coupled with some guarantee for the integrity and independence of that country.

THE LIFE OF A SPY—IN NINE TABLEAUX.

SERVICE AND SHODDY—A PICTURE OF THE TIMES.

FORTIS ET FIDELIS.

THERE were loungers on the steps; and the autumn wind, sweeping freshly in from the shore, was blowing something like a gale. No time or place for sentiment! Besides, the parting was but for a season. Lina Drysdale would be the guest that winter of Robert's sister. Gay, too, would pass the season in New York; so a few laughing words to Lina, and a distant bow to that shy Agnes, already in the carriage, and then Robert March and Guy Drysdale, bound by a rare and subtle sympathy as fine as earthly hearts can bind, loving each other with a love passing that of woman, had shaken hands and gone on their respective ways, with just that subtle tinge of sadness that makes the hope of such partings all the sweeter.

But that winter proved dark with menace of the coming storm, and restless and anxious with the fierce discontent and plotting of South Carolina; and Guy Drysdale, in very virtue of high position and daring spirits, was drawn forward into the vortex of madness. And then boomed out the guns from Sumter, knelling in the war.

The parting had been with mirth and laughter; the meeting was amidst the horror of battle, late on in that stormy day at the Seven Pines. Like a wall had our brave fellows stood against the furious onward surge of the enemy, as column after column they hurled themselves on our solid, stubborn ranks. The river was our reserve, foaming and bridgeless; and all the night before the rebel camp had been deafened with the clash of hoofs, and the roll of artillery trains, and the steady tramp of regiments coming to the rescue; and the soldiers, stung by the reverse at Fair Oaks, and maddened by our battle-cry of "On to Richmond!" were no longer men, but things raging, fighting fiends, back, and to-let the work was done, stroke upon stroke, blow upon blow: regiment after regiment ordered up to Johnston to the attack, and thinned as fast as thinned; fresh men taking the place of tired ones; on and at them, again and again, with the Egyptian taskmaster, fiercer than at bay were heroes, but of flesh and blood, worn out with hours of fighting—fighting desperately, not hopefully,—more than half of their officers down, and the deadly bullets dropping them faster than the pestilence; and at last, in his rage and despair, Johnston was coming on in person, massing fresh colors flying, a great, roaring, angry wave, down upon them as the Red Sea might have swept upon the Egyptian chariots, forcing them from their brave stand, treading them under grinding hoofs, more merciful than Death itself.

All through that day had Robert March fought well and nobly; and now he stood, disdaining to run, but giving the meaning to still the line as much as possible, reviving the soldiers, who rushed upon him shouting, with a succession of rapid, flashing strokes, that presently cleared a space around him, and brought the trooper foremost in attack on guard. Then ensued one of those strange duels common in scenes of horror. The rebel officer, an Alabamian—was in raging earnest, and no mean swordsman; but Robert possessed the immeasurable advantage of self-control, and was ready, eye, foot, and hand, for the blows stormed down upon him; and presently the trooper brought the blood from the Alabamian's shoulder. The soldiers standing by began to murmur and pass on to cheer that; knives were already drawn, and one scowling fellow was drawing his pistol from his belt.

"Oh!" said Robert, coolly parrying a slashing down-stroke; "six on one! It is to be a murder then!"

Things were an ugly look, certainly; the pistol was already level with Robert's breast; but an officer who had been watching the affray dashed in among them like a storm, knocked up the revolver, and crying out,

"You villains! give the man fair play! This isn't a massacre!"

At the sound of his voice Robert, who had nevermore lost self-possession, started and turned hastily; perhaps in his reward for such prompt assistance, a cut on the cheek that brought the blood out redly over the face of dust, and left a gash, terrible, and worst of all, the Confederate uniform, that was Guy Drysdale.

"And look for me, dear Bob, that I stumbled on you!" was his first comment; "for Johnston is either dead or dying, and it has put the very devil in our fellows. I doubt if you would have gotten safe to Richmond to-night."

And so Captain March found himself not many miles from Richmond at the time of the danger was menacing it with its hosts, and Mrs. Jefferson Davis was packing up carpets and curtains in all haste to the shores of the Northern Lakes, a prudence indeed, but in the bosom of a South Carolinian family, and bound only by silken ties.

It had been no easy matter to win for him so much grace; but Guy's friendship was unflinching, his energy unrelenting, and his services of a nature not to be overlooked; and Guy had pledged himself for Robert, life for life, his honor on that of Captain March; and so the young Rebel officer was his guest, and stood leaning over the piano at which Lina was singing, with a blush and flutter of manner quite uncalled for, since Robert's eyes grazed her glossy braids, and were fixed with a curiosity in which we are no longer sure, her singing, on Agnes's figure, there beyond in the dress circle row. She had altered strangely since that morning when she shrank away in the carriage from Guy's good-by. In those gay days she had been a mask or a blank; and though, as a Drysdale, she had their regularity of feature and splendor of physique, the taper fingers and arched instep, it was the lively transparency without the light, the sweet poem without the key to the cipher in which it was written; and puzzled by the strange combination of red dark-gray eyes, black lashes, and high arched brows, with the heavy mass of bright golden hair, people were doubtful whether that "odd Miss Drysdale" should not rank before the pretty Drysdale." But with the war the smouldering flame in her heart had blazed up into clear, decisive speech—prompt, efficient action; and her present passionate energy, contrasting with her former inertness, proved, as Robert had suspected, that what the world charitably termed reserve, was in truth contempt for the small eating, drinking, and chattering of her daily life.

The change visited also her beauty; for the fair face at last, informed with the thoughts so long hidden, revived Lina's beauty of splendid contrasts—ripe color, and clear brine whiteness, pearl white teeth, and midnight blackness of eyes and hair, dewy scarlet lips, and dimpling saucy smile—to so much prettiness; the still figure in the black dress, that she had chosen to wear since the commencement of the war, made of Lina's lithe air and gay ribbon knots and bodice so much coquetry: her very self-controlled presence, seeing there, rapidly and meditatively, upon rough garments for hospital wear, swamped in oblivion Lina's grace and plain desire to please, and roused all Guy's March's curiosity, and a little pique, natural to a man not used to be coolly, sweetly, but decidedly, overlooked by charming girls; accepted, but with lady-like resignation, like any other inevitable nuisance—as the east wind, or a bore; though her endurance was less downpressed, and softened by a something of kindliness since the day they had driven to Richmond, a party of four; Guy, who had snatched a day at home, Agnes, and Robert, whom they had dressed in plain clothes.

Artillery was rattling through the streets, and bands of men hurrying to the front, shouting a gallant front as they marched by, drums beating, and torn banners flying, were crowding in to the help of beleaguered Richmond. Agnes's color rose as she watched their close array and growing numbers.

"They come barefoot and in tatters," she said, half glancing at March, "as once another army crossed the frozen Delaware on a bitter winter's night."

The taunt fell on unheeding ears. Robert's heart and mind were in the field with men then, not ten feet away, was the railway station; and filling its buildings, and piled on its platform in the broiling, sultry heat, were the sick and the hundreds, wounded and helpless, Federal blue and Confederate grey side by side. Among them ministering angels were at work to do, and angels passing the hated Federal uniforms with scorn or indifference; and Robert grew white to the lips as he saw the hospital stores, and the means of refreshing drink, and the wan faces grow more ghastly in their hopeless misery. Guy, who had himself had been wounded, and he remembered yet the fever and pain and misery of those long weeks, softened his tenderness into pity for them; and here were heat, and panting thirst, and loathing hate and scorn, added to racking pain, fever, and misery! Oh! if he could but send for his dead son and brother, lover and husband, to cry I will not let him go! But there were also sons, brothers, and husbands. In the field were the foes in arms and will not help us in this war, because of a thing called an Administration, to read lightly how these brave fellows suffered, and bled, and perished, and talk of exaggeration! But these be facts, though told in an idle tale, and Robert found it hard to look on. He trembled from head to foot, and glanced wildly this way and that, as if for some road to deliverance from out of this. Guy laid a restraining hand on his arm.

"Keep cool, Bob! What would you have? There is not enough to go round already, and if there must be a choice, you can hardly expect that our men would be passed; and bad as it is, it is a little more wonderfully managed for effects and men are crowded three and four hundred in a room, and kept there night and day."

"And I only sent my wife so easily," muttered Robert, "and find my days pass pleasantly; and these men fought as well as I, and some of them deserve better of Heaven! Guy, I can't endure it; my place is among them. I must go and join them."

Then for the first time he saw that Agnes was looking at him, bending forward eagerly, her gray eyes shrinking, pleading.

"You would do that! you would really do that!" Guy laughed.

"Of course he would, and get you to pilot him there, where your romantic enthusiasm would receive a damper in a unanimous request from the four hundred to leave them and make room for oxygen in peace. Stay with us, Bob, if you love them!"

Robert's eyes rested gloomily on the wounded men.

"There are men out of my own company."

"Where?" asked Agnes quickly.

"There, just by that post."

Agnes looked as he pointed, but did not answer immediately: for she was busy with certain covered baskets stowed away under the seats, her basket-trimmings and her embroidery were all packed.

"You shall see," she said, low, as she got out of the carriage, "that Southern women have hearts."

Comprehension of her purpose came, but words to move to follow her; but again Guy held him back.

"There are some here who may know you. Do you stay with Lina and look as indifferent as you can, and I will go."

Look indifferent! As though that were possible, when he longed to kiss the very hem of her dress, as Agnes kneeled by the wounded prisoners, and gave them strawberries with her dainty fingers, or held the coffee to their dry lips. In a moment some soldier put her sleeve, and a shocked voice exclaimed at her elbow,

"My dear Agnes! do you know what you are doing?"

Agnes faced about, and brought her marvelous gray eyes to bear on the pretty questioner's disturbed face, answering severely,

"Yes, I think so, Elise."

"But—but," hesitated the young lady, "that is a miserable Yankee."

Agnes drew down her black brows, and the kindly sunshine was out of her face on the instant.

"Well, Miss Carey, what does that prove?"

The tone scarcely admitted of an answer, and with a shrug of her shoulders the girl turned away and joined a group of whispering ladies at the other end of the platform. Agnes went calmly on with her merciful work, seconded by Guy, whose dark face glowed red with shame and anger, as he glanced toward Robert within hearing of all this. Presently some one touched him—a man this time.

"I arrest you, Sir," he said, harshly.

Guy made no demonstration save for his revolver, but Agnes's soft firm hand was on his in an instant.

"Why and on whose authority?" she asked, calmly.

At the clear tone and steady authoritative glance the man gave back a little, but answered, sullenly:

"As for authority, I am a member of the secret police, and these are prisoners, Miss; and he has been tending them, and all the ladies are talking about it."

Contempt cooled the wrath in Guy's face.

"I am Captain Drysdale," he said, taking a cup of coffee from the servant and kneeling beside a Federal soldier. "When you want me, you can send to Drysdale House."

The official recoiled in dismay.

"I beg your pardon, Sir, but you see you wasn't in uniform, and Miss Agnes—"

Guy's lips curled in a stern smile.

"Tell the ladies," he broke in, "that my mother taught us humanity, and my sisters and I practice it."

And so from that time, as we have said, Agnes's manner had grown something gentler, and Robert found himself looking at her with that sort of relief with which we turn from scarlet to deep-toned people; for Lina's gay talk and French songs jarred on him at times, and this was the first time he was now to sit down by Agnes, and though she made no move acknowledging his closer presence, no cross ticked on the reckoning, a book or color crept into her cheek, drawn there by his steady looking.

At his first coming she would not have done him so much grace, but from the beginning of the talk the Federal Captain in the man, and that done, was on the high road to liking him.

Lina was at the piano over the keys, tripped a bar or two, whirled herself about on the piano stool, and came over also, saying,

"Tell me, Bob, how personal pronoun refer ring to Agnes.) "You can't imagine, Captain March, what a genius she has for music, and it soils the fingers so." looking at her little dimpled hands. "I can't do it. You see (with the gravest face in the world) I've such a tendency to immediately begin to think how those poor Romans, and Celts, and Gauls, and what's their names, all the Latin wretches are suffering, and I find myself so distressed at thought of their unalleviated suffering that I am unable to go on. I have tried it many times."

"For how long?" asked Agnes, gravely.

"Ten consecutive minutes at the very least; now, Agnes, don't look so. That is the way in which you looked at Elise yesterday, and it isn't fair. I appeal to Captain March. She was inhuman; now I am not absurd, and I don't think it is justice to punish us both alike. You see, dear, I am not interested in Latin verbs like Agnes—and, by-the-by, I never can cease wondering at the discretion of Guy's choice, wisdom not being a Drysdale weakness; but I am a butterfly and a bubble, and it is useless trying to change my nature."

She looked as she spoke as if she hadn't the smallest desire to do so; very complacent and selfsatisfied in fact; but Robert was not thinking of her. Something had jarred him rudely He knew better of Guy's untrolled to the public assailant, in fact, it had always been understood; but he recoiled inexplicably at its mention. Agnes, too, she could hardly be satisfied with that mere morsel in her work, and yet there had come upon her a chill and a shadow. Lina's perceptions were not keen; she neither saw nor cared to felt the change, but came back to the staple of conversation, Agnes.

"I am a true daughter of the Confederacy," pursued the young lady, cutting off a piece of Agnes's work. "I am sure in those happy days when we had nothing to do (we didn't have any now) I dressed myself in our colors, though it was frightfully unbecoming; but I almost wish that Agnes would leave off her Captain Kidd's suit. It dismally patriotic. Not long since we were threatened with the company of General Floyd at dinner (I always like Floyd, because); and she would have she was positively angry because I hinted at locking up my diamonds? It was the more ungenerous as she has only a few, and I have a great deal to the cause long ago."

"Silence on you, Lina!" retorted her cousin vehemently. "General Floyd's conduct was fully justified by the exigencies of our cruel position, and he has proved himself an able general."

"At Carnifex Ferry, par exemple," put in Lina, rapidly, "with his cavalry and artillery on one side of the river, and the other, the citizens and their shoes lest Rosecrans should pounce upon them, while your hero stood bawling for boats, rafts, and hay to get him out of his ridiculous position, to his chief engineer, the ex-mechanist, who couldn't so much as rig a washing-tub to help them, and who actually had to call General Wise in charge of a man who could."

"And granting it were so," returned Agnes, looking at her work, and speaking fast and hot under her breath, "I can not see how Guy Drysdale's silence had given him an exposing our folly and weakness to the—enemy."

She hesitated a little at that last word, coloring swiftly at Robert's hasty look of reproach.

"I did not mean quite that," she amended, "but—"

"I understand," returned Robert, gently; "you have no need to excuse yourself."

A twinge of remorse visited Agnes. In fact, such twinges were her constant company. If Robert would but have been angry, or indifferent, or shown pique, or any thing but this unwavering gentle courtesy—the gentleness of manly power, of the stronger to the weaker, of the man who had leaded death coolly in the face and braved overwhelming numbers, to a peevish girl, for she had heard all that story from Guy, and dubbed him hero in her heart, and then found the notion of a Federal hero so monstrous that she thought of him constantly in trying to reconcile it, and to excuse herself to herself, and to escape such self-accusation, softened by unconscious lapses from her cold endurance down to civility; and at last, in the moment in it happened that Captain March's presence in the household was found to be a very pleasant thing.

He was Guy's friend, and now that Guy was gone formed an element of strength and reliability. In these distracted times, Northern though he was; served as a procuration, too, for all their pretty cousettes of toilet. Lina flashed out in the bright silks and quaint little bodices that she had been laid aside for wrappers since every one had gone to the war; and though Agnes never varied the black sweep of her dress, there were softer ruffles edging her snow-white neck, and an occasional gay gleam of color in a knot of ribbon at her throat, or fastened in her abundant hair.

On Robert's part, had Agnes proved as kind as Lina, he would have scarcely have vouchsafed to think of her, but her coldness being a novelty, startled him, and its continuance, which was unnatural to her, piqued, interested, and at last made he saw that she was gracious and gentle to all things besides, that piqued him, and he set himself to win her favor, and to be pleased he and so brought himself day by day in contact with a noble and lovely nature, and as a consequence discovered in her a kindred feeling to the needed the microcopes of time for finding.

Now when we see daily a thing lovable, we are apt to love it.

The time slipped by very pleasantly. Richmond and its hospitals were in comparative rage there, had long been no pleasant residence place and when the terror of M'Clellan's neighborhood was strong enough, Lina had persuaded his family to what he styled their mountain fastness, well pleased that he could leave them with such efficient protection as the presence of Captain March. Their living was Spartan in its simplicity, for one day Agnes had been seen to seat herself with a blush at a portrait of Indian meal, saying that she could not endure to live daintily while all about them suffered such privation, and Robert had received her at once, donning gayly his share of luxuries to the Federal prisoners, and so assisted in the sacrifice. Agnes got to know the soldiers better between them, for privations shared together are among the strongest links of love's chain.

Then about the time Robert found Lina in tears, Agnes standing by, and looking an odd mixture of sorrow and amusement. On seeing him, Lina pulled from some embroidery a little inches of cambric in the middle, styled by courtesy a handkerchief, and began to wipe her eyes, answering his inquiries,

"Oh, it's nothing; only girls' nonsense!"

Robert looked his skepticism. Agnes would never cry about so little as her self-command. Understanding his look, she smiled faintly.

"Do yourself justice, Lina. It is heroic to endure privations, but it is no undignified to be shoeless that we lose all the comfort of heroism; and we are fast coming to that condition, for the price of leather is fabulous, and workmen are not."

Robert's face sparkled at all over suddenly, and then relapsed into its former gravity, thinking that this hour he went about with care on his brow, and was subject to periodical fits of disappearance. He took also to petting the genial parlor-cat Ripper apiece from each of the girls; the consequences of all which was a very creditable pair of bottes, à la Suwarrow, for Lina, and Guy's boots; and after a little persuasion and much blushing consequent on being measured, indefinite slippers and boots, for Agnes's delicate feet. Finally, Mr. Drysdale, who had held aloof as incredulous, was convinced and measured, and presently received his slippers. It was found also that he could mend clocks, and door-latches, and bracelets—and, in short, be helpful in many unexpected resorts. He was always the general reassurance, and was looked upon as embodying the family stock of these qualities quite as necessary for a household's health as flour and wood.

The position was onerous, but it had its peculiar sweetness—its serious burning and adulation at the entire family; for when any thing masculine condescends also to be gracious and useful, straightway his feminine worshippers rise from their pedestal with roses, and drag his chariot themselves, out of the way of meaner strife, and there he will but let them; and there were long, still mornings, when Robert read aloud to the ladies at their work, and afternoons and evenings when they sang among the rocks; and Robert and Agnes never stopped to ask themselves what subtle flame it was that kindled at this quiet but distinct with such rare, half-unearthly happiness.

Every morning came their mails—letters from Southern friends, and sometimes a smuggled Northern one, brought in a bag to Robert; who, standing with it one fair morning in the hall, was dazed by a vision descending the staircase—a vision white robe and brocade train, lace ruffles at the rounded elbows and shading the white neck, a huge fan between from her eyes, and a great sun-drop dragging down the little ears, and tiny high-heeled shoes, with square silver buckles showing at every step.

"Calicoes are priceless, and so we are obliged to full back on brocades and our grandmother's wardrobe," said the vision, its gray eyes introus with merriment as it swept a courtesy to Robert, quite aside from the usual manner and the shedding of her sun-like dress.

Meanwhile Lina had crept behind him, and with sly fingers stoke the letters from the bag, seized on one, and opened it. A sudden exclamation caused Robert and Agnes to turn sharp about.

"What now?"

"Oh!" cried Lina, with her eyes full of tears, "whatever shall we do without you?" Dear Robert, can't you turn reb—patriot, I mean? Those horrid men are going to exchange you. How could they go and tell them!" Here is a letter for you."

Robert tore open the envelope hastily. Guy congratulated him on his freedom. He could stay at once.

Agnes went, and sitting down tried to think, for she could feel nothing as yet but a wild relief that found for itself no name. Those sorrows treat us as in the vision Moses did poor Faithful—then no, and, when we are coming to, beat us down again. Lina ran to dismay her mother with the news, and Robert followed Agnes into the library.

She was sitting there by the window, in a kind of breathless stillness, never raising her eyes at his entrance: but keeping them on the floor, as if unconscious of his presence. At another time Robert might have felt indignation at this strange apathy, this unkind abstinence from all expression of sorrow; but in his deep and sudden distress, in which was an inexplicable horror of something darkening over him, he went straight to her, and tried to win from her some comfort.

"Agnes," he said, gently, "won't you say you are sorry?"

She glanced up at him and smiled, actually smiled; but with what wild eyes and quivering mouth! shuddered, and burst into a flood of tears, the more terrible because she would have died to keep them back; and such stormy sobs, wrenched from her strong self-control by an agony mightier than her pride, was horror and shame unbearable. Lower and lower sank the golden head in her self-abasement; and Robert, hitherto looking on in a strange silence, suddenly cried out, "Agnes, help me!" cried desperately, as men cry looking at walls crashing down upon them, or monstrous waves ingulfing them.

He had folded his arms tightly, he clenched his teeth, he was stamped in the vehemence of his resolve, but the thought dormant in his heart had sprung up with a giant's strength, and he was on his lips, and it must out, and before his lips could frame it it blazed in his eyes, and flamed up in his agitated face; and then he called on Agnes, from whose cheeks the shame-flush had faded away into a mortal pallor, for there was no strength left to struggle with the fell horror of a sudden illumination. It is so terrible to be alone, even in right, how much more in wrong doing! So they stood looking a moment at each other, and the stillness floated in a voice through the window—old Susan reading aloud under the oak near by:

"But God is faithful, who will not suffer you to be tempted above that ye are able, but will with the temptation also make a way of escape that ye may be able to bear it."

The words sounded out clearly in that solemn stillness.

"Then," cried Agnes, passionately, "there is escape for us;" and she dropped on her knees, sobbing, looking up:

"O merciful Saviour! sorrow or dishonor is before us. Lead us in that way of sorrow where thou didst also walk: lead us, for we can not go ourselves, for thy promise's sake."

White as a corpse, Robert knelt beside her, and there came another solemn hush; and at last Agnes rose and gave him her hand; and he held it, and bent over it a moment, and went away, yet with a strange weetness in his despair, that truth and honor were saved, and that is the life of life; and looking back on Agnes, as she stood in her unsaid and splendid dress, inframed in the dark doorway, pale, yet bright with the light of heaven itself, he saw "as it were the face of an angel."

PRIED.

LIZZIE MERCUR went home early this evening. Little Fred had said good-by, after dining on great heavy eyes that followed him all the way to the bank, and kept reminding him of some they had once closed in death in that same neighborhood.

While was buried just three years ago to-morrow. The father went lightly up the stairs, straight on his way to the nursery: as he turned at the head of the staircase, Mrs. Mercur stepped out of her dressing-room door into the flood of the hall lights, elegantly arrayed for an evening party. She paused in surprise at seeing her husband home so early. Pretty and piquant was the wife before him, her delicate beauty, as soft and ethereal as the dress she wore, quite dispelled the stern expression on his face, and the reproach in his tones died down to simple surprise, as he asked:

"Are you going out to-night, Fanny?"

"Yes. Why not?" she inquired, in her flattering, girlish way.

"Your baby, dear," the husband said, in a sad reproving tone.

"Pshaw, Lisle, she's only a little unwell; and Lettie will sit by her. She says a child is full of her, and begs of me to go and enjoy myself. She is thoughtful for me," the young wife added, casting a reproachful glance at the earnest face, looking with sure, disappointed inquiry into hers. "She says I must not shut myself up like a nun."

"Do you think your French maid cares more for you than I do, Fanny?"

The man's hands worked uneasily, opening and shutting her fan. She was always lost when this strong soul love spoke to her for itself, and in no appealable way. So she ignorantly pushed aside the steadying hand that would have guided her into beautiful womanhood, and said, the least bit peevishly:

"Come, Lisle, don't be always making me solemn. Say good-night and kiss me, and tell me to go and be happy."

The husband bent over and kissed the red lips held up coaxingly to his, and encircling the slight waist for a moment with his arm, said in his deep, sad way:

"Go and be happy, Fanny."

She glided down the stairs and sprang into the carriage waiting for her at the door, but could not shake off the strange feeling that her husband's manner had inspired, until fairly launched into the brilliant whirl of giddy enjoyment at Mrs. Grange's. Lisle Mercur watched her graceful, retreating figure until it went out of sight. As the front door closed after her he turned heavily, with the great want his beautiful wife so lightly misunderstood, and walked to the nursery door. It stood slightly ajar. A little querulous voice kept repeating,

"No, no; Pet wants Flynn."

"Sh-sh; Lette's here. Lette's better than Flyn."

Pet turned on the pillow and looked at the fussy French girl with childish incredulity.

"Pet wants Flynn."

Lette was becoming annoyed at the child's persistency, and pushed her chair back impatiently.

Mr. Mercur was about to open the door and go in, when he heard a rustle at the foot of Pet's bed, and a pale, weary-faced woman glided in from a room adjoining the nursery, and stopped over the restless child. Her lips touched the hot cheek and two fat arms went round her neck; like long chains from an angel's hand the love was quiet now. She needed no hushing. The touch of Flynn's cool hand was always enough for her. Lette went busying stiffly about the room, with the face of the crib. After a while Flynn unlocked the fingers clasped about her neck, and holding them in her own, sat down by the bed, and looked at the head nestled on the dainty pillow. Her white, illegible face was partially turned toward Mrs. Mercur, whom Lisle Mercur stood with a father's pardonable curiosity. He had always regarded his young nurse's governess as a mere cog in the system, with soul enough for her position. To-night he caught a glimpse of something more. That strange power seemed to have left the sick child's instinctive, watched, unslumbering, self-guarded in her steady gaze; thrilled in the low sure utterance of her soothing words. A mood itself to be touched will touch. Lisle Mercur saw why his child wanted Flynn. She was one of those women who, when one once knows them, seem to have all the heavy elements, even though they shrink from talking or singing in. To such, it must not go through many hands, all delicate as the finest fingers. So she took to this fair child, and whispered her sweet thoughts to her. And they grew so quietly and naturally together, that even the close-sighted father never knew of the union, until this night when accident showed him Pet's companionship with the pretty wife flushed back in his face the truth, that as for spiritual communion he was alone.

Pet lay so still he thought she must be falling asleep. Then he heard her say, softly,

"Mamma's gone, Flynn."

Flynn smiled.

"Mamma was pretty."

"Mamma was very pretty," Flynn said.

"Why did God make mamma so pretty?"

"God knew," Flynn said, reverently; and the child raised her eyes as she did in prayer. They came back laughing again.

"Mamma wore beautiful flowers!"

"Where?" asked Flynn.

"Here." And the little hands went together over Pet's bosom.

"Pet's flowers flower."

The sweet face brightened with a mischievous smile.

"Wear yours where mamma wears hers."

Flynn understood. She gathered the little form up in her arms, and pressed it close to her loving woman's heart. This had always been nursing would open one day into Flynn's beautiful blossom—not mamma's.

She thought papa, as he waited outside the door, while the pale governess walked the nursery floor with the burden on her breast, and at last laid it down, sleeping, in the crib. Then she went back to his room and waited for mamma. She came home long after midnight, and Flynn met her in the morning. When she met her husband at dinner, she said in her childish way, quite excitingly,

"I knew Pet would be well enough off. Lette said she was quiet, and slept well."

The father thought of weary feet going to and fro inside the nursery door, and of Pet's head turned softly in his baby's ear. Thinking of the subtle music of this woman's voice, he forgot what manner of woman it was that she was there. So no revelations were made.

Mrs. Mercur grew feverishly fond of excitement and party-going. Her husband's remonstrances were unheeded; and at last, growing weary of her weak accusations, and insinuating comparisons of his constant fidelity, he gave up the attempt of restraining her, until he saw that her health was rapidly giving way. Then he pleaded with her tenderly but earnestly. She laughed at his fears, and turned to the pleasures she was madly pursuing with redoubled energy. Then he forced him to more decided action. He led her to her mirror one morning, after a night of dissipation, and bade her confront the sunken cheeks and great glassy eyes, staring back in her face like a solemn warning. She gazed for a moment like one transfixed, and then fainted forward. The attack was a long unconsciousness. She could not tear it. She turned fiercely toward him, and, with a wild gesture, almost shrieked, "Stop your idle prating. I will live while I do live."

The end of her race was reached at last, and she lay down to die. It was a grim place she was verging on. The phantoms and shadows were all passed. The real chasm, the genuine gloom, were just outside. Should she go back, seeking aid of the pleasure-haunters, through this place they had led her to? Ah! this was a darker place indeed.

"I am dying, Lisle," she whispered, hoarsely. She bowed his head over her pillow till his face touched her damp forehead; but they had no counfort for her here.

"Help me, my husband!"

He could have helped her once. He could only turn, in his deep distress, and groan now. A quick thought flashed through him hopefully. "Shall I call Flynn?"

The dying eyes looked up imploringly. She came in, white and marble-like, as she who has there in her last agony would be soon. Lisle could see no more, for which he longed to read if there were hope of comfort for his wife, the lids lay down so heavily on her cheeks.

Fanny turned to her, with a wild plea in every lineament of her suffering face.

"Help me, Flynn!"

"God must do that," said a firm, sustaining voice, close in her failing ear.

"Where is He?" gasped the whitening lips.

"Here, Fanny—closer than I can come to you."

"If I could see Him! if I could feel Him!" she cried, clinging, as if reaching out in the dark.

"Call Him as you call me. Ask Him to help you as you ask me. He loves you better than I. Fanny, look at me. Look at Him. He is right here. Can't you see Him? can't you feel Him?" said the low voice, in tones that thrilled one with the consciousness of an invisible presence.

The look of terror went from the ghastly face, and the faint shadow of a coming smile passed on to the lying lips that she had tried to say,

"I—see—"

She was gone where God could do no more for her.

Lisle Mercur left Pet with Flynn, and went abroad. Two years passed, and he did not return. Then came a letter, saying he would sail in two days more for home.

Toward the close of the summer, just at twilight one evening, they two sat alone in the window-seat of the nursery, looking out at the old light-house far up the beach on the Rocky Point.

"It looks ugly—don't it, Flynn?"

"Yes," said Flynn, slowly, thoughtfully. "It looks lonely, and bare, and grim, in the daylight; but how was it last night?"

The thunder-gust now the storm raged and the sea roared all night, and how she clung to Flynn, and what fear her nurse should ask home, was, no wise, he whirled together in terrible destruction. Then, shining in through the chamber window, streamed that solitary light from the old tower, and Flynn said,

"Look, child, what is it like?"

"Like a star, but it's big, Flynn?"

Flynn said, Yes, and hoped it might be such to those at sea. She did not whisper the dreadful fear she had for the vessel—that vessel, homeward bound, might go down that dismal night. She soothed the little heat that might be fatherless, and wore that in her own heart.

Later in the evening came a messenger saying the Solitaire had foundered in the storm the night before, and that the only survivor of all on board had perished. Almost within sight of home Flynn had learned to bear cruel tidings. So she saw him now she felt. The servants gathered, whispering, in the hall. She went out, and bade them hush, and in a low, steady voice, read to them. The lamps were not lighted, and they could not see her pallid face.

Then took the child to her chamber, and sat beside her until she was asleep. Then she moved like a statue down the stairs into the presence of the sweeping crape that two were waiting as if by instinct for her commands.

"We will have no lights to-night," she said, in a voice of unnatural darkness. "All of you but retire, and the house be quiet. To-morrow will be soon enough." There was no need to say for what they were waiting, and they went from her presence awe-stricken and oppressed with gloom. When they were all gone she went back to the nursery door, and, finding that she had been sitting with Pet, and kneeling down, buried her face in the bed. Then she arose, and one of the outstanding softly on the beach came in at the open window.

Lisle Mercur had sailed a week in advance of the Solitaire, contrary to his expectations when he wrote. When the news of that vessel's wreck reached him there was a sudden, overwhelming longing toward home. It was still comparatively early in the evening when he alighted from the coach in front of the house. He glanced at the nursery, it was closed and dark, he went around toward the back part of the premises, intending to arouse one of the servants by the kitchen door, when he paused, observed it was open, and springing to the low balcony, he was going in when something startled him and he stopped. Stooping over to examine more closely, he was startled by the sight of a human figure lying on the outstanding pallet-bed, and then the moon came from under a cloud, and shone full upon the object at which he stood gazing with such intensity. It was now that Flynn, in her half kneeling, half reclining, as if she had fallen asleep in the midst of prayer.

He called her softly by name, but she did not move. Then he spoke in a louder voice, almost roughly, but there came no response. He grew frightened. The strange, wearied, white face that raised her head nervously, tenderly, and laid it against his bosom, smoothing back the wavy, reddish hair, and gazing fondly in the face he had looked upon ignorantly, unappreciatingly, times without number. Ah! this was Flynn's spirit-face.

"I am dying, Lisle," she whispered, hoarsely. He gathered her cold hands in his own, but he could not remove the chill.

But this face with its passionate energy, this breast against which she was held so tightly, what did it mean? She would see what it meant; so she made a strong effort and sat upright. She had passed through a great agony, she had dreamed a short, sweet dream. It was over now, and she must go back to her self-contentment. In a moment of mutual silence she called up her old habitual calmness, and said, as firmly as her weakness would permit her to,

"We feared you were drowned."

"I knew you would, and hurried home on that account."

"The servants are horror-stricken; but, thank Heaven! Pet is spared what I feared she must know soon."

"Flynn"—the pale face turned so that the moonlight would not strike it so broadly—"did any one else grieve for me?"

She trembled visibly, and tried to say something varying close on propriety.

"Spare me this, Flynn," he said, pleadingly. "Come down from this distance at which I have viewed you, and tell me for once what I ask."

"How far would you have me come?" she asked with quiet significance that he understood at once.

"Not beyond the borders of female delicacy. I forgot in the intensity of the moment that I had cast you there with a broad reversal of my love—love such as men seldom give to women, Flynn."

She looked at him as if trembling in her mingling, and said, musingly:

"I have wandered so long I am lost now."

"Come home, Flynn," he said, reaching out his arms to her. "Let your heart whet it for helplessly a moment since. Trust me. Be mine."

Her head drooped where it was to rest henceforth.

"Tell me why you knelt here like one dead."

"For you," she said, shivering. "I thought you were dead."

"Then you loved me?"

"Oh, Lisle!" The fervor of her words thrilled through his soul.

"How long has this been, Flynn?"

"Since I came here as your sister's governess." He started suddenly.

"Before Fanny?"

"Yes," said a voice tinged with long-borne sorrow.

"Flynn, Flynn, you have suffered!"

She smiled a smile born of deep, soul struggles.

"It has not been in vain." The mask was all off now! Nature and her own self-imposed partial character shining through the face he held to his lips.

"You shall suffer no more alone, darling."

HORRORS OF THE DAY.

A POOR son of the Emerald Isle applied for employment at the establishment of a Broadway tailor, and the employer no more Irishmen, "for the last one died on my hands." "Indeed," said Pat, brightening up, "and is that the reason you have no Irishmen? Sure I can be accommodated that I never died in the employ of any master I ever served."

A company of young ladies lately discussed this question—"What is the great duty of man?" One of them, more astute than the rest, said, "To get married." He was to pay milliners' bills. This was agreed to without a dissenting voice.

"WHAT," asked the schoolmaster, "is the term applied to the crime of possessing two wives at one time?"

"Please, sir," replied the boy, "I don't know."

"And if there be more than two, what should you call it?"

The scholar reflected a moment, then chancing to cast his eye upon a map of Utah that decorated the wall, he smiled, and confidently answered,

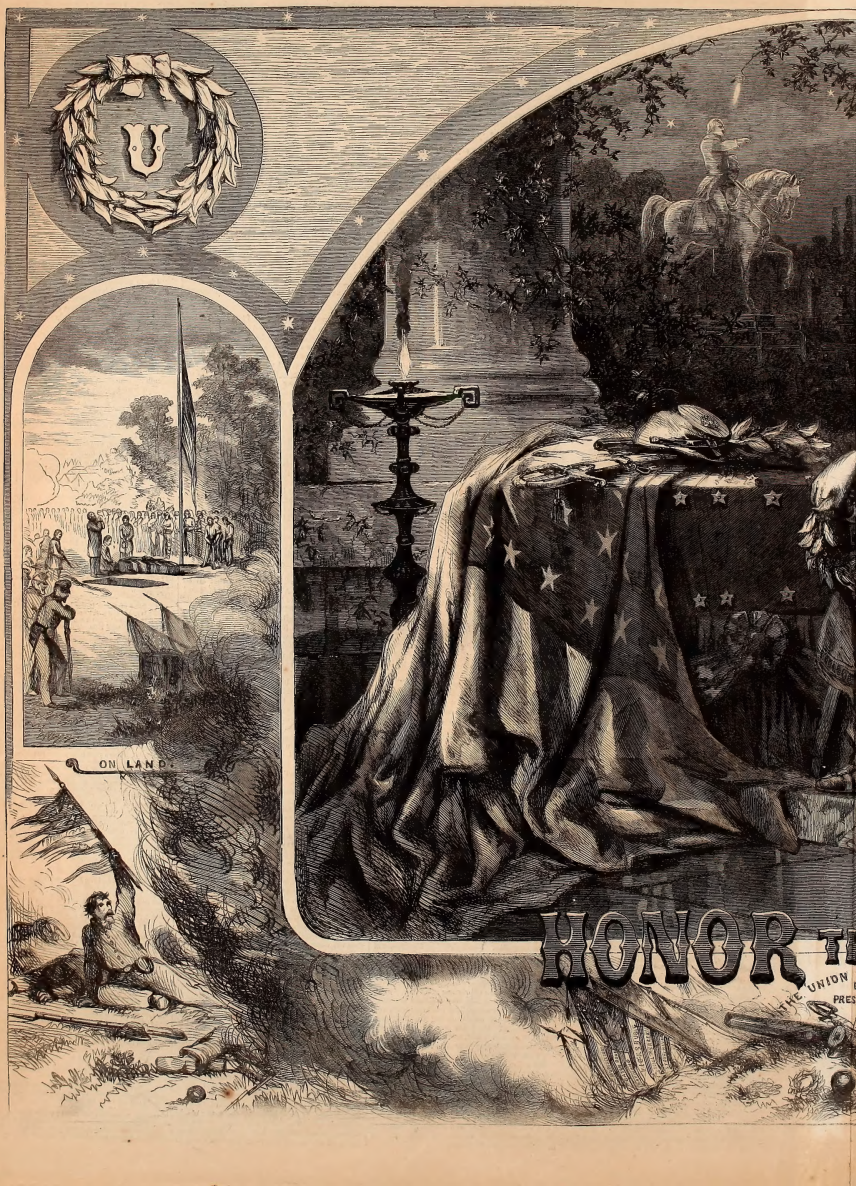
"Brigham Young."

A lawyer was once pleading a case in court before the full bench. The chief justice whispered in his neighbor's ear that he had enough to be heard by-and-by. "I'll wager he lies." The lawyer, not in the least discomfited, drew his conclusions to a full period, saying, as the bar exclaimed, "Put down your money—I take the bet!"

A young man, rather verdant and very sentimental, was accosted by a friend who found him in tears. He had evening by quoting from the poets, to the other choice and more attractive lines. "Why, you fool," said his friend, "Do you really think so?" said the young lady. "Oh yes, sir," was the reply. "Then," said another, "why don't you stay there?"

In Lady Morgan's Memoirs a story is told of a gentleman who had a remarkable habit of twisting his head with a violent philippic by declaring that his lordship was so much an observer of human nature that he could not look on Ash Wednesday?" "Of course he would," said a friend to his bishop; "of course he would, if it was a fast horse!"

A few years ago a little fellow was taken by his father to the theatre to hear the performance of the Siamese twins of the old times. In settling the business the master, who was a bachelor, asked the father, "Well, my boy, I suppose you can eat almost any thing, can't you? I always find that boys with large heads like yours." "Oh, I can enjoy thing but mutch and apple pieth," lisped the boy.



A West-end tradesman, who for two years had vainly tried to get the payment of a score of reverend debts, was suspected of living a little at the expense of confiding parishioners. He was met in the street one day by a "A dozen fancy satin pelisses." "What does this mean?" asked the fop. "What does it mean, indeed?" "They are doubtless your cravats," was the reply; "because they take a deal to hang themselves with."

In ancient Egypt a custom is said to have prevailed, which certainly appears to us rather a singular one—that the husband, on the marriage ceremony, used to present to his wife, instead of, with us, the wife to the husband. It was referred to this custom, perhaps, that the old remark was made by a wit, that he had often heard of Egyptian bondage, but never knew what it was before.

"Talk of rainine cats and dogs," said Dr. Spooner, in a late shower, as he made the fifth ineffectual attempt to keep his umbrella in the perpendicular.

Old Sir James Herring was remonstrated with for not riding earlier. "I can make up my mind to it," said he, "but I can not make up my bed."

Cobbett, in one of his "Rural Rides," says, "I saw no more rooding in ricks; a thing I never saw before, and one would not have believed it had I not seen it." The unlucky wit have believed it had I not seen it." The unlucky wit would not have believed that the bull he had made, to-defiet sportsle never found out the bull he had made.

U
ON LAND
HONOR
THE UNION
PRES

S
AT SEA.
HE BRAVE.
MUST AND SHALL BE SERVED

VERY HARD CASH.

By CHARLES READE, Esq.

AUTHOR OF "IT IS NEVER TOO LATE TO MEND," ETC.

CHAPTER XLI.

DR. SHORT arrived, approved Dr. Phillips's treatment, and said the case was severe but not hopeless, and he would call again. A bed was prepared in the house for Mr. Hardie: but neither he nor any of the Dodds could be induced to sorrowful night.

About midnight, after a short slumber, the sufferer became uneasy, and begged to be left with Julia. Julia was sent for, and found her a good deal easier, but much inquired after than once if they were quite alone, and then asked for paper and a pencil. She wrote a few lines and made Julia put them in a cover and seal them.

"Now, dear friend," she said, "promise me not to open this, nor even to let your mother; it is not for your happiness that what I have written should be seen by her or you; no, no, much better not. Once; dear friend, pledge me your honor." Julia pledged her honor.

Then Jane wrote on the cover, "From a dying sister." Julia saw that; and kept sore.

Jane comforted her. "Do not weep for me, love: I am content to go, or stay. This is not my doing; as I know it must be for the best. He is leading me by a way that I know not. Oh my beloved friend, how sweet it is to lie in His hands, and know no will but His. Ay, I thank Him for crossing my will, and leading me to himself by His own good way, and not by poor blind, feeble, mine."

In this spirit of full resignation she abode constant, and consoled her weeping friends from time to time, and even now and then herself.

About daybreak, being alone with her father, she shed a few tears at his lonely condition.

"I fear you will miss me," said she. "Take my advice, dear; be reconciled with Alfred at once, and let Julia be your daughter, since I am leaving you. She is all humility and heart. Dying, I prize her and her affection more highly; I seem to see matters clearer, all things clearer, than I did before my summons came."

The miserable father tried to be playful and said her "fancy was free" to take me at death," he said. "Your bridal-day is to come first; I know all Edward Dodd has told me he loves you. He is a more noble fellow; you shall marry him: I wish it. Now, for his sake, summon all your courage to me, and make up your mind to live. Why, at your age, it needs but to say, 'I will live, I will. I will;' and when all the prospect is dark, and the world swallows you at the altar, and on every side! If you could leave your poor doting father, do not leave your lover: and here he is with his mother's prayer for you. Let me comfort him; let me tell him you will live for his sake and mine."

Even this failed to console the dying Christian. "Dear Edward," she said; "it is sweet to know he loves me. Ah, well, he is young; he must live on, and I become as a forgotten leaf, her memory of his youth. And oh, I pray for him that he may cherish the words I have spoken to him for his soul's good, for longer than he can remember these features that are hastening to decay."

At ten in the morning Mr. Hardie's messenger returned without Alfred, and with a note from Dr. Phillips, to the effect that the order for Alfred's admission into his asylum being signed by Mr. Thomas Hardie, he could not send him out even for a day except by Mr. Thomas Hardie's authority; it would be a violation of the law. Under the circumstances, however, he thought he might venture to receive that order by telegraph. If then Mr. Hardie would telegraph Thomas Hardie in Yorkshire to telegraph him (Phillips) to that effect, Alfred should with two keepers wherever Mr. T. Hardie should so direct.

Now Mr. Hardie had already repented of sending for Alfred at all. So, instead of telegraphing to Yorkshire, he remitted passion, and said suilenly to Mrs. Dodd, "Alfred can't come it seems."

This Routine kept the brother from his dying sister.

They told Jane, with aching hearts, there was reason to fear Alfred could not arrive that day.

The only gave a meaning look at Julia, shut the paper; and then she said with a little sigh, "God's will be done."

This was the last disappointment Heaven allowed Earth to inflict on her; and the shield of Faith turned its edge.

One hour's pain, another of delirium, and now the clouds that darken this mortal life seemed to part and pass, and Heaven to open full upon her. She spoke of forthcoming glory no longer with resignation; it was with rapture.

"Oh!" she said, "to think that from this very day I shall never sin again, shall never agonized Him by unholy thought, by un-Christ-like behavior!"

The strong and healthy wept and groaned aloud; but she they sorrowed for was all celestial blue. Her father and Julia had age and sorrow, or religious fervor; was not without fervors hours, cold misgivings and depression; but all these fled at that dread hour when the wicked are a prey to dark misgivings, or escape into apathy. This timid girl, that would have screamed at a scratch, met the King of Terrors with smiles and triumph. For her the grave was Jordan, and death was but the iron gate of life everlasting. Mors janua vitæ. Yet once or twice she took herself to task: but only to show she knew that the All-Pure had not given her. "I often was wanting in humility," she said. "I almost think that I in this world of sin and sorrow I am leaving behind, I should grow a little in humility; for I know the ripe Christian is like the ripe corn, holds his head lower than when he was green; and the grave it seems to be ripening me. But what does it matter? since He who died for me is content to take me as I am. Come quickly, Lord Jesus, oh, come quickly!" Believe Thy servant as the burden of the flesh, and of the sins and foibles that cling to it, and keep her these many years from Thee."

This prayer was granted, the body failed more and more; she could not swallow even a drop of wine; she could not even praise Her Redeemer; that is not to say, she could not speak. Yet she lay and triumphed. With hands put together in prayer, and eyes full of praise and joy unspeakable, she passed to her God. Then she so mounted in the spirit, her breath came at intervals unusually long, and all were sent for to see Death conquered by the soul conquered by the soul.

At last, after an unnaturally long interval, she drew a breath like a sigh. They waited for another; waited, waited in vain.

She had calmly ceased to live.

The old doctor laid down her head reverently, and said, "Lord, now lettest Thou now Thy servant with many tears, "Oh, may we all meet where she is now, and may I go to her the first!"

Richard Hardie was led from the room in a stupor.

Immediately after death all the disfiguring effect of pain retired, and the happy soul seemed to have stamped its own celestial rapture on the countenance at the moment of leaving it: a rapture as wonderful, as beautiful, as touching in its calm, irradiated the dead face. The good Christians she left behind her looked on and feared to weep, lest they should offend Him who had taken her to Himself, and set a visible seal upon the house of clay that had held her.

"O, mamma," cried Julia with fervor, "look! look! Can we, dare we, wish that angel back to this world of misery and sin?" And it was some hours before Julia could be brought to hang on Edward's neck and weep his loss and hers, as weep we mortals must, though the saints of Heaven are rejoicing.

Thus died in the flower of her youth, and by what we call a violent death, the one child Richard Hardie loved; member of a religious party whose dignity is to be superior to pain and to soul; but the root of the matter is in them; allowance made for those passions, foibles, and infirmities of which they and all the rest are entirely free from, they live fearing God; and die loving Him.

There was an inquest next day, followed in due course by a public trial of James Meakin. But these are matters of form. The facts were obvious and interesting, must be omitted, or touched hereafter and briefly.

The effect of Jane's death on Richard Hardie was deplorable. He saw the hand of Heaven; but did not bow to it: so it fell on him with rage, rebellion, and despair. He got his daughter away and hid himself in the room with her; remained secluded by night and by day; spoke to no one; he shunned the Dodds: he hated them. He said it was through visiting their house she had met her death: and so in one sense He would not let himself see it was he who had sent her there with his he loathed Alfred, calling him the cause of all.

He asked nobody to the funeral: and, when Edward begged permission to come, he gave a cruel like a wild beast at being baying him. But Edward would go: and at the grave side crying Heaven echoed the young fellow's shocking heart with tears. Alfred also had to be in that parched old man, who stood on its other side like the withered Archangel, his eyes gloomy and wild, his brow dry as stone. Then the bare and crime and anguish, his lofty figure moved by his deep sobs, and the sound of it sickening by turns, with hatred and rebellion, with desolation and despair.

He went home and made his will; for he felt life hang on him like lead, and that any moment he might kill himself to be rid of it. Strange to say, he left a sum of money to Alfred; but at the moments before, he didn't know he was going to do it: a moment after, he was half surprised he had done it, and would not undo it. But he could not take the trouble. He went up to London, and dashed into speculation of some in their despair take to drink. After for this man had not two passions; avarice, and his love for his daughter. Bereaved of her, he must either die or live for gain. He sought the very core of Mammon; he plunged into the Stock Exchange.

When Mr. Hardie said, "Alfred can't come it seems," Mrs. Dodd misunderstood him, naturally enough. She thought the lacerated old man had sent some excuse; had chosen to let his sister die neglected rather than face Julia: "As if she would have refused to see him! as if I was in my home," said Mrs. Dodd, with severe contempt. From this moment she conceived a horror of the young man. Edward shared it fully, and the pair always spoke of him under the title of "the Wretch:" this way when Julia was not by. In her presence he was never mentioned. By this means she would in time forget him, or else see him as they saw him.

And so, after all, they knew little to Mr. Hardie's disadvantage, except what had come out in "the Wretch's" mouth and as moreover Alfred learns was an undutiful son to the father by his brevity and his misery.

His behavior was grateful quite acquitted him of having robbed them, and felt sure the fourteen thousand pounds was at the bottom of the sea.

They were a little surprised that Mr. Hardie never spoke nor wrote to them again; but being high-minded, and sweet-tempered, they set it down to all-absorbing grief, and would not feel sore about it.

And now they must leave the little villa where they had been so happy, and so unhappy.

The scanty furniture went first; Mrs. Dodd followed, and arranged it in their apartments. Julia would stay behind to comfort Edward, inconsolable herself. The auction came off. Most of the things went for a trifle; little money compared to their value: and with the balance the and young pair came up to London, and were grouped in their lodgings by God. Tears were in her tender eyes. "It is a poor place to receive my reasons," she said: Edward looked round astonished; "It was a poor place," said he, "but you have made a little palace of it, somehow or another."

"My children's love can alone do that," reflied Mrs. Dodd, kissing them both again.

Next day they consulted together how they were to live. Edward wished to try and get his father into a public asylum; then his mother could have a balance to live upon out of her income. But Mrs. Dodd rejected this proposal with astonishment. In vain Edward cited the Thor final judgment, and the patterns of comfort, and cure twice as many patients as the privates ones do. She was deaf alike to the Thor and to Edward. "Do not argue me out of my common sense," said she. "My husband, your father, is in a public asylum, where any body can go and stare at my darling!"

She then informed them she had written to her Aunt Bourdillon of Exeter for information, and invited them to contribute something toward David's maintenance.

Edward was almost angry at this. "Fancy asking favors of them," said he.

"Oh, I must not sacrifice my family to false pride," said Mrs. Dodd; "besides, they are entitled to know."

While waiting for their answers, a word about the parties, plan, and prospects.

Our Mrs. Dodd, born Lucy Fountain, was left at nineteen to the care of two guardians: 1, her uncle Fountain, a rich bachelor, who loved comfort, pedigree, and his own way; 2, her Aunt Bourdillon, a managing, dressing, and match-making way: both charming people, when they got their own way; vexatious, when they didn't: and peremptory always.

From guardians they grew match-makers and rivals by proxy: Uncle schemed to grab Lucy for a son of Sir Thomas Bescut, except from a high stool, devoted her to Richard Hardie. An unlooked-for obstacle encountered both: Lucy was most amazingly, and indeed incredibly, obstinate and their spadewards; but there she stopped dead short. They persisted; and, while they pulled her to the left, and ruffled her uncle's calm, David Dodd, first mate of the Something or other, East Indiaman—brown cheek, honest speech, heart of gold—fell deep in love and worshiped her at a distance. His timidity and social insignificance were also harmless as poppyseed: Fountain had him in to dessert to spin yarns; egotist Bourdillon invited him to her house to tea with. And there place he found Richard and Talboys both courting Lucy; this drove him mad, and in his fury he popped. Lucy declined with sensibility and regret, but went away blessing her, with a manly sob or two. Lucy cried a little and took a feminine spite against his rivals, who remained in force. Now Talboys, spurred by uncle, had often all but popped: only some let, hindrance, or just impediment had still interposed. Now, at last, he was preparing at each effort he made toward Hymen; they to say the subtle virgin kept probing the brute with a pin. Sometimes him carcade and spill the treacle as fast as it came her way. However, away they floated to pop by sea. It was the element his ancestors had invaded fair England by; and on its tranquil bosom a lover is safe from pen-and-ink rivals, and the myriad antipops of terra firma. Miss Lucy consented to the water excursion demurely, designing to bring her sickly uncle round to them, and so get rid of him for ever and ever. Plot and counterplot were baffled by the elements: there came an ungodly gale of wind, and rounded Cape Cod. Talboys boated so skillfully that he and his intended would have been united without ceremony by Father Neptune, but for the folly of the British Channel, but for David Dodd, who was hovering near in quiet anguish and a cutter. He saved them both, but in the effort he missed his ship, and professional ruin faced him. Then good-hearted Lucy was touched, and, to accelerate the Hymeneal gette, and he managed somehow to get David made captain of the Rajah. The poor girl thought she had paved the way accurately to David; but he refused the ship unless she would go halves, and while her egotists bullied and cursed her, he wrought on upon her pity, and teased her so, that to get rid of his importunity she married him. In time she learned to love him ten times more than if she had begun all flames. Uncle and aunt cut her tolerably dead for some years; Uncle drummed round the first; some antiquarian showed him that Dodd was a much more ancient family than Talboys. "Why, Sir, they were lords of sixteen manors under the Heptarchy, and hold some of them to this day." Mrs. Bazalgette, too, had long corresponded with her periodically, and on friendly terms.

The answers came on the same day, curiously enough. Uncle Fountain, ruined by railway speculation, was living on an allowance from creditors; but his house was at their service if they liked to live with him—and board themselves.

Mrs. Bazalgette's was the letter of a smooth woman who has boarded imperishable spite. She reminded her niece after all these years that her marriage with David was an act of disobedience and ingratitude. She then enumerated her own heavy expenses, all but the £400 a year she spent in bedizening her carcass, and finally, amidst a multitude of petty insults, she offered to relieve Mrs. Dodd of—Julia. Now Poetry has reconciled us to an asp in a basket of figs; but she was a scorpion in a bundle of nettles. Poor Mrs. Dodd could not speak after reading it. She handed it to Edward, and laid her white forehead wearily in his breast. Edward put the letter in an envelope, and sent it back with a line in his own hand declining all correspondence with the writer.

"Now then, dears," said he, "don't be cast down. Dodd alleged, as warning to us never to ask favors of any body. Let us face the thing in the face; we must work or starve: and all the better for us. Hard work suits hearty hearts. Come, have you any plan?"

"To be sure we have," said Julia, eagerly. "I mess to go keep a governess, and then I shall cost mamma nothing, and besides I can send her the money the people give me."

"A pretty plan!" said Edward, sadly; "what! we three part company? Don't you feel lonely enough without that? I do, then. I'll be cast on the bare earth like a dog, if we are not to be all together to cheer one another along the weary road? What! are we to break up? Is that thought to be borne with?"

He could say no more for the emotion his own words caused him; he broke down altogether, and turn out of the room.

However, he came back in an hour with his eyes red, but his heart indomitable, determined to play a man's part for all their sakes. "Now ladies," said he, with something of his old gayety, and way that sounded so strange in the ears of his red eyes, and inspired a desire to hug him, "are full of talent, but empty of invention. Two months hence we are ruined, or in danger of thing, it is go for a governess, go for a companion, go here, go there, in search of what? Independence! Ay! Dependence, besides, all this going is bosh. Families are strong if they stick together, and if they go to pieces they are weak. I have found one bit of sense of that mass of folly they call antiquity, and that was the story of the old bloke with his twelve sons, and faggot to break. 'Break them over,' he said; and each son broke his stick as easy as playing with a straw. Now then, break it all together!' devil a bit could the duffers break it then. Now we are not twelve, we are but three: keep to them! We are two of a trade, and tied the lot together. No; nothing but death shall break this faggot, for nothing less shall part us three."

He stood like a colossus, and held out his hands to them; they clung round his neck in a moment, as to inharmonize his words—cling sight, and blessed him for standing so firm and forbidding them to part.

Mrs. Dodd sighed, after the first burst of enthusiastic affection, and said: "If he would only go a step further, and tell us what to do in company!"

"Ay, there it is," said Julia. "Begin with me. What shall I do?"

"Why, paint."

"What, to sell? Oh dear, my dauhs are not good enough for that."

"Stuff! Nothing is too bad to sell."

"I really think you might," said Mrs. Dodd; "and I will help you."

"No, so, mamma, I want you for something better than the fine arts. You must go in one of the great houses: Female servants are a must be a dress-maker; you are a genius at it."

"My mamma a dress-maker," cried Julia: "oh, Edward, how can you? how can you? poor, poor mamma!"

"Don't be so impertinent, dear. I think he is right: yes, I will. I am fit for. If ever there was a Heaven-born dress-maker, it's me."

"As for myself," said Edward, "I shall look out for some business in which physical strength goes further than intellectual attainments. Luckily there are many such. Mechanical stones is one. But I shall try a few others first."

It is easy to settle on a business, hard to get a footing in one. Edward soon discovered that dress-making was their best card, searched that mine of various knowledge, the Times, for an governess; but none came. Also he made enquiries among the shops. He was good to a fashionable dress-maker she had employed some years, and ask her advice. Perhaps Madame Blanch would find her something to do. "I never read such a thing in the Times," said Edward, clinging to his idol.

Mrs. Dodd found Madame Blanch occupied in trying to make one of those overwhelming idiots to whom dress is the one great thing, and all things else, sin included, the little ones. She had tried on a scarf three times; and it discontented her when on, and spoiled all else when off. Mrs. Dodd saw, and said obligingly, "Perhaps were I to put on you could judge better." Mrs. Dodd, you must know, had an admirable art of putting on a shawl or scarf. With apparent nonchalance she settled the scarf on her shapely shoulders so happily, that the fish hit, and the scarf went into its carriage; fury supreme, or no. Madame cast a rapid but ardent glance of gratitude Dodd-ward. The customer began to go, and after fidgeting to the door and back for twenty minutes actually went somehow. Then madame turned round, and said, "I'm sure, ma'am, I am much obliged to you; you sold me that scarf: and it is a pity we couldn't put her on your bust and shoulders, ma'am, then perhaps a scarf might please her. What can I do for you, ma'am?"

Mrs. Dodd blushed, and with subdued agitation told Madame Blanch that this time she was come not to purchase but to ask a favor. Misfortune was heavy on her; and, though not penniless, she was so reduced by her husband's illness and the loss of 4,000 by his bankruptcy, that she must employ what little talents she had to support her family.

The woman explored her from head to foot to find the change of fortune in some corner of her raiment: but her customer was as well, plainly, dressed as ever, and still looked an easygoing duchess.

"Could Madame Blanch find her employment in her own line? What talent I have," said Mrs. Dodd, humbly, "lies in that way. I could not eat as well as yourself, of course: but I think I can as well as some of your people."

"That I'll be bound you can," said Madame Blanch, dryly. "But dear, dear, to think of your having come down so. Have a glass of wine to cheer you a bit; do now, that is a good soul."

"Oh no, madam. I thank you; but wine can not cheer me: a little bit of good news to take back to my anxious children, will would cheer me, madam. Will you be so good?"

The dress-maker colored and hesitated; she felt the fascination of Dignity donning Humility, and speaking Music: but she rebuked. "It won't do, ma'am, I should be ruined by mistress in my own place. I couldn't drive you like I'm forced to do the rest; and then, I should be sure to favor you, being a real lady, which I'm not; and you always will be, rich or poor; and then all my ladies would be on the bite with jealousy."

"I, madam," sighed Mrs. Dodd, "am not quite one like a child; you give me sweetmeats, and refuse me food for my family."

"No, no," said the woman, hastily. "I don't say I mightn't send you out some work to do at home."

"Oh, thank you, madam." N.B. The dressmaker had dropped the Madam, so the lady used it now at every word.

"Nor stop a bit," said Madame Blanch. "I know a firm that's in want. Theirs is easy work by mine, and they cut up a piece of cotton into two or three days." She then wrote on one of her own cards Messrs. Cross, Fitchett, Copland, and Tyler, No. 13, and 14, Princess Lane, City.

"Say I recommend you. To tell the truth, an old hand of my own was to come here in very young about it, but she's taken a boy over time; so this will learn her business doesn't stand still for lie-abeds to catch it."

Mrs. Dodd put the card in her bosom and pressed the hand extended to her by Madame Claire Blanch; whose name was really White, minister. She went back to her children and showed them the card, and sank gracefully into a chair, exhausted as much by the excitement of asking favors as by the walk. "Cross, Fitchett, Copland? Why they were in the Times yesterday," said Edward: "look at this; a day lost by being wiser than the Times."

"I'll waste no more time," said Mrs. Dodd, rising quietly from the chair. "Her ladyship is to rest herself first. No, she would not. "I saw this lost by half an hour," said she. "Succeed or fail, I will have no remissness to reproach myself with." And she glided off in her quiet way, to encounter Cross, Fitchett, Copland, and Tyler, in the lane where a primrose was quietly growing—six hundred years ago. She declined Edward's company on her perquisite: "Keep me and comfort your sister," said she. But that was a blind; the truth was she could not bear her children to engage in what she was doing. No, her ambition was to ply the scissors and thimble vigorously, and so enable them to be ladies and gentlemen at large. Sir Joshua and Julia made a parcel of water-color drawings, and sallied forth all on fire to sell them. But, while she was dressing, Edward started on a fruitless search of employment. He failed entirely. They met in the evening. Mrs. Dodd resigned, Edward dogged, Julia ruder excited. "Now let us tell our adventures," she said. "As for me, shop after shop declined my poor sketches. They all wanted something about as good, only a little different: nobody complained of the grand fault, and that is their misfortune. At last, at one shop, a gentleman examined them, and oh! he was so fat; there, round. And he twisted his mouth so" (imitating), "and wiggled his eyebrows so: then I was full of hope; and said to myself, 'Dear mamma and Edward!' And so, when he ended by saying 'No,' like all the rest, I burst out crying like a goose."

"My poor girl," cried Mrs. Dodd, with the tears in her own eyes; "why expose yourself to these cruel rebuffs?"

"Oh, don't waste your pity, mamma; those great babyish tears were a happy thought: mine; he bought two directly to pacify me; and there's the money. Thirty shillings!" And she laid it proudly on the table.

"The old cheat," said Edward; "they were worth two guineas apiece I know."

"Not they; or why would not any body else give two-pence for them?"

"Because purses are a Drug."

He added that even talent was not salable unless it got into the Great Grooves; and then looked at Mrs. Dodd; she replied that unfortunately those Grooves were not always accessible. The City firm had received her stiffly, and squired for whom she had worked. "Children, my heart fell at that question. I was obliged to call myself an amateur and beg a trial. However, I gave Madame Blanch's card: but Mr. —I don't know which partner it was—said he was not acquainted with her: then he looked a little embarrassed, I thought, and said the Firm did not care to send its stuff to ladies not in the business; I might cut it to waste, or— He said no more; but I do really think he meant I might pinch it."

"Why wasn't I there to look him into the earth? Oh, mamma, that you should be subjected to all this!"

"Be quiet, child; I had only to put on my armor: and do you know what my armor is? Thinking of my children. So first on to my store, or and said quietly, we were not so poor but we could pay for a piece of cloth: and I be so unfortunate as to spoil it; and I offered in plain terms to deposit the price as security. But he turned as stiff at that as his yard measure; 'that was not Cross and Co.'s way of doing business,' he said. But is is unreasonable to be deposited as a repulse of my children and out of spirits; not much:" with this her gentle mouth smiled; and her patient eyes were moist.

The next day, just after breakfast, we announced a gentleman from the City. He made his bow and produced a parcel, which proved to be a pattern cloak. "Order, ladies," said he, briskly, "from Cross, Fitchett, and Co., Primrose Lane. Porter outside with the piece. You can come in, Sir." Enter porter with a box. "Please sign this, ma'am." Mrs. Dodd signed a receipt for the stuff, with an undertaking to deliver it in cloak at Primrose Lane in such a time. Porter retreated. The other side, "Our Mr. Fitchett requests me to observe this fall in the pattern. It is new."

"I will, Sir. Am I to trouble you with any money—for buttons, or the like?"

"No orders about it, ma'am. Ladies, your most obedient. Good-morning, Sir."

And he was out.

All this seemed like a click or two of City clock-work: followed by rural silence. Yet in that minute or two Mrs. Dodd's mind had a mental poverty, and left honest labor and modest income behind her.

Great was the thankfulness, strange and new the excitement. Edward was employed to set up a very long dark table, for another's use, so Julia to go and buy tailors' scissors. Calculations were made how to cut the stuff to advantage, and in due course the scissors were heard snick, snick, snicking all day long.

Julia pained zealously, and Edward, without saying a word to them, walked many miles a day hunting for a guinea a week, and finding it not. Not but what employment was often pushed before his eyes, but he could not stoop to swing it. At last he heard of a place peculiarly suited to him—a packing foreman's in a warehouse at Southwark: he went thence, and was referred to Mr. A.'s private house. Mr. A. was in the country for a day. Try Mr. B. Mr. B. was dining with Mr. C. Mr. C. was dressing, belated, he fell in with a fire, and said to say, he was in jeopardy: a little old man had run out at the first alarm, when there was no danger, and as soon as the fireas not had run in again for his celebrated snuff-box, he remembered he does put out some people's reason, clean. While he was rummaging madly the staircase caught, and the man cut off, and could not exit, and climbed up to a little staircase window at the side of the house. Here he stood, hoe in hand, screeching lustily and endeavoring to let the ladder had been brought; but it was a yard short; and the poor old man danced on the window-ledge and shook the house up to a gallant fireman who stood ready to receive him at great personal peril. In the midst of shrieks, and cries, and shouts of encouragement, the ladder practiced gymnast, saw a chance. He ran up the ladder like a cat, hugged fireman to death at it tight, then got on his shoulders and managed to grasp the window-sill: he could always draw his own weight up that way, so he soon had his knee on the sill, and presently stood erect. He then put his left arm inside the window, collared the old fellow with his right, with a powerful jerk, actually lowered him to the ladder with one Herculean arm amidst a roar that made the flames tremble. But such a strain could not long be endured; but the fireman speedily relieved him by seizing the old fellow's coat and directing Edward to let go. He did so, propping him by the waist, went down before him, and landed him safe. Edward waited till he was even down, then hugged him and took the ladder tight below; he hung from the ledge, got his eye with the ladder, descended, the ladder self quietly drop, and caught hold of it with hands of iron, and twisting round, came down the ladder on his hand over hand, without using his feet, a favorite gymnastic exercise of his, learned as the Modern Athene. He was warmly received by the crowd and by the fireman. "You should be one of us, Sir," said a fine young fellow who had cheered him and advised him to work. "I am," said he. "So I was," said Edward. The other thought he was joking, but laughed, and said, "Then you should talk to our head man about a vacancy, there is a vacancy, you know."

Edward saw the joke, and rode home on the engine. There he applied to the head man for the vacancy.

"You are a stranger to me, Sir," said the head man. "And I'm sure it is no place for you: you are a gentleman."

"Well; is there any thing ungentlemanly in saving people's lives and property?"

"Hear! hear!" said a comic fireman.

The compliment began to tell, though. Others put in their word. "Why, Mr. Baldwin, if a gentleman ain't ashamed of us, why should we be ashamed of him?"

"Where will ye get a better?" asked another; and added, "He is no stranger; we've seen him work."

"Stop a bit," said the comic fireman: "what does the dog say? Just call him, Sir, if you please; his name is Charlie."

Edward called the fine dog kindly; he came and fawned on him; then gravely snuffed him all round, and retired wagging his tail gently, as much as to say, "I was rather taken by surprise at first, but, on the whole, I see no reason to recall my judgment."

"It is all right," said the firemen in chorus; and one that had not yet spoken to Edward now whispered him mysteriously, "Ye see that there dog he knows more than we do."

After the dog, a biped oracle at head-quarters was communicated with, and late that very night Edward was actually enrolled a fireman, and went home warmer at heart than he had been for some time. They were all in bed; and when he came down in the morning Julia was reading out of the Times a spirited and magnificent description of the fire at Southwark, and of the heroism displayed by a young gentleman unknown, but whose name the writer hoped at no much line would never be allowed to pass into oblivion and be forgotten. In short, the Times paid him in one column for years of devotion. "Mamma, of course, was going to relate his adventure; but the journal told it so gloriously he hesitated to say, 'I' and all that." He just sat and heard, and ordered, and blushed, and grinned like an ass—pecile.

Edward's new duties escaped the Dodds' ease: "What is a packing for?" inquired Julia, reproachfully. "Is that sheepish face the thing to wear when a sister is reading out a heroic action? Oh, these are the things that make one long to be a man, to do them. What are you thinking about, Edward?"

"Well, I am thinking the Times is pitching it rather strong."

"My boy, what an expression!"

"Well, then, to be honest, I agree with you that it is a jolly thing to fight with fire and save men's lives: but I hope you are not going to fight; for now you will approve the step I have taken. Ladies, I have put myself in the way of doing the sort of thing every week of my life. I'm a fireman."

"You are jesting, I trust?" said Mrs. Dodd, anxiously.

"No, mamma. I got the place late last night, and I like it. I like my duties and put on the livery next Monday. Hurrah!"

Instantly the admirers of fiery heroes at a distance overflowed in grief and disenchantment, in the prospect of one in their own family. They could not speak at all at first: and when they did it was only to say, "Oh, Edward!" from Julia, and "Our humiliation is now complete," from Mrs. Dodd.

They soon dashed Edward's spirits, and made him unhappy; but they could not convince him he had done wrong. However, in the heat of remonstrance, he was at last thus they had just begun to hope by dint of scissors and patient brush to send him back to Oxford. He also defended, with a little hesitation, tender, loving, soothing, coaxing, and equivocating expressions, their idea of a lady's wife, a tall, strong, ornamental creature, whom the women were to cocker up, and pet, and slave for; and he rewarded by making, dear, soft, and in imperial smile on to her felt by their sovereign protégé from his armchair. And, in fact, good women have often demoralized their own to the dirt by this process; to be sure their idols were scarcely clay to begin.

Edward was any thing but flowery, so he paraded no manly sentiments in reply; he just plumply ridiculed the idea of his consenting to prey on them so. "Why, mamma," said he, "you I can't contribute as much to our living as you two can—the petticoats carry the brains in our family!—but I can contribute to your." Not if I know it."

"Pride! pride! pride!" objected Julia, lifting her grand violet orbs like a pensive Madonna.

"And such pride! The pride that falls into the low-lands, and sticks there," quoth Edward.

"That is cutting," said Edward: "but soyons de notre siècle: flunkyism is on the decline. I'll give you reasons for that in both your pipes:"

Honor and rank from no condition rise.
Act well thy part: in that the honor lies.

"Yes, yes," said Mrs. Dodd, "only first choose your part: and let your choice be reasonable."

"Mine was Hobson's; who never chooses ill. Come, come," said he, and appealed calmly to their reason: by which means he made a great impression at all. Then he happened to say, "Besides, I must do something: I own to you I am more conscious than I like to show. Mother, I feel like lead ever since she died." Now on this their fancy filled with sympathy directly. She encouraged him at once to say: "Now that I got my hand on that old duffer's collar, and hovered him to the ladder, and the fire shot roaring out of the window after him, and I got at them, and the crowd cheered the fireman and me, I did feel warm about the waistcoat, and, for the first time this ever so long, life seemed not quite ended: I felt there was a little bit of good left that even a poor dance like me could do, and she could approve: if she can look down and see me, as I hope she can."

"There, there," said Mrs. Dodd, tearfully, "I am disarmed. But, my darling, I do not know what you are talking about: stay; why Edward, sweet—I mean—pray note that the young gentleman in the paper: the one that risked his life so nobly; so foolishly if it was you."

"Why, mother, didn't I tell you it was me?" said Edward, coloring.

"No, that you did not," said Julia. "Was it? was it? oh do be quick and tell me. There, it was."

"Well it was: ah, I remember now; that splendiferous account shut me up. Oh I say, didn't the Times pitch it strong?"

"Not at all," cried Julia. "I believe every word, and ever so much more. Mamma, we have got a hero: and here he is at breakfast with us, like an ordinary mortal." She rose suddenly with a burst of her old fire and fell upon him, and kissed him, and said earnestly how proud she was of him: "and so is mamma; she may say what she likes."

"Proud of him! ah that I am; very proud and very unhappy. Heroes are my horror. How often and how earnestly have I prayed that my son might not be brave! Oh, Edward, but stay quietly at home out of harm's way."

Here remonstrance ended: the members of this family, happy by nature, were unhappy by accident, all knew when to yield to each other.

Unfortunately, in proportion as all these excitements, great and small, died, and her life became quiet and uniform, the sight of Julia's wound showed itself more and more. She never sang nor hummed, as she used to do, going about the house. She never laughed. She did burst out with fervid sentiments now and then, but very rarely; on the whole, a pensive language took the place of her lovely impetuosity. Tears rushed in a moment to her eyes with no visible cause. She often ran to the window, and looked all up and down the street: and, when she was out of doors, she looked down every side street she passed: and sometimes, when a quick light step came behind them, or she saw a tall young gentleman at a great distance, her hand trotted: it did not bound or run—trotted all it. And a sigh, when they came home, she lingered in a room, or at the door-step and looked all round before she went in.

At all these signs one half of Mrs. Dodd's heart used to sink with tenderness, and the other half melt with pity; for she saw her daughter was looking for "the Wretch." Indeed Mrs. Dodd began to fear she was losing her sympathy in ignoring "the Wretch;" Julia's thoughts dwelt on him none the less; indeed all the more, as it seemed; as the topic interdicted by tacit consent bade fair to become a barrier between her and Mrs. Dodd, hitherto her bosom friend as well as her mother. This was intolerable to poor Mrs. Dodd: and at last she said one day, "My darling, do you think I can see; rob me of your happy thoughts if you will, but of half of your sad ones."

Julia began to cry directly. "Oh no, mamma," she sobbed, "do not you encourage me in my folly. I know I have thrown away my affections on one who—who—I shall never see again: I shall I, mamma? Oh to think I can say those words, and yet go living on."

Mrs. Dodd sighed. "And if you saw him, would that mend the chain he has chosen to break?"

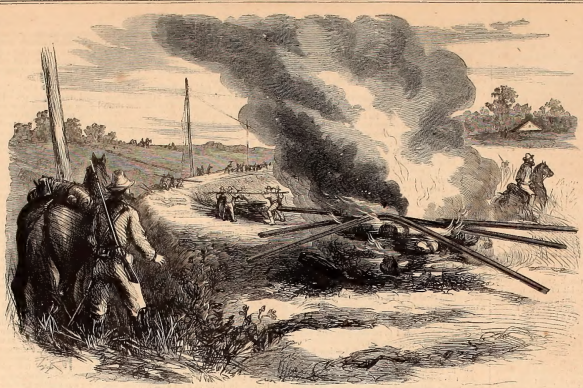
"I don't know; but if I could only see him, to part friends! It is cruel to hate him now he has lost his sister; and then I have got her message to give him. Oh, I am sure he is the man who he was afraid of me; why he could not tell me he had given her his hand, if he had not intended to have him against his will? Oh, mamma," said she, imploringly, "he seemed to love me; he seemed all truth. I am a poor unfortunate girl.

Mrs. Dodd had only caresses to soothe her with. She could not call on her son now.

One day Julia asked her, timidly, if she might be a district visitor. "My dear friend was: and advised me to be one too; but I was willful in those days, and chose to visit by fits and starts, and be independent. I am humbled now a little: may I, mamma, shun the world, and every word of hers seems a law to me."

Mrs. Dodd consented cordially, as she would to any thing else her wounded one had proposed.

This project brought Julia into communication with the poor cousin: and who would it prove to be but Mr. Hurd? At sight of him she turned white and red, and the whole scene in the church-yard took life in her. Mrs. Hurd showed considerable tact for so young a man; he spoke to her in secrets of deep respect, but confined his remarks chiefly to the weather in hand. She told her mother when she got home, and expressed her gratitude to Mr. Hurd, but said she would not call. Mrs. Dodd did the same parish with him. This feeling, however, wore off by degrees as her self-reproaching thought of her more and more into contact with him, and showed her his good qualities.



As for Mr. Hurd, he never understood her vivid emotion at sight of him; saw and pitied; not without wonder that so beautiful a creature should have been jilted. And from that he he marked his sense of Alfred's conduct by showing her a profound and chivalrous respect, which he did not bestow on other young ladies in his parish; on the contrary, he received kindness from them that bestowed it. By-and-by, from this segment of her side her own sorrow, and go sore-hearted day by day to comfort the poor and afflicted, he admired and almost worshiped her for this. He called often on Mrs. Dodd, and was welcome. She concealed her address on the present visit from her friends except Dr. Sampson; but Mr. Hurd had discovered her; and ladies do not snub the clergy. Moreover, Mr. Hurd was a gentleman, and connected to High Church. This she liked. He was very good-looking too, and quiet in his manners above all, he seemed to be doing her daughter good; for Julia and Mr. Hurd had one great sentiment in common. When the intimacy had continued some time on these easy terms, Mrs. Dodd saw that Mr. Hurd was falling in love with Julia, and that sort of love warm, but respectful, which soon leads to marriage, especially when the lover is a clergyman. This was more than Mrs. Dodd bargained for; she did not want to part with her daughter, and under other circumstances would have drawn in her horns. But Mr. Hurd's undisguised homage gratified her maternal heart, coming so soon after that great insult to her daughter; and then she said to herself, "At any rate he will help me cure her of 'the Wretch.'" She was not easy in her mind, though; could not tell what would come of it all. So she watched her daughter's pensive face as only mothers watch, and saw a little of the old peach bloom creeping back.

That was irresistible: she let things go their own way, and hoped for the best.

DESTROYING RAILROADS.

ONE of our artists has shown us, in the picture we publish herewith, how the rebels destroy railroads. The rails are torn from the ties, and fires are lighted and kept going under them until the iron is bent and warped so as to be useless hereafter. When a rail has been subjected to this process, there is nothing to be done with it but to send it to the foundry as "scrap iron."

HOW THE REBELS DESTROY RAILROADS—TWISTING THE RAILS.

RICHMOND FROM THE LIBEY PRISON.

WE are indebted to Captain H. E. Wrigley for the view of RICHMOND FROM THE LIBEY PRISON which we publish herewith. Our poor fellows, shut up in the rebel dungeon, beguile the weary hours by watching and sketching the capital of Jeff Davis's empire, until every steeple and every chimney is as familiar to them as the scenes of their childhood. Let us hope it will not be long before our loyal troops get a better view of the spot, and our cannon command every house in the place.

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.

WE publish on page 685 two pictures, from sketches by Mr. A. R. Waud, illustrating the present position of the Army of the Potomac. Mr. Waud writes:

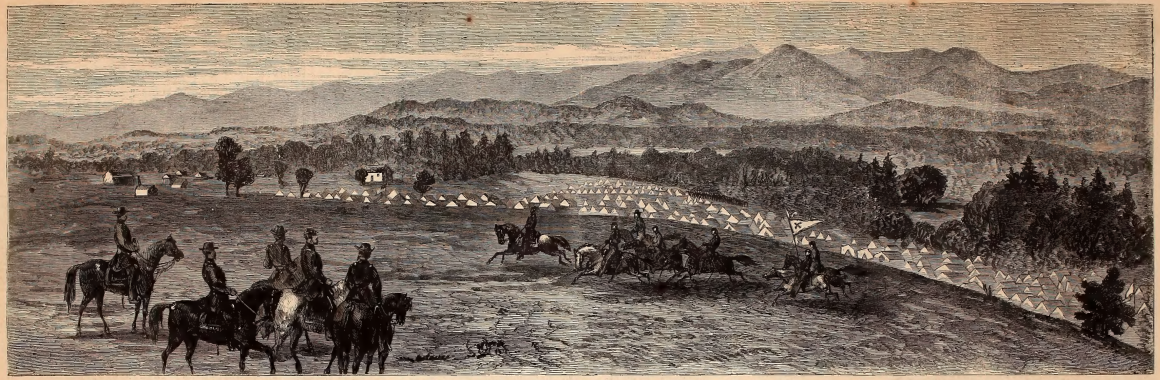
"THE BLUE RIDGE.

"The back-bone of the State—the mountains of Virginia—now loom up in front of the right wing of the army, in a grand panorama of ever-changing beauty. From Stonehouse Mountain, near the tents of General Shaler and his staff, these hills are a grand spectacle. Sweeping up in many peaks, wooded to the tops, the whole range in view extends far below Madison Court House to the south, and northward beyond Front Royal. Right in front is Turkey-hole Mountain, a ragged hill, which rises in front of Thornton's Gap; while to the south is Thoroughfare Mountain, an uneven hill, Southwest Mountain, Clark's Mountain, Cedar Run and Slaughter Mountain, and Pony Mountain, rise, isolated hills, from a wilderness of woods, with apparently few clearings. These woods are mostly of thrifty oak and other hard woods, affording quite a welcome cover to the enemy's scouts and guerrillas.

"SOMERVILLE FORD.

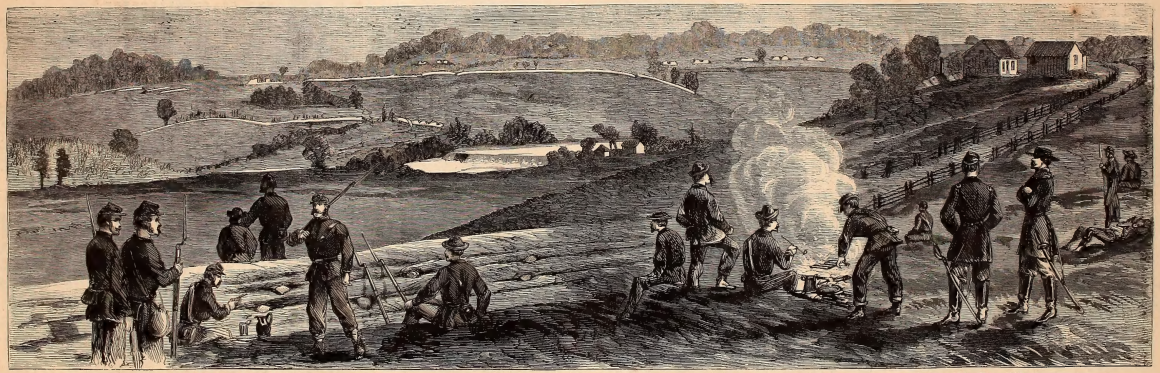
"The rebels have now a continuous line of earthworks upon the Rapidan River, in front of our lines. In fact, there are now fortifications along the Rappahannock and Rapidan from Port Royal, twenty miles below Fredericksburg, up almost to the sources of the latter river. Every point available for a crossing is fortified, which makes the already formidable line of the river almost impregnable. The picture of the position at Somerville Ford is a good specimen of the work done by the secessionists to stay the onward progress of this army. Along the crests of the hills are rifle-pits commanding the approaches, and behind these earth-works for guns, in position to command the opposite country. Since firing has stopped on the picket line, the sentries go down to the banks of the river and indulge in a little talk occasionally; also in a little barter, trading coffee for tobacco, and the Harper's for the Richmond Examiner. At one of these friendly gatherings the rebel pickets wanted to know why we did not follow their example, and fortify to prevent troops crossing.

"Our soldiers could not see why they should do that, when all we desired was to have them come over and bring all their friends.



"The rebs acknowledged they were afraid we should attempt to cross the river, and therefore did all in their power to insure safety."

Since our correspondent wrote matters seem to have changed somewhat. On the night of 9th–10th a large body of rebels moved north from Madison Court House, with what purpose can only be conjectured. On the morning of 10th General Kilpatrick had a lively cavalry skirmish with a body of Stuart's cavalry, and seems, on the whole, to have rather got the worst of it. Whether Lee is moving north with a view to fight the Army of the Potomac in its present reduced position, or whether this movement is merely a feint to cover a retreat, time will show. Lee's army has been greatly reduced of late.



1. Confederate States Capitol.—2. Castle Thunder.—3. Castle Lightning.—4. Gallego Mills.—5. Belle Isle.—6. Long Bridge, Petersburg Railroad.—7. Confederate States Steamer "Torpedo."—8. Gun-works.

VIEW OF RICHMOND, VIRGINIA, FROM THE LIBEY PRISON.—[FROM A SKETCH BY CAPTAIN HENRY E. WRIGLEY, TOPOGRAPHICAL ENGINEERS.]

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC—THE BLUE RIDGE, FROM GENERAL SHALER'S HEAD-QUARTERS.—SKETCHED BY A. R. WAUD.—[SEE PAGE 684.]

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC—SOMERVILLE FORD, ON THE RAPIDAN. SIXTY-NINTH PENNSYLVANIA VOLUNTEERS, WEBB'S BRIGADE, ON PICKET.—SKETCHED BY A. R. WAUD.—[SEE PAGE 684.]

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Burnett's Cocoaine.

☞ A compound of Cocoa-nut Oil, &c., for dressing the Hair. For efficacy and agreeableness, it is without an equal.

It prevents the hair from falling off.
It promotes its healthy vigorous growth.
It is not greasy or sticky.
It leaves no disagreeable odor.
It softens the hair when hard and dry.
It soothes the irritated scalp skin.
It affords the mildest dressing.
It remains longest in effect.

☞ A single application renders the hair (no matter how stiff and dry) soft and glossy for several days. It is conceded, by all who have used it, to be the best and cheapest Hair Dressing in the World.

Prepared by JOSEPH BURNETT & CO., Boston, and for sale by dealers generally.

MERCHANTS' and MANUFACTURERS' Foot Protection and Universal Agency, Instituted under an Act of 1817.

Merchants, Manufacturers, Agents, Peddlers, and all others wishing to increase their business, should send a stamp for our Circular. GOODWIN & CO., 429 Broadway, New York.

Union Playing Cards.

Colonel for King, Goddess of Liberty for Queen, and Major for Jack. Ornamented cards for Poker—Eagles, Shields, Stars, and Flags are the suits, and you can play all the usual games. Two packs, in cases, mailed Free upon receipt of $1. The usual discount to the trade. Send for a Circular. Address AMERICAN CARD COMPANY,
450 Broadway, N. Y., or 165 William Street, N. Y.

$1 VAN ANDEN'S ONE DOLLAR PORTABLE COPYING PRESS. $1
Acknowledged by all who have used it to be, in all respects, unequaled. Sent free by mail. Liberal discount to agents and the trade. HANNAH & HOGG, 104 John St., N. Y. Room No. 1. Send 3 ct. stamp for circular.

TWO WORKS
VALUABLE TO THE SICK OR WELL
Sent by mail.
No pay expected until received, read, and approved.
1st. DR. S. S. FITCH'S SIX LECTURES on the Causes, Prevention, and Cure of Consumption, Skin Diseases, Scrofula and Female Complaints, &c. On the Mode and Rules for Procuring Health. 300 pages, 12 mo. Price 50c.
2d. DR. S. S. FITCH'S NEW WORK on Heart Diseases, Apoplexy, Rheumatism, Erysipelas, and many valuable Medical Prescriptions for these Diseases. 168 pages, 6 engravings. Price 50 cents. ☞ Are the only works that have, giving Name, State, County, and Post-Office. Address DR. S. S. FITCH, No. 714 Broadway, New York.

ALL ARTICLES FOR SOLDIERS
At Baltimore, Washington, and all places occupied by Union troops, should be sent by HARNDEN'S EXPRESS, No. 74 Broadway. Sutters charged for rates.

ENAMELED CHAMBER FURNITURE.—The best assortment of Enameled Chamber Furniture, in all colors and styles, Walnut and Chestnut, Plain and Ornamental, to be found. Wholesale and Retail. Also, Mattresses and Pillows. WARREN WARD, No. 377 Canal St., N. Y.

HOSTETTER'S
CELEBRATED
STOMACH BITTERS

LADIES OF DELICATE CONSTITUTION and uncertain health are strenuously advised to throw aside the tasteless and useless preparations of which they are accustomed to drug themselves, and test the hygiene, Body-and-Constitution-regulating virtues of HOSTETTER'S CELEBRATED STOMACH BITTERS. In all the complaints and disabilities arising from sexual causes, they will find this cheering, refreshing, and invigorating preparation of extraordinary efficacy. Vegetating properties are wonderful, and as a remedy for the languor, nausea, tremors, nervousness, hysteria, &c., which often accompany the develop-ment of womanhood, it has no equal either among the prescriptions of the faculty or secret nostrums. For the many distressing feelings which usher in and often follow a period of maternity, and also for the painful and dangerous symptoms which sometimes accompany the change of life, HOSTETTER'S CELEBRATED STOMACH BITTERS are eminently recommended. No other restorative seems to be able to fit the constitution and the system so much for the roller car. In all cases of female debility, where there is a want of self-a ctivation, the BITTERS produce a most important change—relieving local weakness, and re-establishing the general health. Sold by all Druggists and Fancy Goods dealers.

Hostetter's Stomach Bitters,
Prepared and sold by
HOSTETTER & SMITH, Pittsburgh, Pa.
Depot for New York, 418 Broadway.

DO YOU WANT LUXURIANT WHISKERS OR MUSTACHES? My Organic oil force them to grow heavily in six weeks upon the smoothest face or upon the palm of the hand. Sent by mail, sent by mail, post free, to any address, on receipt of $1 order. E. G. GRAHAM, No. 109 Nassau Street, N. Y.

United States Army and Navy Journal.

A Weekly Newspaper, devoted to the interests of the Army and Navy, and to the discussion of coast defence.

Officers of the Army and Navy will find in this Journal the one paper in the United States that represents the interests of the United Service. Its articles are from the pens of the most military writers, and its special professional information is fuller, more accurate, and scientific than that of any periodical ever issued in this country. Its freedom from politics and partisanship, its full and accurate official and professional information, have already secured for it the approval of the most prominent officers of the Army and Navy, who accompany their subscriptions with letters similar to the following:

HEADQUARTERS, ARMY OF THE POTOMAC, Sept. 14, 1863.

DEAR SIR,—I have received several numbers of the Army and Navy Journal, and have noted with satisfaction the evidences they bear of the promise of usefulness of this journal. It will supply the sincere pleasure to aid my contribution to its maintenance, and I therefore herewith enclose the subscription. Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

GEO. G. MEADE, Major-General Commanding.

Prof. H. Coppee, of the University of Pennsylvania, writes:

A good paper of this kind has long been needed. Every officer of sort within my knowledge has a future, but many promises to be a brilliant success. Its very unpretending publishment and official information—its excellent articles, scientific, new, and yet practical—its high tone and liberal spirit—are all that could be desired. The form, page, and type are admirable; and your own willingness to spend off your profits is the opposite with both efforts and men in our service.

The Journal is published in a large-sized quarto sheet of 16 page, convenient for binding, and printed in the best manner on fine paper.

Terms, $5 a year; $3 for six months. Specimen copies sent, gratuitously, for Ten Cents. W. C. CHURCH, Proprietor, 192 Broadway, New York.

H. VAN NOSTRAND, Publisher.

Agents wanted for every regiment.

American Watches

For Soldiers

AT REDUCED PRICES.

American Watches for Americans!

The American Watch Company give notice that they have lately issued a new style of Watch, expressly designed for Soldiers and others who desire a good watch at a moderate price. These watches are intended to displace the worthless, cheap watches of British and Swiss manufacture with which the country is flooded, and which were never expected to keep time when they were made, being refuse manufactures sent to this country because unsalable at home, and used here only for jockeying and swindling purposes.

We offer to sell our Watch, which is of the most substantial manufacture, as accurate and durable time-keepers, and in Sterling Silver Cases, Hunting patterns, at nearly as low a price as is asked for the fancy-named Levers and Lepines of foreign make, already referred to.

We have named the new series of Watches, Wm. Ellery, Boston, Mass., which name will be found on the plate of every watch of this manufacture, and is one of our trade-marks.

Sold by all respectable watch dealers in the loyal states. Wholesale orders should be addressed to

ROBBINS & APPLETON,

Agents of the American Watch Company,

192 BROADWAY, N. Y.

SALISBURY, BRO., & CO.,
Agents for the United States for the Celebrated
ALBERTINE
Extension Holders and Gold Pens,
Of the most handsome and durable construction, put up in new fancy cases of one dozen each, and not sold in any less quantities. They will retail for $4 each.

Price, per dozen $40 00
" " ½ gross 75 00
" " gross 150 00

Sent by mail or express, prepaid. Address
SALISBURY, BRO. & CO., Providence, R. I.

Have you Played The Author's Game?

The only correct edition, with full instructions for playing, is published by

SAGE SONS & CO.,
Buffalo, N. Y.

GEORGE A. OLNEY
Stationer, 42 John Street, General Agent.

Photograph Albums,

Back-Gammon and Chess Boards.
Dice Chess Men's and Dominoes
Portfolios and Diaries for 1864.

Also, a large assortment of Foreign and Domestic Stationery, offered at

GEORGE A. OLNEY, 42 John St.

Diamond Pointed Gold Pens Retailing at Jobbing Prices.

Medium	Pen $0 35, in Silver ext. case,	$0 75
Large	" 0 50	" "	1 00
Engrossing	" 0 75	" "	1 50
Commercial	" 1 25	" "	2 00
Mammoth	" 1 50	" "	2 50
Leviathan	" 2 00	" "	3 00

Send Pencils Free—the filling will write eight to fifteen hours. Genuine Goods. Send stamp for Circular.
GEO. F. HAWKES, Manufacturer,
64 Nassau Street, New York.

"Vox Stellarum."

Just Published:

Future Fate
Foretold by the Stars:

Being the Nine Hundred Answers of Pythagoras to the Questions of Life and Destiny, derived from the Mystic Letters and Numbers of the Planets. Containing the Fundamental and Radical Mood of Fortune and Fate, beautifully colored. Also, the Moon's Good and Evil Influences on Mankind; and every existing Astrological Calculation of any known value. Compiled from the most Ancient Authorities. This book is the wonder of the times. Agents wanted.

Price One Dollar. Will be sent by mail on receipt of amount.

J. R. HAWLEY, Publisher,
164 Vine Street, Cincinnati, O.

$60 A MONTH! We want Agents at $60 a month, or allow a large commission, to sell our New Rotating Pencils, Oriental Burners, and 13 other articles. 15 circulars sent free. SHAW & CLARK, Biddeford, Maine.

Special Invitation.

BALL, BLACK & CO., Broadway, corner of Prince St.

The public are invited to the inspection of the most extensive importation of choice goods ever exhibited on this side of the Atlantic:—

71 cases from France and Belgium.
18 cases from England.
20 cases from Germany.

We would impress upon our patrons and all desirous of supplying their households with the works of true taste and elegance that the depressed state of the European markets affords all buyers the rare opportunity of purchasing a superior quality of goods at extraordinarily moderate prices. Purchasers will find no other sale advantageous. BALL, BLACK & CO.

HUBBARD BRO'S
IMPORTERS OF WATCHES
NEW YORK

Are offering the cheapest, most accurate, durable, and reliable Watch in the American market! They are the sole consignees in this country for the celebrated

Magic Time Observers,
The Perfection of Mechanism!
Being a Watch, or Open Face, or Lady's or Gentleman's Watch combined, with Patent Self-winding Improvement.

A most desirable watch for one of the present, most convenient, and decidedly the best and cheapest timepiece for general and reliable use ever offered. It has within it and connected with its machinery its own winding attachment, rendering a key entirely unnecessary. The cases of this Watch are composed of two metals, the outer one being fine 18 carat gold. It has the improved ruby action lever movement, and is warranted an accurate timepiece. Price, expertly engraved, per case of half dozen, $204. Samples watches in neat morocco boxes, $35. If sent by mail, the postage is 36 cents; registering, 59 cents.

COMPOSITE
Silver Watches!
First-Class Hunting Time-Piece!

For accuracy of movement, beauty of material, and, above all, cheapness in price, these watches surpass all others.

UNIVERSAL APPROBATION!

An imitation so faultless that it can hardly be detected from the solid metal by the most experienced judges. The material being alike all through, it can not be recognized by cutting or heavy engraving, making it not only in appearance, but in durability, the best resemblance of Solid Sterling Silver ever in existence.

The sale of these watches to the army is a source of enormous profit. Retailing, as they readily do, at $16 and upward. Many hundred dollars can be made in a single day—pay by return mail. Sent by express, C.O.D.

Ay Wholesale only! In heavy hunting cases, beautifully engraved, with enamel dials and fancy and hands, in neat receiving order, by the half dozen, $66; postage, 24 cts.; registering, 20 cts. Sold only by the case. Can be safely sent by mail.

Our importations are novelties produced by no other house, combining greater accuracy to thickerpers, being more elaborately and artistically finished, and at less price challenging competition from all other hands.

The press in all parts of the country volunteered utmost the superiority of our watches. Their encomiums are emphatic, speaking in favor of to the point, in a manner not to be misunderstood.

Particularly valuable for officers in the army, and travelers."—French Leslie's, Feb. 21.

"Prettiest, best, and cheapest time-piece ever offered."—N. Y. Illustrated News, Jan. 10.

"Exceed other manufactures in point of accuracy and elegance."—Private Army and Navy Gazette, May 2.

"An improvement on ordinary timepieces, and invaluable for railroad men."—N. Y. Am. Railroad Journal, Aug. 8.

"Elaborately and artistically finished."—N. Y. Scottish Standard, July 26.

"Combine great accuracy as timekeepers."—Pittsburg, Pa. Chronicle, July 6.

"Very pretty and durable watches for the army."—N. Y. Army and Navy Journ. Government organ, July 29.

"One of the oldest and most reliable houses in business."—Louisville, Ky., Journal, July 31.

☞ Terms Cash; Insurance in Advance. No agents employed; buyers must deal directly with us. If money is sent us by express or mail in a registered letter, it is at our risk. Orders will meet the most prompt and faithful attention.

HUBBARD BROS., Sole Importers,
169 Broadway, cor. Courtlandt St., New York.

Watches and Jewelry.

CHEAPEST AND BEST yet offered to the public. For list of Articles and Prices, address
PARKER COX & CO., N. Y.

Sponsalia Millinery Rooms,

12 Waverley Place. N. Y. City.

Madame Bendix, from Rue de la Paix, Paris, has just commenced her Fall and Winter Fashionable Show-Room, replete with EVERY NOVELTY, for the Fall Season, comprising the various garments enumerated below:

IMPORTED BONNETS.
IMPORTED HATS.
IMPORTED CAPS.

IMPORTED HEAD-DRESSES and NETTS of the rarest and most elegant description.

RICH FRENCH FLOWERS.

The FLOWER department being a fresh branch of the business, Madame Bendix will offer to the trade at CITY PRICES.

The distinguishing characteristics of this Establishment are

EXQUISITE TASTE,
MODERATE CHARGES,
POLITE ATTENTION, and PUNCTUALITY.

A separate department for MOURNING MILLINERY.

H. A. MARVIN, 94 Maiden Lane, N. Y., ☞ TWINES, Rope, Cordage, Oakum, Wool Sacks, Tarred Rope, Wick, CARPET WARP, Fish Lines, Blocking Cuts, Loom Harness, and Cotton Yarns, Winding and Wrapping PAPER, Envelopes, and Paper Bags.

Luce's Seamanship.

Seamanship, compiled from various authorities, and illustrated with numerous original and selected designs for the USE OF THE UNITED STATES NAVAL ACADEMY. By S. B. LUCE, United States Navy. In two parts. A new and greatly improved edition. With over three hundred illustrations. In one handsome octavo. Price $10. Just published by
D. VAN NOSTRAND, No. 192 Broadway, New York.

Burnett's Cocoaine.

☞ A compound of Cocoa-nut Oil, &c., for dressing the Hair. For efficacy and agreeableness, it is without an equal.

It prevents the hair from falling off.
It promotes its healthy vigorous growth.
It is not greasy or sticky.
It leaves no disagreeable odor.
It softens the hair when hard and dry.
It soothes the irritated scalp skin.
It affords the mildest dressing.
It remains longest in effect.

☞ A single application renders the hair (no matter how stiff and dry) soft and glossy for several days. It is conceded, by all who have used it, to be the best and cheapest Hair Dressing in the World.

Prepared by JOSEPH BURNETT & CO., Boston, and for sale by dealers generally.

MERCHANTS' and MANUFACTURERS' Foot Protection and Universal Agency, Instituted under an Act of 1817.

Merchants, Manufacturers, Agents, Peddlers, and all others wishing to increase their business, should send a stamp for our Circular. GOODWIN & CO., 429 Broadway, New York.

Union Playing Cards.

Colonel for King, Goddess of Liberty for Queen, and Major for Jack. Ornamented cards for Poker—Eagles, Shields, Stars, and Flags are the suits, and you can play all the usual games. Two packs, in cases, mailed Free upon receipt of $1. The usual discount to the trade. Send for a Circular. Address AMERICAN CARD COMPANY,
450 Broadway, N. Y., or 165 William Street, N. Y.

$1 VAN ANDEN'S ONE DOLLAR PORTABLE COPYING PRESS. $1
Acknowledged by all who have used it to be, in all respects, unequaled. Sent free by mail. Liberal discount to agents and the trade. HANNAH & HOGG, 104 John St., N. Y. Room No. 1. Send 3 ct. stamp for circular.

TWO WORKS
VALUABLE TO THE SICK OR WELL
Sent by mail.
No pay expected until received, read, and approved.
1st. DR. S. S. FITCH'S SIX LECTURES on the Causes, Prevention, and Cure of Consumption, Skin Diseases, Scrofula and Female Complaints, &c. On the Mode and Rules for Procuring Health. 300 pages, 12 mo. Price 50c.
2d. DR. S. S. FITCH'S NEW WORK on Heart Diseases, Apoplexy, Rheumatism, Erysipelas, and many valuable Medical Prescriptions for these Diseases. 168 pages, 6 engravings. Price 50 cents. ☞ Are the only works that have, giving Name, State, County, and Post-Office. Address DR. S. S. FITCH, No. 714 Broadway, New York.

ALL ARTICLES FOR SOLDIERS
At Baltimore, Washington, and all places occupied by Union troops, should be sent by HARNDEN'S EXPRESS, No. 74 Broadway. Sutters charged for rates.

ENAMELED CHAMBER FURNITURE.—The best assortment of Enameled Chamber Furniture, in all colors and styles, Walnut and Chestnut, Plain and Ornamental, to be found. Wholesale and Retail. Also, Mattresses and Pillows. WARREN WARD, No. 377 Canal St., N. Y.

HOSTETTER'S
CELEBRATED
STOMACH BITTERS

LADIES OF DELICATE CONSTITUTION and uncertain health are strenuously advised to throw aside the tasteless and useless preparations of which they are accustomed to drug themselves, and test the hygiene, Body-and-Constitution-regulating virtues of HOSTETTER'S CELEBRATED STOMACH BITTERS. In all the complaints and disabilities arising from sexual causes, they will find this cheering, refreshing, and invigorating preparation of extraordinary efficacy. Vegetating properties are wonderful, and as a remedy for the languor, nausea, tremors, nervousness, hysteria, &c., which often accompany the develop-ment of womanhood, it has no equal either among the prescriptions of the faculty or secret nostrums. For the many distressing feelings which usher in and often follow a period of maternity, and also for the painful and dangerous symptoms which sometimes accompany the change of life, HOSTETTER'S CELEBRATED STOMACH BITTERS are eminently recommended. No other restorative seems to be able to fit the constitution and the system so much for the roller car. In all cases of female debility, where there is a want of self-a ctivation, the BITTERS produce a most important change—relieving local weakness, and re-establishing the general health. Sold by all Druggists and Fancy Goods dealers.

Hostetter's Stomach Bitters,
Prepared and sold by
HOSTETTER & SMITH, Pittsburgh, Pa.
Depot for New York, 418 Broadway.

DO YOU WANT LUXURIANT WHISKERS OR MUSTACHES? My Organic oil force them to grow heavily in six weeks upon the smoothest face or upon the palm of the hand. Sent by mail, sent by mail, post free, to any address, on receipt of $1 order. E. G. GRAHAM, No. 109 Nassau Street, N. Y.

United States Army and Navy Journal.

A Weekly Newspaper, devoted to the interests of the Army and Navy, and to the discussion of coast defence.

Officers of the Army and Navy will find in this Journal the one paper in the United States that represents the interests of the United Service. Its articles are from the pens of the most military writers, and its special professional information is fuller, more accurate, and scientific than that of any periodical ever issued in this country. Its freedom from politics and partisanship, its full and accurate official and professional information, have already secured for it the approval of the most prominent officers of the Army and Navy, who accompany their subscriptions with letters similar to the following:

HEADQUARTERS, ARMY OF THE POTOMAC, Sept. 14, 1863.

DEAR SIR,—I have received several numbers of the Army and Navy Journal, and have noted with satisfaction the evidences they bear of the promise of usefulness of this journal. It will supply the sincere pleasure to aid my contribution to its maintenance, and I therefore herewith enclose the subscription. Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

GEO. G. MEADE, Major-General Commanding.

Prof. H. Coppee, of the University of Pennsylvania, writes:

A good paper of this kind has long been needed. Every officer of sort within my knowledge has a future, but many promises to be a brilliant success. Its very unpretending publishment and official information—its excellent articles, scientific, new, and yet practical—its high tone and liberal spirit—are all that could be desired. The form, page, and type are admirable; and your own willingness to spend off your profits is the opposite with both efforts and men in our service.

The Journal is published in a large-sized quarto sheet of 16 page, convenient for binding, and printed in the best manner on fine paper.

Terms, $5 a year; $3 for six months. Specimen copies sent, gratuitously, for Ten Cents. W. C. CHURCH, Proprietor, 192 Broadway, New York.

H. VAN NOSTRAND, Publisher.

Agents wanted for every regiment.

Union Playing Cards.

Colonel for King, Goddess of Liberty for Queen, and Major for Jack. Ornamented cards for Poker—Eagles, Shields, Stars, and Flags are the suits, and you can play all the usual games. Two packs, in cases, mailed Free upon receipt of $1. The usual discount to the trade. Send for a Circular. Address AMERICAN CARD COMPANY,
450 Broadway, N. Y., or 165 William Street, N. Y.

$1 VAN ANDEN'S ONE DOLLAR PORTABLE COPYING PRESS. $1
Acknowledged by all who have used it to be, in all respects, unequaled. Sent free by mail. Liberal discount to agents and the trade. HANNAH & HOGG, 104 John St., N. Y. Room No. 1. Send 3 ct. stamp for circular.

TWO WORKS
VALUABLE TO THE SICK OR WELL
Sent by mail.
No pay expected until received, read, and approved.
1st. DR. S. S. FITCH'S SIX LECTURES on the Causes, Prevention, and Cure of Consumption, Skin Diseases, Scrofula and Female Complaints, &c. On the Mode and Rules for Procuring Health. 300 pages, 12 mo. Price 50c.
2d. DR. S. S. FITCH'S NEW WORK on Heart Diseases, Apoplexy, Rheumatism, Erysipelas, and many valuable Medical Prescriptions for these Diseases. 168 pages, 6 engravings. Price 50 cents. ☞ Are the only works that have, giving Name, State, County, and Post-Office. Address DR. S. S. FITCH, No. 714 Broadway, New York.

ALL ARTICLES FOR SOLDIERS
At Baltimore, Washington, and all places occupied by Union troops, should be sent by HARNDEN'S EXPRESS, No. 74 Broadway. Sutters charged for rates.

ENAMELED CHAMBER FURNITURE.—The best assortment of Enameled Chamber Furniture, in all colors and styles, Walnut and Chestnut, Plain and Ornamental, to be found. Wholesale and Retail. Also, Mattresses and Pillows. WARREN WARD, No. 377 Canal St., N. Y.

HOSTETTER'S
CELEBRATED
STOMACH BITTERS

LADIES OF DELICATE CONSTITUTION and uncertain health are strenuously advised to throw aside the tasteless and useless preparations of which they are accustomed to drug themselves, and test the hygiene, Body-and-Constitution-regulating virtues of HOSTETTER'S CELEBRATED STOMACH BITTERS. In all the complaints and disabilities arising from sexual causes, they will find this cheering, refreshing, and invigorating preparation of extraordinary efficacy. Vegetating properties are wonderful, and as a remedy for the languor, nausea, tremors, nervousness, hysteria, &c., which often accompany the develop-ment of womanhood, it has no equal either among the prescriptions of the faculty or secret nostrums. For the many distressing feelings which usher in and often follow a period of maternity, and also for the painful and dangerous symptoms which sometimes accompany the change of life, HOSTETTER'S CELEBRATED STOMACH BITTERS are eminently recommended. No other restorative seems to be able to fit the constitution and the system so much for the roller car. In all cases of female debility, where there is a want of self-a ctivation, the BITTERS produce a most important change—relieving local weakness, and re-establishing the general health. Sold by all Druggists and Fancy Goods dealers.

Hostetter's Stomach Bitters,
Prepared and sold by
HOSTETTER & SMITH, Pittsburgh, Pa.
Depot for New York, 418 Broadway.

DO YOU WANT LUXURIANT WHISKERS OR MUSTACHES? My Organic oil force them to grow heavily in six weeks upon the smoothest face or upon the palm of the hand. Sent by mail, sent by mail, post free, to any address, on receipt of $1 order. E. G. GRAHAM, No. 109 Nassau Street, N. Y.

J. H. Winslow & Co., 100,000

WATCHES, CHAINS, &c., &c.

Worth $500,000.

To be sold for One Dollar each, without regard to value, and not to be paid for till you know what you are to get.

SPLENDID LIST!!

OF ARTICLES TO BE SOLD FOR ONE DOLLAR EACH.

100 Gold Hunting Cased Watches	$100 00 each.
100 Gold Watches	60 00 each.
200 Ladies' Gold Watches	35 00 each.
500 Ladies' and Gents' Silver Watches	15 00 each.
5000 Vest and Neck Chains	5 00 to 10 00 each.
3000 Gold Band Bracelets	5 00 to 10 00 each.
3000 " " "	2 00 to 5 00 each.
3000 Gold Lockets	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Monnic and Jet Brooches	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Lava and Florentine Brooches	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Coral, Opal, and Jet Brooches	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Cameo Ear Drops	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Monnic and Jet Ear Drops	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Lava and Florentine Ear Drops	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Coral, Jet, and Opal Ear Drops	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3500 Gent's Breast Pins	2 50 to 5 00 each.
3000 Watch Keys	2 00 to 4 00 each.
3000 Fob and Ribbon Slides	2 00 to 4 00 each.
3000 Sets of Room Studs	2 50 to 5 00 each.
3000 Sleeve Buttons	2 50 to 5 00 each.
6000 Plain Rings	2 50 to 5 00 each.
6000 Stone Set Rings	2 50 to 5 00 each.
6000 Lockets	2 50 to 10 00 each.
5000 Gold Thimbles	2 50 to 10 00 each.
10000 Gold Pens, Silver Mounted Holders	4 00 to 5 00 each.
10000 Gold Pens, with Silver Extension Cases and Pencils	4 00 to 6 00 each.

All of the above list of Goods will be sold for one dollar each. Certificates of all the various articles, stating what each one can have, are first put into envelopes, sealed up, and mixed; and when ordered, are taken out without regard to choice, and sent by mail, that giving all an equal chance. On receipt of the Certificate, you will see what you can have, and then if in at your option to send one dollar and take the article or not.

In all transactions by mail, we shall charge for forwarding the Certificates, paying postage, and doing the business, 25 cents each, which must be inclosed when the Certificate is sent for. Five Certificates will be sent for $1; eleven for $2; thirty for $5; sixty-five for $10; and a hundred for $15.

AGENTS.—Those acting as Agents will be allowed ten cents on every Certificate ordered by them, provided the remittance amounts to one dollar. Agents will collect 25 cents for every Certificate, and remit 15 cents to us, either in cash or postage stamps. Great caution should be used by our correspondents in regard to giving their correct address, Town, County, and State. Address

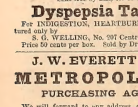
J. H. WINSLOW & CO.,
203 Broadway, New York.

Sent free by mail for 60 cents.

Dyspepsia Tablets,

FOR INDIGESTION, HEARTBURN, &c.—Manufactured only by

S. G. WELLING, No. 707 Centre St., New York.
Price 50 cents per box. Sold by Druggists generally.



J. W. EVERETT & CO., METROPOLITAN

PURCHASING AGENCY.

We will forward to any address, on receipt of order (accompanied by cash), ANY ARTICLE REQUIRED, at the LOWEST PRICES; Photographs, Albums, Engravings, Publications, Music, Jewelry, Books, Playing Cards, Army Caps Badges, or any or, ar articles procurable in the City.

We will forward, on receipt of 20 cents each, Photographs of GENERAL MEADE, MCCLELLAN, GRANT, HALLECK, BANKS, BURNSIDE, SIGEL, HOOKER, SHERMAN, HALLECK, SEWARD, GIDEON WELLES, ANDREW JOHNSON, and many of the leading OFFICERS IN THE ARMY AND NAVY.

Dominoes for the Million.

AMERICAN PATENT IVORINE.—This excellent article, being nearly durable, and a perfect substitute for the more expensive kinds, will relieve the tedium of the long confinement in the Hospital. Single sets, 15 cents, per mail; $1 50 per dozen; per hundred, $10.

Union Badge.

PER HUNDRED, $10.00.

SINGLE BADGES, 15 cents.

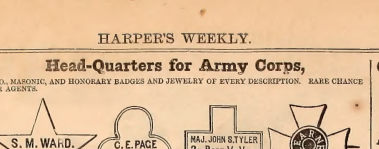
Sent free by Express or Mail.

Address J. W. EVERETT & CO.
111 Fulton Street, or P. O. Box 1,614,
NEW YORK CITY.

Printing Office for $12.

Every Man his own Printer.

THE LOWE IMPROVED PRINTING PRESSES are the best and cheapest portable Card and Job Presses ever invented, and have been awarded Silver Medals and Diplomas. Not-hasters, Druggists, and others, are saving or MAKING MONEY by using them. Cards, Bill-Heads, Circulars, Labels, &c., can be printed at a trifling expense. Price of Presses: $4, $5, $8, and $10. Price of Job Office, with Press, $12, $20, $30, and $40. Send for a Circular to the



LOWE PRESS CO., 13 Water Street, Boston.

EMPLOYMENT

AT YOUR OWN HOMES.—THOUSANDS CAN REALIZE A LIBERAL AND PLEASANT WEEKLY INCOME, who would extend their means if known to many hundreds profit to $10 per week, dispersed through the country. Full particulars and a sample of the work by mail, on the receipt of 50 cents. Address C. MUNRO BROWN, 74 Bleecker Street, New York.

Head-Quarters for Army Corps,

CO. MASONIC, AND HONORARY BADGES AND JEWELRY OF EVERY DESCRIPTION. RARE CHANCE FOR AGENTS.

50,000 Agents Wanted.

Agents wanted in every Regiment, Hospital, and on board every Naval Vessel. For $1, will send you as sample, with a Circular giving full instructions to Agents, either a Fine Gold Pen and Pencil, or a beautiful New Style Vest Chain, or Chatelaine Chain and Pin, or Guard Chain, or an Engraved Sprint Locket, or a Seal Stone, California Diamond, or Cluster Ring, or a fine Gold California Diamond Pin, or a New Style Set of Jewelry, or a solid Silver Shield, or other Army Corps Pin, with name, Co. and Reg. handsomely engraved upon it, or a Kearney Crescent Gold Plate; and, for 50 cents, I will send a beautiful Union League Pin, in fine Gold Plate.

Address R. T. HAYWARD, Manufacturing Jeweler, 208 Broadway, N. Y. Box 4876.

$15 Per Day Easy $15

And a Watch Free.

Employment for everybody, male and female. 30,000 men, women, and children wanted to act as our Agents in every Town and Village throughout the U. S. to sell our immensely popular, successful, and unheard-of-before large size PRIZE STATIONERY, RECIPES, and YANKEE NOTION PACKAGES, containing fine Writing Materials, such as Paper, Pens, Pencils, Envelopes, Blotters, Beautiful Emblems, Lady's Fashion Plates, Designs for Needlework, Cottage Keepsakes, Household Companions, Camp Companions for Soldiers, Parlor Amusements, Letter Writers' Guide, Medical Preparations, Many Ways to Get Rich, Likenesses of Military Heroes, Union Designs, Gents' Pocket Calendars for 1863, YANKEE NOTIONS of all kinds, and our Justly Celebrated Patent Self-Adjusting Skirt Recipes, Games, Army Advice, &c., &c., the whole worth, if bought separately, ONE HUNDRED DOLLARS each Package costs 25 cents. Wholesale rates to Agents only—for $100 we will forward 200 packages, all assorted. Our Packages make money in countless places where no competitors, and are valuable and reduced Articles of the kind now manufactured. Packages of all descriptions put up by the trade for Sutlers, Peddlers, Wholesale Dealers, &c., can be sent by Express safe to ALL PARTS of the Army South, or Southwest. A SPLENDID SILVER WATCH, Handsome Pattern, and correct timepiece presented FREE to each person who will act as Agent. Send for a Circular containing Extra Premium Inducements, sent FREE. CAUTION.—BE SURE AND ADDRESS S. C. HALLETT & CO., 160 Nassau St., N. Y. The Great Original, Largest, and Oldest Prize Package House in the World.

The Standard American Billiard Table.

Approved and adopted by the Billiard Congress of 1863. The best and only reliable billiard tables manufactured. Balls, Cues, and every article relating to Billiards. Sold by PHELAN & COLLENDER, corner of Crosby and Spring Streets, New York.

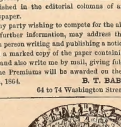
The "STAR" No Chimney Burner for Kerosene Oil Lamps, Patented Aug. 11, 1863.

Gives a brilliant and steady light without smoke or odor, and requires no chimney. An excellent portable or hall light. Can be carried and handled freely without being extinguished. Superior to any burner for the kind. Agents wanted. Sample sent, post-paid, for 25 cts. Circulars free. A liberal discount to the trade.

PETER ESSIG & CO., Manufacturers,
No. 3 Platt Street, N. Y.

$200! $150! $100! $50! PREMIUMS.

To Editors and Others!



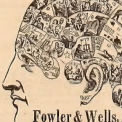
I will pay the above-named amounts for the best four articles on either my Soap, Substitute, or Concentrated Potash.

The articles must state the writer's experience in using the goods, and must be not less than one page, and be published in the editorial columns of any good family newspaper.

Any party wishing to compete for the above, and desiring further information, may address the undersigned. Each person writing and publishing a notice as above, will send a marked copy of the paper containing the notice to me, and also write me by mail, giving full address.

The Premiums will be awarded on the fourth day of July, 1864.

64 to 74 Washington Street, New York.



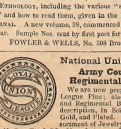
Fowler & Wells,

PUBLISHERS.

PHRENOLOGY, PHYSIOLOGY, PHYSIOLOGY, PSYCHOLOGY, SOCIOLOGY, including the various "Water Cures," and how to read them, given in the PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL. A new volume, 38, commenced in July. $1 50 a year. Specimens free, read by and by 13 cents.

FOWLER & WELLS, No. 308 Broadway, N. Y.

National Union League, Army Corps and Regimental Badges.



We are now prepared to furnish League Pins: also, Army Corps and Regimental Badges, of every description, in Solid Silver, Solid Gold, and Gilt, and have a large assortment of Jewelry.

E. N. TOUTE & CO., Manufacturing Jewelry,
203 Broadway, New York.

Soldiers' COMPANY PINS.

Constantly on hand and Engraved to Order, and sent free on receipt of Price.

Solid Silver $1. Solid Silver, $1.

Solid $1 k. Gold, $3 50 each.

Solid Silver, with Letters in GOLD Relief, $1 50.

Corps Badges

Sent free by Mail or Express on receipt of Price.

Solid Silver, $1 50. Enameled, $2.

Solid Silver, $1 50. Enameled, $2.

Solid Gold, $4. Solid Gold, $4.

Badges for the 1st, 2d, 3d, 5th, 6th, 11th, and 12th Army Corps.

1st Division Enameled Red, 2d Division White, 3d Division Blue.

Terms Cash in advance. Send for a Catalogue.
Address J. G. PACKARD & CO.,
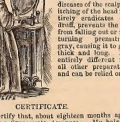
203 Broadway, New York.

Sportsmen, Tourists, and Army and Navy Officers.

Powerful and Brilliant Double Glasses.



Portability combined with great power in Field, Marine, Theatre, Opera, and general out-door day and night double perspective glasses, will show distinctly a person to know him at from 9 to 6 miles. Spectacles of the greatest transparent power to strengthen and improve the sight, without the distressing result of frequent change. Catalogues sent by enclosing stamp.

SEMMONS, Oculists-Optician,
601 Broadway, New York.

Printing-Press for Sale.

One Taylor Double Cylinder, for Bolton, Table Distribution, Bed 26x51. Price $2500.
Apply to HARPER & BROTHERS, 329 Pearl St., N.Y.

STERLING'S AMBROSIA

DR. STERLING'S

AMBROSIA

is a stimulating oily extract of roots, barks, and herbs. It will cure all diseases of the scalp and bring of the most inveterately eradicates dandruff, prevents the hair from falling out or from turning prematurely gray, causing it to grow thick and long. It is entirely different from all other preparations, and can be relied on.

CERTIFICATE.

This is to certify that, about eighteen months ago, I commenced using STERLING'S AMBROSIA. My hair was thick, thin, and rapidly falling out. I had tried many Hair Tonics, Invigorators, &c., without receiving any benefit. Soon after using the Ambrosia, my hair ceased falling out, and commenced growing rapidly as to astonish me. Now my hair is thick, long, and glossy, and is free from dandruff. I have not been a day confined to the house. This is the result I attribute entirely to the use of STERLING'S AMBROSIA, as since I commenced using it I have enjoyed good health.

MR. L. A. BROWN, No. 408 Broadway, New York.
PRICE $1 00 PER BOTTLE, containing two bottles.
DR. H. H. STERLING, Sole Proprietor,
Depot No. 402 Broadway.

For sale by all druggists.

Portable Printing Offices.

For sale by the ADAMS PRESS CO., 31 Park Row, New York. Circulars sent free. Specimen Sheets of Types, Cuts, &c., 5 cents. Send for it. GOLD'S CHASE & LEAVITT, 85 Lincoln Street, Boston, Mass.

Cloaks and Mantillas. BRODIE,

The Leader of Fashions!

Opened his Fall Stock on Thursday, 8th inst.

And as usual stands unrivaled for Style, Quality, AND VARIETY.

300 Canal Street, New York.

$10 AGENTS WANTED. $10

To sell Soothing New. Send stamp for Circular. S. W. RICE & CO., 83 NASSAU STREET, N. Y.

The Beard, Hair &c.

I am a discharged Indiana Volunteer. I will tell in a printed letter what I know of the short time or balsam with which a secret woman steamed the face of Chas. Schaffer, 18 years old, gassed by a sabre cut at the battle of Shiloh. With the healing power a thick Beard. It is a tasteless balsam, and has the remarkable power of causing the whiskers, hair, &c., to come forth quickly, fresh and strong, upon the smoothest face and the baldest head. Five small package, &c., given. ADDRESS JOHN RAWLINS, 767 Broadway, N. Y.

It is in the Beginning of Sickness you should Use

Brandreth's Pills.

One dose then of four or six pills is of greater service in curing you than many would be when the disease is further advanced.

After a few doses should you call in a doctor, your cure will be easy, compared with what it would have been had you not used BRANDRETH'S PILLS.

Be wise in time; if you are out of sorts get them. A single dose often cures a serious Diarrhœa, and will certainly open the bowels in all cases of Constipation, call in Colds, Asthma, and Affections of the Lungs, they are unrivaled.

THEY ARE THE BEST PURGATIVE IN THE WORLD.

Pamphlets of cure gratis, at PRINCIPAL OFFICE,

294 CANAL STREET,

Also at No. 4, Astor House Square, New York, where the Pills are sold.

See B. Brandreth in White on Government Stamp.

Sold everywhere by Dealers. Price 25 cents. Send every soldier a box.

Close of the Twenty-Seventh Volume.

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE

For November, 1863.

CONTENTS:

PICTURES OF THE JAPANESE.—I. LIFE IN THE CAPITAL.

ILLUSTRATIONS.—The Evening Meal.—Japanese Bellery.—Swashbucklers.—"We won't go Home till Morning."—Slightly Elevated.—Saburai.—Japanese Greeting.—A Woman.—A Fashionable Street in Superior.—Norimon.—Cango.—Yatoshi on Service.—At Rest.—Musicians.—Music-Girl and Servant.—Carrying Handsome Cake.—A Student.—Japanese Dove.—Musikmal Minstrels.—Carrying Flowers.—Japanese Bed.—Carrying Refreshments and Meal.—Gentleman Dressing.—Hair-Dressing.—Lady in Full Dress.—Coiffure Morchant.—Ladies Shaving Head.—The Matorial Locust.—Ladies at Toilet.—The Discovered Treasure.—Lady Cooking Supper.—Parachutists.—In Summer and Winter.—Female Costumes.—Woman of Rank.—Lover Meets Servant in a Silk Shop.—A Short Scene.

SCENES IN THE WAR OF 1812.—V. THE NORTHERN FRONTIER.

ILLUSTRATIONS.—General Brown's Residence.—William Vaughan.—Isaac Chauncey.—Old Church at St. Regis.—Site of Old Fort Presentation.—Colonel M. Pike.—Remains of Old Fort Toronto.—Remains of the Western Battery.—Fort Niagara.—Fort Niagara as Henry Leland.—Jacob Brown.—Month of French Creek.—Lighthouse Kept by Johnson.—Remains of Fort Schlosser.—Junction of Big and Little Sandy.—Brown's Head-Quarters.—Fort Erie.—Fort Covington.

JOSEPHINE HERBERT.

OFF-HAND SKETCHES.

CAP-AND-BELLS.—A NOVEL IN TWO CHAPTERS.

COMMENCEMENT WEEK AT YALE.

THE SMALL HOUSE AT ALLINGTON.

CHAPTER XXVII. An Old Man's Complaint.

CHAPTER XXXVIII. Dr. Crofts is called in.

CHAPTER XXXIX. Dr. Crofts is treated badly.

ILLUSTRATIONS.—The Small House.—"Let me beg you to think over the Matter again."

MORAL UTILITY OF CHILDREN.

IN THE RANKS AT STONE RIVER.

A WOMAN'S WAR-CRY.

THE RELIGIOUS LIFE OF THE NEGRO SLAVE. (Third Paper.)

HALF-WAY.

MAXIMILIAN OF AUSTRIA.

TRIED AND TRUE.

MY FRIEND CRACKTHORPE.

MONTHLY RECORD OF CURRENT EVENTS.

LITERARY NOTICES.

EDITOR'S EASY CHAIR.

EDITOR'S DRAWER.

SEA-SIDE SKETCHES.—With Two Illustrations.

PISCATORIAL.—With Two Illustrations.

FASHIONS FOR NOVEMBER.

ILLUSTRATIONS.—Promenade Dress and Girl's Fashion.—Shroud.

TERMS.

One Copy for one Year $3 00
Two Copies for One Year 5 00
An Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of Ten Subscribers, at $2 50 each, or 5 Copies for $10 00.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE and HARPER'S WEEKLY, together, one year, $6 00.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS.

Circulation over 100,000.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

Single Copies Six Cents.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year $3 00
Two Copies for One Year 5 00
And an Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of Ten Subscribers, at $2 50 each, or 5 Copies for $10.

TERMS TO ADVERTISERS.—Seventy-five Cents per line for inside, and One Dollar per line for outside Advertisements.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS.

SENSATION IN THE HAPPY FAMILY CAUSED BY THE RECEPTION OF THE RUSSIANS AT NEW YORK.

FISK & HATCH.

Bankers and Dealers in Government Securities,

AND

AGENTS FOR THE UNITED STATES FIVE-TWENTY LOAN,

No. 38 Wall Street.

Orders received for Five-Twenty Bonds at Par, interest to commence with date of payment.

U. S. 7.30 Treasury Notes.

Do. 1 Year Certificates.

Six per Cent. Bonds of 1881.

And all other Government Securities bought, sold, and constantly on hand.

Accounts of Banks, Bankers, and others received on favorable terms.

Special attention given to the Collection of Government Vouchers, Quartermasters' Checks, and maturing Certificates of Indebtedness.

FISK & HATCH, 38 Wall Street.

Miss Kate Denin,

The celebrated actress, says: "I have used Hyatt's KARAVITE for my hair, and find it the most pleasing article for keeping it in its full beauty and luxuriance that I have ever used. I can freely recommend it to every lady." It contains no oil, alcohol, or any other injurious ingredients, and is the most perfect hair-dressing in the world. Price 50 cents. Depot 46 Cliff Street, N. Y.

FISH'S PETENT LAMP HEATING APPARATUS

Boiling, Frying, Stewing—Steeping with the flame that lights the room.

Every Family should have One.

For description Pamphlet and Price List, address W. D. RUSSELL, Agent, 306 Pearl St., N. Y. Agents wanted.

Learn to Skate in One Hour by using The American Parlor Or Fleur Skate, Hard Rubber Rollers, Anti-friction Axles. Frederick Stevens, 215 Pearl Street, New York.

58 Kilby Street, Boston.

A Splendid New Book for Boys!

The Drummer Boy

In a story of Burnside's Expedition to North Carolina—a boy's book—full of stirring adventure and rapid incident. The life and enthusiasm of the young hero is painted in vivid colors".—New York Evening Post.

Elegantly illustrated. Price $1 00.

Just published by J. E. TILTON & CO., Boston, and sold at all book-stores.

PREPARE FOR THE HOLIDAYS.

There is no Gift or Present, which can compare with the Craig Microscope and Mountain of Objects. As a source of amusement and instruction they are unsurpassed. This Microscope will be mailed, postage paid, for $3 25; or with 6 beautiful mounted objects, for $5; or with 24 objects, for $8.

Address, HENRY CRAIG,
335 Broadway, New York.

A liberal discount to the trade.

VINELAND.

LANDS.—TO ALL WANTING FARMS.—Large and thriving settlement, mild and healthful climate, 30 miles south of Philadelphia by railroad. Rich soil, productive large crops, which can now be seen growing. Twenty and fifty acre tracts, at from $15 to $20 per acre, payable within four years. Good business opening for Mason-ary-Tyrkers and others, excellent schools, and good society. It is now the most improving place East or West. Hundreds are settling and building. The beauty with which the place is laid out is unsurpassed. Letters answered. Papers containing reports and giving full information will be sent free. Address CHAS. K. LANDIS, Vineland Post Office, Cumberland County, New Jersey.

From Report of Solon Robinson, Agricultural Editor of the Tribune:—It is one of the most extensive fertile tracts, in an almost level position and suitable condition for pleasant farming that we know of this side of the Western prairies.

A BEAUTIFUL MICROSCOPE

For 30 cts. (coin preferred), magnifying small objects 500 times. Five of different powers for $1 40. Mailed Free. Address F. C. BOWEN, Box 926, Boston, Mass.

A Household Word.—Buy your Housekeeping Articles at BASSFORD'S, Cooper Institute, New York.

Helmbold's Extract Buchu
Cures Diabetes.

Helmbold's Extract Buchu
Cures Gravel Brick-dust Deposits.

Helmbold's Extract Buchu
Cures Irritation of the Bladder.

Helmbold's Extract Buchu
Cures Inflammation of the Kidneys.

Helmbold's Extract Buchu
Cures Catarrh of the Bladder.

Helmbold's Extract Buchu
Cures Diseases Arising from Exposure or Imprudence.

Helmbold's Extract Buchu
Cures Nervous Diseases and Prostration of the System,

From whatever cause originating, and whether existing in either sex.

Helmbold's Extract Buchu

Is safe and pleasant in Taste and Odor. Diseases of those organs require the aid of a Diuretic.

Helmbold's Extract Buchu

Is the Great Diuretic.

Strengthening, Blood Purifying, and Invigorating.

Certificates from well-known persons in all parts of the country, in book form, giving the full descriptions, the cases and the mode of treatment, will be forwarded on receipt of 4 three-cent postage stamps.

It is a book of 100 pages.

Price of medicine $1 per bottle, or six for $5. Delivered to any address.

Direct letters to

HELMBOLD'S Medical Depot, No. 104 South 10th St., Philadelphia.

Sold by Druggists generally.

Beware of Counterfeits,

Ask for HELMBOLD'S. Take no other.

Live Yankees

In all parts of the habitable globe will be glad to know of a sure thing by which they may do good and get rich! All of my Agents are doing good and getting rich.

If you have vim and spunk enough to go and do likewise, send four cents postage stamps and receive full particulars in return.

J. R. HAWLEY, 164 Vine Street, Cincinnati, O.

Photograph Albums!

SUPERB STYLES, in ARABESQUE and GOLD, at ANY PRICE from $1 00 to $35 00 each. Very Elegant Albums, French Styles, for 50 pictures, sent for $5 00.

Catalogue and Price List sent on receipt of Five Cents.

E. W. LUCAS & CO., 175 Broadway, N. Y.

AGENTS WANTED.—$2 positively made from 20 cts.; urgently needed by every person. Call an' examine. Ten samples sent free by mail for 20 cts.; retails for $2. R. L. WOLCOTT, 170 Chatham Square, N. Y.

ROMAN SCARFS FOR LADIES & CENTS

3,000 dozen pure Roman Scarfs.

Made from the Purest and Softest Silk.

These are the most fashionable, elegant, and economical Scarfs ever imported, as they are reversible; one Scarf is as good as two.

They are much worn in Europe by both ladies and gentlemen. Can be worn with either pin or ring.

The whole lot will be retailed at

WHOLESALE PRICES!

1,000 doz. at $1 00 each; 2,000 doz. at $2 each. A single Scarf sent by mail on receipt of the above amount and six cents for postage. S. W. H. WARD,

No. 387 Broadway, New York.

STEEL COLLARS

ENAMELED WHITE.

Having the appearance and comfort of linen, have been worn in England for the last two years in preference to any other collar, as they are readily cleaned in one minute with a sponge.

To Military Men and Travelers they are invaluable.

Price $1 each, sent by Post to any part of the Union on receipt of $1 25.

WHOLESALE AND RETAIL

AGENTS WANTED in every Town in the Union.

S. W. H. WARD, Sole Agent for U. S., 387 B'way, N. Y.

FRENCH FLANNEL OVER SHIRTS.

the largest assortment in New York, $2 75, $3, $3 75 each; all cut one yard long.

A single Shirt sent by mail on receipt of the cost. The cost of postage must be ensured—25 cents for each Shirt. Send the size of your neck.

ENGLISH MERINO UNDERSHIRTS AND DRAWERS, $2, $2 25, and $2 50.

SCOTCH LAMB'S WOOL UNDERSHIRTS AND DRAWERS.

ALSO,

FINE WHITE SHIRTS

MADE TO MEASURE AT $24, $20, $18, AND $16 PER DOZEN.

Self-Measurement for Shirts.

Printed directions for self-measurement, list of prices, and drawings of different styles of shirts and collars sent free everywhere.

S. W. H. WARD, from London.

No. 387 Broadway, New York.

EDWARD ALLEN 729 IND. AVE. H

Annexed is a fac-simile design of the Solomon's Cornucopia. The letter representing the COMPANY is in BOLD RELIEF, and very conspicuous.

The Cornucopia will forward to any soldier one of the above Boxes, filled with silver, with name and regiment clearly engraved upon it, on receipt of One Dollar.

FOR CAMP USE ARE BADGES, see Ads.

Address J. G. PACKARD & CO., 208 Br'dway, N. Y.

IVORY SLEEVE BUTTONS

OR STUDS.—Red, White, and Black, engraved with initials. The per pair, will be sent free on receipt of the price by mail. For sale by WM. M. WELLING, manufacturer of Ivory Goods, 307 Canal St., N. Y., sign of the Golden Elephant. A liberal discount to the trade.

Shults' Ongruent, warranted to produce a full set of Whiskers in six weeks, or money refunded. Sent postpaid, for 50 cents. Address C. F. SHULTS, Troy, N. Y.

$22 WATCHES. $22

Genuine American Lever Watches, in Coin Silver, heavy Hunting Case, warranted, for $22. Retail price $25.

Genuine Full Jewelled American Lever Watches, in 4 ounce Coin Silver Hunting Case, gold joint, for $35. Also every variety of good watches, at equally low rates. All orders from the army must be prepaid, as the express companies will not take Bills for Collection on soldiers.

J. L. FERGUSON, Importer of Watches, 208 Broadway New York.

WATCHES FREE.

$15 Per Day Easy $15

Agents in Towns, and Soldiers in camp or discharged, are making easily $15 per day selling our GREAT NEW and WONDERFUL UNION PRIZE AND STATIONERY PACKAGES, NOVEL AND UNIQUE,ALES, and unlike all the old styles; containing all New Articles, and of fine quality. Writing Materials, Games, Useful and Fancy Articles, Likenesses of Horses, Camp Companions (for the Army), fish gifts of Jewelry, &c., &c., altogether worth over $1, for ONLY 25c. They are just the thing for a present to your friend in the Army. No family should be without one. Profits immense, sales quick. Soldiers in camp can act as Agents, and make money fast. A SPLENDID WATCH, warranted as a perfect time-keeper, presented free to all Agents. Package is endless variety and at all prices. Agents wanted all through the country. Send for NEW CIRCULAR for 1864, containing EXTRA Inducements. Sent "15 per day Easy" on limite page.

S. C. RICHARDS & CO., 102 Nassau Street, New York, largest and oldest Prize Package House in the World.

How to Paint Photographs.

A NEW WORK.

Just published. Price 10 cents. Sold by all principal Booksellers, Artists' supply-men, and Stock Dealers, and sent, post-paid, by the publishers.

J. E. TILTON & CO., Boston.

☞ 1 Doz. free by Mail for $1 25.

Beautiful chased metal frames for Card Photographs, to hang up or stand up. We call them the "Improved American Carte Forte."

For sale by all Booksellers, Frame Dealers, or Fancy Goods Men.

E. & H. T. ANTHONY,

501 Broadway, New York.

Manufacturers of Photographic Materials, Photographic Albums, and Stereoscopic Views.

Fogg's Double-Action Patent Lever Skate Buckle.

Manufactured and for sale on Straps, at wholesale, by F. STEVENS, Manufacturer of Skates, Straps, and Leather Goods, 125 Pearl Street, New York, 63 Kilby Street, Boston.

MUNN & CO.,

Solicitors of American and Foreign Patents,

And Publishers of the ILLUSTRATED SCIENTIFIC AMERICAN, 37 Park Row, N. Y. Pamphlets of information concerning Patents, FREE. Specimens of the Paper, FREE.

From the N. Y. Illustrated News, Jan. 10, 1863.

"One of the prettiest, most convenient, and decidedly the best and cheapest time-piece for general and reliable use ever offered."

Magic Time OBSERVERS!

The Perfection of Mechanism!

Being a Hunting, with OPEN FACE, or LADY'S or GENTLEMAN'S HUNTER CONVERTIBLE, with PATENT SELF-WINDING BARREL IMPROVEMENT.

A most pleasing novelty, of which we are the only importers in this country! It has within it and connected with its machinery its own winding attachment, rendering a key entirely unnecessary. The cases of this watch are composed of two metals, the outer one being of fine 16 carat gold. It has the improved ruby action lever movement, and is warranted on accurate time-piece. Its size is convenient, measuring but two inches across it. Price, superbly engraved, per case of half dozen, $204. Sample Watches, in neat Morocco cases, $35. If sent by mail, the postage is 36 cents; registering, 20 cents.

TERMS, CASH, INVARIABLY IN ADVANCE.

HUBBARD BROS., Importers,

Broadway, cor. Courtlandt Street, N. Y.

FINE DRESS SHIRTS TO ORDER. UNRIVALED In Manufacture, Fitting, and Material. At UNION ADAMS, No. 637 Broadway.

GOLD PENS AND CASES.

Retailed at wholesale prices. 14 kt. Gold Pen, Solid Silver Case, $1 50, warranted for one year, and every pen accompanying each Pen. Send for a circular. Pens repointed on receipt of 50 cts.

E. S. JOHNSON, 15 Maiden Lane, N. Y.

$7. WATCHES. $7.

A Beautiful Engraved Gold-Plated Watch, Lever Cap, small size, English Movements, perfect time-keeper. Sent free by mail, in neat case, for only $7. A Solid Silver, same as above, $7. Specially adapted to the ARMY. CHAS. P. NORTON & CO., 58 & 60 Ann Street, N. Y.

Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper says: "Messrs. NORTON & CO. have combined two very desirable things in a watch—cheapness and reliability. When it is known that for $7 a person can have an excellent timekeeper, there will be greater punctuality in all the affairs of life."

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. VII.—No. 357.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 31, 1863. [SINGLE COPIES SIX CENTS. $3.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1863, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

THE ARMY OF THE CUMBERLAND—DESTRUCTION OF UNITED STATES WAGONS BY REBEL CAVALRY, OCT. 2, 1863.—SKETCHED BY MR. THEODORE R. DAVIS.—[SEE PAGE 690.]

THE ARMY OF THE CUMBERLAND—REBEL ATTACK UPON WAGONS IN ANDERSON'S GAP.—SKETCHED BY MR. THEODORE R. DAVIS.—[SEE PAGE 690.]

THE ARMY OF THE CUMBERLAND.

We devote pages 689, 692, 696, and 697 to illustrations of the Army of the Cumberland. The pages 696 and 697 will be found a fine battle scene, which will convey an idea of the gallant stand made by General Thomas's heroes against the rebel advance at the battle of Chickamauga, when they saved the day and covered themselves and their leader with glory.

On pages 689 and 692 we reproduce three illustrations of the cavalry operations while in harness, the battle, from sketches by Mr. Theodore R. Davis, who writes:

HEADQUARTERS MARSH-GENERAL GRANGER, CHATTANOOGA, October 1, 1863.

Arriving at Bridgeport during a pelting rain-storm, and at night, I considered until morning under a railroad platform that seemed to comprise the town.

The morning came, and out I crawled, finding, after much inquiry, that "the way to reach Chattanooga was to walk, of course;" and "the distance by the safe route was only sixty miles." "But," quoth I, inquisitively, "General Wheeler, with all the cavalry of Bragg's army, is on that route now." My hunch-maker of the previous night there had only been a regiment under the pattern to have attacked any party and hard luck.

Very soon I learned that Colonel E. M. M'Cook, with a portion of his division of cavalry, would start at once to attack the raiders. Excellent! I at once volunteered my valuable services and those of a mule of which I unexpectedly found myself proprietor.

The combined force started at once, the rain pouring in torrents. We reached Jasper at midnight, and unwounded; which means, as far as our cause, to pour the water out of one's boots and crawl under a rail shanty. Dawn found us on the march, and when within a few miles of the enemy's Gap we saw a dense smoke, caused by the burning of a train of forage by the rebel cavalry.

At three o'clock we came up with the enemy, charging them at once. The Fourth Wisconsin, under Colonel De Grange, dashing down the road, while the Second Indiana, charged by a flank movement to the right, fighting Indian-fashion all their head. The while fore being under Colonel M'Cook.

The rebels soon broke and fled out of view. Then turned and ran, dropping their plunder as they went. Reaching a very strong position they again drew up in line of battle, only to break in disorder as our men came upon them in a naive charge.

At every commanding position they drew up in line only to stand for a moment—then skedaddle again and our men demoralizing in the extreme.

In one of these charges General Wheeler had a very narrow escape. Colonel La Grange had cut down one of Wheeler's staff, and the major's blade bending double, had dashed at Wheeler, when he had nearly reached, when the rebel jumped his horse over a fence, which left the horse of the gallant Colonel refused.

Just at this time Major Brodie had gotten so far in advance of his men that a number of the rebels had surrounded him, when, with a shout, his regiment rushed to the rescue, spilling on his way the pates of several of the rebel cavalry. During this charge Captain Hall, acting aide-de-camp of Colonel M'Cook's staff, was among the foremost in the fray. When, at last, the rebels had quite overpowered by questioning prisoners, of whom we had quite a number, that we had fought and whipped twice-as-many rebels as picked men with ten regiments, or less than half their number—as the prisoners reported from 11 different regiments.

The Fourth Indiana cavalry, under Major Lampson, had her some way up other men and bore herself as an old and earliest moment of daylight.

The next morning came, but with it a fog so dense that it was impossible to move, and eleven o'clock came before it was practicable to advance. Then after them we went, recapturing a large number of mules that they had stolen from our regiments, and again driving them.

Finding now that the continuance of my stay with the cavalry would only prevent my use for their correspondence, I returned to Anderson's Gap—finding as that place the brigades of Generals Mitchell and Turner. Near the Gap, and scattered for some distance along the road, were the immense stores and destruction of which I have given a full account. Over two hundred wagons had been destroyed and hundreds of mules. Some of the wagons had been fired without taking the mules from them.

THE NEW CALL FOR MEN.

By the President of the United States.

A PROCLAMATION.

WHEREAS, The period of service of part of the volunteer force of the United States will expire during the coming year; and whereas, it is desirable to the main during the present draft, it is deemed expedient to call out three hundred thousand volunteers, to serve for three years or the war, unless sooner discharged, during three years.

Now, therefore, I, Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States, and Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy thereof, and of the militia of the several States when called into actual service, do hereby call upon the respective calling upon the Governors of the different States to raise and to send into the United States service, for the various companies and regiments in the field from their respective States, their quotas of three hundred thousand men.

I further proclaim that all the volunteers thus called out and duly enlisted will receive advance pay, clothing, and bounty, as heretofore communicated to the Governors of States by the War Department, through the Provost Marshal General's office, by special letters.

I further proclaim that all volunteers received under this call, as well as those who have not heretofore credited to be duly credited and deducted from the quotas established for the next draft.

I further proclaim that if any State shall fail to raise the quota assigned to it by the War Department under this call, then a draft for the deficiency in said quota shall be made in such States, or on the districts of said State, for their due proportion of such quota, and the draft shall commence on the 6th day of January, 1864.

And I further proclaim that nothing in this proclamation shall interfere with existing orders, or with those which may hereafter be issued during the present draft, under which it is now in progress or where it has not yet been commenced.

The quotas of the States and districts will be assigned by the War Department, through the Provost Marshal General's office, due regard being had for the men heretofore furnished, whether by volunteering or drafting, and the recruiting shall be conducted in accordance with such instructions as have been or may be issued by that department.

In issuing this proclamation I address myself not only to the Governors of the several States, but also to the good and loyal people thereof, invoking them to lend their cheerful, willing, and effective aid to this measure thus adopted, with a view to reinforce our victorious armies in the field, and bring our mournful military operations to a prosperous end, thus closing forever the fountains of sedition and civil war.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the city of Washington, this seventeenth day of October, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-three, and of the independence of the United States the eighty-eighth.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

By the President:
WILLIAM H. SEWARD, Secretary of State.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 31, 1863.

THE REMOVAL OF ROSECRANS.

GENERAL ROSECRANS has been removed from the command of the Army of the Cumberland, and General Thomas, the hero of Chickamaugs, appointed in his place—General Grant taking the supreme command of all the armies on the Mississippi and in East and South-ern Tennessee. The announcement has taken every one by surprise. For two months, two months ago, the removal of a popular general from his command would have been a signal for a popular outcry, now even the Copperheads can barely get up a feeble hiss at the change; and the public at large, fully satisfied that the President knows what is required by the emergency, and is doing his duty faithfully, accept the event without murmur.

Whatever may have been the faults of General Rosecrans, it is encouraging to see that the President, when satisfied that he ought to be removed, had the courage to remove him, without hesitation or explanation to the public. We remember the time when the public safety absolutely required the removal of General Frémont, whose impolicy was jeoparding our cause in Missouri, and who was threatening to make us with a military despotism if their favorite were disturbed. If ever a head wanted amputation, it was his. Yet he was left unmolested for weeks, and months, and only ventured at last to strike the blow after the public of the West had been educated to distrust Frémont by the publication of Adjutant-General Thomas's famous report in the Tribune. Again, there can be no doubt but M'Clellan's removal ought to have been made months before it was, and as soon, in fact, as that General refused to obey orders from Washington, and to report to the Commander-in-Chief. The President hesitated and hesitated until a month of invaluable time was lost—fearing the effect of the removal of a commander who had won great personal popularity. But all of a sudden, he struck however, in these days; and Mr. Lincoln, perceiving that the Republicans did not throw down their arms and run away from the Democrats when M'Clellan retired to Jersey, now understand that the people, of whatever political party, are more devoted to the country than to any individual, and have not hesitated to remove Rosecrans. It was just this nerve and this courage which were required to insure the success of the draft.

There is a lesson to be learned by the people from this event, and that is, to beware of accepting the newspaper and popular estimate of generals as the true one. Up to the hour of Rosecrans's removal he was believed to be nearly perfection. He was called prudent, daring, invincible, lucky, the Napoleon, Jackson as a strategist, and always obedient to his superiors. He was contrasted with other generals, to their infinite disparagement, especially with those of Chicamauga, the Copperheads—whose implacable foe he had proved himself—threw the whole blame on Government, and entirely exonerated him. At one time loyal men clamored for his appointment to the command of the Army of the Potomac, and were only silenced when they were informed that the Army of the Cumberland had the more important duty of the two. Well, what if it should prove, when the truth comes out, that Rosecrans has been overpraised—that when he should have been daring, and rash when he should have been cautious; that the battle of Murfreesborough was lost by him, and afterward—when he has given his men up by his subordinates; that he should have taken Chattanooga weeks before he approached it, and should not have remained where he is beyond; that, by his advance, he disarranged the general plan of campaign determined at Washington, and thus lost the opportunity to aid and approval—and this seemingly from no other motive than a vain wish to win greater victories than Grant; that, so far from obeying the positive instructions of the President, he disregarded the commands of the President; and that, so far from being the chivalric soldier we painted him, he left the battle-field at Chicamauga in the middle of the fight, and was in bed at Chattanooga, sung and safe, when the gallant Thomas was left to furnish one who has the stemming the furious onset of the rebel army. If all this should be presently discovered to be the truth, what shall we then say of popular estimates of generals?

THE STATE ELECTIONS.

PENNSYLVANIA and Ohio have followed in the track of California and Maine, and Iowa and Indiana have not been behindhand. New York will fittingly close the quarterly campaign with a magnificent Union majority.

Last year honest citizens were deeply pained by a precisely opposite result. New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio were carried by the opponents of the Government, and it seemed to superficial observers that the people of the North were about to be substantially divided, which in effect would have secured the triumph of the rebels. The chief European organ of the insurgents—animated by a simple wish to see the United States destroyed—chuckled over the defeats of the Administration candidates, and confidently predicted the collapse of the "Lincoln Despotism."

We have changed all this now, and good citizens may congratulate themselves on the restoration of confidence. Throughout the North the fact has been established that the war must be prosecuted until the entire territory of the United States is permanently replaced under the dominion of the flag. We hear no more daily or ninety-day prophecies in these times. No one is now willing to pledge himself to the capture of Charleston, or Atlanta, or Richmond within a given time. We have learned to respect our enemy, and to bide our time. It may take one year, or it may take four to complete the work of subjugating the rebels. The Administration is basing its calculations and its contracts upon the theory that it will take at least three years from this time. This is the reckoning of the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Treasury, though both are wisely providing for a prolongation of the contest beyond the expiration of the period fixed in their estimates. The idea of every body, in and out of the Government, is that no further estimates as to time will be made, but that the war must be prosecuted steadily and perseveringly until the object sought has been attained.

In this view the overwhelming defeat of the Copperheads is a matter of decided congratulation. We learn from the elections in Pennsylvania and Ohio that the masses of the people can be relied upon, and that they are not less resolutely fixed upon the vigorous prosecution of the war than their leaders. With such evidence of popular determination the ultimate result is not doubtful. It is, as we said, a mere question of time.

The Democratic has pilloried Benedict Arnold, will erect a still higher gallows for the mean sneaks who, in this darkest hour of their country's peril, wavered, and commended submission to the traitors of the South.

OUR RENEGADES.

THE Earl Russell, who made his reputation as a friend of liberty and democracy throughout the world, and who seriously damaged that reputation by espousing the cause of the slaveholding rebels against the United States, has lately won a fresh laurel, and in a speech delivered in Scotland protests that he wishes to be considered as much a friend of the North as ever. This is consistent with the course Secretary Seward is pursuing. He is endeavoring to conciliate ill-will between the two nations. The Earl entrusts Senator Sumner, with Mr. Seward, and compliments the latter, as a friend of peace, at the expense of the former.

People in this country are very much touched by the Earl's graceful allusions to the beauty of peace, and to our common tongue, our common origin, and so forth. We remembered these things when England was at war with Russia, and our authorities combined in an instant to prevent even the departure of an infinitesimal fraction of our military levies. Earl Russell forgot them when he let the Alabama, the Florida, and the Georgia go to sea to prey upon our defenceless commerce. They only occurred to him after he had heard of the capture of the Atlanta (a sister ship of the Merrimac) in fifteen minutes by the Weehawken, and of the perforation of Gilmore's Parrott guns at Charleston.

When a man has trampled on his enemy and done him all the harm he can do, and is beginning to apprehend that the foe who seems crushed may rise and retaliate, he is very apt to be in a hurry to make a later of war. The Earl Russell's recollection of our common origin would have been better timed if it had occurred to him before he let the Alabama go to sea, in spite of the earnest protests of our officials.

He thinks it horrid that Senator Sumner should, on the heels of the bloody fight at Chickamauga, utter words which may lead to bloody battles with British troops. It had never occurred to him, probably, when he made his famous Newcastle speech which encouraged our rebels at a time when the natural consequence of that speech would be bloody battlefields. We, like Earl Russell, dislike battles. But still it is natural for a man who has done more than any other individual to foster the resistance of the rebels, to turn on us now, and exclaim against the blood spilled in the war. Why did he not think of this before he pronounced the slaveholding insurgents a belligerent power?

Blood-letting, in war, is a shocking thing, no doubt. No nation loves peace more than the United States. But we have been driven into a desperate war, mainly through the acts and expressed opinions of Earl Russell and his colleagues; and they may now with justice call Senator Sumner, much more than Secretary Seward, expresses the views of the people on our relations with England, when he tells the English that their conduct during the present war has aroused a hostility to them in this country which will outlive this generation.

THE LOUNGER.

INTERPRETING ELECTIONS.

IT is amusing to see the different interpretations that are put upon the recent elections. One Copperhead paper finds that they mean merely that nobody wants peace at any price. Another of a lighter hue, discovers that they are a terrible rebuke of Mr. Lincoln for listening to radical advisers. Another thinks that they prove that loyal men are going to do exactly what the rebels want them to do. And so the doleful tale goes round, and the Copperheads console themselves with telling what would happen if only the sky would fall, and the trees were sawn off even with the ground.

One thing is clear amidst all the speculation. It is pretty evident that Ohio does not wish Vallandigham for Governor, nor Fernando Wood, Mayor. We can all agree that they prove so much. Then why did those States not wish such Governors? They are certainly the same in both States. The arguments were identical. And what were they? Simply that Vallandigham and Wood were not loyal heartily for the war. There might be shadowy differences of opinion between them. Vallandigham might be with peace and union by separation, looking to reconstruction; and Wood-ward might pronounce for war upon terms certain to secure the success of the rebellion. But the popular common sense sees that if the rebellion is to subdued, it must be done by cordially supporting and supplying the men and means for the war. The people knew that neither W. nor V. intended so to support and supply—and they therefore rejected them both.

The policy of the war is as clearly defined as the war itself. Fighting, confiscation, emancipation, suppression of the human corpse in order that public safety require it," and drafting, are all measures of that policy. Every vote for Seymour and Wood-ward is its prosecution by all honorable means of warfare. That has been plainly announced for a year. It went into practical operation on the first of January, 1863, and every popular election since has overwhelmingly approved it. Every man whose face is veiled from the sun supports it, and, of course, mean to say that he approved every detail and every person involved in the working out of that policy. He is therefore leaving the matter confiding in the good intention of the Government, and especially in the unquestioned honesty of the President, all loyal men know that to oppose and embarrass the operations of the war is to help the enemy. That is, therefore, in the great States of Pennsylvania, Ohio, California, Iowa, and Maine, as well as in the smaller States of Connecticut, Vermont, New Hampshire, and Rhode Island, declared for the war and the policy of the war. Does any body suppose that New York will falter?

REBEL FRANKNESS.

THERE is one great change in the policy of the rebels. They began by shouting that they would never submit to less than their unconditional and the vile Yankee North. Every Northern party and man excepting Vallandigham and Seymour were renegades. Then they would acknowledge their independence, and then, perhaps, hold their noses and trade with us.

Now comes the child of experience. They confess now that they need Northern co-operation. It is not enough that they have an army invincible in numbers. They have also a loyal Northern support. The Chattanooga Rebel, published in Atlanta, says plainly that all the rebels have to do is to "maintain themselves" in the Kentucky and East Tennessee, "retake the Valley of the Mississippi, secure the Legislature of Pennsylvania, and bring to the fall, and arrange the terms of treaty and independence." Here is a very pretty programme for the loss of its cardinal points of the aid of the Northern Copperheads. Now the rebels may be supposed to know their friends as well as we do. What they say that they need is not bullets and peace ballots, who does not see that to vote for the candidates they wish to see elected is as particularly to their use as to shoot in the ranks of Bragg's or Lee's army?

DEPOSE.

THE London Times, speaking of Mr. Channing's expression of the want of English sympathy with the wonder of wonders, says: "To make a complaint of such perpetual recurrence is unreasonable. It is not removed the plunge into national ruin is unreasonable almost to childishness."

If the word States had been suffered to set aside without opposition, and the Union and Government which we consecrated with our blood—if we have been any less national ruin? Where would then have been the nation known as the United States? Or if, after an unprecedented and peaceful constitutional election in which they took part, the rebels had offered, or had been solicited to offer, to submit upon which they would obey the laws, would the Government have been any the less overthrown, and could its usurpation, which is now about to be shot fired, for the sole purpose of perpetuating human slavery, have been any less national ruin?

The Times says further: "Whatever may rise out of the wreck, it will not be the old Federal Union of America." Very likely; and what then? Whatever arose out of the great rebellion of 1645 in England was not the old monarchy of England. Was the civil war consequently a process of "national ruin?" The nationality and the union of these States will be preserved under a better and more stringent form than ever. Is that ruin? A man finds the walls of his house cracking. He strengthens them with iron bands and stays. Is it ruin, in a certain sense, the old house that rises to its feet? Or is the old house ruined?

LOYAL SHOTS AND VOTES GO TOGETHER.

GOVERNOR SEYMOUR, who declares that he had rather see the Union destroyed than Slavery, and who insists that we had no business to discuss subjects which were disagreeable to our Southern masters, who are now trying to whip us in to obedience, last week filled the bill for allowing the soldiers to vote. Why? Because his instinct was just. Because he knew that the soldiers would inevitably vote for the Government to support which they were fighting. Their fire and their vote are equally true to their country and the Union. How correct he was the late military vote in Ohio shows. There are so few votes against the Union and the war for it that they are not worth counting. Seymour knows that his "friends" are not in the field fighting the rebels. They stay at home to burn orphan asylums to avoid merciless conscript and helpless men and children. Perhaps some one would like to insist that the rank and file of the army are Copperheads. It is as true as that any thing that the Army of the Potomac will fight under nobody but M'Clellan.

HOW'S THE WIND?

IF the great debate in the British Parliament last April upon the duty of England under her neutrality to Lord Palmerston in his many hearty tone declared, amidst the applause of the House, that no menace would induce the Government "to cease down to this Russian and proposed violation of the law." In his late speech at Blairgowrie, Lord Russell said that the Government were prepared to do every thing that the duty of neutrality required, even if it should be necessary "that the sanction of Parliament should be asked to further measures."

Lord Palmerston spoke when the rebellion seemed to be successful. Lord Russell, when it is pretty surely defeated. The two speeches are a fair representation of what the Government of Great Britain understands by neutrality. To abolition to ask a change of the law last April was exactly what it is now. That one party in the war is sure of the successful use not only of the attitude of a neutral power. War with England will doubtless be avoided by her action. But let us not deceive us as to the conscious character of action. It is not a change of heart—Vicksburg, Port Hudson, Gettysburg, Charleston, those have been the "eye-openers" of Great Britain.

DUMBNESS IN LIBRARIES.

"A CONSTANT READER" writes that, having occasion recently to apply for a book at the Mercantile Library (in what city is not stated), he was requested, almost inaudibly, to write his name, address, etc., on a slip of paper, and, upon inquiry, was "curtly answered" that communication between the librarian and the reader was to be had by signs that there might be no noise of conversation. "Why, then, dear Lounger," asks the writer, "did the librarian's voice and lungsupply, if it was intended we should transact all the business of this worth by signs?" And he further remarks: "If this system is to be permanent, I would respectfully suggest that the library hire persons who are really deaf and dumb for librarians; in which case we should all be content, and it would be a fair employment to a class who do not often have the chance of making a living, and who could hand us the slips of paper and get us our books as well as those now in charge."

"A Constant Reader" is perhaps not aware that the slip of paper is a receipt for the book, is of great convenience for reference in case of loss, and saves murmuring in the library, where many students may be reading. And although, as he suggests, it is fair to presume that persons who have taste and culture enough to wish to visit a library will have sufficiently good manners not to disturb others, yet experience unfortunately shows that literature are a long way from all young and heedless persons who do not know the value of silence. Meanwhile, remember that in time of libraries, we do not understand that it is proposed to transact all the business of the world by signs or by slips of paper. It does not appear because the talk is not high at four o'clock that there will be a deluge at six. Does it?

A COMBINED MOVEMENT.

ON the 7th of September the Richmond Inquirer said: "The success of the Democratic [Copperhead] party would be no longer doubtful should General Lee once more advance upon Meade. Let him drive Meade from Washington, and it will again raise the spirits of the Democrats [Copperheads], confirm their timid, and give confidence to their wavering." Conformably with this plan General Lee did move upon Meade, but did not happen to drive him. At the same moment, and for the same purpose of raising the spirits of the Copperheads, General M'Clellan moved against the Government at Detroit with Lee. Lots of combined movement of Generals Lee and M'Clellan neither defeated the Government in the field nor at the polls. Another chief can be classed among the successful Generals.

THE LYCEUM.

THE Lyceum all over the country begins to arrange its winter courses of lectures. The demand for good lecturers was never greater, and some of the most eminent and popular, such as Mr. Beecher, Mr. Chapin, Mr. Bayard Taylor, return from their European absence refreshed and inspired. Inevitably and happily, the profound interest of the time will hardly suffer any speaker to wander far from some aspect of the condition of the country. Parties have disappeared. Politics are not now a question of partisan ascendency, but of national salvation. And hence we never was a time when the fullest public intelligence was more desirable, or there was never a better opportunity for the vigorous and frank discussion of the great fundamental social questions, to which our attention must be for a long time turned, than the Lyceum.

There will be a desire of variety, certainly, in the general range of topics, although there is little fear that the same subject will be treated in the same way by any of the chief lecturers. It is the treatment, no less than the topic, which is of the utmost importance. But for Lyceums which wish to have the current of public interests altogether, Mr. Taistro's and Mr. Vandenhoff's readings, Professor Youman's and Richard's scientific lectures, and the illustrated lectures of Mr. Oscanyan upon Turkish life, will be most attractive. The series of card-photographs illustrative of Mr. Oscanyan's lectures are extremely interesting. They are valuable studies of Oriental costume, and Mr. Oscanyan is so fluent in the English language, with which he is entirely familiar, that his lectures, with their fabulous, will be a most agreeable variety.

LITERARY.

"MARTIN POLE" is the last issue in the Harper's Library of Select Novels. It is by John Saunders, the author of "Abel Drake's Wife," a writer who is fast gaining great popularity for his vigorous and powerful stories of modern domestic life.

The Harpers also issue "The Ring of Amasis," a tale "edited" by Owen Meredith, which is the production of Messrs. Lytton Bulwer, one of the novelist, and a poet of some repute. This story is grotesque and fanciful; a love story which will not fail to interest those who like the peculiarly intense poetry of the author.

"DOES the Bible sanction American Slavery?" is the title of the latest essay of Goldwin Smith, Professor of Modern History in Oxford, recently published by Severs and Francis of Cambridge, Massachusetts. It is a brief, clear, and masterly exposition of the whole question. The author was at the South, who muddle their brains about the "Christianity" of slavery, could read and understand this short and unpretending book. Another accomplished scholar and noble Englishman, they would not fire another shot for the "divine" institution. This pamphlet of Professor Smith's we especially commend to our readers, because Bishop Hopkins of Vermont, in a letter to the Episcopalians of Pennsylvania, announces that he shall, within a few months, publish "a full demonstration of the truth wherein I stand"—namely, that the Bible sanctions Slaveryness to bred babies for sale. A pleasing truth for a Bishop to stand upon! Let the Bishop comprehend the feeling of the whole world. He proves to show that the Christian Church has always justified slavery, and his conclusion will be that Slavery is therefore a Christian institution. Now he knows the little work called "Slavery in Christendom," by Patrick Larrogue, formerly rector of the Academy of Lyons in France, in which the geography so profound and extensive a scholarship as the Bishop of Vermont's, that Slavery in Christendom Church has always approved slavery. But his conclusion is very different from the Bishop's. It is that it is not a true Church! He declares that slavery and "dogmatic Christianity" rise and fall together. And while he says plainly that Christ habitually associated with slaves, that in the utter condemnation of slavery, he asserts that those principles have never been practiced by the Church? It will be seen that the Bishop of Vermont spies a tolerably wide field. But to every simple Christian heart, which is more anxious to hear what Christ said than what men say that he said, Goldwin Smith's little pamphlet is conclusive.

"THE Union Generals," a work which G. W. Childs is preparing, will be the natural companion of every history of the war. It is to be written by distinguished literary gentlemen, most of whom have made the rebellion a subject of special study. With the description of each will be given, and in the most open form, the details of the heroes, with maps, plans, and wood-cuts, it must be a very important addition to the history of the war. The publisher, Mr. Childs, would be very glad to receive any facts or vertical incidents relative to the Generals or to the battles and sieges in which they may have been engaged.

"THE Student's Repository" is the title of a modest periodical published at Spartanburg, Indiana, which is devoted to the interests of the students and friends of the Union Literary Institute, a society of colored persons. It is to be issued quarterly, and if the spirit in which the interest of all Americans who wish that all men in this country should have fair play. Many of the articles in the first number are naturally crude and experimental, but the tone of the work is earnest and manly. As a brief paper by the editor, "What shall be done with the Negro?" written in 1860, is a very simple and conclusive statement of the wisdom of giving the colored man the free work with him. In the opening article a few remarks show a quiet good sense, which is worthy the careful consideration of every one. "We are not as a race ever become educated, elevated, and respected, we have got to do the work ourselves. No one else can do it for us. We must prove to the white man that we are as susceptible of improvement as he is."

ARMY AND NAVY ITEMS.

LIEUTENANT-COLONEL LLOYD D. WOODRUFF, of the Eleventh Regiment Illinois Volunteers, who served with distinction at Fort Donelson, Shiloh, and Vicksburg, and was for a long time Chief of Staff for Major-General M'Pherson, has been officially announced as Provost Marshal of the Port of Vicksburg.

Brigadier-General JESSE REED KING has been reappointed Minister Resident to Bogota, and has resigned his position as the staff, to take effect immediately. The mission has been vacant since the appointment of Mr. Jones. General King formed the command of the Eighth Corps, Army of the Potomac over to General MAJOR-GENERAL COUCH.

MAJOR J. W. ADAMS of the Engineer corps has been announced upon the staff of Major-General GILMORE. He will have the department of records and topographical surveys under his control. MAJOR ADAMS is an old army officer, and served for a long time upon the staff of Major-General BANKS.

The well-earned star has been conferred upon Colonel J. W. TURNER. That officer is now a Brigadier-General, continuing, however, to serve as Chief of the Staff and Judge of Artillery.

COLONEL DICKINSON, formerly Assistant Adjutant-General to General HOOKER's staff, has been assigned to the command of the convalescent camp, vice Colonel GERRISH, moved.

LIEUTENANT DRINKWAT, Provost Marshal of Williamsburg, Virginia, was shot on 14th October by Private BOYLE, of the First New York Mounted Rifles; and a day or two after Private BLAKE stabbed Private RUSSOO, both of the same regiment.

COLONEL FAIRCHILD, of the Second Wisconsin Regiment, who was severely wounded in the late battle, having received the effects of his wounds, received at Gettysburg, by which he lost an arm. He is now about to resign his commission and assume the duties of Secretary of State of Wisconsin, for which he is a candidate as a War Democrat.

COLONEL CORNAD BAKER, First Indiana Cavalry, and Colonel E. A. PARROTT, First Indiana Artillery, have been detailed to superintend the volunteer recruiting service in their respective States. Hitherto none but officers of the regular army have been assigned to this duty.

Colonel LOUIS FAIRCHILD, of the Second Wisconsin regiment, has been appointed a Brigadier-General, for gallantry in the battle of Gettysburg.

The friends of Colonel ELIPHALET HAMMOND say that there is no doubt that he will, on his return from his tour of inspection in New Orleans, be, perhaps other point in the West, resume his place at the head of the bureau.

Captains CUTTING and BENJAMIN, of General AUGUR's staff, have resigned their commissions and resumed their duties. The remainder of the General's staff are at New Orleans. General AUGUR has been made, temporarily, a Colonel in the Regular Army, and will, on the 1st of November, be assigned to a different field.

Major-General BANKS, who was recently ordered to the Department of the Gulf, remains in Washington, awaiting further instructions. It is rumored that he is to be assigned to a different field.

A court-martial, composed of thirteen officers, under medical treatment, but who are capable of performing the duties required of them, has been appointed for the trial of military offenders, at Nashville, of the One Hundred and Forty-second Regiment New York Volunteers, is President of the court. A similar court, of which Colonel CHARLES ZIEBER, of the Eighty-second Illinois Reserves, is President, has been appointed from the Invalid Corps.

The proceedings of the court-martial in the case of Lieutenant-Colonel BRADLEY, of the Fifth Kentucky, have been sent in, and are awaiting the action of the War Department. It is said that Colonel BRADLEY has received permission to return to Philadelphia to perfect his accounts as disbursing officer of the Fifth Kentucky.

General SCHENCK, though still suffering from his wound, is able to walk a little, and hopes to rejoin his brigade ere long: but the military authorities declined to send him to his home, believing that he can be more readily made liable of active service. He will, however, be ordered to New York, where he will remain as military court.

Last week Major-General AUGUR assumed command of the Department of Washington. It is reported that this change is owing to the difficulties caused by the illness of General HEINTZELMAN, and that the latter will resume command on recovering his health. General AUGUR will remain in the performance of their duties as head-quarters.

Lieutenant-Colonel CHARLES LATE, of Colonel RAINES' Cavalry regiment, have been dismissed the service for drunkenness on duty.

Five officers were arrested at Washington on 17th for remaining in the city without authority, after their regiment had left. They were ordered to report under arrest to the Provost Marshal General of the Army of the Potomac, and to be released from arrest with such duties as were attached to, these officers were arrested in less than twenty-four hours after the order for their release was received.

Lieutenant-Commander BRADDLEE has been detached from special duty in New York, and ordered to the Wabash.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.

THERE has been since our last number went to press a great deal of manœuvring, marching and countermarching by the various corps of the Potomac, and one small battle. It seems that Lee crossed the Rapidan, and encamped in the neighborhood of Culpepper Court-House, but was foiled by Meade's strategy. Meade fell back to and crossed the Rappahannock, and was followed by Lee. On a little rebel took place at Bristoe Station, in which the rebels were defeated, and Meade continued in the line of retreat to Centreville. Meade finally halted at or near Centreville. On 30th October it is said Lee was encamped in force on the Warrenton Turnpike, at the head of a powerful column of cavalry, with Stuart in command. Previously, Buford's division of cavalry was reported to be near Aldiegton, Virginia, one hundred and seven miles from Washington, and that Lee was to have fed on that region for a distance of over forty miles. The movement of General Lee by easier or shorter routes on the following day his retrograde movement toward Lynchburg was commenced. The troops in advance, under General Hill, were covered by an immense train of cars over Warrenton Junction on the Orange and Alexandria Railroad by way of Warrenton and Greenwich. Meade is now in pursuit.

THE BATTLE OF BRISTOE STATION.

THE following is the official report of the battle:

HEAD-QUARTERS, 3D DIVISION, 2D CORPS, OCT. 15, 1863.

The Major-General commanding announces to the army that the division, under command of the Second corps, was attacked yesterday, while marching on the Warrenton road, by the rebel forces under A. P. Hill, resulting in both sides, and the capture by the enemy of the guns, two colors, and 450 prisoners, of the Second brigade, Third division, Second corps. The gallantry and bearing of the officers and soldiers of the brigade, corps, are entitled to high commendation. By command of MAJOR-GENERAL MEADE.

S. WILLIAMS, Assistant Adjutant-General.

BURNSIDE'S ADVANCE.

General Burnside is reported by the rebels to be advancing from New Orleans, with fourteen thousand cavalry, for the purpose of making a raid on the East Tennessee Railroad, and cutting off supplies from the destruction of the great salt-works near Abingdon. They acknowledge that he had engaged and driven their forces, with a loss of 500 killed and wounded, from Bible Ridge to Greenbrier, and that he was advancing on Abingdon. He is also said to have organized three regiments of Tennessee "renegades," and that 4000 refugees were following his army.

THE ARMY OF THE CUMBERLAND.

The following has been received at the head-quarters of the army:

Major-General H. W. Halleck, General-in-Chief:

CHATTANOOGA, OCT. 19, 1863.

The following dispatch has just been received from Brigadier-General George Crook, commanding the Second Cavalry division, dated Rogerville, Alabama, October 19, 1863.

"I have the honor to inform you that I have had three days' fight with the enemy, in which I have completely whipping him very badly each time. The last battle ended at Farmington, Mississippi, where I fought Wheeler's entire command with only two brigades. I cut his force in two, sundered his line of communication, captured his artillery, 1000 stand of cavalry arms, and 500 prisoners, besides the wounded. As I pushed on after the enemy immediately, I have not been able to ascertain the number of their killed and wounded, but it was very heavy. They were scattered over a distance of fifteen miles from this, and their retreat was a perfect rout, their men deserting and straggling over the country. I pursued them with great vigor, but their horses being better than mine, I was unable to come up with a couple of regiments at Bogue Creek, let to detain me. I made a charge on them, capturing some of their men, and scattering the remainder pell-mell in the creek. When within eight miles of the river I struck the gallop, and when I reached the river I found that Lee had crossed. He had some three miles above Stamp's Ferry, where they were crossing in force, and I suppose all night. I never saw troops demoralized than the were. I am satisfied that those who fled in this rail-way to Mississippi to rejoin their command. Their loss in killed and wounded will be considerably augmented by the following another rail soon. Signed, GEORGE CROOK, Brigadier-General commanding."

W. S. ROSECRANS, Major-General.

REMOVAL OF ROSECRANS.

General Rosecrans has been relieved from the command of the Army of the Cumberland; and Major-General Thomas, Grant takes command of that Department and of the Army of the Tennessee (Grant's old army), the Army of the Cumberland (Rosecrans's late army), and the Army of Kentucky (Burnside's). General Thomas, who fought so splendidly at Chickamauga, takes the immediate command vacated by General Rosecrans.

THE LOSSES AT CHICAMADOA.

Complete official returns from the infantry engaged in the battles of Chicamauga have been received, showing that the losses of officers will reach 1,000. The losses in the cavalry will swell the grand total to about 16,000. Of this number, 2,500 were wounded. Thirty-six pieces of artillery were lost and a few wagons.

SHELBY ROUTED.

HEAD-QUARTERS, 3D DIV., 4TH CAV. CORPS, October 14, 1863.

Major-General H. W. Halleck, General-in-Chief:

Colonel Shelby has been badly whipped under Sledge to a decisive engagement yesterday. The fight was obstinately contested for four hours. The rebels were completely routed and scattered in all directions, with the loss of all their artillery and baggage and a large number killed, wounded and prisoners.

The exact number is killed and wounded is very large. Our troops are still pursuing the flying rebels.

J. M. SCHOFIELD, Major-General.

OUR PRISONERS AT RICHMOND.

Lieutenant-Colonel Broderick, of the First New Jersey Cavalry, Major Lord and Adam Badeau, who were sent recently to the cavalry will swell the grand total to about 16,000. Of this number, 2,500 were wounded. Thirty-six pieces of artillery were lost and a few wagons.

SHELBY ROUTED.

HEAD-QUARTERS, 3D DIV., 4TH CAV. CORPS, October 14, 1863.

Major-General H. W. Halleck, General-in-Chief:

Colonel Shelby has been badly whipped under Sledge to a decisive engagement yesterday. The fight was obstinately contested for four hours. The rebels were completely routed and scattered in all directions, with the loss of all their artillery and baggage and a large number killed, wounded and prisoners.

The exact number is killed and wounded is very large. Our troops are still pursuing the flying rebels.

J. M. SCHOFIELD, Major-General.

OUR PRISONERS AT RICHMOND.

Lieutenant-Colonel Broderick, of the First New Jersey Cavalry, Major Lord and Adam Badeau have been sent recently in the cavalry fight on the Rappahannock last June, arrived at Washington on 19th from Richmond. The statements concerning the condition of the Union prisoners are of the most distressing character. They have applied to the Government to institute at once prompt measures for their relief. They are now confined with upward of three hundred officers and over ten thousand enlisted men. Many of the latter are without shelter, tents, mattresses, and coats, and sickness prevails to a fearful extent. Typhoid fever has set in, and the mortality is still increasing. Insufficiency of food and lack of clothing have prostrated many of the men with disease. The colored men are actually starved, and an officer who grew some portion of his own rations for his men in the room they occupying is through the floor, has been confined in a dungeon. Great agitation has been created among the prisoners owing to the apparent neglect, on the part of the Government, of the question of exchange. We have to say that a basis is our favor, and, if an exchange can not be effected, our officers and men will be in a very critical position, subjected to the same privations until the rebel authorities can provide for their release.

BRITISH CONSULS EXPELLED FROM THE SOUTH.

Jeff Davis has taken umbrage at the action of the British Consuls in the Confederate States in regard to the arrest of the rebel secretar, and has dismissed them all from the Confederate States. The following correspondence has occurred on the subject:

RICHMOND, OCTOBER 17, 1863.

SIR: I am instructed by the President to inform you that the conduct of the British Consuls in the Confederate States in regard to the arrest of Mr. Mason, a citizen of the Confederate States, and a fugitive from justice, has been such as to forfeit the confidence of this Government, and to render their presence in the country inadmissible. You will therefore communicate to the Consuls of your nation the fact that they are required to leave the Confederate States within ten days from the date of this communication.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

JUDAH P. BENJAMIN, Secretary of State.

To JAMES MURRAY MASON, Commissioner, etc.

JEFF DAVIS has taken umbrage at the action of the British Consuls in the Confederate States in regard to the arrest of the rebel secretar, and has dismissed them all from the Confederate States. The following correspondence has occurred on the subject:

RICHMOND, OCTOBER 17, 1863.

SIR: I am instructed by the President to inform you that the conduct of the British Consuls in the Confederate States in regard to the arrest of Mr. Mason, a citizen of the Confederate States, and a fugitive from justice, has been such as to forfeit the confidence of this Government, and to render their presence in the country inadmissible. You will therefore communicate to the Consuls of your nation the fact that they are required to leave the Confederate States within ten days from the date of this communication.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

JUDAH P. BENJAMIN, Secretary of State.

To JAMES MURRAY MASON, Commissioner, etc.

VOTE OF THE OHIO TROOPS.

Under date of Chattanooga, October 14, General J. A. Garfield sends the following to the Ohio State Journal:

Thirteen thousand of the Ohio soldiery infantry in this army gave 9454 for Brough and 3536 for Vallandigham. Seven regiments of cavalry and eight batteries not yet heard from. Over four regiments of cavalry did not vote, having been ordered away from their homes on the election days of Vallandigham's friends. Ohio may be proud of the votes at Chattanooga. We shall have to left great John Brough's letter. Give us the news from home."

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

SOUTHERN CLUBS.

THE "Southern Club" of England and the "United Association for the Recognition of the Southern States" have been formally organized at Manchester under the society under the title of The Southern Independence Association, with Mr. Wharcliffe, Member of Parliament, at a strong speech in favor of the recognition of the rebel states by England.

AN EARTHQUAKE.

England has again been visited by an earthquake. It took place on Tuesday, October 6, between 5 and 6 o'clock in the morning, and was felt in many places. From Liverpool, Hereford, and numerous other places, we have accounts of the shock. Windows in the houses of towns to have been up upheaving of the earth from west to east, followed by a loud subterranean subsidence, after which a loud rumbling noise was heard.

THE GREEK KING IN ENGLAND.

The King of the Greeks has arrived in England from St. Petersburg. Having visited Queen Victoria he was to go to Paris, and proceed from Paris Tuileries to Athens.

AUSTRIA.

THE MEXICAN DEPUTATION.

The Mexican deputation reached Miramar, the seat of the Archduke Maximilian, in great state from Vienna. Señor de Estrada made the tender of the crown to the Emperor elect in a long and elaborate address. He proposed the toll of the votes of the Chamber of Notables of Mexico, plausibly expressed and backed by the will and the acquiescence of solid gold, manufactured by Mexican artists. The Archduke replied in a speech in which he accepted, as set forth the conditions on which he will accept the crown, declaring that a monarchy could not be satisfactorily established in Mexico without the spontaneous consent of the whole nation. Having regard also to certain "dangers" which threaten the integrity and independence of the country, he was assured by the "guarantees" and if both these conditions are fulfilled the Archduke intimates that he will accept the Mexican crown, relinquishing the rights of his brother, the Emperor of Austria. In the event of becoming monarch of Mexico, he declares the path of progress" by giving "a constitution" to the country of his election. He puts a compliment to the Emperor Napoleon.

THE ARMY OF THE CUMBERLAND—CHARGE OF THE FIRST WISCONSIN AND SECOND INDIANA CAVALRY ON THE REBELS, OCTOBER 3, 1863.—SKETCHED BY MR. THEODORE R. DAVIS.—[SEE PAGE 690.]

THE SIOUX WAR.—CAVALRY CHARGE OF SULLY'S BRIGADE AT THE BATTLE OF WHITE STONE HILL, SEPTEMBER 3, 1863.—SKETCHED BY AN OFFICER ENGAGED.—[SEE PAGE 695.]

WHIFF.

Go back with me to an old New England village, as sleepy almost as a Dutch berg. I was about to describe it, but on the whole think I will not; perhaps you know the town, perhaps you were born here, or have uncles and cousins there. If you don't know any thing of the place, I doubt if I could wrest it away from time and distance, who now have it fast; yet some other day perhaps I will show it to you. I believe it is somewhere along the Sound, for it has a wharf, though not much use for that; the India trade never comes that way, and the whalers have gradually gone to other ports, so that the piles are green with slime and not even the rats of the warehouses mar by ever getting forlorn; but sometimes a vessel comes in, and then all the elders about the village have an excitement.

The time was a Sunday, after the second service. In Deacon Hodges's keeping-room sat Miss Mahala Stevens, talkative. She was given to the weakness of talking about every body, for if people stuck themselves up they must expect to be seen. She had dropped in now, full of something to tell; but of course she hung back—no use at all to hurry her. She sat, trotting one foot and swinging a large, aginary jacket, prickly and unyielding as any bur. No favors asked, large or small; you can't get on a day without me and I know it, was what she said to the world of the village—all the world the village knew or cared any thing about.

"You see, Miss Hodges, I slipped it right up here fast as my legs could carry me, fear somebody else'd tell it first; an' now what with the heat an' the sermon, an' my general flustrin', I do believe I've forgot what 't was."

"Yes?" suggested the Deacon's wife, the New England "yes," meaning any thing and every thing. Here it was a gentle stroke of Mahaly's plumage to go on.

"I guess it wasn't of very much consequence," smoothly remarked Dorr, the Deacon's pretty daughter. "If it wasn't a lie, you know, you wouldn't have forgot it."

Great spinsterly indignation. "That's you, Dorr Hodges, all over. That's right, keep your mentin', it'll come right handy bimby when you hev to keer for yourself, and when you're gray's them rocks in your lap you'll wish you had it. Them that snuffs when they're young allers snuffs when they're old," I tell 'em."

"Never mind Mahaly; Dorr was only in play."

"Well, well, it's no odds, but what's brat in the bone will come out on the skin, an' there ain't no young folks nowadays; they 're all afraid of their elders. I was just goin' to say something 'bout Frank Hawley, he that used to sheep round Dorr—what on earth was it now?"

Toss of the head on the part of the young lady. "Why, somebody'll show me how to my work, I 'spose," and she turned to sheep round Dorr—what on earth was it now?"

"Guess you never had any practice," said Sam, the "terrible" child that falsified for that house the saying about deacons' families.

"Sam!" said Mrs. Hodges, with some peculiar tone that meant a great deal.

"Well, Dorr, toss your head, but mind not toss once too many times. I heerd of a girl that got her a pail o' milk off her head once, an' 'tain't all straight sticks grows in the woods by a long sight, though like 's not what I was goin' to say 'bout Frank Handy—"

"You don't trouble yourself to say any thing at all about Frank Handy to me," retorted Dorr; "I don't want to see him or hear any thing about him."

"H'm," mirthed the sagacious Mahaly. "Well, I'spose you won't care to hear that the Esmeralda's got backed—leastwise now that's just what I was goin' to say; I thought 'twas gone from me sure; Mr. Handy's aboard; but then, of course, he won't show himself here."

"You don't!" tersely remarked Mrs. Hodges.

"I do, though; the folks was a crowdin' down to the wharf to see him, and I first see him as he neared's jump, Sam; it's all over by this time. It's most to—half to, now, Mr. Handy. I mean—the folks doesn't want to see him, a'ter a two-years' v'yage. Well, good-day, sorry you're so spleeped, Dorr; I'm sure you're glad you're single for a livin', then folks 'll bar it of you when ye snap. What makes your cheeks so red, child? Got burnt in the sun? Should say so, if you weren't dark complect nat'rally."

Now, generally speaking, there is nothing very soothing in Mahaly's remarks or manner, but the air in the shutting of a door, especially if it happens to be shut rather spitefully; but I am mistaken if the slam of the door after Mahaly was not the pleasantest sound Dorr had heard that day. "Well, I don't care, now," said she, with an emphasis on the last word.

"I wouldn't mind it, dear," said Mrs. Hodges.

"Do you?" asked Dorr, with eyes, hair and lips both. (I don't know what she meant.)

"No, I guess not; cloth that's well combed always has the smoothest nap in the end. Never mind Mahaly, Dorr; yes vexed her or she wouldn't talked quite so bad. Nobody sets much by what she says, because she's always talking, you know."

"I'm going up stairs, mother," said Dorr. Mrs. Hodges took up a volume of "Discourses," as if she had not read enough that day, and it is to be supposed she read them, though who shall answer for the question?

Dorr retreated to her own room and flung herself into her chair that her own fingers had cushioned, but somehow the room didn't look pleasant. Every thing was in place just as she left to go to meeting—the "things" were not tossed about in disorderly evidence that there had been a toilet made there—yet it didn't seem quite right. Why the string of shells that hung over her little mirror had a different look, and swung back and forth in the wind as if they were alive. They were beckoning her attention. She looked at them, at them and held them still, but they went to swinging again as she let them go, as if they knew something bad got back, and suddenly remembered the swaying bosom of the sea; she set the chairs in order, pulled the curtains a little, shut the blinds a little more, and then sat down. It seemed as if she had gone into somebody else's room; so she glided down stairs to the keeping-room and got a spy-glass that was kept there—a rare treasure in those days—and ran back to it with the fast.

The garret window was an old look-out of hers where she used to knit in the afternoons, and where she did all her day-dreaming. A hill shut off the wharf from sight, but there was the top of a mast on it, looking as if it had sprouted out of the hill; and by leaning well out of the window Dorr could see just the stern of the vessel. Yes, that was the Esmeralda, then; the sails were furled, and of course they had all gone ashore before this time. How queer that that old ship had really been off so far, way out in the South Pacific, out on the edge of her map, where the islands were sprinkled about so thick that it must be hard to sail without running against some of them; it must spell spicy as well as greasy, and Dorr wondered. Did it go to Italy? Her name was Italian, Eudora, grandmother's fancy—no, that couldn't be. But the Esmeralda had been gone long enough, and she had been staying quietly at home helping mother do the work and keeping sunshine in the house all the time, and Frank had been off there, and up in that black box, sailing along day after day in the hot sun, never getting any word from home all the time. How glad he must be to get back; no wonder he hurried ashore as quick as he could. Then to think she said she didn't want to see him! Well, she didn't, but it was not to be as she had said to tell him so after being gone so long. Would Mahaly tell him of it? Yes to one she would; she was just like a keyhole, every thing went through her. She said Frank wouldn't come here. H'mph! He would.

And he did. Yes, he did. He came the very next afternoon, sunburnt, healthy, in his old with long strides, as if a kind of half-reluctance held him back. The clover-heads nodded a welcome to him, and the bees seemed to know every yellow; at least he would have thought so had not his handsome face been shaded with a wonder how he would be received. Clover and bees would come again next summer, but if the flower he had loved to think of did not bloom for him, what was all other fragrance? Dorr had not quite say—is it ever an easy thing?—

"Ah, she is not fair to me.

"Was what? how fair she be?"

What might not have happened in two years? They had seemed so long while they were going, and now they were gone there seemed but a little while; why he only went away yesterday, every thing looked so natural. He remembered his long acquaintance with Dorr, and how, after the first relief time and again until he generally took the first opportunity to go down to Deacon Hodges's station, and then they were better friends than ever. She had risen from the horizon of his life till now she filled him with her full orb—the sun, but possibly he had sunk out of sight with her. He had thought of her all the while and of this very day, and now at last he had come to see her, and she was not there, right present before him, and it made him tremulous and half shrinking to face it. How would she meet him? Why, she would probably be excited at knowing meanwhile that the other was alive! She must have changed a good deal in that time; what a deal of a change! It might be a new Dorr that it might be toward him, though there never was any thing between them. Two years ago she was young, only sixteen, and Dorr, when he thought this current of his thoughts to an abrupt stop. Hastily scanning the sea and the horizon for the afternoon, the locusts with their simmering notes in the air, the clouds that began to sink upon the west and feel gentle dew, all but the sea, and every thing he saw, were trembling with a kind of expectation, and all eagerly watching him. Dorr in the world? Dorr in the sea? Dorr in him—from crown to sole, through every nerve and fibre his heart throbbed and tingled as he moved.

But while he was thinking of her she was dead, and his bold feet carried his doubting heart up to the gate, which Dorr had left open for the poor dead learder than it used to; perhaps it did, but then he hadn't opened any gates for two years. He followed the path, and the door-knocker began to consider whether to knock. If he should go right in it might seem too bold; and if he knocked it might seem too much a stranger to come unannounced on shipboard: but he chose the former, and so waited on. It is such an excellent way to get at people's real character, the waiting of their gates.

Mrs. Hodges and Dorr were in the kitchen when he entered it. He did catch them, for Dorr was opening and the mother's back was to the door. Nevertheless it gave him a sudden pang to see Dorr so far from him. Yes, he had supposed I was coming here she would not have been ironing in the kitchen," and the thermometer fell in manner of Deacon Hodges's whipping. Somewhere that Dorr had expected him, and had been watching all the afternoon, and so had seen him marching that way, and a thousand tender and reassurances had felt it her duty to assist about the ironing. She was woman enough not to mean to let him think she was waiting for him.

Mrs. Hodges spoke first, and half put out a floury hand; then drew it back with a deprecatory gesture, and bent again over her work. Dorr had not heard what she said, however, but looked at Dorr, who started in spite of herself; then gave him her hand, which, albeit it was hot and red from the merciless flat-iron, he pressed as meaningly as he dared, and thought he had a little echo of a touch in return. "She didn't expect me, but her modest did," thought he, in which he had the thing exactly reversed, but then he knew Dorr was fooled by a bi I think les femmes have been very inventive, and have had their revenge all along by fooling les hommes.

"When did you get back?"

"Now pretend you don't know. Yesterday."

"Well, I did see a ship come in after meeting was out. Did you have a pleasant voyage?"

"Very pleasant after I got into the home waters, so that I thought I could smell home in every breeze that came from this way."

Dorr raised her eyebrows and was going to whistle—an old trick she had. "How does home smell?"

"I can't tell you exactly till you go away from it; but it's good to think of after a hard day's work."

"Whaling is hard work, I do suppose," said Mrs. Hodges.

"It's the exercise. I see there is work to be done on shore too."

"Oh yes indeed," answered Dorr, enthusiastically; "here's my ironing, you see," taking a fresh iron from the fire. "I wish we didn't have ironing to do in the hot weather."

Mrs. Hodges turned her sponge, and had set it away to rise, and found she had work to do in another part of the house; so she went out, without hearing a look from Dorr, whose back was just then turned toward 'him."

"I thought you didn't expect to see me," he said by way of experiment.

"Why, did Mahaly tell you I said I didn't want to see you?" said Dorr, without thinking that she had made a slip.

"No, Mahaly didn't tell me; Miss Eudora Hodges told me; but I don't want to believe her, and I don't think I do."

Dorr made no answer, but her cheeks burned as the pleasantest kind of fire, and her eyes set a little while.

"What am I now?"

"What do you mean?" she asked.

"Just before I went away you called me Mr. Handy. What am I now?"

"Well, you haven't had your name changed, I suppose. See there, how you are raveling my nice ironing-cloth, Mr. Handy."

"So I am. I beg pardon. I was thinking of some other things that are raveling to waste."

"I see you have become a sober as you used to be, and you talk just in the same way."

"And I am just as dull too, you would say."

"No, I didn't say that at all."

"But you thought it? I am sober, Dorr, because I don't see any thing to laugh at just now. And then I've been two years at sea, and haven't talked much in that time; and perhaps I've been a little moody, but I'm back; and now I am back we two are just as stiff as if we never met before."

"But—but you're grown, and look so different, I'm most afraid of you."

"Yes, but that isn't the way to get over it, to be afraid."

"You're the one that's stiff, I'm sure, with your long words and long face too," said Dorr, feeling quite vexed.

"But I hoped you would be r. little glad to see me after all this time."

"Well, I guess I said I wasn't glad."

"What was it you told me just now without meaning it?"

"Oh! but you said a minute ago you didn't believe that."

"I don't; but still you don't seem quite as I wished."

"I see you are bound to quarrel. I didn't know before that you had been made people so rough."

"I am scolding—forgive me; but we won't quarrel, Dorr. What do you suppose I have been thinking of all these days, while I have been counting the days and wondering if I should find—"

Here an interruption. Dorr had been casting about for an experiment, and she caught at the first and the worst coz. "Ah-h!" she cried, dancing back from the table and flirting her fingers in the air; then, stamping her foot, she wrenched the flatiron in a new place; but this time she really did burn her fingers, and sucked them over-hard, and so got her hold when she had lifted it fairly up. Down went the heavy iron thud upon the table, then pushed to the side, and Dorr sat while violently at it fell. No scream; but she gave a flush and a catch of her breath with the acute pain, and would have fallen if Frank had not caught her from the floor with equal strength and gentleness; and before she could utter a syllable he had started for the stairs with her, with her head cold on his breast that she did not remonstrate. He had not forgotten the way, and he carried her directly to her room, and put her down softly without a word; he just could not help touching her lips with his, in their nearness, and answered by a look and the whispered word he had been longing to hear—"Frank!" Then he left her and went away.

The ankle was slow at healing—far too slow for Dorr's patience; but she said to herself, "It's just good enough for me, I'll be cautious to be trying such a trick at all; and I should have known better than to try such a stupid one as that. Ache away: I deserve it for whipping." And the ankle kept giving repentant and monitory twinges.

Frank Handy walked away in a sort of glow. He call him Mr. Handy so abruptly, to be sure; but had he not held her a moment in his arms, that had been yearning for her over all the trackless miles of sea? Had he not carried him in his nurse? He almost wished the ankle never would get well, so that he might carry her in his arms forever; and then he was inclined to bless the knowing flat-iron, that had come in to take his part. Such a fairy-tale-like way Dorr was found out, that never can work with any thing less real than flat-irons and broomsticks—must have taken hold of it just that minute. Why, no indeed she did; and she was lying up stairs now with a bruised ankle! And then he accused himself of having caused it all by his unreasonable fears.

He was permitted to sit with Dorr much of the time, though it is questionable whether it gave him more pleasure than pain. She was very gracious now. She smiled on him, and said the last was not meant when it was, or he gave her a chance to be idle, and kept the neighbors from interrupting her; she heard him read to her by the hour, made him tell sea-yarns, and let him feed her with the jellies and other niceties which considerate friends sent in. It was impossible for him to understand it all. Strong, earnest, direct character that he was, he could not understand how any body could act any thing or hide any thing; and whether she really cared for him and enjoyed being with him, or was only doing it to please him, was the question he could not answer and only she could. But it was somehow not easy to ask it but then; whenever he began to skirt about the tender edges of his love Dorr took alarm, real or pretended. She would give him an appealing look as much as to say, "You can't take advantage of my helpless position here;" and then another look would threaten, "If you do I shall go to sleep;" and so the words got no further than his lips.

Several weeks slipped away. The wind had blown the spicy scents out of the Esmeralda, and the calaboz creaked her impatience at being tied to shore. The moderate cargo had been discharged, and supplies had taken their place in; and the owner were getting ready to say another good-by to the lasses they left on shore. One day Frank Handy went to the home fire, and sitting close down into through a piece of woods, and while in this he suddenly started to find that, while he was going to the house, Dorr had come over to meet him. She met Dorr picking her way along with a polished, cushioned, brass-ornamented crutch. On seeing him she stood quite too; but did not resist when he gently took the crutch away and somehow substituted his own arm for it.

"How could you thought you were coming this way?" said she. "Do you generally come so?"

Sometimes. But if I had been a little later I should have found my patient gone."

"And then the doctor would have caught it. I suppose mother'll scold now; but the afternoon was too lovely and I feel so strong."

"Love never did to see you; but I could almost find it in my heart to be sorry too, for I have seen more of you, and now I must go away again in a few days or two. How shall I think of you after I am gone?"

"I don't know I'm sure. Excuse me, there's a hop-yard a little farther on!"

He bent the vine over steadily, broke off the bulb and, giving Dorr a stem to play, began to plait them with a sailor's dexterity and expertness. There was a sort of creaminess in watching the motion of his fingers and the softer of Dorr's head, till the wreath was finished; then with a sudden toss he threw it over her head, and with the same motion caught both hands in his own.

"There is no use in trying to conceal the truth," he said; "you have seen in my eyes long ago what I am going to tell you with my lips. You know as well as I do that I love you, but you do not know how much and how long. You do not know that when I went away I left the better part of me here. You do not know how you have been in my thoughts till I can hardly see or hear any thing that does not remind me of you, and I do not suppose you know how much I mean when I tell you now that I love you. See, Dorr! I could hold your hands here if I chose; but I can not hold them through life without your consent. I let them go, then: will you put them in mine again?"

Her hands lay in her lap.

"Will you not?" Mine are waiting."

Her hands did not stir, and there was no sound except the wind rustling through the leaves.

"I am very sorry, but I can not be to you what you wish," she said.

What sword is so keen as cruel words? He even were stabbed from the cool of his flesh, but she felt a shiver through the strong arm that lay touching her waist.

"Dorr, Dorr, I am going away—that is certain; and also that you are to say how I shall go. I am somewhat changed, and even now I feel you without your love to soften and humanize me? There are temptations every where, and I have rules, which, in trifles or trifles will you make them stronger, or will you arm me with this hope to resist them with?" Will you make me doubt God, Dorr?—for I believe I am not that. Or never can forget all the times we have been together, or even to-day: shall I think of them all as part of the unpleasant duties we will yet have to fulfill against me with the stings of furies?"

"I have told you what I mean," she said, looking away again, and did not speak.

"I am older than you," he resumed, "and I am a man, as others are men generally are, but Dorr, now I am dependent on your will. Why do you suppose your sex has this power given them over ours?"

"I hope you may find some one who will use it as you wish. I must go back now."

"No, you shall not. You said just-to either of us. You injure me by only half believing what I say, and you injure yourself by doubting your own power. You have not deserved that, and will not put up with it."

Dorr began to look black. "I don't know why you should say such things to me."

"I have a right to say them. You know better than I know myself what I have meant by all the encouragement you have given me; and you know—I do not—whether you have not known of my love this great while. One of us has changed, for I do not recognize the girl I used to know. Will Have I waited all this time in vain, Dorr? Will you send me away quite empty? Think a little, and remember what you are deciding."

He waited. She leaned more cheerily: the trusts been hummed in their old way: all the sounds of the woods kept on as usual; and the careless squirrels skipped across the path and looked at them. Tick, tick, went the minutes on which he had hung his hopes, and when he looked at her there was no change in her fixed expression—part indifference, part vexation.

"I see it now," said he, bitterly: "this is my first knowledge of coquetry, and your sex are welcome to it as their special prerogative. You have worn me till you were tired of me, and now you throw me away as you will that wreath when it has faded, and care as much for one as the other."

"You talk now as if you loved me, certainly."

"Talk so if I did not! I ask you honestly, and with all the love of my soul, to be my wife, and you come to upbraid me with such a taste that Sau stared and kept staring.

On the next day Sau came rushing into the house like a tornado that had just slipped its halter, bringing with him three things—a pair of unusually large and round eyes, a long black tail, and a lamentable face, and called on Dorr to go out and see what there was in the yard. Remonstrance on her part—she was busy—was disregarded. "Such an ugly little beauty!" he said, and so she went. In the grass close to the yard fence there was a cage in which was one of the grandest of parrots. Dorr went back to the house indignant. "Of all the screeching, hateful things in the world, a parrot's the worst!" And she would not let Sam move the cage or go near it; so there the unlucky bird staid all day, and bit and screamed to its heart's content.

But as nightfall I suppose she relented, for one by who—as the watch might have seen that the cage was brought into the house. A folded piece of paper was attached to it, and Dorr read this:

"Since yesterday I think I was harsh to you. Forgive me; but we hurt was sore.

"You once said to me that you should like a parrot. I came upon this one a number of months ago, and have brought him home with me, and now I leave him for you. His education has been sadly neglected, and he can say little more than—perhaps you can teach him. I might have sat his tongue with the help of a sixpence you gave me so long ago, but some reason I did not like to do this way. Keep him for my sake, but if you are very tired of him you will not mind that the bird is purchased for a sixpence of life.

"I fear I shall not be able to put you out of my heart, Dorr. It is sad and painful that you should forget, who have no need to, and I, who shall be tortured till I die, can not. If I have written in something like anger, remember, Forgive me, for bitterness will come sometimes, though not against you if I can help it. Good-by, and let me be your friend. FRANK."

At the same time that Dorr read this and dropped a tear on it, the impatient Esmeralda glided out of the barber and stood to sea.

The bird was soon duly domesticated, and Dorr came really to like him. He was "an ugly beauty," however, for he certainly was a beauty and his temper was vicious. He never was disposed to be talkative, and all that was ever comprehended in an odd mixture of two or three consonants which sounded more like "whiff" than any thing else; so that was given as his name.

Time went on month by month, the Esmeralda creeping on her venturesome course somewhere on the lower edge of the world, and Dorr and Sam quietly on with her old life. New England is even now very uniform in its domestic life from day to day, and we will suppose no in the old time. Nothing probably was content, or if she was not, she never hinted it or showed it, but went on with her duties, taking no idea of her strange position, and progress where Nature has made life appeal to the eye rather than to the ear; but sometimes she looked out at him she thought of his distant owner, and possibly felt a touch of some kind of regret.

One day there was an unusual noise in the board. The cat had made a demonstration against the cage, and when Dorr picked it up and replaced it on the hook there was a piece of feather floating on the floor. She was puzzled at first, as she recognized the writing; then she concluded it must have been hidden, accidentally or purposely, between the two boards of the bottom of the cage, and the fall had jolted it out. It read:

"I forgot to tell you that there is a way of magic about this parrot. Some one bestowed it on him—a Malay who, I believe, is the son of a chief. He was very grateful, and enough to say: and if you ever wish to get rid of him, about me, where I am, and what I am doing and thinking, if you talk him seriously to me, he will tell me. So do it when you really desire to know, and then believe that he will tell you the truth. Again, and for the last time. FRANK."

"Nonsense!" was Dorr's thought; and she put the note away. During the whole voyage she was thinking of it occasionally, however. She had an irresistible inclination to think over all she had thrown off or rejected lover in past years. How could he write her such a story as that and think she would believe it? Did going to sea make a man supernatural? Pshaw! Yet, indeed, she would like to know where he was, and it would be nice if the parrot could tell.

When it was coming dusk she found herself alone in the room; for her father and Sam had not come in from work, and her mother had stepped out for an hour. Perhaps the soft twilight influenced her, and she went up to the cage, which hung at the window. The bird had dozed, but she woke him up and looked at him, thinking it over. She sat down in the window and let him out, and he flew around for as he was accustomed to do, generally hit sin, he did want.

"Where is he?" cried she. "Does he think about me? Does he know how sorry I am I used him so, because I love him?"

The parrot did not answer a word. Of courses he couldn't; how foolish! He only flew round and round her. Finally he settled on her head; but he was rubbing her hair with his beak and claws in a very unusual way. The touch was strange, very strange; the bird was surely possessed. The pressure on her head changed, and changed, and the claws were transformed into a pair of hands that suddenly slid down over her ears to her waist, where they held her in a firm clasp, and—

"Yes!" said Frank Handy. "I did not go in the Esmeralda. Now, will you forgive?"

"Yes?" cried Dorr, with a blush and a start. Then sinking her head lower and lower, till it rested naturally on his shoulder and hid itself there, she murmured:

"Oh, Frank! I was only talking to Whiff!"

CHIAPA CHOCOLATE.

DON BERNARD DE SALAZAR, Bishop of Chiapa, Mexico, had the misfortune to live in a perpetual state of contest with the ladies of his flock, and the subject of dispute was chocolate. It was a brave struggle—bravely fought on both sides.

The prelate fulminated all the censures at his disposal in his ecclesiastical armory; the ladies, on their side, made use of all the devices and intrigues stored in their little heads.

Now the great subject of altercation was as follows. The ladies of Chiapa were addicted to the use of chocolate that they would neither hear low mass, much less high mass, nor a sermon, without drinking a cup of chocolate. Before and during preserves brought in on trays by servants during the performance of divine service; so that the voice of the preacher, or the chaunt of the priest, was drowned in the continual clatter of cups and clack of spoons; besides, the more precincts: a busy whisper circulated, then a hush ensued, and on one accord the ladies trooped off to the nearest refectory, and there was no congregation that day at the Minster.

The brethren of S. Dominic and of S. Francis were nothing loth to see their chapels crowded with all the rank and fashion of Chiapa; for with the ladies came money-offerings, and they blinked at the chocolate as a considerable evil. This was allowed to continue a few Sundays only . our friend the bishop was not going to be shelved thus, and a new regulation appeared, forbidding females from admitting parishioners to their chapels, and ordering the latter to frequent their churches.

The reply was a general "no entry" not so the ladies—they would go when they pleased, quotha! for a month and more not one of them went to church at all. The prelate was in sore trouble: he hoped that his froward charge would eventually return to the path of duty, but he hoped on from Sunday to Sunday in vain.

On Saturday evening the old bishop was more than usually moved: he paced up and down his library, meditating on the sermon he purposed preaching on the following morning—a fruitless task, for he knew that no one would be there but a few poor Mexicans. Sick at heart, he all but wished that he had yielded for peace' sake, but conscience told him that much evil would have been wrong; and the great feature in Salazar's character was his rigid sense of duty. He leaned on his elbows and looked out of a window which opened on a lane between the palace and the cathedral.

"Silly boy!" muttered the prelate. "Luis is always prattling with that girl. I thought better of the fair sex of Chiapa of late." He spoke words as his eyes caught his page, chattering at the door, with a dark-eyed Creole servant-maid of the De Alda family. Presently the bishop clapped his hands, and a domestic entered. "Send Luis to me."

"When the page came up, the old man greeted him with a half-smile.

"Well, my son, I wish my chocolate to be brought me. I will take it by her," said the bishop; "did you express to the maiden my thanks?"

Luis bowed.

"Then, child, you may prepare me a cup of this chocolate, and bring it me at once."

"The Donna de Solis's chocolate?"

"Yes, my son."

When the boy had left the room, the old man clasped his hands with an expression of thankfulness.

"They are going to yield! This is a sign that they are beginning to repentance!"

Next day the cathedral was thronged with ladies. The service proceeded as usual, but the bishop was not present.

"How is the Bishop?" was whispered from one lady to another, with conscious glances: till the query reached the ears of one of the canons who was at the door.

"His Holiness is very ill," he answered. "He has retired to the monastery of S. James."

"What is the matter with him?"

"He is suffering from severe pains, internally."

"Has he seen a doctor?"

"Physicians have been sent for."

For eight days the good old prelate lingered in great suffering.

"Tell me," he asked, very feebly; "tell me truly, that is my opinion forgotten, how to pray: prayer they are unused to, for the highest act of worship. Absolution can offer is only regarded by them as an opportunity for the gratification of their appetites. You recommend me to yield to their wishes. A strange counsel would it be to who let his sheep lead him; a wonder-us captain who was dictated to by his soldiers! As for the cause of true religion being endangered, I judge differently. Religion is endangered; but it is by children's disobedience to their spiritual legislators, and by their own perversity. I am sorry for you, my sons, that you should have undertaken a fruitless office; but you may believe me that nothing shall induce me to swerve from the course which I deem advisable. My personal safety, you hint, is endangered; my life, I answer, is in my Master's hands, and I value it but as it may advance His glory."

When the bishop heard that their request had been refused, they treated the excommunication with the greatest contempt, scoffing at it publicly, and inditing chocolate (a church, "or principle, more than ever: "Just," says Gage, "drinking in church as a fish drinks in water."

But the bishop and priests were then stationed at the cathedral doors to stop the ingress of the servants with cups and chocolate-pots. They had received injunctions to remove the drinking and eating vessels, and suffer the servants to come empty-handed to church. A violent struggle ensued in the porch, and all the ladies within rushed in a body to the doors, to assist their domestics. The poor clerics were utterly overcome, and were in confusion down the steps, while, with that odious well-known clink, clink, the trays came in as before.

Another move was requisite, and on the following Sunday, when the ladies came to church, they found a band of soldiers drawn up in readiness to barricade the way against any inroad of chocolate; a stern determination was depicted on the faces of the soldiers, and the fair ones feared to enter the sacred edifice it should be over their purpose.

The foremost damsels halted, the matrons stood still, the crowd thickened, but not one of the pretty rogues would turn back. A consultation, precincts: a busy whisper circulated, then a hush ensued, and with one accord the ladies trooped off to the nearest refectory, and there was no congregation that day at the Minster.

The brethren of S. Dominic and of S. Francis were nothing loth to see their chapels crowded with all the rank and fashion of Chiapa; for with the ladies came money-offerings, and they blinked at the chocolate as a considerable evil. This was allowed to continue a few Sundays only . our friend the bishop was not going to be shelved thus, and a new regulation appeared, forbidding females from admitting parishioners to their chapels, and ordering the latter to frequent their churches.

The reply was a general "no entry" not so the ladies—they would go when they pleased, quotha! for a month and more not one of them went to church at all. The prelate was in sore trouble: he hoped that his froward charge would eventually return to the path of duty, but he hoped on from Sunday to Sunday in vain.

On Saturday evening the old bishop was more than usually moved: he paced up and down his library, meditating on the sermon he purposed preaching on the following morning—a fruitless task, for he knew that no one would be there but a few poor Mexicans. Sick at heart, he all but wished that he had yielded for peace' sake, but conscience told him that much evil would have been wrong; and the great feature in Salazar's character was his rigid sense of duty. He leaned on his elbows and looked out of a window which opened on a lane between the palace and the cathedral.

"Silly boy!" muttered the prelate. "Luis is always prattling with that girl. I thought better of the fair sex of Chiapa of late." He spoke words as his eyes caught his page, chattering at the door, with a dark-eyed Creole servant-maid of the De Alda family. Presently the bishop clapped his hands, and a domestic entered. "Send Luis to me."

"When the page came up, the old man greeted him with a half-smile.

"Well, my son, I wish my chocolate to be brought me. I will take it by her," said the bishop; "did you express to the maiden my thanks?"

Luis bowed.

"Then, child, you may prepare me a cup of this chocolate, and bring it me at once."

"The Donna de Solis's chocolate?"

"Yes, my son."

When the boy had left the room, the old man clasped his hands with an expression of thankfulness.

"They are going to yield! This is a sign that they are beginning to repentance!"

Next day the cathedral was thronged with ladies. The service proceeded as usual, but the bishop was not present.

"How is the Bishop?" was whispered from one lady to another, with conscious glances: till the query reached the ears of one of the canons who was at the door.

"His Holiness is very ill," he answered. "He has retired to the monastery of S. James."

"What is the matter with him?"

"He is suffering from severe pains, internally."

"Has he seen a doctor?"

"Physicians have been sent for."

For eight days the good old prelate lingered in great suffering.

"Tell me," he asked, very feebly; "tell me truly, that is my opinion forgotten, how

"Your Holiness has been poisoned," replied the physician.

The Bishop turned his face to the wall. Some one whispered that he was dead, when he had been thus for some hours. The dying man turned his face round, and said,

"Hush! I am praying for my poor sheep! May God pardon them." Then, after a pause: "I forgive them for having caused my death, most heartily. Poor sheep!"

And he died.

Since then there has been a proverb prevalent in Mexico: "Beware of tasting Chiapa chocolate."

The cathedral presented the same scene before; the prelate had labored in vain, and chocolate was copiously drank at his funeral.

THE SIOUX WAR.

THE illustration which we give on page 693 shows us what, we trust, will prove the close of the Sioux War, viz., the surprise of the Indians by Sully's brigade on 30 September. The author of the sketch, an officer in the 6th Iowa Cavalry, one of the most gallant regiments in the service, writes us:

"FORT PIERRE, DACOTAH TERRITORY,
September 16, 1863.

"While public attention has been completely absorbed with the Rebellion and the splendid record made by the Federal troops in July, an expedition which started from Sioux City in June has been working its way against every adverse circumstance up to Dacotah to punish the savages for the massacres in Minnesota last year. The troops were General A. Sully's Brigade, and consisted of the Sixth Iowa Cavalry, Colonel D. S. Wilson; eight companies of the Second Nebraska Cavalry, Colonel R. W. Furnas; one company of the Seventeenth Iowa Infantry, Captain Millard, and one battery of six small brass pieces. General Sully's aids are his old Potomac officers, belonging to the immortal First Minnesota, viz.: Adjutant-General Captain J. H. Pell, Captain King, and Lieutenant Leverett. Against these accomplished Indians near White Stone Hill, about the centre of Dacotah Territory, on the 3d of September, and in a most bloody fight of about thirty minutes' duration sight set in, killed nearly two hundred savages, wounding nearly one hundred more, capturing one hundred and fifty-eight prisoners besides seizing immense supplies of buffalo meat which they had dried for the winter, destroying five hundred of their lodges, capturing a large Indian camp, and an immense stock of robes, furs, etc. The result of this fight will most certainly lead the savages to sue for peace. They never will attempt such a terrible blow. The left represents the Sixth Iowa Cavalry led by Colonel Wilson, who narrowly escaped, his horse being killed under him, and gallantly leading his regiment. The right represents the Second Nebraska Cavalry, commanded by Colonel R. W. Furnas, whose horse was wounded under him in the engagement. The whole brigade was commanded by Brigadier-General Alfred Sully. He is a most gallant officer, having fought bravely in every battle on the Potomac from Bull Run to Chancellorsville. He is a West Pointer, and was selected because he was experienced in savage warfare. In this battle the number engaged was about twelve hundred against the same number of Indian warriors. He lost twelve men killed and twenty-three wounded. Few officers would have overcome all the obstacles that General Sully did in this trip. He deserves well at the hands of his countrymen. In every grade he has done his duty nobly. I refer you for more particulars of the battle to the Iowa papers."

CHARLESTON.

WE devote pages 700 and 701 to illustrations of the progress of the siege of Charleston.

The attempt to blow up the iron-clad steamer New Ironsides, on the evening of the 5th of October, is one of the most striking and thrilling incidents of the present war—a war full of brave deeds. Our artist has drawn the scene just at the moment of explosion, when one of the vessels was seen firing volleys of musketry at the unseen foe. The explosion was witnessed by him from the beach near Fort Wagner, and the scene which he has sketched immitably grand, notwithstanding the darkness of the night.

Our artist also sends us a sketch of the "cigar steamer" used in the attempt. It is drawn from the descriptions of the prisoners taken. Charleston is the frontier, as the commencement of the war, a lieutenant in the United States Navy. The steamer, it is a contemptuous name for the steamer, was only large enough to contain four or five men. The torpedo was attached to the forward end, and the enough under water in contact with the vessel's bottom to which it was directed. The man who steered was entirely exposed, sitting on top with his feet in the water. The fate of the man who fired the shot which is supposed to have mortally wounded the officer of the deck on the night of the 5th is unknown. The steamer of Fort Sumter by a small steamer, and from there started upon its perilous mission. The steamer accompanied by the small boat which our artist has thrown in the fore-ground of the picture on page 700.

On page 701 our artist has given a view of the bottom of the harbor on the very spot chosen as the resting-place of the Ironsides. It carried down with it the bodies of the brave men who fell.

Our other illustrations, from sketches by Mr. Otto Eng, show us the enemy's works on Sullivan's Island. He says the writes:

"The representation of Fort Moultrie shows the effects of the last bombardment by the Federals and Monitors. The effect of the shots is visible on the house standing in the centre of the fort; also on the outside of the ramparts or banks where you see men at work to mend the damages. Those square white patches resting on the embankment are piles of bales to be placed for defences, and have been erected since the last fight, giving to the fort a different appearance from what it had the week ago. Her sister works, Bee and Beauregard, are all on Sullivan's Island, and will in the next few days be the scene of a desperate fight."

THE BATTLE OF CHICAMAUGA—THOMAS'S MEN REP

ULSING THE CHARGES OF THE REBELS.—[See Page 690.]

VERY HARD CASH.

By CHARLES READE, Esq.

AUTHOR OF "IT IS NEVER TOO LATE TO MEND," ETC.

CHAPTER XLII.

THE tenacity of a private lunatic asylum is unique. A little push behind your back and you slide into one; but to get out again is to scale a precipice with crumbling sides. Alfred, luckier than many, had twice nearly escaped; yet now he was tighter in than ever. His father at first meant to give him but a year or two of it, and let him out on terms, his spirit broken, and Julia married. But his sister's death was fatal to him. By Mrs. Hardie's settlement the portion of any child of hers dying a minor, or intestate and childless, was to go to the other children: so now the prisoner had inherited his sister's ten thousand pounds, and a good slice of his bereaved enemy's and father's income. But this doubled his father's bitterness—that he, the unloved one, should be enriched by the death of the adored one!—and also tempted his cupidity: and unfortunately shallow legislation conspired with that temptation. For, when an Englishman, sane or insane, is once pushed behind his back into a mad-house, those relatives who have hidden him from the public eye, i. e., from the eye of justice, can grab hold of his money behind his back, and they certified away his wits behind his back, and can administer it in the dark, and embezzle it, chanting "But for us the 'dear deranged' would waste it." Nor do the monstrous enactments, which confer this unconstitutional power on subjects, and shield its exercise from the light and safeguard of publicity, by one chance in a thousand detected. In Lunacy the extremes of intellect meet: the British senator plays at Satan; and tempts human frailty and cupidity beyond what they are able to bear.

So behold a man in twenty-one years of age devoted by a father to imprisonment for life. But step a moment into the mad statute, which is the threefold temptation of Facility, Obscurity, and Impunity, insure the occasional incarceration and torture and extinction of one but removed men, do provide, though feebly, for their bare liberation, provided they don't yield to the genius loci, and the direct effect of confinement plus anguish, by going mad, or dying. The Commissioners of Lunacy had power to liberate Alfred in spite of his relations. And this power, you know, he had soberly but earnestly implored them to exercise.

After a delay that seemed as strange to him as postponing a hand to a drowning man, he received an official letter from Whitehall. With bounding heart he broke the seal, and devoured the contents. They ran thus:

"SIR,—By order of the Commissioners of Lunacy I am directed to inform you that they are in the receipt of your letter of the 29th ultimo, which will be laid before the board at their next meeting. I am, etc."

Alfred was bitterly disappointed at the small advance he had made. However, it was a great point to learn that his letters were allowed to go to the Commissioners at all, and would be attended to by degrees.

He waited and waited, and nothing had happened but in patience: at times his brain throbbed and his blood boiled, and he longed to kill the remorseless, kindless monsters who robbed him of his liberty, his rights as a man, and his Julia: but he knew this would not do; that when he was mad enough to gnaw his reason away, and then who could disprove that he had always been mad? Now he felt that brooding on his wrong would frustrate him: so he described his teeth, and vowed a solemn vow that nothing should drive him mad. By advice of a patient he wrote a letter to the Commissioners begging for a Special Commission to inquire into his case; and, this done, with rare stoicism, solid sense, and wisdom in one so young, he actually sat down to read hard for his first class. Now in this, he wanted the Bible, Thucydides, and Rhetoric of Aristotle, certain Dialogues of Plato, the Comedies of Aristophanes, the first-class Historians, Demosthenes, Juvenal, the Greek Testament, Wheeler's Analysis, Prideaux, Horne, and several books of reference, sacred and profane: but he could not get these books without Dr. Wycherley, and unfortunately he had cut the worthy dead in his own asylum.

The "Scornful Dog" had to eat some humble pudding and humble pie. He gulped these delicacies as he might; and Dr. Wycherley showed excellent appetite: he entered into his friend's humble studies with singular alacrity, supplied him with several classics from his own shelves, and bestowed the rest at the London Library. After did his seat stop there: he offered to read an hour a day with him, and avowed it would afford him the keenest gratification to turn out an Oxford first classman from his asylum. This remark puzzled Alfred, and set him thinking: it bore a subtle family resemblance to the observation he heard every day from the patients; it was so once-spred.

Soon Alfred became the Doctor's pet maniac. They were often closeted together in high discourse, and indeed discussed Psychology, Metaphysics, and Moral Philosophy with indefatigable zest, long after common sense would have packed them both off to bed, the donkeys. In fact, they got so thick that Alfred thought it only fair to say one day, "Mind, Doctor, all these pleasant fruitful hours we spend together so sweetly will not prevent my plotting you for a conspiracy as soon as I get out: it will rob the retrospect of half its relish though."

"Ah, my dear young friend and fellow-student," said the Doctor, blandly, "let us not sacrifice the delights of our profitable occupation of imbibing the sweets of intellectual intercourse to vague speculations as to our future destiny. During the course of a long and not, I trust, altogether unprofitable, career, it has not unfrequently been my lot to find myself on the verge of being indicted, sued, assassinated, hung. Yet here I sit, as yet unimmolated on the altar of phrenetic vengeance. This is ascribable to the fact that my friends and pupils always adopt a more favorable position of me long before I part with them; and ere many days (and this I divine by infallible indicia) your eyes will commence to moisten; and, in proportion as you progress in perfect restoration of the powers of judgment, you will grow to suspicion of the fact of being under a delusion—or rather I should say a very slight perversion and perturbation of the forces of your animadverting faculties and a proper subject for temporary seclusion. Indeed this consciousness of insanity is the one diagnostic of sanity that never deceives. On the other hand, an obstinate persistence in the hypothesis of perfect rationality demonstrates the fact that insanity yet lingers in the remotest recesses and recesses of the brain, and that it would not be humane as yet to cast the patient on a world in which he would inevitably be taken some unprecarious advantage of."

Alfred ventured to inquire whether this were not rather paradoxical.

"Certainly," said the ready Doctor; "and paradoxicality is an additional characteristic of truth in all matters beyond the comprehension of the vulgar."

"That sounds rational," said the maniac, very drily.

One afternoon, grinding hard for his degree, he was invited down to see the visitors.

At that word he found out how prison tries the nerves. He trembled with hope, and fear. It was but for a moment: he dried his face and hands to compose himself; made his toilet carefully, and went into the drawing-room, all on board. There he found Dr. Wycherley and two gentlemen; one was an ex-physician, the other an ex-barrister, who had thrown up his sinecures and brieflessness for a snug £1500 a year at Whitechall. After a momentary pressing they continued their conversation with Dr. Wycherley and scarcely noticed Alfred. They were therepro forma; a plausible lunatic had pestered the Board, and extorted a Special Commission. Alfred's blood boiled, but he knew it must not boil over. He contrived to throw a short, pertinent remark in every now and then. Then Dr. Wycherley politely, told, and at last Dr. Eskell, Commissioner of Lunacy, smiled and turned to him. "Allow me to put a few questions to you."

"The more the better, Sir," said Alfred.

Dr. Eskell then asked him to describe minute, by, and in order, the life he had led since seven o'clock that day. And he did it. Examined him as to books he had read, and how he read it. And, while he was applying these old-fashioned tests, Wycherley's face wore an expression of pity, that would have moved the brains a bit. Eskell had an itch for the classics: so he went on to say, "You have been a scholar, I hear."

"I am not quite enough to be a scholar, Sir," said Alfred; "but I am a student."

"Well, well; now can you tell me what follows this line?"

Jusque datum sceleri canimus populumque potentem."

"Why, not at the moment."

"Oh, surely you can, Sir," said Dr. Eskell, irritably. "It is a tolerably well-known passage. Come, try."

"Well, I'll try," said Alfred, sneering secretly. "Let me see:

Mum—mum—mum—populumque potentem,
In sea visited Scamander's mouth."

"Quite right; now go on, if you can."

Alfred, who was playing with his examiner all this time, pretended to search the brains a bit, then went on, and warmed involuntarily with the lines:

Cognatasque acies et rupto fœdere regni
Certatum totis concussi viribus orbis
In commune malum: tetigit quæ proxima signis,
Signa, pares aquilas, et pila minantia pilis."

"He seems to have a good memory," said the examiner, turning to Wycherley.

"Oh, that is nothing for him," observed Wycherley.

"He has Horace all by heart; you'd wonder: And mounts our Homer's Greek like thunder."

"Yes, Sir; that surely rather tumid. 'Thy whole forces of the shaken globe?' But little poets love big words."

"Yes, Sir; and surely rather tumid. 'Thy whole forces of the shaken globe?' But little poets love big words."

"Well, Sir, you were with Horace, that so great a work as an epic poem should open modestly, with an invocation."

"No, Sir," said Alfred. "I think that rather an arbitrary and peevish canon of friend Horace. The Æneis is a fine poem, and as he was an Epic ought not to begin; and the Æneid is the greatest Latin Epic. In the next place, the use of Modesty is to keep a man from writing an Epic Poem at all; but, if he will have that impudence, why then he had better have the courage to plunge into the Homeric stream, like Virgil and Lucan, not crawl in flunking and whining on by the Muse's apron-string. But—excuse my common bluntness—what can friend Horace do with this modest entry to the Epic?"

Mr. Abbott snorted contemptuously in support of the query. But Dr. Eskell smiled, and said: "Continue to answer me as intelligently, and you may find it has a great deal to do with it."

Alfred took this hint, and said, artfully, "Mine was a mere opinion, Sir, and I am not a gentleman of your experience can test the mind on any subject however trivial." He added, piteously, "Still, if you would but leave the poets, who are all half crazy themselves, and examine me in the philosophers, of Antiquity, surely it would be a higher criterion."

Dr. Wycherley explained in a patronizing whisper, "He labors under an abnormal contempt for poetry, dating from his attack. Previously to that he actually obtained a prize poem himself"

"Well, Doctor; and after that am I wrong to despise poetry?"

They might have comprehended this on paper, but spoken it was too keen for them all three. The visitors stared. Dr. Wycherley came to their aid: "You might examine my young friend for hours, and not detect the one crevice in the brilliancy of his mental armor."

The maniac made a face as of one that drinketh verjuice suddenly. "For pity's sake, Doctor, don't be so inaccurate: say a spot on the brilliancy, or a crevice in the armor: but not a crevice in the brilliancy. My good friend here, gentlemen, has taken no doctoral certificates and broken metaphors. He dislocates more tropes, to my sorrow, than even his friend Shakspeare, whom he thinks a greater philosopher than Aristotle, and who calls the murder of an individual sleeper the murder of sleep, confounding the concrete with the abstract, and then talks of taking arms against a sea of troubles; query, a cork jacket, and is he drowned?"

"Well, Mr. Hardie," said Dr. Eskell, rather feebly, "let me tell you those passages which so shock your peculiar notions are among the most applauded."

"Very likely, Sir," retorted the maniac, whose logic was at that moment clouded only in a mesh where the floods clap their hands every Sunday morning, and we all pray for peace, giving as our exquisite reason that we have got the God of hosts on our side in war."

Mr. Abbott, the other commissioner, here interposed a little, and said this very drily in a tone of weary indifference. He now said to Dr. Wycherley, "I wish to put you a question or two in private."

Alfred was hereby frightened: this was the very dodge that had ruined him at Silverton House. "Doctor, Doctor," he cried, imploringly. "Let me have fair play. You have given me no secret audience; then why give my accuser one? I am charged with a single delusion; for mercy's sake go to the point at once, and examine me on that head."

"Now you hear him," said Mr. Abbott; as if the previous topics had been chosen by Alfred.

"But that will excite him," objected Dr. Eskell: "it will be cruel to excite him."

"It excites the insane, but not the sane," said Alfred. "So there is another test: you shall observe whether I am sane or no." Then, before they could interrupt him, he glided on: "My supposed hallucination is this: I strongly suspect my father, Archbishop—and therefore dishonest—banker, of having somehow misappropriated a large sum of money belonging to which sum is known to have been brought from India by one Captain Dodd, and has disappeared."

"Stop a minute," said Mr. Abbott. "Who knows it, besides you?"

"The whole family of the Dodds. They will show you his letter from India, announcing his return with the money."

"Where is the letter?"

"Albion Villa, Barkington."

Mr. Abbott noted the address in his book, and Alfred, highly excited and encouraged by this sensible act, went on to describe the various indications, which, insufficient singly, had by their united force driven him to his conclusion. When he described David's appearance and words to his father, Mr. Abbott said, Wheelerly interrupted him, quietly: "Are you quite sure this was not a vision, a phantom of the mind haunted by your agitation, and your suspicions?"

Dr. Eskell nodded assent, knowing nothing about the matter.

"Pray, Doctor, was I the only person who saw this vision?" inquired Alfred, slyly.

"I cannot say, Mr. Hardie," said Dr. Wycherley, with an admirable smile.

"But why do you conclude so? because you are one of those who reason in a circle of assumptions. Now it happens that Captain Dodd was seen also, on that occasion by three persons besides myself."

"Name them," said Mr. Abbott, sharply.

"A gentleman named Reynolds, another policeman, whose name I don't know, and Miss Julia Dodd. The policemen helped me lift Captain Dodd off the floor; Miss Julia was close by, and we four carried Dr. Wycherley's phantom home together to Albion Villa."

Mr. Abbott wrote down all the names, and then turned to Dr. Wycherley. "What do you say to that?"

"I say it is a very important statement," said the Doctor, blandly; "and that I am sure my young friend will be glad to have it unless he was firmly persuaded of its reality."

"Much obliged, Doctor; and you would not contradict me so readily in a matter I know all about and you know nothing about, if it was not your fixed habit to found facts on theories instead of theories on facts."

"There, that is enough," said Mr. Abbott. "I have brought you both to an issue at last. I shall ask Barkington and examine the policeman and the Dodds."

"Oh, thank you, Sir," cried Alfred, with emotion. "If you once apply genuine tests like that to my case, I shall not be long in prison."

"Prison?" said Wycherley, reproachfully.

"Have you any complaint, then, to make of your treatment here?" inquired Dr. Eskell.

"Not of my treatment," said Alfred, warily. "Dr. Wycherley is the very soul of humanity. Here are no tortures, no handcuffs or leg-locks, no brutality, no insects that murder Sleep—without offense to Logic. In my last asylum the attendants inflicted violence; here they only allowed violence to endure it. And, gentlemen, I must tell you a noble trait in my enemy there. Nothing can make him angry with madmen; their lies, their groundless and narrow suspicions of him, their deplorable ingratitude to him, of which I see examples every day that he sees on his account; all these things seem to glide off him, baffled by the infinite kindness of his heart, and the incomparable sweetness of his temper; and he returns the duffers good for evil with scarcely an effort."

At this unexpected tribute the water stood in the Doctor's eyes. It was no more than the truth; but this was the first man he had met intelligent enough to see' his good qualities clearly and express them eloquently.

"In short," continued Alfred, "to be happy in his house all a man wants is to be insane. But, as I am not insane, I am miserable: so convict me, gentlemen, or else I am wretched as I am, gentlemen. And what is my crime?"

"Well, well," said Dr. Eskell, kindly, "I think it likely you will not be very long in confinement." They then civilly dismissed him: and on his departure asked Dr. Wycherley his candid opinion. Dr. Wycherley said he was now nearly cured; his ability to discuss his delusion without excitement was of itself a proof of that. But in another month he would be better still. The Doctor concluded his remarks thus:

"However, gentlemen, you have heard him: now judge for yourselves whether any body can be as clever as he is, without the presence of more or less abnormal excitement of the organs of intelligence."

It was a bright day for Alfred: he saw he had made an impression on two out of the Commissioners, and, as luck does not always come single, after many vain attempts to get a letter post, and to Julia, he found this very morning a nurse was going away next day. He offered her a guinea, and she agreed to post a letter. Oh the happiness to Julia, to the poor prisoner to write it, and unburden his heart and tell his wrongs.

He kept his manhood for his enemies; his tears fell on the paper, he sent it by the nurse bride. He had no misgivings of her truth: he judged her by himself, and knew her credit depended, but not for doubt. He concluded a long, ardent, tender letter by begging her to come and see him, and, by personal admission, establish his case in the newspapers, and employ a lawyer to proceed against all the parties concerned in his detention. The next day he waited in vain for answer to his letter; none came. Then he began to be sore perplexed, and torn with agonizing doubts. Was she false? her mind was poised not. What if she thought him mad? What if some misfortune had befallen her? What if she had received Julia's letter, and her head was broken? Hitherto he had seen his own trouble chiefly: but now he began to think day and night on hers; and though the ground on which he began not to waste time, and not to be driven mad, yet it was almost superhuman that misery sighs loosed from his laboring breast while his hard, indomitable brain labored away, all uphill, at Aristotle's Division and Definitions.

On the seventh day, the earliest the mad statute allowed, the two Commissioners returned, and this time Mr. Abbott took the lead, and told him that the policeman Reynolds had left the force, and the Dodds had left the town, and that he, Abbott, had their address not known.

At this Alfred was much agitated. She was alive, and perhaps near him.

"You have given a good deal of your story," said Mr. Abbott, "and, coupling it with what we have seen of you, we think you may have been treated you, and a young lady of whom every body speaks with respect—"

"God bless you for saying that! God bless you!"

"—treated you both, I say, with needless severity."

Dr. Eskell then told him the result of the Special Commission, now closed. "I believe you to be sane, Sir," said Dr. Eskell; "and, as some doubts whether you were ever positively insane. We shall lay your case before the Board at once, and the Board will write to the party who signed the order, and propose to him to discharge you at once."

At this moment project Alfred's countenance fell, and he stared with astonishment. "What! gentlemen, do you mean to do me justice, without soliciting Injustice to help you?"

"The Board has the power," said Dr. Eskell; "that for obvious reasons they use with prudence and reserve. Besides, it is only fair to those who have signed the order to give them the greatest facility for liberating a lunatic: it paves the way to reconciliation."

Up flies Alfred. The Commissioners, to keep up his spirits, promised to send him copies of their correspondence with the person who had signed the order—"That, Mr. Hardie," added, kindly, "you will see your case is not being neglected."

The following précis, though imperfect, will give some idea of the correspondence:

1. The Board wrote to Thomas Hardie, letting him know the result of the Special Commission, and requesting him to discharge his nephew.

Thomas quaked. Richard smiled, and advised Thomas to take no notice. By this time he was gained to Injustice, and lost to Justice.

2. The Board pointed out Thomas Hardie's inadvertence in not answering No. 1; inclosed copy of it, and pressed for a reply.

Thomas quaked, Richard smiled.

3. Thomas Hardie to the Board. From what he had heard, it would be premature to discharge Alfred. Should write in a week or two.

4. Alfred to Board warning them against this proposal. To postpone justice was to refuse justice, certainly for a time, probably forever.

5. The Board to Thomas Hardie, suggesting that if not released immediately he ought to have a trial—i. e., be allowed to go into the world with a keeper.

6. Alfred to the Board begging that Dr. Sampson, an honest independent physician, might be allowed to visit him and report to them.

7. The Board to Alfred declining this for the present as unadvisable, they being in correspondence with the person who had signed the order —with a view to his liberation.

8. T. Hardie to the Board shuffling, and requesting time to make further inquiries.

9. The Board suggesting there should be some reasonable limit to delay.

10. T. Hardie asking for a month to see about it.

11. The Board suggesting a week.

12. Alfred Hardie asking permission to be visited by a solicitor with a view to protection of his liberty and property.

13. The Board declining this, pending their correspondence with other parties; but adding him for the names and addresses of all his trustees.

14. Thomas Hardie informing the Board he had now learned Alfred had threatened to kill his father as soon as ever he should get out, and leaving the Board to discharge him on their own responsibility if they chose after this warning; but declining peremptorily to do so himself.

15, 16, 17. The Board, by advice of Mr. Abbott, to Alfred's trustees, warning them against any alienation of Alfred's money, and stating the notion that he was legally a lunatic: and saying that a public Inquiry appeared inevitable, owing to Mr. T. Hardie's unwillingness to enter into their views.

18. To Alfred, inquiring whether he wished to encounter the expense of Chancery proceedings to establish his sanity?

19. Alfred to the Board, imploring them to use their powers and discharge him without further delay, and assuring them he meditated no violence on his liberation, but should proceed against all parties under legal advice.

20. The Board to T. Hardie, warning him that he must in future pay Alfred's maintenance in Asylum out of his own pocket, and pressing him either to discharge the young man, or else to apply to the Lord Chancellor for a Commission de Lunatico Inquirendo, and inclosing copy of a letter from Wycherley saying the patient was harmless.

21. T. Hardie respectfully declining to do either, but reminding the Commissioners that the matter could be thrown into Chancery without his consent, only the expense, which would be tremendous, would fall on the lunatic's estate, which might hereafter be regretted by the party himself. He concluded by promising to come to town and visit Alfred with his family physician, and further in a week.

Having thus thrown dust in the eyes of the Board, Thomas Hardie and Bedwell proceeded with a notoriously unscrupulous mad-house keeper in the suburbs of London, and effected a master-stroke of wherewithal anon.

The correspondence had already occupied three months, and kept Alfred in a fever of the blind; of all the maddening things with which he had been harassed by the pretended curers of Insanity, this had tried him hardest. To see a dozen honest gentlemen waiting to do justice, able to do justice by one manly stroke of the pen, yet forego their vantage-ground, and pretend to count on a rude rogue to do their duty, and undo his own interest and rascality! To see a strong cause turned into a weak one by the timidity of champions clad by law in complete steel; and a rotten cause, against which Law and Power, as well as Truth and Justice, and Common Sense, had now declared, turned into a strong one by the pluck and cunning of his one enemy and enemy! The sensation resembled that the ingenious gods tortured Tantalus in hell by ever-present thirst, and water flowing to just the outside of his lips. A Briton does not live for liberty as hard as Tantalus or hunted deer can thirst for cooling springs: and this soul-grasping negotiative business brought liberty into manhood, and love, and happiness, to the lips of Alfred's burning, pining, aching heart, only to turn again, and again; then carried them away from him in mockery. Oh the sickening anguish of Hope deferred, and deferred!

The hell it is in suing long to bibs.

But indeed his hopes began to sicken for good when he found that the Board could not have any honest independent physician to visit him, or any solicitor to see him. At first, indeed, they refused it because Mr. Thomas Hardie was going to let him out: but when T. Hardie would not move at their request, then, on a fresh application, refused it, giving as their reason that they had already refused it. Yet in so keen a battle he could not throw away a weapon, and he determined to win Dr. Wycherley altogether by hook or by crook, and get a certificate of sanity from him. Now a single white lie, he knew, would do the trick. He had only to say that Hamlet was mad. And "Hamlet was mad" is easily said.

Dr. Wycherley, you see, was a collector of mad people, and collectors are always amateurs, and very seldom connoisseurs. His fine mind refused co-operating with his interests, led him to put down any man a lunatic whose intellect was manifestly superior to his own. Alfred Hardie, and one or two more contemporaries, had suffered by this humor of the good Doctor's. Nor did the dread escape him entirely. Pascal, according to Wycherley, was a madman with an illusion about a precipice; John Howard was mad lunatic in whom the affections were reversed; Saul a moping maniac with homicidal paroxysms and nocturnal visions; Paul an intellectual monster who in his writings flies off at a tangent, and who admits having once been the victim of a photopsic illusion in broad daylight; Nebuchadnezzar was a lycanthropical lunatic; Joan of Arc a thenomaine; Bobby Burton and Oliver Cromwell were melancholy maniacs; Napoleon was an ambitious maniac, in whose case the impossibility became gradually extinguished by visceral and cerebral derangement: Luther a phrenetic patient of the old demoniac breed, allayed by blasphemy:

One sees more devils than vast Hell can hold.
That is the madness.

But without any disrespect to any of these gentlemen, he assigned the golden crown of Insanity to Hamlet. To be sure this character tells his friends in the play he shall feign insanity, and swears them not to reveal the reason. And after this hint to his friends and the audience (it is notorious he was not written for readers) he keeps his word, and does it as cleverly as if his name were Bob Acres instead of Hamlet; indeed, like Edgar, he rather overdoes it, and so puzzles his enemies in the play, any one of them criticaster and English mad doctors in the closet, and does not puzzle his bosom friend in the play one bit, nor the pit for whom he was created. Add to this his sensibility, and his kindness to others, and his eloquent grief at the heart-rending situation, which his father's and mother's son was placed in, and had brains to realize, though his psychological critics, it seems, have not; and, to crown all, that the prodigious extent of his mind, his keen observation, his deep reflection, his brilliant fancy united for once in a way with his vast judgment, or judicial, intellect, that locks down and sees all the sides of every thing—and what can this rare intellectual compound be? The answer decided the question. Hamlet was too much greater in the world of mind than S. T. Coleridge and his German criticasters, to not have a higher, deeper, and broader than Esquirol, Tissot, Sauvages, Linnæus, Pagens, Pinel, Arnold, Rose, Burgery, Wycherley, and such small deer, to be any thing but a madman.

Now, in their midnight discussions, Dr. Wycherley more than once alluded to the insanity of Hamlet; and offered proofs. But Alfred declined the subject as being "a bore." "A man must exist before he can be insane," said the Oxonian philosopher, severe in youthful gravity. But when he found that Dr. Wycherley had buried in Denmark at the time, would have conferred cassinly with Hamlet's uncle, removed the latter by relations, disbelief in Hamlet's insanity, and signed the young gentleman away behind his back into a lunatic asylum, Alfred began to take a pathetic view of the posthumous victim of Psychological Science. "I believe the bloke was no murder than I am," said he. "I'll tell you. I've studied it afresh, compared the fiction with the legend, compared Hamlet humbugging his enemies and their tools, Rosencrantz and Guildenstern, using his real mind to himself or his Horatio the very next moment; contrasted the real madness in the author's mind with the sane mind of Hamlet and Lear by the side of these extravagant imitations, to save, if possible, even dunces, and dreamers, and evidence-proof fools from being led by the latter; and at their next séance pitches into the Doctor's pet Chimera, and what with logic, fact, ridicule, and the author's lines knocked it to atoms double quick.

Now in their midnight discussions, Dr. Wycherley had always handled the question of Alfred Hardie's Sanity or Insanity with a philosophical coolness he could not command, and found it hard to emulate; but this philosophic calmness deserted him the moment Hamlet's insanity was questioned. Then his face was expressed, the redder, the angrier, the louder, the more confused the Psychological physician became; and Alfred, who had never yet had bored out of the antispasmodic or roundabout style, and called Alfred a d—d ungrateful, insolent puppy, and was astonished at the man's ire, and, finally, to the young man's horror, fell down in a fit of an Epileptic character, grinding his teeth and foaming at the mouth.

Alfred was filled with regret, and, though alarmed, had the presence of mind not to make assistance. The fit was a very mild one in reality, though horrible to look at. The Doctor recovered, and asked Alfred's pardon. Alfred got it him, and the Doctor, with a mixture of cunning and alarm in his eye, said he had fainted away in a fit. Alfred, very obsequiously, and looked sheepish. After this he took care never to libel Hamlet's intellect again by denying his insanity. Alfred, in his own mind, for what he had long half suspected, that the Doctor had a bee in his bonnet, and Alfred set to work and studied true insanity all this time, and knew how inhumane it is to oppose a monomaniac's theory, it only infuriates and worries him. No power can convince him.

But now he resolved to play on the Doctor's foible. It went against his conscience; but the temptation was so strong. He came to him with a long dog-story:

"Doctor," said he, "I have been thinking over your arguments, and I capitulate. If Hamlet ever existed, he was as mad as a March hare." And he blushed at this his first quibble.

Dr. Wycherley looked at him with affection.

"My young friend, this gives me sincere pleasure—not on my account, but on your own. There goes a man who will recover. Now tell me—the £14,000! Have you calmly reconsidered that too?"

Alfred hung his head, and looked guilter and guiltier.

"Why," said he, "that never amounted to any thing more than a strong suspicion. It has long ceased to occupy my mind in excess. However, should I ever be able to substantiate a charge, my liberty, I have no objection to collect the evidence about it, pro and con, and then make you the judge instead of myself." This he delivered with an admirable appearance of indifference.

"Very well, Sir," said the Doctor, dryly. "Then, now, I have a piece of good news for you."

"Oh, Doctor, what is that?"

"Your cure is complete; that is all! You are now a sane man, as sane as I am."

Alfred was a little disappointed at this piece of news; but, recovering himself, asked him to certify that, and handed him the certificate for the Board. Dr. Wycherley said he would, with pleasure.

"I'll bring it to you when I make my round," said he.

Alfred retired triumphant, and went to Plato with a good heart.

In about an hour Dr. Wycherley paid him the promised visit. But what brown was this brought forth? He came with mortification and regret in his face to tell Alfred that an order of transfer had been signed by the proper parties, and countersigned by two Commissioners, and he was to go to Dr. Wolf's asylum that day.

Alfred groaned.

"I knew my father would outwit my feeble friends somehow or other," said he. "What is his game? Do you know?"

"I suppose to obtain a delay, and meantime get you into an asylum where they will tell the Commissioners you are worse again, and perhaps do something to make their words good. Dr. Wolf, between ourselves, will say or do almost any thing for money. And his asylum is conducted on the old system, though he pretends not."

"My dear friend," said Alfred, "will you do me a favor?"

"How could I deny you any thing at this sorrowful moment?"

"Here is an advertisement I want inserted in the Morning Advertiser."

"Oh, I can't do that, I fear."

"Look at it before you break my heart by refusing me."

Dr. Wycherley looked at it, an' said it was innocent, being unintelligible, and he would insert it directly.

"Three insertions, dear Doctor," said Alfred. "Here is the money."

The Doctor then told him sorrowfully he must pack up his things. Dr. Wolf's keepers were waiting for him.

The moment of parting came. Then Alfred solemnly forgave him, Dr. Wycherley, for signing away his sanity, and thanked him for all his kindness and humanity. "We shall never meet again, I fear," said he; "I feel a weight of foreboding in my sad heart I never felt before; yet my trials have been many and great. I think the end is at hand." Dr. Wolf's keepers received him with some first act was a hundred him. The cold steel struck into him deeper than his wrist, and reminded him of Silverton Grove. He could not speak for a shudder. The carriage rolled all through London with him. He saw the Parks with grass, and they seemed rich silver by the eye like two prize-fighters. Dr. Wolf's eye fell under Alfred's, and the latter felt he was capable of any thing. He was a man of the old bull-necked breed, and contained the bulldog and the spaniel in his single nature. "I shall have to be comfortable here, Sir," said he, doggedly.

"I will try, Sir."

"The first-class patients dine in half an hour."

"I will be ready, Sir."

"Full dress in the evening; there are several ladies." Alfred assented by a bow. Dr. Wolf rang a bell and told a servant to show Mr. Hardie to his room.

He had just time to make his toilet when the bell rang for dinner.

As he was going a nurse met him, held up something white to him as she came, lowered it quickly, and tossed it at his feet in passing.

It was a billet-doux.

It was twisted into a pretty shape, scented, and addressed to Alfred, in a delicate Italian hand and in that pale ink which seems to reflect the charming timidity of the fair who use it.

He wondered, carried it into a recess, then opened it and read it.

It contained but this one line:

"Drink nothing but water at dinner."

These words, in that delicate Italian hand, sent a chill through Alfred. What on earth was all this? Was he poisoned? Was his life insured at now instead of his reason? What was this mysterious drama prepared for him the very moment he was left in the place, perhaps before? A poisoner, and a friend! Both strangers. He went down to dinner, and contrived to abstain every half a quarter of an hour at table. But they were all strangers. Presently a servant filled his glass with beer. He looked at it, and was guarded from a small jug holding only his portion. Alfred took his ring off his finger, and holding the glass up dropped his ring in.

"What is that or?" inquired one or two.

"Oh, my ring has a peculiar virtue: it tells me what is good for me. Ah! what do I see? my ruby changes color. Fetch me a clean glass." A servant did with some from a carafe. "No, Sir, leave the beer. I'll analyze it in my room after dinner; I'm a chemist."

Dr. Wolf changed color, and was ill at ease. Here was a bold and ugly customer. However, he said nothing, and felt sure his morphia could not be detected in beer by any decomposer but the stomach. Still he was thoroughly mystified.

In the evening Alfred came down into the drawing-room, and found several gentlemen and ladies there. One of the ladies seemed to attract the lion's share of male homage. Her back was turned to Alfred; but it was a beautiful back, with great magnificent neck and shoulders, and a skin like satin; she was tall, but rounded and symmetrical; had a massive but long and shapely white arm, and perfect hand; and masses of thick black hair sat on her head in great coils like a raven on a marble pillar.

It was not easy to get near her; for the male gentlemen were all crowding on her all round, like Queen Elizabeth's courtiers.

However, Dr. Wolf, seeing Alfred standing alone, said, "Let me introduce you," and took him round to her. The courtiers fell back a little. The lady turned her stately head, and her dark eyes ran lightly all over Alfred in a moment.

He bowed, and blushed like a girl. She courtesied composedly and without a symptom of recognition—deep water runs still—and Dr. Wolf introduced them ceremoniously

"Mr. Hardie—Mrs. Archbold."

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

THE DUKE OF H. had a son, a student at the Bonaparte Lyceum. At the distribution of honors the young nobleman bowed with a single cue, at which the duke was very angry. "Go, Sir," said he to him, "go to bed—go yourself up to your room, and don't show it to me."

An outside passenger by a coach had his hat blown over a bridge and carried away by the stream. "Is it not very singular," said he to a gentleman who sat next to him, "that my hat took that direction?" "Not at all," replied the latter; "it is natural that a beaver should take to the water."

MODEST.

Miss Blank, it is known, is accustomed to say
Many very queer things in a very queer way;
But of all her mistakes the most stupidest and oddest
Occurred when she called a French confidé modeste.

An old lady, who had a great aversion to ire in any form, says, "I think now they have got to making it into whisky she can take a little now and then."

SCHOOLMISTRESS (pointing to the first letter of the alphabet). "Now, Charley, what is that?"

CHILD. "I shan't tell you." (Bursts out crying.)

SCHOOLMISTRESS. "You won't? But you must! Come, now, what is it?"

CHILD. "Oh, what's tell you! I didn't come here to teach you, but for you to teach me."

"No pains will be spared," as the quack said when sawing off a poor fellow's legs for the sake of the dissection.

What pupil is the most to be pitied?—The pupil of the eye, because it is always under the lash.

A passenger, having hired a boat to take him across a rather rough stream, asked the Irish boatman if any body had ever been drowned in it. "Drowned!" said he; "nobody was drowned here last week, but we found him again the next day."

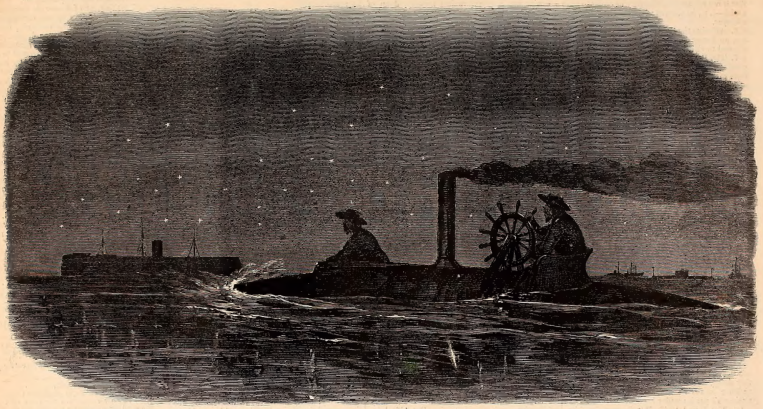
The editor of a paper says he can generally manage, by hook or by crook, to get up a pretty good paper. Practice says he does it principally by hook.

Is there an English word that contains all the vowels?—Unquestionably. A teetotaller thinks that all "sensible people" would prefer them in their regular order—A facetiously.

"I speak within bounds," as the prisoner said to the jailer.

A gentleman, now dead, being very poor, offered his hand and heart to a fair widow who had a large fortune and three children. "Sir," said she to him, "I cannot marry you," said the richly-endowed widow. He went home disconsolate and hard. Then he thought of it, sowed the gentleman a turn for certain labors undertaken and expected reward, and received condign thanks. The noble lord had won a seat in Parliament, and told him to ask. "Make me a lord," said he, "and you shall have and fortune. "No," replied the nobleman, "I can not do that." "Then," said he, "I will marry the widow and be a knighthood." Whereupon the gentleman consulted his barrister. "Will it make me a lord?" "No." "Then I say that will do." He returned to his patron and got his knighthood, and subsequently the lady and her fortune.

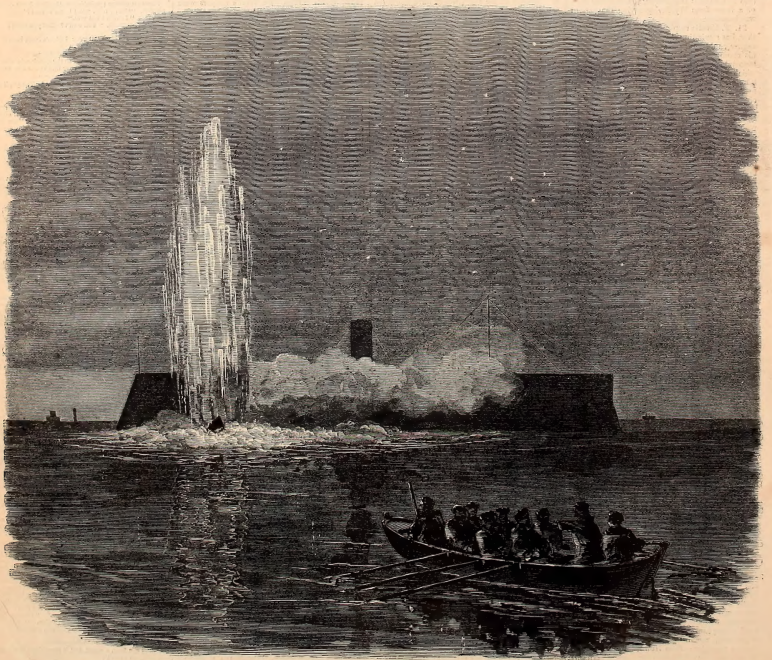
A man passing along the street with a looking-glass under his arm met a little boy, and thought to be witty at his expense. "Boy," said he, "do you know what I have got under my arm?" "Yes, Sir," said the boy, "I know what it always; you would have been better off if you had stood plain."



At a public meeting in a country town an eloquent officer of a benefit society thus addressed himself: "Mr. President, I rise to get up, and am not backward to come forward in the cause of charity. Here, for lack of knowledge for education, I should be to ignorant as you are, Mr. President."

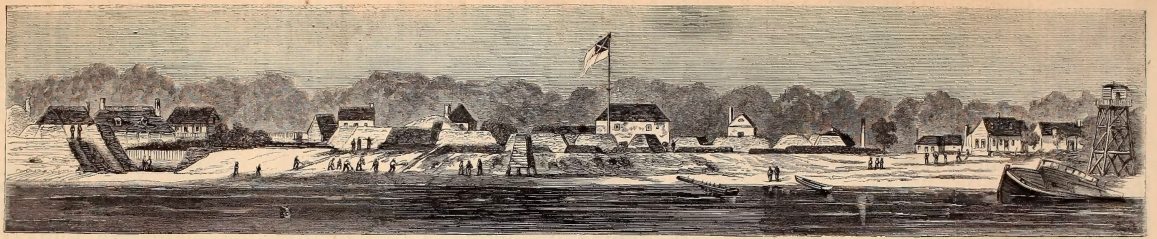
TAKE TWO OR THREE.—A bashful youth was paying marked attention to a young lady, and was about to make the question of an interesting nature when the latter stopped him and said, "Stop, Sir, I shall only trying to serve herself to ask the terrible question." At this the little man entered the room, and straight struck him. Taking her on his knee, he asked, "Now, my darling, what is Tommy, dear, she knee, he asked, "Now, my darling, what is Tommy, dear, she you willing I should have your aunt for my own? I will give you five hundred guineas for her." "Oh yes" said give you five hundred guineas for her." "Oh yes" said she little thing, clapping her hands in glee. "But hadn't you better give me a thousand guineas, and take five of them?"

Women can keep a secret, but it generally takes a good many of them to do it.



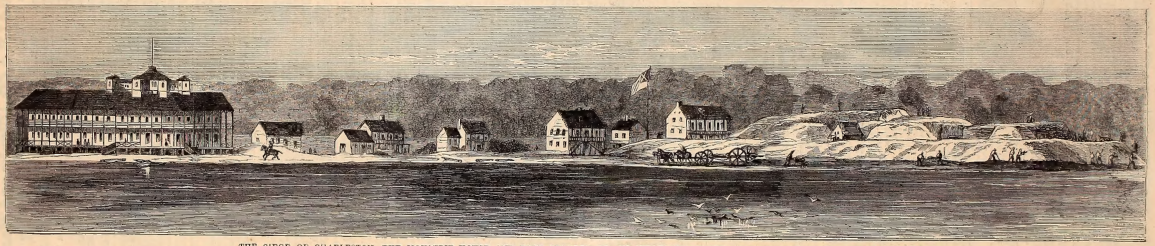
The paper containing many fine points—a paper of pins.

Pitchy darkness has been so improved as to read "illuminous obscurity."

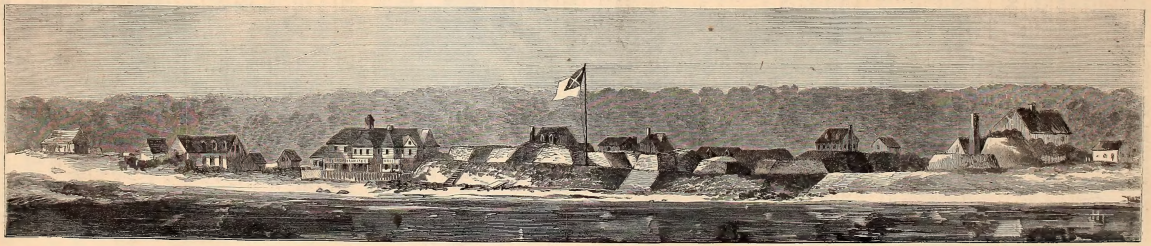


THE SIEGE OF CHARLESTON—THE "SEGAR STEAMER" WHICH PROPELLED THE REBEL TORPEDO.—SKETCHED BY AN OCCASIONAL CONTRIBUTOR.

[SEE PAGE 695.]



THE SIEGE OF CHARLESTON—ATTEMPT TO BLOW UP THE "IRONSIDES" BY A REBEL TORPEDO.—SKETCHED BY AN OCCASIONAL CONTRIBUTOR.



[SEE PAGE 695.]

THE SIEGE OF CHARLESTON—PRESENT APPEARANCE OF FORT MOULTRIE.—Sketched by Mr. O. Enz.—[See Page 695.]

THE SIEGE OF CHARLESTON—THE MOULTRIE HOUSE AND FORT BEAUREGARD, ON SULLIVAN'S ISLAND.—Sketched by Mr. O. Enz.—[See Page 695.]

THE SIEGE OF CHARLESTON—BATTERY BEE, ON SULLIVAN'S ISLAND.—Sketched by Mr. O. Enz.—[See Page 695.]

THE ONLY SON.

TO MRS. ABRAM ROSSITER, RICHMOND, MASS.

Is the still New England autumn
The work of the year was done;
Has after were fields unsickled
Under the southern sun—
Fields to be reaped in battle—
Harvests by victory won.

The young men came from the hill-sides
A thousand strong and more,
At the call of a sterner duty
Than their souls had heard before;
And whose under-tone was deeper
Than the far-off cannon's roar.

From each house a living echo
Was given unto the call,
One from the stalled cottage,
One from ancestral hall;
In a home were three fair brothers,
And the mother gave them all.

They went, and the fields by the river
With their harvesting grew red;
And they came with the sheaves of triumph
Ere the leaves again were dead:
"Welcome, my son, mine only,"
Calmly the mother said.

On the lower Mississippi
The work of the year was done;
The deadly fields were sickled
Under the burning sun;
And the harvest-home was Joyful,
Though the mother welcomed one.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

BURNETT'S

Standard Flavoring Extracts

For Cooking Purposes.

Lemon,	Peach,	Rose,	Cloves,
Celery,	Orange,	Vanilla,	Ginger,
Nutmeg,	Cinnamon,	Nectarine,	Almond.

THE SUPERIORITY OF THESE EXTRACTS CONSISTS IN THEIR

Perfect Purity and Great Strength.

We select the following Testimonials:

POPULAR HOTELS.

"Pre-eminently superior to all others for culinary use."
PARKER HOUSE, Boston.

"Superior to any we have ever used."
REVERE HOUSE, Boston.

"Have used your Extracts for several years, and regard them the best in the world."
UNITED STATES HOTEL, NEW YORK.

"Our test has proved them very excellent."
ST. NICHOLAS HOTEL, NEW YORK.

"Have been found really superior by thorough and accurate use in our Establishment for years."
CONTINENTAL HOTEL, Phila., Pa.

"Possess all the rare qualities claimed for them."
ESTAW HOUSE, Baltimore, Md.

"For superior to any in the market."
WILLARD'S HOTEL, Washington, D. C.

MANUFACTURERS AND PROPRIETORS,

JOSEPH BURNETT & CO.,

BOSTON.

THE "RIDGEWOOD" PATENT

SMOKING CASE.

Most ingenious in its combination of the Metallic Case, containing Pipe and Stem. Matches and Pipe Cleaner, with a handsome Tobacco Pouch attached, filling the top of the case, without use of fingers or waste of Tobacco, the whole securing freedom from all odor, and portable as a Cigar Case. It is made for sending in all of various styles, at $1 50, $1 88, $2 25, $2 50, and $3 75 each, and $5 and $6 per dozen. Sent by mail, postage paid. Nothing can excel its comfort, utility, and economy for all smokers, at home or abroad, in the Army or Navy. Present to friends nothing could be more acceptable. Try it, either in camp or on the march, it is invaluable. Gen. CHARLES ANDERSON, of Ohio, using one, says: "Every patriot soldier should have one of these cases as a constant campaign companion." Also

The Ridgewood Smoking Tobacco,

Of superior quality and flavor, in packages to fill the Pouch (about a week's smoking), or larger packages for the general trade. OFFICERS, SOLDIERS, and DEALERS are invited to examine these Goods. SUTTLERS' ATTENDING particularly called to them. Circulars sent on order. A liberal discount to Dealers. Single Cases sent by mail or express, paid, on receipt of price and 25 cts. All orders will receive prompt attention.

RIDGEWOOD MANUFACTURING CO.,
Office 429 Broadway, cor. Howard Street, New York.

SOMETHING TO DO—"PLEASANT AND PROFITABLE." Good Books, ready sales, and good profits. Agents wanted. Address, with stamp, FOWLER AND WELLS, 308 Broadway, New York.

ARRANDALE & CO.,

Importers of Watches,

212 Broadway, N. Y.

Doubtless the great want of this age of progress is a really good time keeping watch at a moderate price. This desideratum has been at length supplied by ARRANDALE & CO., who spare no effort to combine in their watches the latest discoveries of science and the most moderate prices, as will be seen from the following

Price List.

Handsome Silver Watch, warranted..... $10 00
New Railway Timekeeper, silver composite hunting case, with jewelled Time Indicator, is the watch to use in transits of opposing cars. This novelty has been introduced for the convenience of our brave soldiers. Handsome and reliable, often sold for Thirty Dollars..... $15 50
Ladies' Gold Composite Watch, Engraved Hunting Cases, difficult to distinguish from real gold, very elegant and accurate, often sold for Fifty Dollars..... $19 00
Soldier's Own, Patent Lever, Sterling Silver Hunting Cases. An excellent timekeeper. Usually sold for Thirty Dollars..... $16 00
Genuine Patent Lever, Silver Cases; usually sold for Thirty-five Dollars..... $20 00
Army Watch, with Patent Solid Winding arrangement attached to Cap, strong Gold Plated Hunting Cases, an admirable watch for general campaigning, sold for Thirty-five Dollars..... $20 00
Fine Gold Watch, exact size, extra jewelled, Engraved Gold Cases, manufactured expressly for this house, is a most gratifying accuracy to the day of the month. Can be adjusted to all climates. The invention of the age! Just imported by Arrandale & Co..... $40 00
The New Watch contains Second Hand, and also the Thermometer! The cases are of heavy gold plate. This Watch, having the most perfect time balance, is not affected by change of climate, but will work equally well in all countries..... $40 00
Fine American Lever, Jewled, Massive Fine Gold, Hunting Cases, usually sold for One Hundred Dollars $65
Patent Detached English Lever, Chronometer Balance, Full Jewelled, Reserve Cases of Sterling Gold. In every fine, usually sold for One Hundred and Twenty-five Dollars..... $70 00
A great variety of Ladies' and Gentlemen's Watches, Chains, &c. Send for circular fully describing these and others. All Watches are sent out in good working order, properly regulated, sealed, free of any charges, and warranted for 12 months. A reduction on wholesale orders. Money sent as our risk if payment is not satisfactory. ARRANDALE & CO., 212 Broadway, Three Doors from Barnum's Museum, corner of Fulton Street, N. Y.

$15 Per Day Sure $15

And a Watch Free.

Employment for everybody, male and female. 100,000 men, women, and children wanted to act as our Agents in every Town and Village throughout the U. S. to sell the most useful, popular, unexcelled, and unparalleled large Patent Stationery Reference and Package Combination. Package Containing One Thousand Articles, such as Paper, Envelopes, Bronzed and Colored Initial Emblems, Ladies' Fashion Plates, Designs for Needlework, Cottage Designs, Household Conjurations, Useful Explanations for Soldiers, Parlor Amusements, Letter Writer's Guide, Method for Removing Stains, &c., &c., the whole worth, if bought separately, many dollars. Price each Package only 25 cents retail. Wholesale Agents can clear very low, from 100 to 200 PER CENT PROFIT ALLOWED. Our Package is sent by mail or express, alone, and above all competitors, and have long been acknowledged as the leading and most valuable and standard Articles of the kind now manufactured. Package of all descriptions put up by the 100 gross. Address, Wholesale Dealers Only, &c. Goods sent by Express safe to all PARTS of the army South or Southwest. A SPLENDID SOLID SILVER ANCHOR ENGLISH MOVEMENTS, and correct timepiece presented FREE to agent who sends us the largest order. Send for our new Circulars, containing Extra Premium Inducements, Terms, &c. J. G. BLAKESLEE & CO., 162 Nassau St., N. Y. The Great Original, Largest, and Oldest Prize Package House in the World.

STERLING'S

AMBROSIA

DR. STERLING'S

AMBROSIA

is a stimulating oily extract of roots, barks, and herbs. It will cure all diseases of the scalp and bring to the head its primitively exclusive dark color. It prevents the hair from falling out or from turning prematurely gray, causing it to grow thick and long. It is entirely different from all other preparations, and can be relied on.

Trade Mark.

CERTIFICATE.

This is to certify that, about eighteen months ago, I commenced using STERLING'S AMBROSIA. My hair was then thin, and rapidly falling out. I tried many of the Hair Tonics, Invigorators, &c., without receiving any benefit. Soon after using the Ambrosia, my hair ceased falling out, and commenced growing so rapidly as to astonish me. Now my hair is thick, soft, and glossy, and is from four inches in length—when let down reaching to the waist. This wonderful result I attribute solely to the use of STERLING'S AMBROSIA, as since I commenced using it I have applied nothing else to my hair.

MRS. L. A. BROWN, No. 403 Broadway, New York.

PRICE $1 00 PER BOTTLE, containing Directions.

DR. H. H. STERLING, Sole Proprietor,
Depot No. 403 Broadway.

For sale by all druggists.

Elliot's New Repeaters

Are now ready. The most safe, compact, durable, effective, cute, and reliable Revolvers made. Carry large balls (No. 32 cartridge), are rapidly loaded and fired—conveniently carried in the vest—whole length five inches—four barrels—each rifled gain twist. The Trade supplied.
ELLIOT ARMS CO., 323 Broadway, N. Y.

ALL ARTICLES FOR SOLDIERS

At Ballmore, Washington, and all places occupied by Union troops, should be sold by HARLOW'S EXPRESS, No. 74 Broadway. Suttlers charged low rates.

Cloaks and Mantillas.

BRODIE,

The Leader of Fashions!

Opened his Fall Stock on Thursday, 8th inst.,

And as usual stands unrivaled for Style, Elegance, AND VARIETY.

300 Canal Street, New York.

10,000,000 GLEASON'S SAVED KEROSENE CRATER

Will warm food for the baby, heat water or steep herbs, &c., for the sick, make water hot for shaving or toilet, cook a few oysters, boil or fry eggs, make tea and coffee, toast bread, &c., &c., in less time and expense than by any other means known. Used on any lamp without obstructing the light. Price 25 cents; by mail, postage paid, 30 cents. Also a Patent Lighter, for lighting lamps without removing the chimney. Price 10 cents. F. P. GLEASON, Manufacturer, 175 Mercer Street, New York.

Jobbing Agents of Manufacturer's Prices.

BRACKETT, WEBSTER & PALMER, Rochester, N. Y.
W. H. GLENNY, 161 Main Street, Buffalo, N. Y.
RICE & BURNETT, 103 Superior Street, Cleveland, Ohio.
H. WITTBOLD & CO., Chicago, Ill.
HALE & CO., Milwaukie, Wisconsin.
GEO. G. FOOTE, 122 Chestnut Street, Chicago, Illinois.
BOWEN & CO., 85 Main Street, Dubuque, Iowa.
G. W. CURTIS & CO., 7 & 9 South Second St. Louis, Mo.
WM. STONE & CO., Bullitt Street, Louisville, Ky.
BAKER & VAN TUYL, 1 and 3 West 4th St., Cincinnati, Ohio.
WILSON & KELLY, 164 Wood Street, Pittsburg, Penn.
ARMOUR & CHANDLER, Memphis, Mo.
And at most of the principal lamp houses in New York, Philadelphia, and Boston.

IMMENSE PROFITS

To be made selling the INVISIBLE SATCHEL POCKET.
Send for our New Circular.
G. S. HASKINS & CO.,
36 Bookman Street, N. Y.

American Watches

For Soldiers

AT REDUCED PRICES.

American Watches for American Soldiers.

THE AMERICAN WATCH COMPANY give notice that they have lately issued a new style of Watch, expressly designed for Soldiers and others who desire a good watch at a moderate price. Those watches are intended to displace the worthless, cheap watches of British and Swiss manufacture with which the country is flooded, and which were never expected to keep time when they were made, being mere manufactures sent by this country because unsalable at home, and used here only for jockeying and swindling purposes.

In order to sell our Watch, which is OF THE MOST SUBSTANTIAL MANUFACTURE, AN ACCURATE AND DURABLE TIME-KEEPER, and in every respect RELIABLE, we have resolved, as nearly as low a price as is asked for the fancy-named Anchors and Lepines of foreign make, already referred to.

We have named the new series of Watches, WM. ELDRIDGE, BOSTON, MASS., which name will be found on the plate of every genuine American Watches, and is one of our trade-marks.

Sold by all respectable watch dealers in the loyal states.

Wholesale orders should be addressed to

ROBBINS & APPLETON,

Agents of the American Watch Company,

182 BROADWAY, N. Y.

SALISBURY, BRO., & CO.,

AGENTS FOR THE UNITED STATES FOR THE CELEBRATED

Extension Holders and Gold Pens,

Of the most handsome and durable construction, put up in new fancy cases, and sold at prices to suit and keep in less quantities. They will retail for 50 cents.

Price, per dozen..... $0 75
" gross..... 5 00
" 100 00

Sent by mail or express, prepaid. Address
SALISBURY, BRO., & CO., Providence, R. I.

Diamond Pointed Gold Pens Retailing at Wholesale Prices.

Medium	Pen $0 38, in Silver ext. case, $0 75
Large	" 0 50 " " " 1 00
Engrossing	" 0 75 " " " 1 50
Commercial	" 1 25 " " " 2 00
Mammoth	" 1 50 " " " 2 50
Gentlemen's	" 2 00 " " " 3 00

Sent by mail to all parts of the country.

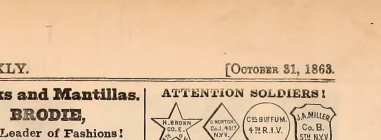
H. A. HARVEY, 91 Maiden Lane, N. Y., TWINES. Ropes, CORDAGE, and Yarn, Steam Packing, Wick, CARPET CHAIN, Hay Lines, Blocking Cord, Log Cord and Sorgeons' Tow, Writing and Wrapping PAPER, Davenport, and Tarred Felt.

Sent free by mail for 60 cents.

Dys-ensia Tablets,

For INDIGESTION, HEARTBURN, &c.—Manufactured only by
S. G. WELLING, No. 207 Centre St., New York.
Price 50 cents per box. Sold by Druggists generally.

Insoles, Belts, and Armlets.



SECURED BY LETTERS PATENT OF THE UNITED STATES AND GREAT BRITAIN.

These articles are purely Voltaic, and by the union of two metals producing a voltaic current, which is excited by the moisture of the feet and body, diffusing a healthy and copious action of electricity to the whole person of the wearer, being an effective cure for Rheumatism, Cold Feet, Gout, &c., and all nervous affections of the body.

METTAM & CO., PROPRIETORS.

Insoles, $1 60; Belts, $3; Armlets, $1 50; per mail, 20 cents additional. Office 439 Broadway. Send for circular.

ATTENTION SOLDIERS!

All our Badges are 14 inches in Diameter.

Solid Silver Shield, with Name, Rank, and Regiment,	EACH $ 60
" Star "	1 00
" Clover Leaf "	1 00
" Diamond "	1 00
" Circle "	1 25
" Cross "	1 25
" Maltese Cross "	1 25

Either of the above styles enamaled in red, white, or blue, for $1 25 each, with Name, Rank, and Regiment engraved distinctly upon them.

Solid Silver Co. Pins, with Name, Rank, and Regiment neatly engraved on each, for $0 per dozen. Letters run from 1 to 6.

Silver Plated Corps Badges, enamaled red, white, or blue, $2 per dozen. Finest, Diamond, and Clover Leaf, $3 gold, $5 each; Circle, Cross, and Maltese Cross, 18 K. gold, $5 each; Crescent, in 18 k. gold, $5 each; Shield, 18 k., $3 50 each. Badges sent free on receipt of price mentioned.

Orders for 100 or 1000 at a liberal discount. We are constantly receiving new designs from our own Manufactory, and we are the Pioneer Army Badge Manufacturers, and are prepared to turn out patterns more liberally than any house in the trade. Terms, Cash in Advance. Address DROWNE'S MODEL, Badge Manufacturing Jeweler, 103 Broadway, New York.

A Splendid New

Mexican War Story

Is just commenced in the

New York Weekly,

Entitled,

The Light Dragoon;

OR, THE

Rancheros of the Poisoned Lance.

A TALE OF THE BATTLE-FIELDS OF MEXICO.

By Harry Hazel.

For sale everywhere. Price 5 cents per copy.

ENAMELED CHAMBER FURNITURE.—The best assortment of Enameled Furniture, in all colors and styles, Walnut and Chestnut, Plain and Ornamental, in Suites, Single and Retail, at Manufacturers' wholesale Prices. KERNER WARD, No. 377 Canal St., N. Y.

WANTED.—DISABLED AND DISCHARGED SOLdiers, Sailors, Marines, unmanned and crippled, can hear of a pleasant and profitable business by addressing P. O. Box No. 6, Philadelphia. (Sample free for 25 cents.)

Union Playing Cards.

Colonel of Kitty, Goddess of Liberty for Queen, and Major for Jack. Commanded cards to the pack. Eagles, Shields, Stars, and Flags are the suits, and you can play all the usual games. Pack of 52 cards, handsomely put up, sent free on receipt of $1. The usual discount to trade. Address A. LOVEJOY, AMERICAN CARD COMPANY,
455 Broadway, N. Y., or 165 William Street, N. Y.

GLASS LETTERS & SIGNS

Glass and other Letters and Numbers for attaching to Windows, Doors, Signs, Transparencies, Gilding Signs and Show Cards, with frames, to order at low prices. Office 107 Fulton St., N. Y. GLASS LETTER CO.

AGENTS WANTED—Call and examine, or 10 samples sent free by mail for 30 cents, that retail for $5; wholesale, $2 per dozen. Address
R. L. WOLCOTT, 170 Chatham Square, N. Y.

DR. SAMUEL S. FITCH'S New and Improved TREATISE, ABDOMINAL SUPPORTERS, BANDAGES, SHOULDER BRACES, INHALING TUBES, &c. They are patented in the United States, ENGLAND, and SCOTLAND, and universally acknowledged to be the most perfect Instruments made. Persons requiring will do well to call and examine (or send for pamphlet) before purchasing. Office, 714 BROADWAY, N. Y.
PARKER COX & CO., N. Y.

Cristadoro's Hair Dye.

THE BEST IN THE WORLD.

Cristadoro's Hair Preservative.

Unequaled as a dressing. Both are sold everywhere, and applied at No. 6 Astor House, N. Y.

Watches and Jewelry.

CHEAPEST AND BEST yet offered to the public. For list of Articles and Prices, address
PARKER COX & CO., N. Y.

Barnard and Barry's Re, rt

Of the Engineer Military Operations of the Army of the Potomac, from its organization to the close of the Peninsular Campaign. By Brig.-Gen. BARNARD, Chief Engineer, and Brig.-Gen. BARRY, Chief of Artillery. Illustrated by 20 Maps and Plans. Octavo, cloth, $3 50. Copies sent free by mail on receipt of price. Published by D. VAN NOSTRAND, 192 Broadway, N. Y.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK,

Have Just Published:

ALCOCK'S JAPAN. The Capital of the Tycoon: a Narrative of a Three Years' Residence in Japan. By Sir Rutherford Alcock, K.C.B. In 2 vols. 12mo, cloth. Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary in Japan. With Maps and Illustrations. 12mo, cloth, $2 50.

KNAPP'S FRENCH READING-BOOK; CHRESTOMATHIE FRANÇAISE: Containing Selections from the best French Writers, with Copious References to the Author's French Grammar. By Dr. Charles Knapp. Molière, Racine, Corneille, and Voltaire; with Explanatory Notes, Biographical Memoirs of Eminent Men, and a Vocabulary. By William L. Knapp, Professor of Modern Languages and Literature in Malden University, N. Y. 12mo, cloth, $1 25.

THE BIVOUAC AND THE BATTLE-FIELD; or, Campaign Sketches in Virginia and Maryland. By Captain Charles F. Noyes. 18mo, cloth, 50 cents.

J. H. Winslow & Co.,

100,000

WATCHES, CHAINS, &c., &c.

Worth $500,000.

To be sold for One Dollar each, without regard to value, and not to be paid for till you know what you are to get.

SPLENDID LIST!!

OF ARTICLES TO BE SOLD FOR ONE DOLLAR EACH.

100 Gold Hunting Cased Watches	$100 00 each.
100 Gold Watches	60 00 each.
100 Ladies' Gold Watches	35 00 each.
100 Ladies' and Gent's Silver Watches	15 00 each.
5000 Vest and Neck Chains	5 00 to 10 00 each.
3000 Gold Hand Bracelets	5 00 to 8 00 each.
3000 "	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Cameo Brooches	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Mosaic and Jet Brooches	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Lava and Florentine Brooches	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Coral, Opal, and Em. Brooches	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Lamar Ear Drops	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Mosaic and Jet Ear Drops	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Lava and Florentine Ear Drops	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Coral, Em., and Opal Ear Drops	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Gent's Breast Pins	2 50 to 5 00 each.
3000 Watch Keys	2 00 to 4 00 each.
3000 Fob and Ribbon Slides	2 00 to 4 00 each.
3000 Sets of Boson Studs	2 50 to 4 00 each.
3000 Sleeve Buttons	2 50 to 4 00 each.
3000 Plain Rings	2 50 to 5 00 each.
6000 Stone Set Rings	2 00 to 4 00 each.
6000 Lockets	2 00 to 10 00 each.
5000 Sets Ladies' Jewelry	5 00 to 10 00 each.
10000 Gold Pens, Silver Mounted Holders	4 00 to 5 00 each.
10000 Gold Pens, with Silver Extension Cases and Pencils	4 00 to 6 00 each.

All of the above list of Goods will be sold for one dollar each. Certificates of all the various articles, of which each one can have, are first put into envelopes, sealed up, and mixed; and when ordered, are taken out without regard to choice, and sent by mail, thus giving all a fair chance. On receipt of the Certificate, you will see what you can have, and then it is at your option to send one dollar and take the article or not.

In all transactions with us, we shall charge for forwarding the Certificates, paying postage, and doing the business, 25 cents each, which must be inclosed when the Certificate is sent for. Five Certificates will be sent for $1; eleven for $2; thirty for $5; sixty-five for $10; one hundred for $15.

AGENTS.—Those acting as Agents will be allowed ten cents on every Certificate ordered by them, provided their remittals amounts to one dollar. Agents will collect 25 cents for every Certificate, and remit 15 cents to us, either in cash or postage stamps. Great caution should be used by our correspondents in regard to giving their correct address, Town, County, and State. Address

J. H. WINSLOW & CO.,
203 Broadway, New York.

Printing Office for $12.

Every Man his own Printer.

THE LOVELL IMPROVED PRINTING PRESSES are the best and cheapest portable Card and Job Presses ever invented, and have been awarded Silver Medals and Diplomas. Merchants, Druggists, and others, are saving a MAKING MONEY by using them. Cards, Bill-Heads, Circulars, Labels, &c., can be printed at a trifling expense. Price of Press: $7, $12, $18, and $27. Price of an Office, with Press, $12, 25, 35, and $45. Send for a Circular.

LOWE PRESS CO., 13 Water Street, Boston.

$200! $150! $100! $50!

PREMIUMS.

To Editors and Others!

I will pay the above-named amounts for the best four articles on either my Soap, Saleratus, or Concentrated Potash.

The article must state the writer's experience in using the goods, and must be less than ten lines long. It will be published in the editorial columns of any good family newspaper.

Any party wishing to compete for the above, and desiring further information, may address the undersigned. Each person writing and publishing a notice as above, will mail a marked copy of the paper containing the notice to me, and also write me by mail, giving full address.

The Premiums will be awarded on the fourth day of July, 1864. B. T. BABBITT.

64 to 74 Washington Street, New York.

National Union League, Army Corps and Regimental Badges.

We are now prepared to furnish League Pins; also, Army Corps and Regimental Badges of every description, in Solid Silver, Solid Gold, and Plated. Also a large assortment of Jewelry.

E. N. FOOTE & CO., Manufacturers of Jewelry,
203 Broadway, New York.

Sportsmen, Tourists, and Army and Navy Officers.

Powerful and Brilliant Double Glasses.

Portability combined with great power in Lemaire, Marine, Theatre's, Opera, and general out-door use. Also, all other descriptive glasses, suitable for every purpose. Every shop in town or city has 5 to 6 inferior. Spectacles of the greatest transparent power to strengthen and improve the sight, without the distressing result of frequent changes. Catalogue sent by enclosing stamp.

SEMMONS, Oculist—Optician,
609½ Broadway, New York.

Printing-Press for Sale.

One Taylor Double Cylinder, five Rollers, Table Distribution, Bed 38×51. Price $3500.
Apply to HARPER & BROTHERS, 329 Pearl St., N.Y.

Meeks' Cabinet and Furniture Warehouse,
No. 699 BROADWAY, and 333 and 335 Fourth Street.

The largest assortment of rich and plain furniture in the city, made of the very best well-seasoned and selected material, by the best workmen in the country, under the immediate superintendence of the firm, whose reputation for excellence of manufacture has been established seventy years. Also, an assortment of superior COTTAGE FURNITURE. ☞ Goods packed and shipped to all parts of the world.

Head-Quarters for Army Corps or Co. Fins.

Agents wanted in every Regiment, Hospital, and on board every Naval Vessel. For $1, will send you as sample, with a Circular giving full instructions to Agents, either a Fine Gold Pen and Pencil, or a beautiful New Style Vest Chain, or Chatelaine Chain and Pin, or Guard Chain, or an Engraved Sering Locket, or a Seal Stone, California Diamond, or Cloud Stone, or a fine Gold, California Diamond Pin, or a new Style Set of Jewelry, or a solid Silver Shield, or other Army Corps, Division, or Company Pin, with your Name, Co. and Reg., handsomely engraved upon it, or a Keatney Cross in Gold Pin. Any article, for choice, I will send a beautiful Union League Pin, in fine Gold Plate.
B. T. HAYWARD, Manufacturing Jeweler, 208 Broadway, N. Y. Box 4976.

EXTRA AND BEST

Inducements yet offered to Agents to sell our New Card Thermometers—Magic Tobacco Boxes—Venetian Barometers—Solitaire Smoking Pipes—Lucky Crystal Cosmetics—Ice strainers—Pocket Match Safes—Self-repairing Steam Fixtures—Shadetacy and Yankee Notion "Fits" Packages.

Send for New Circulars and be convinced. Address
RICHARDS & CO., Inventors and Manufacturers,
No. 5 Liberty Street, P. O. Box 3133, N. Y.

P. S. Parties wishing to purchase Shadetacy, Yankee Notions, Cheap Jewelry, &c., or to put up "Free Packages" themselves, we will furnish with three Goods at the lowest Wholesale Cash prices.

HUBBARD BRO'S
IMPORTERS OF WATCHES
NEW YORK.

Are offering the cheapest, most accurate, durable, and valuable Watches in the American market! They are the sole consignees in this country for the celebrated

Magic Time Observers,

The Perfection of Mechanism!
Being a Handsome Open Face, or Lady's or Gentleman's Watch combined, with Patent Self-winding Improvement.

A most desirable Watch for Travelers. One of the prettiest, most convenient, and decidedly the best and cheapest timepiece for general use, that has ever offered. A Watch in which is and connected with its machinery its own winding attachment, rendering a key entirely unnecessary. The cases of this Watch are composed of two metals, the outer one being that of Gold, and the inner a peculiar fine action lever movement, and is warranted an accurate timekeeper. Price, handsomely engraved, per case of 3 cases, $20. Sample watches in neat morocco boxes, $25. If sent by mail, the postage is 10 cents; registering, 10 cents.

Silver Watches!

First-Class Hunting Time-Pieces.

FOR ACCURACY OF MOVEMENT, BEAUTY OF MATERIAL, AND, ABOVE ALL, CHEAPNESS IN PRICE, THESE WATCHES MUST INSURE

UNIVERSAL APPROBATION!

An imitation so faultless that it can hardly be detected by the most experienced judges. The material lining of two metals, the outer one fine quality Silver and the inner one German Silver, it can not be recognized by cutting. "heavy metal," as it is not over an ounce and a half in weight, the solid resemblance of Solid Silver Watches.

The sale of these watches in the army is a source of enormous profit, retailing at their very cheapness, at $25 and upward. Many hundred dollars can be made in a single day by any one of ordinary business tact.

At WHOLESALE ONLY! In hunting cases, beveled, fully engraved, with dial, second hand, and fancy dial hands, in good running order, by the half dozen, $60; postage, 40 cents. Sample watch, $12, sent only by the case. Can be safely sent by mail.

Our Agents have on novelties produced by no other house, combining greater accuracy as timekeepers, being more elaborately and tastefully finished, and offered at prices challenging competition from all other hands.

The press in all parts of the country voluntarily attest the superiority of our watches. Their uncommon sale on the American, equally as the public, in a manner not to be mistaken.

Particularly valuable for officers in the army, and travelers.—Frank Leslie's, Feb. 21.

"Perfect, neat, and cheapest time-pieces ever offered."—N. Y. Illustrated News, Jan. 10.

"Exceed other manufactures in point of accuracy and elegance."—Phila. Army and Navy Gazette, May 9.

"An improvement on ordinary timepieces, and invaluable for railroad men."—N. Y. Am. Railroad Journal, Aug. 9.

"Elaborately and artistically finished."—N. Y. Scientific American, July 25.

"Combine great accuracy as timekeepers."—Pittsburg, Pa., Chronicle, July 20.

"Very pretty and durable watches for the army."—N. Y. Army and Navy Journal, Government organ, July 25.

"One of the oldest and most reliable houses in business."—Louisville, Ky., Journal, July 31.

☞ TERMS CASH; INVARIABLY IN ADVANCE. No agents employed. Watches sent by express safely with an accuracy is sent or by express or mail in a registered letter, if it is preferred. Orders will receive the most prompt and faithful attention.

HUBBARD BROS., Sole Importers,
Broadway, cor. Courtlandt St., New York.

The Beard Harness.

I am a discharged Indiana Volunteer. I will tell in a printed letter what I know of the shrub juice or balsam with which a South woman steamed the face of Gen. Schaffer, 18 years old, gashed by a sabre cut at the battle of Stone River. With the same balsam a black fire-mark. It is a bitterish balsam, and has the remarkable power of making hair grow on bald heads, &c., to some forth coming fresh and strong, upon the smoothest face and the baldest head. For said package, &c. (God), address JOHN RAWLINS, 767 Broadway, N. Y.

Portable Printing Offices.

For sale by the ADAMS PRESS CO., 81 Park Row, New York. Circulars sent free. Specimen Sheets of Type, Cuts, &c., 6 cents, and also for sale by CHASE & LEAVITT, 35 Lincoln Street, Boston, Mass.

$60 A MONTH.—We want Agents at $60 a month, Expenses paid, to sell our Everlasting Pencils, Gold Pens, Pencil Cases, and other articles. Circulars sent free. SHAW & CLARK, Biddeford, Maine.

Soldiers' COMPANY PINS.

Constantly on hand and Engraved to Order, and sent free on receipt of Price.

Every Co. from A to M Solid Silver, $1.
Soli. Silver, with Letters in GOLD Relief, $1 50.
Solid 18 k. GOLD, $4 50.

Corps Badges

Sent free by Mail or Express on receipt of Price.

Solid Silver, $1 50. Enamled. Solid Silver, $1 50. Enamled.

Solid Gold, $5. Solid Gold, $5.

Badges for the 1st, 2d, 3d, 5th, 6th, 11th, and 12th Army Corps.

1st Division Enameled Red, 2d Division White, 3d Division Blue.

None but perfect Goods sent.

Terms Cash in advance. Send for a Catalogue.
Address J. G. PACKARD & CO.,
203 Broadway, New York.

Accordeons and Flutinas, NEW QUALITY, 8 keys $7 50; 11 keys $9; 13 keys $9 50; 8s keys (double) $8 to $11; 16½ keys (double) $5 to $9. Flutinas $8 to $25. Music Books 8% cents. Sent by express to any part of country. Musical Instruments repaired.
FREDERICK BLUME, 293 Bowery, N. Y.

$10 AGENTS WANTED. $10
To sell Something New. Send stamp for Circular. B. W. RICE & CO., 83 Nassau Street, N. Y.

$1 VAN ANDEN'S ONE DOLLAR PORTABLE COPYING PRESS. $1
Acknowledged by all who have used it to be, in all respects, unequaled. Sent free by mail. Liberal discount to agents and the trade. HANNAH & CO., No. 104 John St., N. Y. Room No. 1. Send 3 ct. stamp for circular.

A Splendid Holiday or Bridal Present.

HARPER'S
Illuminated and Pictorial
BIBLE

Including the Apocrypha. Superbly embellished by over Sixteen Hundred Illustrations, exquisitely engraved by Adams after Designs by Chapman, exclusive of a Series of Rich Illuminations in Colors, comprising Frontispieces, Presentation Plate, Family Record, Title-pages, &c. The whole forming a sumptuous Folio Volume.

PRICES.—Morocco, gilt edges, beveled and panneled sides, $20 00; Morocco extra, gilt edges, $22 00; Full calf, marbled edges, blank stamped, $18 00; Full Roan, marbled edges, $15 00.

Harper's Pictorial Bible is printed from the standard copy of the American Bible Society, and contains Marginal References, the Apocrypha, a Concordance, Chronological Table, List of Proper Names, General Index, Table of Weights, Measures, &c. The large Frontispieces, Titles to the Old and New Testaments, Family Record, Presentation Plate, Historical Illustrations, and Initial Letters to chapters, Tailpieces, &c., are from new designs, made expressly for this edition, by J. G. Chapman, Esq., of New York. In addition to which, there are numerous large Engravings, from designs by eminent French artists in France and Engaged to which a full Index is given.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers, New York.

For sale by A. WILLIAMS & CO., Boston; SMITH, ENGLISH & CO., Philadelphia; CORNMAN & SELLERS, Baltimore; DERBY, TAYLOR, Washington; ROBERT CLARKE & CO., Cincinnati; KEITH & WOODWORTH, Chicago; GEO. H. CO., Cleveland; HARPER & BROTHERS, Montreal.

☞ Sent by mail, postage free, on receipt of Price.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK,

Have just published.

MARTIN POLE. A Novel. By JOHN SAUNDERS, Author of "Abel Drake's Wife," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

ELEANOR'S VICTORY. A Novel. By MRS. BRADDON, Author of "Aurora Floyd," "John Marchmont's Legacy," &c. With Illustrations. 8vo, paper, 50 cents.

THE RING OF AMASIS. From the Papers of a Gentleman Physician. By ROBERT DEVEREUX LEVEUX (Cowel Merciful). 12mo, Cloth, $1 00.

DAILY WALK WITH WISE MEN. Religious Exercises for Every Day in the Year. Compiled, Translated, and specially Adapted, by REV. NELSON HEAD. Large 12mo, Cloth, $1 00.

HARPER'S
NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE

TERMS.

One Copy for one Year	$3 00
Two Copies for One Year	5 00

And an Extra Copy gratis. Any person a Club of Ten Subscribers, at $2 50 each, or 11 Copies for $25 00.

Back Numbers and Harper's Weekly, together, one year, $5 00.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS.

Circulation over 100,000.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

Single Copies Six Cents.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year	$3 00
One Copy for Two Years	5 00

And an Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of Ten Subscribers, at $2 50 each, or 11 Copies for $25 00.

Back Numbers and Harper's Weekly, together, one year, $5 00.

Postage.—Harper's Weekly will be delivered to subscribers in the United States, free of postage, for 26 cents per year, or 13 cents for six months, which must be paid quarterly or half-yearly in advance at the office where received. The postage on Harper's Weekly to Canada is 52 cents per year, which must be paid at the office where received. The postage on Harper's Weekly to California, Oregon, Washington Territory, or any part of the Pacific Republic, is 52 cents per year, which must be paid at the office where received.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS.

THE STATE ELECTIONS.

PENNSYLVANIA. "Friend Otto, I thought thee hadst got rid of this noxious weed, as I of mine; and yet I see an ugly Pumpkin growing upon thy land."

Otto. "Not upon my land, I guess! It's the VALLANDIGHAM PUMPKIN as I've tossed over into my neighbor's field, and he's bin and tuck root, you see, among the Canady thistles!"

E. & H. T. ANTHONY,
Manufacturers of Photographic Materials.
501 Broadway, New York.

Card Photographs.
Our Catalogue now embraces considerably over
FOUR THOUSAND
different subjects (to which additions are continually being made), consists of Eminent Americans, etc., viz.:

72 Major-Generals,	285 Statesmen,
100 Brigadier-Generals,	127 Divines,
25 Colonels,	116 Authors,
81 Lieut.-Colonels,	20 Artists,
207 Other Officers,	172 Stage,
40 Officers of the Navy,	40 Prominent Women,
147 Prominent Foreign Portraits.

2,500 COPIES OF WORKS OF ART.
INCLUDING REPRODUCTIONS OF THE MOST CELEBRATED ENGRAVINGS, PAINTINGS, STATUES, ETC.
Catalogues sent on receipt of Stamp.
An order for One Dozen PICTURES from our Catalogue will be filled on receipt of $1 00, and sent by mail, free.

Photographic Albums.
Of these we manufacture a great variety, ranging in price from 50 cents to $30 each.
Our ALBUMS have the reputation of being superior in beauty and durability to any others.
The smaller kinds can be sent safely by mail at a postage of six cents per oz.
The more expensive can be sent by express.

We also keep a large assortment of
Stereoscopes & Stereoscopic Views.
Our Catalogue of these will be sent to any address on receipt of Stamp.

E. & H. T. ANTHONY,
MANUFACTURERS OF PHOTOGRAPHIC MATERIALS,
501 Broadway, New York.

Friends or relatives of prominent military men will confer a favor by sending us their likenesses to copy. They will be kept carefully, and returned uninjured.

☞ FINE ALBUMS MADE TO ORDER for Congregations to present to their Pastor, or for other purposes, with suitable inscriptions, &c.

IF YOU WANT TO BE CURED OF Piles, External or Internal, L.Y.D.S.
Spring is the time to use DR. LEATHES'
YELLOW DOCK SYRUP,
Which Purifies the Blood, Invigorates the Body, gives Tone to the Nerves, Strength to the Muscles, and Health to every Channel, Limb, and Limb.
One Dollar per Bottle (which often cures).
Depot, 130 CHATHAM ST., N. Y. Sold 500 GRAND ST.
Ask for LEATHE'S YELLOW DOCK SYRUP. Take no other. Established 1845. Sold by Druggists everywhere.

VINELAND.
LANDS.—TO ALL WANTING FARMS.—Large and thriving settlement, mild and healthful climate, 30 miles south of Philadelphia by railroad. Rich soil, produces large crops, which can now be seen growing. Twenty and fifty acre tracts, at from $15 to $20 per acre, payable within four years. Good business opening for Mantua-makers and shoe, clothing, millinery, and general trade. It is now the most improving place East or West. Hundreds are settling and building. The beauty with which the place is laid out is unsurpassed. Letters answered. Papers containing reports and giving full information will be sent free. Address CHAS. K. LANDIS, Vineland Post Office, Cumberland County, New Jersey.
From Report of Silas Robinson, Agricultural Editor of the TRIBUNE.—"It is one of the most extensive fruit tracts, in an almost level position and suitable condition—the pleasant feeling that we knew of this side of the Western prairies.

PREPARE FOR THE HOLIDAYS.
There is no Gift, or Present, which compares with the Craig Microscope and Mounted Objects. As a source of amusement and instruction they are unsurpassed. The Microscope will be mailed, postage paid, for $2·75; or with 6 beautiful mounted objects, for $3; or with 24 objects, for $5.
Address HENRY CRAIG,
202 Broadway, New York.
A liberal discount to the trade.

FISK & HATCH.
Bankers and Dealers in Government Securities,
AND
AGENTS FOR THE UNITED STATES
FIVE-TWENTY LOAN,
No. 38 Wall Street.

Miss Kate Denin,
The celebrated actress, says: "I have used HENRIN'S KAMALEON for my hair, and find it the most elegant article for keeping it in its full beauty and luxuriance that I have ever used. I can freely recommend it to every lady."
It contains no oil, alcohol, or any other injurious ingredients, and is the most perfect hair-dressing in the world.
Price 50 cents. Depot 46 Cliff Street, N. Y.

FISH'S PATENT LAMP HEATING APPARATUS
Boiling, Frying, Stewing—Steeping with the flame that lights the room.
Every Family should have One.
For descriptive Pamphlet and Price List, address W. D. RUSSELL, Agent, 996 Pearl St., N. Y. Agents wanted.

Pins for every Co. from A to M.
Annexed is a fac-simile design of the SOLDIER'S COMPANY PIN. The letter representing the COMPANY is in BOLD RELIEF, and very conspicuous.
The undersigned will forward to any soldier one of the above pins in solid silver, with name and regiment clearly engraved thereon, on receipt of One Dollar.
Address J. G. PACKARD & CO., 298 Broadway, N. Y.

FINE DRESS SHIRTS TO ORDER.
UNRIVALED
In Manufacture, Fitting, and Material.
At UNION ADAMS, No. 637 Broadway.

GUNS, PISTOLS, Military Goods,
FRENCH AND ENGLISH FANCY GOODS.
Also, a full assortment of
Jet, Coral, and Steel Goods.
Schuyler, Hartley & Graham,
19 Maiden Lane & 22 John Street, N. Y.,
15 Rue d'Enghein, Paris,
47 Hampton St., Birmingham, Eng.

IVORY SLEEVE BUTTONS
OR STUDS—Red, White, and Black, engraved with initials, 75c. per pair, will be sent free on receipt of the price. For sale by THE H. WELLING, manufacturer of Ivory goods, 296 Centre St., N. Y., sign of the Golden Elephant. A liberal discount to the trade.

LOOK OUT for the "GHOST OF WELL-DEAN."—The most exciting, mirth-provoking story of the age, just published by IRWIN P. BEADLE & CO., No. 137 William St., New York. This thrilling narrative is such a happy combination of the Tragical, Ludicrous, and Marvelous, that Artemus Ward will assuredly give up the Ghost from sheer envy after once reading it. For sale by all News Agents. Price 10 cents. Sent, postage paid, on receipt of price.

American Enamelled
Metallic Collar Co.,
No. 94 Pine Street, New York.
Are now manufacturing their splendid Collars, which for shape, appearance, and durability are FAR IN ADVANCE of anything heretofore produced.
They are the inventors and manufacturers of the only real "TURN-OVER" COLLAR ever offered.
These Collars are infinitely SUPERIOR TO STEEL, being more pliable, and the material of which they are manufactured BEING A NON-CONDUCTOR, renders them free from the objectionable feature of the steel collar, viz.: the exciting of that dangerous element, electricity, in the shape of lightning. Incase $1 for a "Choker," or $1 50 for a genuine "half turn-over" collar, to the AMERICAN ENAMELED METALLIC COLLAR COMPANY, Box No. 3178 New York City Post Office, and receive it by return mail.

$35 WATCHES. $35
Genuine Full-Jeweled American Lever Watches, in 4 Ounce Coin Silver Hunting Cases, Gold Joints, for $35.
Also every variety of good Watches at equally low rates: All orders from the Army must be pre-paid, as the Express Companies will not take bills for collection on soldiers.
J. L. FERGUSON, Importer of Watches.
208 Broadway New York.

DR. B. C. PERRY,
DERMATOLOGIST,
49 Bond Street, New York,
Formerly of 29 Winter Street, Boston, treats successfully all Diseases of the Scalp, Loss of Hair, and Premature Baldness. Also, removes Moth Patches, and other Discolorations from the face, without injury to the texture or color of the skin.
For particulars enclose stamp for Circular.

Shults' Onguent, warranted to produce a full set of Whiskers in six weeks, or money refunded. Sent postpaid, for 26 cents. Address C. F. SHULTS, Troy, N. Y.

$7 WATCHES. $7.
A Beautiful Engraved Gold-Plated WATCH, Lever Cap, small size, English Movements, perfect time-keeper. Sent free by mail, in neat case, for only $7. A Solid Silver, same as above, $7. Specially adapted to the ARMY. CHAS. P. NORTON & CO., 26 & 40 Ann Street, N. Y.
Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper, of Aug. 22, says: "CHAS. P. NORTON & CO. have combined two very desirable things in a watch—cheapness and reliability. What it is better, is that for $7 a person can have an excellent timekeeper, there will be greater punctuality in all the affairs of life."

MUNN & CO.,
Solicitors of American and Foreign Patents,
And Publishers of the ILLUSTRATED SCIENTIFIC AMERICAN. 37 Park Row, N. Y. Pamphlets of information concerning Patents, FREE. Specimens of the Paper, FREE.

WATCHES FREE.
$15 Per Day Easy $15
Agents in Town, and Soldiers in camp or discharged, are making easily $15 per day selling our GREAT NEW AND BEAUTIFUL GOLD PRIZE GIFT ENTERPRISE PACKAGES, NOVEL AND UNEQUALED, and unlike all else on sight, containing all of New Articles, and of the quality. Writing Materials, Games, Useful and Fancy Articles, Likenesses of Heroes, Camp Companions (for the Army), rich gifts of Jewelry, &c., &c., altogether worth over $1, for only 25c. They are just the thing to present to your friend in the Army. So finely should they sell. Credit immense, sales quick. Gold watches among ones sent as Agents, and make money fast. A SPLENDID WATCH guaranteed as a perfect time-keeper, presented free to all Agents. Packages in endless variety and at all prices. Agents wanted all through the country. Send for NEW Circulars for 1863, containing EXTRA inducements. See "15 per day" on inside page.
S. C. HICKARDS & CO., 102 Nassau Street, New York, largest out-door Sale Dealers in the World.

GOLD PENS AND CASES.
Retailed at wholesale prices. 14 kt. Gold Pen, Solid Silver Case, $1 50, warranted for one year, guarantee accompanying each Pen. Send for a circular. Pens reported on receipt of 25 cents.
GEO. A. JOHNSON, 15 Maiden Lane, N. Y.

Amalgam Bells.

Cheapest and best for Churches, Schools, Farms, Factories, &c. Equal in tone and durability to any other metal, and two-thirds less in price, or 15 cts. per lb. Send for a circular to the manufacturer, John B. Rossman, Isle Phila. Bell Foundry and Machine Co., 100 William St., N.Y.

A Beautiful Complexion free from Tan, Pimples and Freckles, may easily be procured by using the "BALM OF THOUSAND FLOWERS." For sharing it is unsurpassed. Removes all roughness of skin, and other valuable articles, highly perfumed by its own ingredients, and also used for washing, rapid and certain, renders the skin soft and white, and free from blemish. Price 50 cents.
The Trade supplied by HOWARD, SANGER & CO., 199 and 197 Chatahem Street, N. Y., and for sale by all Druggists.

Learn to Skate in One Hour by using The American Parlor Or Floor Skate, Hard Rubber Rollers, Anti-friction Axles.
Frederick Stevens,
215 Park Street, New York.
68 Kilby Street, Boston.

A BEAUTIFUL MICROSCOPE
For the Waistcoat Pocket, magnifying objects 500 times. Five of different powers for $1 60. Mailed free. Address F. U. BOWEN, Box 2520, Boston, Mass.

Helmbold's Extract Buchu
Cures Diabetes.
Helmbold's Extract Buchu
Cures Gravel Brick-dust Deposits.
Helmbold's Extract Buchu
Cures Irritation of the Bladder.
Helmbold's Extract Buchu.
Helmbold's Extract Buchu
Cures Inflammation of the Kidneys.
Helmbold's Extract Buchu
Cures Catarrh of the Bladder.
Helmbold's Extract Buchu
Helmbold's Extract Buchu
Cures Diseases Arising from Exposure or Imprudence.
Helmbold's Extract Buchu
Cures Nervous Diseases and Prostration of the System,
From whatever cause originating, and whether existing in either sex.
Helmbold's Extract Buchu
Is safe and pleasant in Taste and Odor. Diseases of those organs require the aid of a Diuretic.
Helmbold's Extract Buchu,
Is the Great Diuretic
Strengthening, Blood Purifying, and Invigorating.
Certificates from well-known persons in all parts of the country, in book form, giving the full descriptions, the cases and the mode of treatment, will be forwarded on receipt of a three-cent postage stamps.
It is a book of 100 pages.
Price of medicine $1 per bottle, or six for $5. D. Ilreet to any address.
Direct letters to
HELMBOLD'S Medical Depot, No. 104 South 10th St., Philadelphia.
Sold by Druggists generally.
Beware of Counterfeits.
Ask for HELMBOLD'S. Take no other.

NATIONAL BATTLE PIN.

M'Clellan, Grant, Burnside, Meade, Gillmore, Barnside, Hooker, Foster, and Rosecrans. All are the same pattern as the cut, only differ in battle-grounds and date. Perfect photograph likenes in each pin. Plated in bronze and heat in fine gold. By enclosing $1, a sample will be sent by mail. A gents wanted in and out the army. The undersigned has the exclusive right of manufacture, and the inventor of this beautiful keepsake and reward of gallant acts.
LOUIS PHILLIP, 609 Broadway, N. Y.

Something New!—Every Family and every Soldier must have it. Retail price $1. For an Agency address A. B. BALLOU & SON, HAVERHILL, MASS.
☞ Samples mailed to Agents for 50 cents

Stimson's Improved Checker Boards, with Instructions, Rules of the Game, &c. $2 00 per dozen; retails at 50 cents. For sale by
GEO. A. OLNEY, 46 John Street, N. Y.

Fogg's Double-Action Patent Lever Stump Handle.
Manufactured and for sale on Straps, at wholesale, by F. STEVENS, Manufacturer of Skates, Straps, and Leather Goods, 215 Pearl Street, New York, 68 Kilby Street, Boston.

AGENTS WANTED.—$5 positively made from 20 sales. A urgently needed by every person. Call and examine. Ten samples sent free by mail for 20 cts.; retails for $2. H. L. WOLCOTT, 110 Chatham Square, N. Y.

A Household Word.—Buy your Housekeeping Articles at HASSOUIN'S, Cooper Institute, New York.

WANTED! WANTED!
Do you want Splendid Whiskers or Moustaches?
HUNTER'S ONGUENT will force them to grow heavily in six weeks, on any smooth face without fail, or no charge to the skin. Also on Bald Heads in ten weeks. Two Boxes for $1 00. Postage free. Address
C. HUNTER & CO., Box 674, Milwaukee, Wis.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

Vol. VII.—No. 358.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 7, 1863. [SINGLE COPIES SIX CENTS. $3.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1863, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

THE ARMY OF THE CUMBERLAND—A TROOP TRAIN PASSING THROUGH THE BIG CUT ON THE LOUISVILLE AND NASHVILLE RAILROAD.—[SEE PAGE 711.]

THE GALLOP OF DEATH.

TANTARA, tan-ta-ra, tan-ta-ra, tan-ta-ra!
"Boots and saddles!—quick, quick! Now mount and away!
Look sharp and ride fast; that's the word. Hip, hurrah!
We must catch them asleep at the dawning of day!"

Now they noisily dash through the rippling stream,
Now silently gallop along the soft sand;
Then off with a bound through the woods, where no gleam
Of star-light shines through, rides the brave, gallant band!

"Now slowly and steadily. Hist!—not a word!"—
'Tis the sentinel sleepily passing his beat.
The murderous smile of a satire is heard,
And he falls with a groan at the first horse's feet.

"Draw rein! Now charge, boys! No powder to-night!"
Rings the voice of the chief, while the loud bugles blare
Mid the clashing of swords, striking flashes of light,
And the fiery wheel-horses, and the yells of despair.

'Twas a brave work done by that gallant band!
Let their deeds be sounded on every breath
Of wind that blows o'er our glorious land!
And this be the song of the Gallop of Death!

Tan-ta-ra-ta!

Hip, hip—hurrah!
'Tis the bugle's stirring call—
Mount, boys, mount,
And never count
What will be your chance to fall.
On, boys, on, till the morning sun
Gleams on our flag, and the victor's won!

It matters not
If a rebel shot
Fat an end to our fleeting breath—
Ride, boys, ride,
And buck bridle
Those who ride the Gallop of Death!
On, boys, on, till the morning sun
Gleams on our flag, and the victor's won!

With ringing clash,
And lightning flash,
We'll strike a righteous blow;
And let the shout
Ring loudly out,
As we smite the traitors low.
On, boys, on, till the morning sun
Gleams on our flag, and the victor's won!

And when 'tis done,
And the victory won,
We'll gayly march to camp;
And joyous song,
As we ride along,
Keep time to our horses' tramp.
On, boys, on, till the morning sun
Will smile on us and the brave work done!

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 7, 1863.

THE WINTER CAMPAIGN.

FROM Washington comes once more the weary report that the campaign in Virginia is at an end. In November, say the strategists, Virginia mud is impracticable. The only episode of the fall campaign has been a rapid and successful attempt to outflank Meade or to force him to fight on the banks of the Rappahannock. Having failed in this, the rebel chief has fallen back to his old quarters, within easy reach of Richmond and Staunton, having lost in his brief enterprise about as many men as we did, and minus four or five guns, against which last loss he has no set-off. The Richmond editors do not seem well pleased with the result, on the whole, and we are not surprised at it. Whether, as is assumed at Washington, the campaign in Virginia is really over is not very certain to our mind. Virginia mud is no doubt very deep and very creative, but is it much more difficult to navigate than the swamps of the Mississippi, through which Grant and Banks marched their armies in victory? Of the progress of marching forward at once to give Lee battle where he is, the President and General Meade must be much better judges than we are. But one does not need to be much of a soldier to see that if Lee sends any considerable portion of his army to reinforce Bragg in the Southwest it will be possible for Meade to attack him in his position in Virginia, mud or no mud, and that he ought on no account to fail to do so.

So far as we have discerned, however, the true key, in a military sense, to the rebel position is in the Southwest. It is doubtful whether the conquest of all Virginia, including of course Richmond, would really impair the capacity of the rebels to continue the war, so long as they held the more southern States. To lose Richmond would be a very serious loss, both in a moral aspect, but likewise in view of the stores and work-shops established there. But it would not be fatal. Raleigh would answer every purpose of a Confederate capitol, and the rebels have shown that they can build foundries and cast shot and shell any where. Thus far, with the single exception of the capture of Vicksburg, it is questionable whether all our operations in Virginia from the commencement of the war to the present time, have yielded any permanent advantage to the Union cause.

Very different with our operations in the West. There, every blow struck has told. Every Union success has visibly weakened the capacity of the rebels for further resistance. The loss of New Orleans, the loss of Nashville, the loss of Vicksburg, the loss of the Mississippi, the loss of Chattanooga—these are losses to them irreparable, sending each of them directly to render it impossible for them to protract the war. A few more such successes will render this tendency imperative.

Our military policy in the West is very simple. We hold the river. That we must continue to hold, and are preparing to do so by a system of forts garrisoned mainly with negro troops, and connected together by gun-boats. Every bluff from Cairo to New Orleans is being fortified; gun-boats patrol the river from end to end, almost within sight of each other: so that, when the work is complete, it will be impossible to wrest it out of our hands, though guerrillas will of course continue to annoy unarmed vessels for a long time to come.

Then we hold Chattanooga and the two lines of communication therewith—one to Nashville through Tullahoma and Murfreesboro, the other to Memphis through Stevenson, Huntsville, Florence, and Corinth. These long lines we must keep. We must be prepared to bear almost daily attacks on them by rebel raiders, of bridges burned, trains captured, tracks torn up. These injuries we must patiently repair, and punish the raiders whenever we can catch them: bearing in mind, as a consolation, that however annoying these raids may be to us they are of no use to the rebels, and do not invalidate the fact that the two last the two central roads through the heart of the Confederacy, and are every day gradually, by our mere occupancy, crushing out its life.

This is, however, only the beginning of what we have to do. Chattanooga must become, by-and-by, the base of a new military operation into Georgia—the object of which will be a junction with the land army of Gilmore at or near Savannah or Charleston. Success in this operation presupposes the defeat of Bragg by Grant, and the capture of Charleston by Gilmore—both of them operations of great difficulty, as we have all learned by this time. But Gilmore and Grant will need more men than they have; more guns, and more supplies. But they are getting more men, guns, and supplies, and pretty soon the campaign will open. How soon it will end, or how many campaigns it will take to achieve the purpose, no one can tell, and few inquire: for every one knows that, no matter how long it takes, the work will be steadily prosecuted till it is completed. When Gilmore and Grant shall have joined hands in South Carolina, the second bisection of the Confederacy will be complete, and we shall then be glad to hear from the Richmond Enquirer on the subject of peace.

ONE POINT GAINED.

THE steady abuse which has been poured upon this country by the British press since the war began has conferred upon us an inestimable benefit. It has enfranchised us from the condition of quasi-colonial dependence—as to public opinion—in which we had previously existed. Before the war, abuse England and Englishmen as we might, we all secretly feared and respected British opinion. No matter how paper wielded as much power in our educated circles as the London Times. The articles of that journal were usually republished in our dailies, were eagerly read, and very generally accepted as a guide of conduct by intelligent Americans. And from the days of Canning to the greatest we were used to being led by England. When the London Times expressed a preference in a Presidential contest, its candidate's prospects rose instantly. When it denounced us from the mandates of the foreign journal; and the public scarcely dared receive a definitive verdict on a book, or a play, or a picture, until the great British papers had pronounced on the subject. Neither the War of Revolution nor the War of 1812 succeeded in emancipating us from the control of the Mother Country in matters of opinion, judgment, and taste.

It was reserved for the Slavery Rebellion to complete our intellectual freedom. We have confessed that it has done the work pretty thoroughly. Every American who reads any thing at all can now accurately estimate the London Times and most of the other British journals are, in the first place, so ignorant of this country that their opinions are valueless; and, secondly, so brutally hostile to our institutions that their counsels should be regarded as the sneers of an enemy. There is hardly a prediction that has been made by the leading London journals which has not been falsified. There is not a suggestion that has found place in them which we would not indignantly reject. They have learned by this time that the Potomac does not empty into the Mississippi, and that Vicksburg's not on the Hudson. But they have not learned not to hate us, and not to wish for our ruin.

The consequence is that we have at length achieved our independence, and are as indifferent to British opinion as we have always been to French or German opinion. No French or German criticism of our policy or our habits ever annoyed us. And now we care as little about British criticism. Our journals no longer publish the abusive articles of the London Times, for nobody cares to read them. It is taken for granted, that whatever is said about us in England will be false, mean, unjust, and ill-natured; and nobody cares about seeing the precise form of abuse adopted. Henceforth we shall pay no more attention to what the English think or say than we do to the views of the Dutch or the Spaniards.

This is a great point gained, and really lays us under obligations to the London press. Nothing was more injurious to the development of independent national thought than the craven, semi-colonial deference to British views which used to prevail in this country. We shall hear no more now of what the London Times says on this or that subject, or what the British Reviews have decided on this or that book, policy, picture, or play. We are going over to do our own thinking. For this great boon let us be duly thankful.

AMERICAN INDUSTRY.

THE steady advance in the price of manufactured goods imported from abroad should secure to our manufacturers an era of unexampled prosperity. All kinds of dry goods and hardware, for instance, imported from England, have advanced, since the war began, from 75 to 150 per cent. With the exception of cotton, there has been no corresponding advance in the cost of the raw material; and labor, though more valuable than it was, has not risen in an equal ratio. The fact is, the tariff was advanced at the commencement of the war from an average of 20 per cent. to an average of 30 per cent., and the duties being payable in gold, the actual duty has averaged 40 or 45 per cent.

If legislation and natural favors can develop manufacturing industry in this country, we ought now to become independent of the world. There is not a manufactured article used in any house in the United States which can not now be made cheaper in this country than it can be imported from abroad. Labor is not a tool, or an article of wearing apparel, which free trade can not produce at a lower price than it will cost to procure a similar article from Europe. If our manufacturers have the energy, they will now drive the foreigner out of our markets once and forever.

But there must be no mistake in the selection of a site for manufactures. New England is not destined to be the home of manufacturing industry, for the reason that it does not possess the coal which is the main-spring of manufactures. It is in Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Illinois—especially the latter—that the great fabrics of the United States will chiefly find their home. Illinois alone is capable of manufacturing every thing that is wanted in this country, from steam-engines to kid gloves: from threshing machines to bull tables. And now is the time to establish factories there. The great manufacturing establishments of England which have enriched Manchester, and Leeds, and Paisley, and Birmingham, date from the Napoleonic wars. If our capitalists are shrewd and enterprising, our great war will do as much for them, the great manufactures of the United States will now be established at the West, and Chicago will speedily become independent of Europe, but will, by-and-by, be prepared to send goods thither as well as produce.

THE LOUNGER.

OUR FRIENDS IN ENGLAND.

WE have all spoken with constant and just indignation of our friends in England; have we thought or said enough of our friends? We have always had them even there. Richard Burke, our British friend in the Revolution, did not justify the colonies. He said only that it was impolitic for Britain to exact the right she claimed. And therefore he would not ask whether she had it. But our friends in England now are unconditional. They clearly comprehend the origin and scope of the war, and they spare no effort to enlighten the public mind around them. In fact no country torn by a war ever had such intelligent, and such a steady of friends in another country as the United States now have in England. The acute absurdity of Lord Brougham, the hard dumbness of Sir Bulwer Lytton, the feeble flings of Carlyle, the thundering fierceness of the Times, the silliness of the sailing of the Rams was war—all these, with the passionate hatred of the Union, and manifest sympathy with the rebels to establish Southern rule which abound in the London clubs and English society, are not more remarkable than the faithful friendship of Richard Cobden, of Mill, of John Elliot Cairnes, of Goldwin Smith, of John Bright, and of the others whose names are familiar in our ears and our hearts.

With the beginning of the rebellion, and the declaration of equal belligerence by the British Government, these men began their work of active friendship. Mr. Mill's pamphlet upon the American contest was a clear and masterly statement of the situation. None more comprehensive and powerful has been made in this country. First issued in a magazine, it was subsequently published separately. It was followed by letters in the same spirit in answer to invitations to public meetings. An article of his upon the American question in the Westminster Review is unsurpassed for its wisdom, eminent sense, and manliness upon the whole struggle.

The work of which Mr. Mill's article was a review, "The Slave Power," by Professor Cairnes, republished here by Carleton and by a Boston house, is the most complete presentation of the subject ever made. The perfect familiarity of the author, not only with the political movements of the last thirty years in this country, but with their most secret spirit and bearing, and his calm and elaborate exposition of the social and industrial death which is, by the laws of political economy and of nature, engendered by slavery made this book the most valuable single work which the long and fierce debate in this country has produced. Professor Cairnes was at once attacked by all the English emissaries and agents of rebellious slavery. Its facts were denied, his arguments controverted, and his conclusions scouted. But the champion was worthy of the cause. He stripped for the fight, and in the columns of the London Spectator he absolutely demolished his antagonists. They were either Englishmen who did not understand the merits of the case at all, or the paid tools of opponent, or they were renegade Americans, who supposed that their mere dicta would prevail in an American question. But Mr. Cairnes cleared the field. His argument, his good-humor, his agility, his ample and detailed knowledge, were irresistible. A lecture upon the war delivered by him last winter in Dublin was printed and circulated as a tract, and his "Slave Power" was issued in a second and enlarged edition. It is a work indispensable to every man who would thoroughly comprehend the slavery question. In his conclusions the American reader may not agree. But nobody will deny the immense service it has rendered to the American cause.

Goldwin Smith, Professor of History at Oxford, was first generally introduced to the public of this country by his powerful able speech last spring at the meeting in Liverpool or Manchester to protest against the building of rebel pirates in English yards. The meeting was nearly unanimous with the debate in Parliament in which Mr. Laird, amidst the cheers of the friends of British lawgivers, flippantly announced that he intended to break the British laws. Mr. Goldwin Smith claimed that if he did so he would be punished. The law should be changed. Lord Palmerston sneered that the Government would not ask a change of the law. Six months afterward Lord Palmerston's colleague declared that they would. In April Goldwin Smith demanded that Great Britain should hold a certain course, because it was the only honorable and dignified one. In October the British Government unanimously says it intends to take it, because it is the only safe one. Which of course Goldwin Smith indignantly asks—which of us has dishonored and dignified England? His pamphlet, just republished here, upon the question whether the Black justifies American slavery, is the conclusive reply of a competent and learned scholar to the shallow traversing of reverend charlatans. At the moment when the Times and English public sentiment are trying to persuade themselves that slavery is, after all, a Christian institution, Professor Smith scatters the hope of success, and so knocks another prop from English sympathy with slavery as to leave it confessed against the peace and existence of a power friendly to England.

The speeches of Mr. Bright, of Mr. Forster, and of Mr. Colden, are familiar to our readers. Their noble words will not be forgotten till the last pigeon whatever befalls. And that nothing may be wanting to show the quality of our English friends, they have now begun the publication of a series of short monthly penny-tracts. The first, by Frances Power Cobbe, "The Red Flag in John Bull's eyes;" the second, by Ex. Ex., "Why the Federals Fight Slavery, extracted from Mrs. Kemble's Georgian Journal;" the third, "Who are the Casters?" by Professor Cairnes; the fourth, by Goldwin Smith, "Why will such friends do such work for our cause we have no right to speak of "England" as hostile. For they speak the thought of the leading mind of England. They forecast its future. And it is for their sake, for their tried and brave friendship that the mind of our American is bound to do all he can by temperate criticism and forbearance, not indeed spare the shapeless censure of the irresponsible mob of the British press, and the meanness of the British Government, to lessen the chances of war between America and England.

FROM A DIARY.

THE Lounger's friend, who keeps a diary has returned from his summer excursion, and we meet at the club, where he hears and sees a great many amusing things. It is with his consent that the younger readers have a glimpse of his diary.

Coming to the evening I found X—— laughing at the cool way in which the World cuts Vallandigham. "The representative from Lincoln Vallandigham," he called him. Then he turned to the Express of the previous evening, and laughed still more heartily.

"And so," I don't know," he answered, "but the mere sense of the paper reminded me of a certain M. C. for the days, and of a story I heard at the time, of characteristic posterday. I set next to the fierce Mrs. ——, when a gentleman, whom I did not know, came and spoke to me and said, 'I suppose you hate us like the rest.' 'My dear sir,' I answered, 'I hate nobody. I am a philosopher.'

"She was quite reassured, and prattled on in the most amusing way. 'Do you know,' said she, 'that I have been afraid to go into society ever since I have been in New York, for I have not had hear remarks offensive to Southern ears.'

"'Well, dear lady,' said I, 'New York is a very large place. You may choose your society, and you must be extremely unfortunate if you meet with Secessionists and Stolenmeches, I doubt not, find congenial companionship here. Why should a rebel despair, my dear Madame?' I said, smiling.

"'Oh!' she answered, 'I am quite elated. I called the other day at the house of one of your members of Congress, and there was a large company assembled; and I assure you, although public efforts were discussed, and I am the wife of a Confederate officer, I heard nothing that was not most agreeable to my feelings—nothing at all.'

"'When?' said I. 'And what did you say to that?'

"'I smiled, on principle, and I said, 'Why, my dear Madame, you might have been at the house of any of our city members, and your ears would have been perfectly secure.'

"Very well," said Madame, proudly, 'I can tell you that Mrs. Burnside, or Mrs. Grant, or Mrs. Foster, or Mrs. Gilmore, could not to at the house of any of our members without hearing what would be extremely disagreeable.'

"'Yes, Madame. May I offer you a bit of this pâté?'

"'Is she mad?' he said [illegible]. 'Mrs. Jefferson Davis would be the last person to find the first Copperhead circles here as in the rebel drawing-rooms of Richmond. But what then? There were Tories in the Revolution. The best wine will have lees."

Colonel Tom told me the last met of the President, whose good humor will be as famous as Talleyrand's. He was anxious to know who was really responsible for the surrender of Harper's Ferry last summer. So he asked Colonel Tom. The General did not know. "Very well," said the President, "then I will ask General Schenck." But Schenck merely knew that he was not to blame. The President sent for Milroy. Milroy averred that he was not guilty. Hooker was consulted. Finally Jay Joe hoped it was clear to His Excellency that he had nothing to do with it. "Perfectly clear," said the President. Abraham, smiling. So he assembled all the four Generals in his room. "Gentlemen," said he, "Harper's Ferry was surrendered, and none of you, then, were responsible. I am very anxious to discover the man who is." He waited and bore down the room, while they looked there. Suddenly he stopped. "I have it," he said. "I know who's responsible." The General-in-Chief looked the President, each a little suspicious. "Who is it, who is it, Mr. President?" "Gentlemen," replied our uncle, with a twinkle in his eye, "I am the man."

Trimountain is here from Boston, and dined with me yesterday. He says that little Mrs. V—— is a tremendous Copperhead, because her husband can't get a place. The banker and the other day she went to the barber's to have her boy's hair cut. While the barber was busy a gentleman began to abuse the Government, the Administration, with the opprobrious of an Amazon Parker and the order of Liberty and Union. There was nothing to be said to be rebuked to it, and gentle was too mild a name for the angelic-eyed creature Lincoln. But, alas! the gentle species was the most to be denounced. Who is safe if coercion is to be admitted? What right has this Government to suppress Slavery States?

Little Mrs. V—— flatly trembled with delight, and at the first pause she turned all talk and attention to him.

"Excuse me, Sir, I am unknown to you; but my whole heart responds to your most just and generous sentiments. I am glad that some men are still enough men to protest against this tyrannical despotism. I thought myself in the home of the gallant and struggling Southron, whom the Government is wickedly endeavoring to coerce. From my heart I thank you."

The gentleman bowed, said that he was very happy that they had so much mutual sympathy, and wished her good morning. He went out, and the moment the door was closed little Mrs. V—— called, with enthusiasm, for the name of so patriotic a gentleman.

"Why, marm, excuse me, do you remember the man who ordered a shave and hair cut and half killed her, some years ago, and was sent to the State Prison?"

"Yes."

"Well, marm, this is the chap. He came back yesterday, and he says he's done quite enough."

Little Mrs. V—— did not tell the story, said Trimountain, but the barber did.

LOUIS NAPOLEON'S FRANCE.

BY-AND-BY, when the complications arising from the French conquest of Mexico plainly develop themselves, we shall wonder that we have been so long unwilling to see that our most subtle and dangerous foe from the beginning of our war was Louis Napoleon. We have raged against England, who is the most jealous and sordid of nominal allies. But how has it been with Emperor Louis?

He began, hand in hand with the British Government, by recognizing equal belligerence between the rebels and the nation. Then, in the wrath with England, our ancient foe, we overlooked the singular fact that France, our traditional friend, showed exactly the same disposition. Under plea of the recognition, and of her neutrality, and of her municipal law, the British Government shut its eyes as well as sick at home, while ships were built, rigged, armed, and manned in her yards, and sailed from her ports. Let the whole truth be stated. The British Parliament, representing at the stress of British public opinion declared against us, and the fact that pirate ships sailed under the British flag, and were sealed and victualed in British ports, without remonstrance from the British Government, unquestionably drove American ships from the ocean, and ruined that enormous commerce of our commercial activity. That is the indictment against England. It is black enough, and it has the substantial part of her offense in the policy of piracy. But this she has stopped, and by paying arrears of damage the mischief can be soon repaired.

How is it with Louis Napoleon? Beginning with England and recognizing the equal belligerent, he signed with England and Spain the treaty of Soleiad to secure the payment from Mexico of their common debt. But the moment that the troops were evidently transcended the agreement, and contemplated the conquest of the country, thereby establishing an interest which compelled him to be the active foe of this Government, England withdrew from the treaty. Have we done the same in the matter? The occupation of Mexico under plea of collecting a debt was a most specious pretense for entering the result of war which England was supposed to desire. But she refused, and Louis Napoleon pushed on alone.

But when he landed on Mexican soil he put his foot upon a cardinal and traditional point of the policy of the United States, and he did it because he thought us unable to resist. He subverted a republic, our neighbor. He scornfully flouted our established declaration that we could not, in the case of our own interest, see unconcerned a foreign European power forcibly dictating an internal policy to any of our neighbors. He did it confidently upon the success of the rebellion to found two rival states upon our late united domain, which would be a check upon each other, while the weakest, lying next to him, would depend upon his alliance. Mr. Slidell said openly in Paris within six months that the rebels would gladly become colonists of France rather than return to their old allegiance. In Mexico Louis Napoleon still remains. Every day necessarily commits him to a more hostile position to us, because the success of the rebellion was essential to his plans, and as that prospect fades he is forced upon the alternative of finally openly defying from Mexico, which is a confession both of infamy and failure, or of lending his aid to secure the success upon which he counted.

The blow Louis Napoleon aims at us is deep and mortal. England, even if she would gladly see us smitten, refuses the stroke. Nurse and clumsy John Bull must needs be, and he has never affected to be so. But Louis Napoleon in this war can be condoned, if not forgotten. While Louis Napoleon's France, which began to offend with him—which treats the Florida as a ship of war—and receives with confidence and respect the rebel emissary Slidell, whose confederate, Mason, is kicked out of England by the British Queen, which proposed to England to mediate, when mediation meant either humiliation or exasperation to the United States, as England then knew, and declines—where agent in Washington is a notorious sympathizer with the rebels—which, unless indeed, is building ships for the enemy—would, had she the still convenient ports, would have coaled and victualed those already long-equipped corsairs—Louis Napoleon's France, which, counting upon our destruction, has been swift to take steps that require our ruin for their success, is the most dangerous enemy of the United States which the war has revealed.

GENERAL BURNSIDE.

THE very ingenious explanation of General Burnside in Eastern Tennessee have hardly received their fair appreciation. Until his late dispatch announcing his march upon Cumberland Gap and secure line from Lynchburg, and redemption of the whole State, none of his official accounts have been published. What is the reason of this silence? Burnside's movement from the capture of Morgan and his horde, the passage of the Cumberland Gap to the valley of the Knoxville, and the occupation of East Tennessee, has been triumphant. From the beginning of the war it was all of—"Why go to East Tennessee? Why not seize and hold the most loyal part of the rebel section, and a military position of the utmost value?" Now, when it is done by one of the most gallant, heroic, and noble of our Generals, ought we not to take a little more care to wave a laurel wreath for the liberator of East Tennessee?

We have the dispatches of other Generals in full, by not Dispatches? Is it because General Burnside does not like him? And does General Halleck dislike him because Burnside recommended the removal as a military necessity which General Halleck remember the story of the pontoons at Fredericksburg?

Let us not harm in wanton allusions to disagreeable circumstances. But we must remember that General Burnside has been under a cloud more than once, and retained it only in obedience to the express wishes of the President, and, we may add, of the whole country, who believed that that resignation was in any degree the result of jealousy in other quarters and consequent injustice, the truth should be known. Burnside himself may judge the offenders. Meanwhile Burnside's name remains among the most cherished and illustrious of the war. His fame is his own, and will be matched by the skill and heroism of the soldier.

A LAST WORD.

On Tuesday, the 3d of November, the people of the State of New York are to decide whether the Empire State shall be given over to the rule of a base band of loyal communists to pronounce against the Union and Government, and the war for their preservation. And if any Democrat can suppose that it is not fair to say so, and insists that the Copperheads are equally zealous with loyal men for the Union and the Government, let him observe this fact, that at the Copperhead Metropolitan Ratification Meeting the motto selected for the inspiration of the speeches by the managers, and the sentiment of the audience was, that the question to be considered was not the difference between the Union and the rebellion. That there is a bloody conspiracy against the Government, that it seeks to destroy the unity of the Union, that to perplex and embarrass the Government in saving the Union is to play into the hands of its enemies, were facts ignored by the Copperhead orators who ask our votes for their ticket. But that the success of that ticket is counted upon by Jeff Davis and Beauregard is the strongest blow for their cause; that every foreign enemy of this country prays that it may triumph; that every true voter who encourages it does so to aid it in them, and every man who wishes to see the Government forced to negotiate with the rebel traitors, will vote for that ticket, is as well known as that Lincoln is honest and Davis a rebel.

You have to answer by your vote not whether you approve every measure of the war, but whether you think the country in more danger from our own Government than from the rebels in arms against it. If you think the latter, then vote as the rebels want you to vote. If you think our danger is not from ourselves but from our enemies, then vote as you will. The 8d of November in New York shall be a victory as the polls are significant as the great day of Gettysburg in the field.

WHAT MR. LINDSAY THINKS.

THERE is great harmony of sentiment between our Copperheads and the British friends of the rebels. Even the vagaries of Vallandigham, a quadruple disfranchised traitor, find a friend in Mr. W. S. Lindsay, a gentleman who came to this country before the war, to secure a monopoly of a certain California trade for English ships, and went home again wroth at his failure, informs us that he believes the "old republic" will be cut up not merely into two, but into four distinct States. This is Vallandigham's thunder. That martyr statesman proposed the same plan three or four years ago in Congress.

THE ARRIVAL OF THE COMING MAN.

A DAILY paper says: "He is going to take his stand upon the floor of Congress as an independent, individual statesman. As such he will rule the surging factions around him without joining them or compromising himself. He will be the only splendid prouvre to bear upon great national questions from new and unexpected points of approach. He will exert his mighty mind to preserve, consolidate, and support the country, and will yield to no mire isms or pestilent politicians."

Mr. Henry Ward Beecher returned? Is Jefferson alive? Are Hamilton, or King, or John Quincy Adams to sit in the next House? Have we a Calhoun, a Clay, a Webster among us? Not quite. This is to be the Hon. Fernando Wood's exalted station in the next Congress.

ARMY AND NAVY ITEMS.

GENERAL SHERMAN and staff have left for the front, and indications of operations are apparent.

GENERAL RUFUS, Chief of the Ordnance Bureau at Washington, has died, after a protracted illness.

GENERAL DODGE has returned from a leave of absence, and resumed command of the District of the Sixteenth Army Corps.

GENERAL SWEENEY'S command has been sent in pursuit of the rebels from Lagrange.

By order of the War Department, Assistant Surgeon-General Wood is assigned to duty as Medical Director in Canada, Missouri, to Louisville, Kentucky.

GENERAL LOGAN, with his command, has arrived at Stevenson, Alabama, on 39th, the one from Nashville, the other from Chattanooga. Our line of railroad is thus secured. Such a military gathering attracted much attention.

JUDGE-ADVOCATE-GENERAL HOLT has been called by the Secretary of the Navy that the Court of Inquiry in his case, ordered by the Navy Department, may have its assistance not properly of further proceedings."

The Treasury Department has recently sent to Memphis eighty thousand dollars in gold for the payment of troops.

His execution of Dr. Wenger, for the murder of Lieutenant Sanford, a paroled officer of Virginia, in 1862, an attempt was made by the culprit to escape by using the corpse of his victim as a shield to cover his flight.

The Counties of Hancock, Brooke, and Ohio, in West Virginia, have been constituted by the Department of the Monongahela, and added to the Department of W. Virginia, under General Benjamin F. Kelly.

Rear-Admiral DAHLGREN has thought proper to contradict, in the most authoritative manner, the absurd report that he resigned because General Gillmore would not commit his self not of a harmonious character. The report that Captain Percival Drayton succeeded Admiral Dahlgren is positively denied.

General WINFIELD HAYS, U.S.V., has taken his seat as President of the Court-martial from which Brigadier-General Robert Ogden Tyler, Captain R. C. Bowering, A.A.G., is detailed as member of the court in place of Brigadier-General Ruger, who is ordered to another field for duty on the staff of Brigadier-General Leggett, U.S.V.

General MIDDAY has received leave of absence for twenty days, and has left Washington.

Rear-Admiral PORTER reports the capture, by Acting Master Dillingham and Pilots Jones, of steamers and Mr. Moore, on the Red River, of two steamers performing important service for the rebels. It being impossible to get the vessels out into the Mississippi, they were destroyed.

Major-General MEADE was in Washington on 2d, and had a long interview with President and Secretary Halleck. He returned to the Army of the Potomac on 3d, passed off the cars at Bealton, and went to the camp notwithstanding.

Brigadier-General FOLK has arrived a prisoner at St. Louis, and will be sent to Johnson's fleet.

Colonel Ely Parker, Military Secretary of the Convalescent Camp in Virginia, and Lieutenant-Colonel Duncan have not been appointed Aids, and Colonel Duncan is still Chief Provost Marshal of the Department of Washington, and will remain there. Colonel Parker is busy abroad, and therefore could not have been relieved.

By direction of the President, the Secretary of War has written a letter to Governor Seymour, of New York, commanding a brigade under General Burnside, compliment ing him in the highest terms for his expeditious march from Knoxville to Cumberland, in the movement upon Cumberland Gap. The command marched the whole route in fifty-two hours.

Major-General FRENCH, while leading his column at Auburn, Virginia, during the recent charge on the front line of Army of the Potomac, received a bullet in his leg.

Brigadier-General ELLIOTT has been ordered from the Army of the Potomac to the Army of the Cumberland.

Brigadier-General CAIN has been assigned to the command of the Third Division, Third Army Corps, of the Army of the Potomac.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.

LEE has fallen back across the Rappahannock. Meade followed him closely, regarding the Orange and Alexandria railroad to the rear. Between these two lines the country between the cavalry reconnoitring parties; but he battle has been close. The impression prevails that the contest again in Virginia is at an end for the season.

THE ARMY OF THE WEST FIELD.

General Grant has issued an order assuming command of the Military Division of the Mississippi, and announcing that his headquarters will be in the field.

THE ARMY OF THE CUMBERLAND.

From Chattanooga we learn, by dispatches via Cincinnati, that a portion of the enemy's forces under General Buckner, Breckinridge and Marshall-Wheeler, left in front of General Rosecrans's army, have been moving in huge bodies to the left of our line, and it was reported that the enemy had left Atlanta and fiome in the rear. General Rosecrans's scouts, landed from Conton, Mississippi, on the 15th, taking 200 prisoners and occupying Florence. The rebels had been concentrated in detachments from the front, and the whole army movement in consequence of the advance of Rosecrans up the river.

EIGHT NEAR CORINTH.

General Ostrinan, in the advance from Corinth, eastward, on the 31st inst., encountered two brigades of rebel cavalry, under Generals Lee and Forrest, near Chewalla Station. The rebels were defeated, and retreated in confusion, driven back with serious loss. Our loss was seven killed and thirty-seven wounded.

EAST TENNESSEE.

The latest reports from General Burnside represent that he is reinforcing and occupying the East Tennessee, and has repeatedly driven back rebel reconnoitring parties.

CHARLESTON.

The siege is steadily progressing, and General Gillmore's batteries are nearly ready to open on the doomed city. We have a dispatch received in Richmond from Charleston, dated the 31st inst., which says that stormy times are expected.

AFFAIRS IN TEXAS.

The whole rebel force west of the Mississippi is reported not to exceed 20,000 men, and among them there is much dissatisfaction, leading to frequent desertions. On the 15th ult. Kirby Smith visited the rebel army at Arkadelphia, Arkansas, and issued a flaming address to the people. He therefore relieved Price and put Holmes in his place. This latter raised a new army, in which probably a majority are unfriendly to Holmes, and the confusion is described to have been terrible. Between Saturday morning and Friday, from 800 to 700 men deserted, and to save the rest pickets were given orders to shoot them. Price, and his Brutus, Kirby Smith's head-quarters are at Marshall. A strong Union sentiment is reported to prevail in Northeast Texas, and Morgan, the Union candidate for Congress in the First District, comprising nineteen counties, has been elected.

BOMBARDS AT HOME.

General Rosecrans arrived at Cincinnati on 30th, and was received in the Queen City with the usual demonstrations of citizens. He was enthusiastically welcomed together with the entire line of march.

Judge Storer introduced the General to the assemblage by saying his distinguished services which produced what he would be bad accomplished for his country, and he assured him of their undoubting confidence. While he had never dishonored his native State, his native State had never forgotten him. Although he resigned from the service of the Cumberland, Judge Storer said the people would receive the former General with that hearty welcome.

General Rosecrans returned thanks for the expression of sympathy and respect with this public reception. He said: While he felt flattered by it, he could not forget that the heart of the people did not go out to him individual alone. It was the principle for which we were contending, and the success of that little which produced such an ovation. He asked the people never to forget their duty to the Union, whatever might be the result of this crisis. The question as to how he had been used he desired to have left to the people to answer.

Some friends of mine in New York, he said, are very much troubled about my health. The Army of the Cumberland thinks I am well enough, and so do I. As for the Army of the Union I have taken, General Grant's command. New York and Washington papers have said that General Rosecrans and Major-General M'Cook disobeyed orders against me. They have assured me that they regret exceedingly that they have published so many falsehoods.

He said that since the battle of Chickamauga he had received a letter from a friend in Washington, which he took no less than chief; and whatever charges appeared in the Eastern papers against him, he was sure that the Government was in no way responsible for them. He expressed his confidence to do whatever the Government requires of him.

At the conclusion of his speech cheers were given for General Rosecrans and the Army of the Cumberland. The welcome throughout was universal and hearty.

OUR POOR FELLOWS AT RICHMOND.

The number of Yankee prisoners held in Richmond up to the 30th inst. is reported by the Richmond Examiner to be under twelve thousand. One of the prisoners, a member of the Seventh Connecticut, died on the 29th inst. by previous by a guard while attempting an escape, and was immediately buried.

THE NEW QUOTA OF NEW YORK.

By a dispatch received yesterday at the Executive Department, it appears that the new quota of New York is 17,000. It appears that the quota of volunteers which the State of New York is to furnish under the call of October 17 is one hundred and eight thousand and eighty-five.

GOVERNOR SEYMOUR'S REBEL-LIKE TAKE.

The Richmond Enquirer says:

"Governor Seymour's views are accepted to peace whatever, and must fight till doomsday rather that yield an iota of the following principles:

Recognition by the enemy of the Independence of the Confederate States.

Withdrawal of the Yankee forces from every foot of Confederate territory, including Kentucky and Missouri.

Withdrawal of the Yankee soldiers from Maryland, until which time shall elapse after the war, no Yankee will be allowed in the old Union or ask admission into the Confederacy.

Consent on the part of the Federal Government to give up to the Confederate States every slave who may at that flood at the time of secession, or to pay for the same.

Consent on the part of the North to allow the Federal Government to that portion of the old Territories which may be left to the Confederacy.

An equitable settlement on the basis of our absolute independence of the political rights, of the public and private debt and public lands, and the advantages accruing from foreign treaties.

FREE LABOR IN THE SOUTHWEST.

The Commissioners for treating Government plantations in Mississippi and Louisiana have issued the first exchange of the paid labor system are decidedly successful and profitable. Another population exists in favor of the Union men to consent means for the re-establishment of civil government in those States.

THE MISSOURI QUESTION.

President Lincoln's reply to the Missouri delegation, his letter of instructions to General Schofield, and the order issued by the latter, have created a profound sensation.

In an address by Mr. Drake, in answer to the President's reply, he said in part:

The main points of the President's reply are as follows: The duty to the Union of the Missouri Convention and the troops and sufferings of the Union men are attributable to the action of General Schofield's order. The letter of, which he gives a vivid picture, referring to the conviction of the traitor under General Curtis, Governor Gamble, and Curtis, to sustain his position.

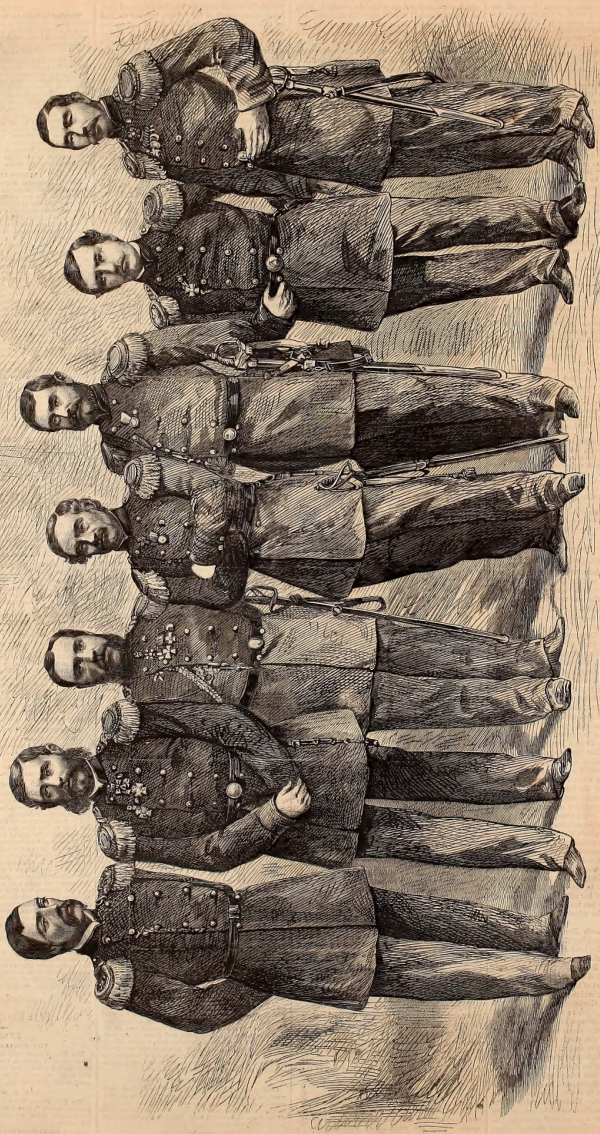
He does not think the measure at Lawrence proves inability on the part of General Schofield, as similar acts could not be prevented by military precautions.

He says the charge that General Schofield has purposely withheld protection from Union men, and facilitated the objects of the rebels, is altogether beyond the power of belief. With this charge he knows he declines to review General Schofield.

Regarding the enrollment of the militia, he says he shall not publish his letter to General Schofield on that issue in. In the mean time he declines to abandon it, and expresses the hope that General Schofield will modify or suspend it, thereby enabling him to strengthen General Curtis at the time reinforcements were imperatively needed.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.



THE ANGLO-RUSSIAN RAMS.

THE Mersey correspondent of the London Herald says charge of a detachment of marines, and the London Times asserts that, though nothing had been detected in regard to them, yet, being suspected, they would not be allowed to slip away as the Alabama did.

REV. H. W. BEECHER.

The Rev. Henry Ward Beecher has made another impressive speech in Liverpool. He was again successfully interrupted; but a riot, which had been expected, did not take place.

ENGLAND THREATENED WITH WAR IN INDIA. The London Times says that there has been a force 7000 men, headed by the sons of Dost Mohammed, who are thought to be merely the van-guard of a large force.

OUR RUSSIAN VISITORS.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.—[SEE PAGE 711.]

THE SOLDIER'S DREAM.

THE CONSCRIPT'S APPEAL.

"MARSHAL, revoke the stern decree!
Doctor, I can not go!
Though my disease you may not see,
I'm far from well, I know!

"What though my cheeks look florid now,
'Tis a deceptive glow;
The enemy's first fire, I vow,
Will turn them white as snow!

"And tho' my limbs seem strong and straight,
I know their old disease;
A 'charge' would find them, sure as Fate,
Uncertain in the knees!

"My heart, too, which just now you heard
Beating so calm and slow,
Would strangle me, upon my word,
Soon as I saw the foe!

"And lastly, Sirs, my appetite,
Though generally good,
Is dainty, and would fail me quite
Upon your soldier's food!

"Besides, think how I would be missed
By all the ladies here!
So, Marshal, strike me from your list:
Exempt me, Doctor, dear!"

Then spake the Marshal: "If 'tis true
What you have said, take thanks!
We want no popinjays like you
To mar our patriot ranks!

"So mark! you merely man in name,
Go, with what speed you can,
And for the glorious cause you shame
Provide a real man!"

The Conscript, like a beaten hound,
Slunk toward the open door,
But ere he crossed the threshold's bound
The lash fell yet once more.

A maid her brother's last embrace
Chanced in the hall to bide:
With kindling eye and glowing face,
"Foul slanderer!" she cried.

"Poor coward! no true woman's heart
A single throb would give
Wert thou to die. Indeed, thou art
Too abject not to live!

"Had I—" He waited not to hear
The indignant beauty's threat,
But fled as though the foe were near—
And may be fleeing yet.

C. D. G.

CASE FOR THE PRISONER.

AT six o'clock on Monday morning, the 29th of January, 1827, the Dover mail-coach, mud-bespattered and travel-stained, pulled up before the General Post-office in Lombard Street, and the official porters in attendance flung themselves upon it, and dragged from it the receptacle for letters (then containing correspondence from France, from foreign countries transmitting through France, and from Dover itself), which, in official language, was known as the mail-portmanteau. The guard, cold, stiff, and tired, tumbled off his perch, stamped his feet on the pavement, yawned, stretched himself, and literally "lent a hand" toward the removal of the mail-portmanteau by just touching it in its descent with his four fingers; the coachman, also cold, stiff, and tired, let his benumbed left hand give to the motion of the four jaded horses, which, dank and steaming, stretched their necks, and yawed about with their heads and shook their bodies, rattling their harness in a dismal manner. All the passengers had dismounted long ago, the guard had stepped inside the office to settle some little matter in connection with the way-bill, the few stragglers always waiting about to see the coaches come in had been cheaply edified and were moving off, the coachman had jerked the horses' heads into the air preparatory to walking them round to the stable, when a pale-faced clerk, with a pen behind his ear, came rushing out of the little side-door, tumbling over the guard, and exclaiming, "Hold hard, for God's sake! The mail has been robbed!"

When the two official porters carried the mail-portmanteau into the Foreign Office of the General Post-office, they placed it before the clerk waiting to receive it. There was little time to count, and sort, and dispatch the letters; the clerk knew that, in order to get through his work, he must have quick eyes and nimble fingers; and in a minute he had unbuckled the flaps of the square portmanteau and thrown them back, preparatory to opening the two compartments, when in each of the compartments he saw a long cut, as with a knife, large enough to admit of the inclosed bags being drawn out. Rather staggered at this, the clerk hastily turned all the bags out on to the floor, noticing as he did so that several of them were cut and frayed. Then he looked for the Paris letter-bill, which he found in due course, and read as follows: "No. 203. Direction Générale des Postes de France. Départ de Paris pour Londres. Ce Vendredi, 26 Janvier, Année 1827. Le contenue de votre dernière depêche du 24[me] a été exactement distribué, et ultérieurement expédié pour sa destination, l'administration vous demande le même soin pour le contenu de la présente du reçu, de laquelle vous voudrez bien lui donner avis." Then followed a list of the bags and their weights, from France, Italy, Spain and Portugal, Switzerland, Germany, and Turkey. The clerk carefully compared the bill in his hand with the bags lying before him, and instantly found that the Italian bag, the heaviest, and probably, therefore, the most valuable, was missing.

The pale-faced clerk, rushing out and communicating this fact to the coachman and overturned guard (when he was picked up) of the Dover mail-coach, had the satisfaction of seeing their rubicund countenances turn to his own hue; but with that he was obliged to remain content, as they merely invoked different species of condemnation on various portions of their anatomy, if they knew any thing about it, or could tell how it occurred. So the Dover mail-coach went round to its stables. That night, when the return Dover mail left the Elephant and Castle, it had for one of its inside passengers the solicitor to the General Post-office: a man of clear head and prompt action, to whom the investigation of delicate matters connected with the postal service was confided. To him, comfortably installed at the Ship Hotel, came the postmaster of Calais and the captain of the Henri Quatre, the French packet by which the mail had been brought over. After a little consultation these gentlemen were clearly of opinion that the mail arrived intact at Calais, was sent thence and arrived intact at Dover, was sent thence intact, and was violated on the road to London. Tending to the proof of this was a special circumstance. When the mail arrived at Dover, it was so unusually heavy as to induce a custom-house officer who saw it landed to regard it with suspicion; so he accompanied the men who bore it from the French vessel to the packet-agent's office, that he might see it opened, and be satisfied that it contained nothing prohibited. The portmanteau was unbuckled and its compartments were thrown open in the presence of this officer, of Sir Thomas Coates the packet-agent, and of three other persons, all of whom were certain that the compartments of the bags were in a perfect state, and that the bags were then uncut.

So far so good. In such cases proving a negative is the next best thing to positive proof, because it shuts the gate and prevents your wandering in the wrong direction. So the solicitor to the Post-office, journeying back to London, and taking up the threads of his case on his way, stopped at Canterbury, made a few casual inquiries, pricked up his ears, opened a regular official investigation, and received what he believed to be very important information. For it appeared that on the Sunday night of the robbery four inside and three outside passengers left Dover by the mail-coach for London. The four insides were booked for London; one of the outsides was booked for Chatham; another for Canterbury, or as much further toward London as he pleased; the third outside intimated that he should only go as far as Canterbury. When the mail reached the Fountain Inn, Canterbury, the outside passenger who was booked as far toward London as he pleased got down and paid his fare, stating that he should go no further; the passenger who was booked for Canterbury alighted at the same time; and the two walked away from the coach together.

One of the mail-coach proprietors, who resided at Canterbury, happened to be looking at the mail while it was standing at the door on the evening in question, and observed two men, dressed as if they had just left the coach, crossing the street. They stood consulting together for a few minutes, and, after walking about fifty yards, stopped again, when a third man joined them. They all conversed for about a minute, and then separated; two of them went down the street on the road to London; the mail passed them; and almost immediately afterward they returned up the street in the direction of the Rose Hotel. The third man went into the coach-office, booked himself as an outside passenger for London, and went on by the mail. Shortly after the mail passed through Canterbury that night two strangers, coming from the direction in which the mail had gone, entered the Rose Hotel, and ordered a chaise to London. On being asked whether they would change horses at Ospringe or Sittingbourn, they said it was immaterial, so long as they got on quickly. The waiter who showed them into a sitting-room noticed that they had a small bag with them. They ordered some brandy and water, and shut themselves in—in the room, not the bag. After the lapse of a quarter of an hour the waiter, suddenly opening the door to say that the chaise was ready, perceived various letters (at least twenty or thirty), and several small paper packets, lying on the table; the men were feeling the letters, holding them up to the candles, and otherwise examining their contents. They appeared much confused when the waiter entered the room, crammed the letters into their pockets, paid their bill, got into the chaise, and at once set off for town.

The thieves were traced through different stages, until it was ascertained that they had been set down between six and seven o'clock on Monday morning near a watch-box in the Kent road, and that, having paid the post-boy, they then walked off toward Surrey Square.

So much notice was taken of the men at the Rose Hotel, and at the places where they stopped to change horses and take refreshment on the road to town, that a description of their persons was procured, and the police communicated with. On hearing the description, the police at once considered that it implicated one Tom Partridge, and one of his associates, who had been concerned in most of the coach robberies which had recently been committed; and private information having been obtained that these were really the men who had violated the mail, warrants were obtained, and Tom Partridge was "wanted." After a search of many weeks Tom Partridge was apprehended, and, on the examination which he underwent at Bow Street, was distinctly identified as one of the persons who booked an outside place at Dover by the mail of the evening in question, and as one of the men who were seen on the same evening at the Rose Hotel examining letters and packets which lay open before them. On this evidence Mr. Tom Partridge was fully committed for trial.

From March till August Mr. Tom Partridge lay in prison: immediately on his committal he had strongly denied his guilt, and had made application to be admitted to bail; but his request was refused. On the 21st of August, 1827, the assizes for the Home Circuit being then held in Maidstone, there was more than usual excitement round the old court-house of that town. Very many witnesses were to be examined on the part of the crown, among them some French gentlemen, clerks in the Paris Post-office, and officers of the packet, who had been staying at the principal hotel of Maidstone for some days, and at the expense of the prosecution: who had lived very freely, and had winked at the cherry-cheeked Kentish damsels in a manner which had caused some of those young girls to clench their fists and hint at giving "furriners" that dread blow known as a "smack o' th' face." And above all else productive of interest was the prevalent belief that the whole case was one of extraordinary circumstantial evidence; that it would turn upon the nicest question of personal identity; and that the prisoner intended bringing forward undeniable proofs of his innocence.

So the cramped little court was crowded from floor to ceiling when the learned judge took his seat on the bench. Immediately below him sat the Post-office solicitor, outwardly bland, but inwardly anxious: betraying his anxiety when there seemed any hitch in his case by repeated application to a massive gold snuff-box. From time to time he conferred with the crown counsel on his right hand, and occasionally answered questions put to him by two old gentlemen on his left, London merchants and bankers. More than the average number of counsel (none appearing for the prisoner though) at the little green table appropriated to them, and though sitting with wigs cocked awry and employing themselves generally in the mastication of quill pens, yet paying more than usual attention to a case in which they were not concerned. All round the court, wherever permissible, stood the eager public, stout broad-shouldered yeomen, buxom women, hostlers, and inn-yard loiterers, with occasionally among them the thin sallow face of a London "professional," probably a friend of the prisoner, contrasting strongly with the acres of broad healthy red cheeks by which it was surrounded. The prisoner himself in the dock fronting my lord the judge, a middle-sized stoutly-built man, with a queer humorous face, lighted by a twinkling arch blue eye. Not a bit daunted, but apparently rather pleased by the universal gaze, he stood leaning over the front of the dock, playing with the bits of herbs which custom still retained there, keenly observant of all that transpired, but apparently fully trusting in his own resources.

The judge settled himself in his seat, the usher demanded "Silence" at a moment when a pin might have been heard to drop, each juryman threw every scrap of intellect at his command into his countenance, the Post-office solicitor took an enormous pinch of snuff, and Mr. Sergeant Strongbow, retained on behalf of the crown, rose to address the court. He told the story briefly, pretty much as it has been here stated, and proceeded to call his witnesses. First came the French gentlemen. M. Etienne Bonheur, controller at the foreign office of the General Post-office, Paris, proved that he made up the mail for London on the evening of Friday, the 26th of January, that there was an Italian bag, that he handed them to M. Avier to dispatch. M. Avier, M. Gustave d'Ortell, postmaster of Calais, Captain Margot, of the Henri Quatre steamer, John Nash, the Custom-house officer at Dover, and Sir T. Coates, the packet-agent, all deposed to the dispatch and receipt of the mail in due course. Rather dull work this. So the judge thought, leaning back and biting his nails; so the jury thought, listening in bucolic wonder to the translation of the French witnesses's evidence by the interpreter, but bored when it came out in English a mere matter of formal routine connected with the transmission of a mail; so the prisoner thought, as he shifted from leg to leg, and smiled slightly once or twice, looking on with great unconcern. Booking-office keeper at Dover, mail coachman, coach proprietor at Canterbury, waiter and chambermaid at the Rose Hotel, waiters and hostlers all along the road, up they came one after the other, kissed the book, looked at the prisoner in the dock, and declared that he was the man who figured in their recollection as connected with the events of the night of the 28th of January. At the conclusion of this evidence the court adjourns for refreshment, judge goes out at a side-door, prisoner wipes his forehead and sits down by his guardian turnkey, Post-office solicitor takes a pinch of snuff and receives congratulations of London bankers on manner in which evidence had been got together, Sergeant Strongbow says, "Seems clear case," and commences sandwich.

After an interval of twenty minutes the court resumed, Sergeant Strongbow intimated that the case for the prosecution was concluded, and the prisoner, called upon for his defense, humbly prayed that a written paper which he had prepared might be read aloud. The court assenting, the paper was handed to an officer, and was read aloud, to the following effect: In the first place, the prisoner denied any participation in the crime of which he was accused, and stated that in the month of January last he was traveling with a person of the name of Trotter, on business, in the counties of Somerset and Devon. That on Monday, the 22d January, he and Trotter arrived at the George Inn, Glastonbury, kept by Mr. Booth. That they left the George the same day, and went to Mr. Baker's, who keeps an inn at Somerton, and thence in Mr. Baker's gig to Yeovil. That the prisoner, taking a fancy to the horse in this gig, sent word back to Mr. Baker that if he had a mind to sell it, he (prisoner) would meet him at the George Inn, Glastonbury, on the ball night, the Thursday following. That on this Thursday night the prisoner and Trotter duly arrived at the George, bought Baker's horse for twelve guineas twelve shillings, borrowing the silver money from Booth, tried it on the Friday morning, and left it with Booth to get it into better condition. That he (prisoner) and Trotter left Glastonbury at half past eleven on Saturday morning, the 27th, by the Exeter coach, which they quitted on the road about five miles from Tiverton, and walked on to that town. That at Tiverton they put up at the Three Tuns Hotel, and being cold, they called for and had some hot egg beer on their arrival, and that while at this hotel, having a wish to procure some clotted cream, they inquired of the waiter how they should carry it, when the waiter recommended them to have two tin cans for the purpose, which cans were procured and filled accordingly. That they staid at the Three Tuns during the Saturday, the 27th, and Sunday, the 28th, and left on Monday, the 29th, by the Bristol coach to Bridgewater.

This statement of the prisoner's having been read aloud, he was called upon to corroborate it by evidence. Thereupon he summoned and produced in the witness-box, one after the other, Booth, the landlord of the George at Glastonbury; Baker, of whom he bought the horse; Ellis, the waiter at the Three Tuns at Tiverton, who produced the book containing the entries of the refreshment had by the prisoner—among them the hot egg beer, the clotted cream, and the tins for carrying it; and the chambermaid at the same inn. All of these persons exactly corroborated the prisoner's statement, and all of them swore positively to his identity. After the evidence of the last witness the judge interposed, and asked the crown counsel whether he desired to press his case? Sergeant Strongbow turned to the Post-office solicitor, who, with a pinch of snuff suspended in the air, was gravely shaking his head, when several of the jury expressed themselves satisfied that the witnesses for the prosecution were mistaken, and that the prisoner was not one of the persons who had committed the robbery. Whereupon a verdict of acquittal was recorded, and with a smiling face and a bow to the court Mr. Tom Partridge walked out of the dock a free man.

Some two years after this trial, which gave rise to a vast amount of wonder as to how the Government could have been so mistaken as to prosecute an innocent man, the Post-office solicitor, wending his way quietly along Bishop-gate Street to catch the Norwood coach at the Flower-Pot Inn, was brushed against by a man going into a public house, and, looking up, saw that the man was Tom Partridge. Now, in Mr. Solicitor's leisure moments, which were few enough, he had often thought of Tom Partridge, and had puzzled his brain ineffectually for a solution of Tom Partridge's mystery. So now, having a few minutes to spare, he first satisfied himself that the man who had brushed against him was the veritable Tom, and then crossed the street and took a careful survey of the public house into which Tom had vanished. As he stood looking up at the house Tom came out of the street door, looked up, and called "Hi!" whereupon from an upper window of the house appeared the head and shoulders of another Tom, an exact reproduction of the original Tom, middle-sized, stoutly built, with a queer humorous face lighted by a twinkling arch blue eye. Mr. Solicitor rubbed his eyes and took a stinging pinch of snuff; but when he looked again there were the two Tom Partridges, exactly alike, one on the pavement in the street, the other looking out of the third floor window. Then both disappeared into the house, whence presently emerging both by the street door, one pointed to some distant object and the other started off up the street, the first returning into the public house, each so exactly like the other that, when they separated, they looked like halves of one body.

Mr. Solicitor took a short joyous pinch, rubbed his hands slowly, and went off to the Flower-Pot Inn. That evening he had several extra glasses of a peculiarly fine brown sherry which he only drank on special occasions, and Mrs. Solicitor remarked to the Misses Solicitor that she thought father must have had a very good case on somewhere, he was in such spirits. Next morning Mr. Solicitor was closeted for half an hour with one of the heads of the Post-office department who had the official conduct of criminal cases, and shortly afterward a confidential messenger was dispatched with a letter to William Lexden—otherwise known as Conkey Lexden, otherwise as Bill the Nobbler, otherwise as sundry and divers flash personages.

That evening Mr. La Trappe, of the General Post-office, sat in the study of his private house in Brunswick Square. On the desk before him stood his dispatch-box, a cutting from a newspaper, a lawyer's brief with some official tape-tied papers. A case-bottle of brandy, a tumbler, and a water-bottle, stood on the corner of the desk. As the clock struck eight the servant entered and announced "a man." The man being admitted, proved very velveteeny, slightly stably, and very bashful.

"Sit down, Lexden," said Mr. La Trappe, pointing to a chair. "I sent for you, because I discovered that the last time you were here you left something behind you—"

"The devil!" burst out Mr. Lexden.

"Oh, don't fear!" said Mr. La Trappe, smiling gently, and looking at him with a peculiar glance, "it was only this letter! You needn't open it; you'll find it all right."

Mr. Lexden took the letter with some misgiving; then a light gradually dawning on him he crumpled it softly in his palm; a responsive crinkling of crisp inclosure fell upon his ear, and he chuckled as he said, "All right, Sir! I'm fly!"

"Mix yourself a glass of grog, Lexden," said Mr. La Trappe, pointing to the case-bottle. "You've entirely left the profession, I believe?"

"Entirely, Sir."

"And are leading an honest life?"

"Reg'lar slap up 'spectable mechanic," said Lexden.

"I want a little information from you; it can't hurt any body, as the affair is by-gone and blown. Do you recollect the robbery of the Dover mail?"

"I should think so," said Lexden, grinning very much.

"Ah!" said Mr. La Trappe. "We tried a man named Tom Partridge for it, and he was acquitted on an alibi. He did it, of course?"

"Of course," said Lexden.

"Ah!" said Mr. La Trappe again, with perfect calmness; "he has a double who went into Somerset and Devon at the same time, and worked the trade for him?"

"Well! How did you find that out?"

"Never mind, Lexden, how I found it out. What I want to know is—who is the double?"

"Tom Partridge's brother—old Sam, one year older nor Tom, and as like him as two peas. He was the best rig o' the sort as ever was rigged. Old Sam had been out in Ameriky all his life, and when he came back, every one was talking about his likeness to Tom; you couldn't know 'em apart. Fid-by, the farce, thought-something might be made of this, and he planned the whole job—the egg-hot, and the cream, the tins, and the horse whit he bought. Tom's got that horse now, to drive in: is they-cart on Sundays, and he calls him 'Walker.'"

"Walker!" said Mr. La Trappe; "what does he call his Walker for?"

"Walker's a slang name for a postman," explained Mr. Lexden, in great delight. "Won't it per-cise?"

"Oh!" said Mr. La Trapps, with great gravity, "I perceive. One more question, Lexden; how was the robbery effected? The interior of the portmanteau could not have been cut unless it had been unbuckled and the compartments thrown open, and they could not possibly have done all that on the top of the coach. Besides, the guard stated he had fastened it on very peculiar straps at Dover, and that the fastenings were in exactly the same state when he opened it in London."

"Ah! That was the best game of the lot," said Mr. Lexden. "The job was done while the portmanteau was in the agent's office at Dover, where it lay from three o'clock on Sunday afternoon till between seven and eight in the evening. Tom Partridge and his pal only opened the street door with a skeleton key, there was no one there, and they had plenty of time to work it."

"And Tom Partridge's pal was——?"

"Ah, that I can't say," said Mr. Lexden, looking straight into the air. "I never heard tell o' his name."

"Thanks, Lexden, that'll do" said Mr. La Trappe, rising. "Good-night! You've done no harm. I shall know where to find you if ever I want you again."

About a twelvemonth afterward Tom Partridge was re-arrested on a charge of horse-stealing, was hanged for horse-stealing. Just before his execution he sent for Mr. La Trappe, and confessed that he had been Tom Partridge's accomplice in the robbery of the Dover mail. Mr. La Trappe thanked him for the information, but bore it like a man who could bear a surprise.

"NO CHANGE!"

'Tis standing by the little school,
Where I stood five long years ago—
Five years—ay, more! for then the snow
Lay gleaming in the light of yule.
The grey old church across the way
Still smiles-cliffs upon its gable—
The Parsonage, so bare to-day,
Was garlanded with holly-chains.

Ah! let me see, in this old room
That night there was a "fancy fair"—
Gay lights had eaten up the gloom—
That lined in cobweb'd corners there;
Gay stalls were planted on each side
Loaded with many curious things,
And Charity, the gentle-eyed,
Of course looked on with outspread wings!

I know that many a goddess seemed
That night behind the stalls to stand;
I know that while I looked I dreamed
It was the old, old fairy-land!
Though certainly it did seem strange
That goddesses should come to earth
To sell neat cups for their worth,
And, when you paid them, give no change!

I think the object of the thing
Was the extension of a wall,
Or building on the school a wing,
To shelter and to form the small.
I know, whate'er it was, 'twas good,
And when a sweet young curate came,
And led me on to where there stood
A lady whom "I dare not name,"

And tempted me, young curate-wise,
To buy a dress—a little one;
I turned and only saw her eyes—
She gave no "change"—I wanted none!
Oh! came with the sunny hair,
And looks so wickedly demure,
You could not guess what form should wear
The gentle garment, I am sure.

Was it her calm's electric touch
That thrilled me as I gave the gold—
So soft and velvety—as such
Young palms are ever? Was I bold
To glide behind the little stall,
And help to sell her dainty wares?
"Without reserve" we sold them all;
"The sacrifice," of course, in shares.

And when they brought a cup of tea,
'Twas her refreshment, and I was sure—
I took the cup, the saucer die:
'Twas Congou (bad), it seemed like wine.

Oh! dream of other days (ah! when Shall we not dream?)—there stands a crowd
Of babbling imps where she stood then,
And cobwebs half the window shroud.

I've said the "cause" I can not tell
For which those pretty things were made,
For which white fingers worked so well,
In mysteries of beads and braid.
I know it did not fail—the toll
Young curate said so, for one,
Gained, at that dear old corner stall,
Love without change—I wanted none!

THE ARMY OF THE CUMBERLAND.

We publish on page 705 an illustration of the war in Southern Tennessee, from a sketch by Mr. Theodore R. Davis, which explains

A TROOP TRAIN IN THE BIG CUT IN THE ROCKS, ON THE NASHVILLE AND CHATTANOOGA RAILROAD.

Mr. Davis writes:

"CHATTANOOGA, October 19.

"En route for the army, I found on reaching Louisville that no pass could be obtained to reach this place; and finding that Gen. Rosecrans and Gen. Thomas, who has had charge of the late transportation of troops, and who gave me a place upon a troop train, a more lengthy stay at Louisville would have been my lot.

"The scenery upon the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad is very picturesque, and the sketch will give some idea of the magnitude of some of the cuts through rock and mountain.

"One regiment only of the second Brigade (the Thirty-third New Jersey) seemed to be a particularly jolly one, for as the train went slowly climbing among the mountains, they sang, laughed, and shouted. The favorite song seemed to be, 'Oh, Rosecrans, he is the man,' etc. I think they are right in nearly every particular. The road, the picket returning his thanks in a yell peculiar to our Western soldiers, and one to which the ears of many a rebel has tingled."

OUR RUSSIAN VISITORS.

On page 708 we reproduce an admirable photograph by Brady, representing our Russian visitors, ADMIRAL LESOFFSKI AND THE CAPTAINS OF HIS FLEET. They are all hard-working men, perfect gentlemen, and as accomplished in letters and science as they are skillful in their profession. They are individually and as a public body very trying with such other to do them honor. For the noble attitude of Russia in abstaining from interference in our war we touched at least of every American and filled it with gratitude. Brady's photograph is, as usual, a success.

THE BLOCKADE AT WILMINGTON, NORTH CAROLINA.

ON page 716 we give an illustration, from a sketch by Mr. Rogers, of the navy, of the RESIDENT BATTERIES AT NEW INLET, WILMINGTON, NORTH CAROLINA, which is now the principal point at which the blockade is being run. Mr. Rogers writes:

"CAMP OF THE 48TH REGIMENT, October 19, 1863.

Having recently returned in the United States steamship Iroquois from an eight days' blockade at New Inlet, North Carolina, I take the liberty of handing you herewith a few sketches, which, if worthy, I feebly should you deem them of sufficient interest, sketches of the rebel defenses at that place, and of the "Mound Battery" in its first and more advanced stage of construction.

The last remaining seaport of any note and navy at Charleston having turned the tide of blockade-runners from port to Wilmington, the latter place consequently become a point of much interest in the area of the great rebellion. This interest will doubtless be considerably increased upon the capture of Charleston, when it is to be hoped the attention of the blockading fleet directed to the reduction and occupation of Forts Caswell and Fisher, and ensuing our success.

No port on the Southern coast offers better facilities and protection to the blockade-runner than Wilmington, North Carolina. The two entrances—Western Bar, to the westward, and New Inlet, to the northward—the Cape Fear River combine a decided advantage in privilege of selection, and rather two blockading squadrons are necessary if there were no many widely-separated ports to guard. Though the direct distance from Fort Fisher to Fort Caswell is but seven miles, to reach one point from the other with a vessel it is necessary to steer a distance of about twenty miles around Smith's Island and Frying-Pan Shoals. The coast for some distance on either side of New Inlet forms nearly due north and south, and presents no curve to shorten and contract the sailing distance. The bar, which at most other points is two miles or more from the nearest shoals, is here but one mile from Fort Fisher, and within easy range of all the rebel guns. Deep water can be carried up to within a short distance of the bar, which the blockade-breakers usually run, in the shadow of the dense pine woods.

There are eight batteries at New Inlet, mounting in the aggregate about sixty-four, which completely cover the bar and its approaches. The guns are of the heaviest calibre and longest range, ranging from the famous 32-pounder Whitworth patent. In addition to the above there are several other batteries mounting from four to ten or eight miles along the coast to the northward of Fort Fisher.

The "Mound Battery" is eighty feet high, composed of sand, bushes, and timber, and connected at the top by an up an inclined railway by means of a stationary engine at the base. Its guns, which were taken from the fleet on the 24th ultimo, two heavy guns had been placed in position on the top, and preparations were going forward for mounting more. The object of this battery is evidently to bear plunging shot and shells of striking vessels to the Fisher is a strong and extensive earth-work on the side of the Cape Fisher-boats, mounting four guns to seaward and two landward.

The other batteries mount from two to four heavy guns each, and are composed of sand and provided with bomb-proofs.

A line of submarine obstructions, consisting of strike of heavy timber with bars of iron projecting at an outward angle and torpedoes, stretches across the channel opposite the "Mound Battery"; while another similar line submarine Cape Fear River, on the bend of the river and just below Fort St. Philip, a strong fortification on the west bank, some four or five miles above the bar.

The vessel engaged in violating the Wilmington blockade are fast or inclined to prize, and generally built for the purpose. They rise low on the water, have no yards, little or no rigging, and are provided with telescopic smoke-stacks and masts arranged with hinges, so as to lower upon the deck. They invariably select the darkest nights for running the guantlet of the blockaders.

Until recently the blockade of Western Bar and New Inlet has been intrusted to an average of eight vessels only, whose station was necessarily much farther apart than was desirable.

Notwithstanding the above adverse circumstances the record of the blockading fleet off Wilmington, from the early part of February last to the 24th ultimo, when a squadron of eight steamers and quite as many sailing vessels either captured or destroyed within its line of set of violating the blockade.

Within the past few weeks several fast and otherwise efficient steamers have been added to the fleet off Wilmington, and it is confidently hoped that the remainder of increased risk of capture will curtail to a great extent if not effectually put a stop to what has hitherto been so profitable to neutral Englishmen, and brought to much material aid and comfort to the rebels.

I am, very respectfully,
Your obedient servant,
JAMES S. ROGERS,
Late Sec. of New Inlet Division H. A. B. Squadron.

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.

We devote considerable space this week to illustrations of the Army of the Potomac, from sketches by our special artist, Mr. A. R. Waud. On pages 712 and 713 we find a picture of the BATTLE OF BRISTOE'S STATION.

Mr. Waud writes: "General Warren was attacked by the rebels, already in position on the hills on the south side of the railroad. The first attack was made on his flank, while marching in the rear of the army. The advantage thus gained by the rebels was of little use to them, as soon as Warren put his troops at once in the best position for a fight, the railroad embankment forming a perfect rifle-pit, and the fine rear Arnold's battery held a commanding position behind General Webb's brigade,—and the killing and wounding of 1200 men, besides the demoralizing influence of the affair on the minds of the men, who were led to expect a capture of our train at any rain. Our loss was about 200, a large proportion being wounded."

On the same pages we illustrate the BURNING OF THE BRIDGE OVER THE RAPPAHANNOCK, and the STRUGGLE AT THE BRIDGE, after the bridge had been burnt. Mr. Waud writes:

"This bridge was destroyed on Tuesday, the 13th of October, to prevent the rebels crossing it for supplies by railroad after we evacuated the line of the Rappahannock River. Of course it could be rebuilt, but the work would be a great deal of labor. It was set on fire a number of straggliers came up, and had to wade over at the dam just above the bridge. It is astonishing how much still had in the rear of the army, and thereby risk a long and hungry march into Richmond, and a still longer and a loathsome captivity."

On page 716 will be found another illustration, which depicts the DESTRUCTION OF THE bridge over the Rappahannock. Mr. Waud writes:

"This point, alternately held by both armies, and the scene of many a skirmish and military movements, is again in our possession. Lee, foiled in his intended movement, has declined Meade's offer of battle, and after he has restored having torn up and destroyed the railroad track, to finish the destruction which we commenced by burning the Rappahannock Bridge, and the immense trestle-work of the bridge, under the crest of the hill. The fort on the other side of the river was built to defend it from attack in that direction. The rifle-pits on this side being crowned with similar works and a line of rifle-pits for some distance up and down the river. The whole length of which these fieldworks are made gives a gloomy aspect to them, in great contrast to the smiling autumn foliage in the woods they erect their frowning crests."

Some of the more humorous scenes of camp-life are portrayed on page 717. One of them, from a sketch made before the provost marshal's arrangements were as complete as they now are, shows us how the boys managed to get rid of paying office off duty. At one time it was the boast of the gamblers that they were more interested than any others in the success of the army; the boys themselves said off, as the bulk of the greenbacks, sooner or later, fell into their hands. The other picture is described on page 717.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

WORTH TYING.—A dashing and fashionable widow says she thinks of suing some gentleman for a breach of promise, as they generally know to the amount she is worth.

Madness was always sparely dressed, and fond of a handsome umbrella. Monden was miserly in his habits. He had a handsome umbrella, which he carried in all weathers to parachute. After Monden had left the stage Mathews had a fine umbrella left behind.

"Ah, Monden," said Mathews, "I beg you'll let me have something of yours as a remembrance."

"Certainly, my boy," replied Joe Monden; "we'll exchange umbrellas."

Mathews was so taken by storm that Monden walked off with a new umbrella.

DROPPING THE VOICE.—During a rehearsal Braham said to Tom Cooke, who was the conductor, "Now, Tom, keep that place down, and when I come to the part, I'll give effect, I intend dropping my voice." "Do you, by the powers!" said Tom; "wherabouts? for it's just the sort of voice I should like to pick up."

He who has a heart for his lesson will soon have his lesson by heart.

"What is the difference between a milkmaid and a swallow?—One skims the milk, and the other skims the water.

THE RING.—Among the Romans the gift of a ring was a solemn betrothal; hence, perhaps, the slanted people may best explain whether it is so among the moderns.

TO CURSORY VISITORS.—Wanted, a key to open a lock of hair; a gun to fasten the tie of friendship; a cement for repairing broken vows; and a keeper for brightening clouded prospects.

Burton once went to a London theatre to see a new piece played for the first time, and, being "near-sighted," peered going into the pit, so made for that portion of the house. Perceiving, when in his entrance for his delight, he was nearly the first there he discovered several persons standing on the stage with their backs turned towards him. Shortly after the first act he went out, and on going into the box-keeper in the pit, said, him, "I've told on Fools the first who had paid!" "So you was," said the man, "Then, we are all gone, who was to keep the door while I went in?" added Burton. "Oh them," continued the matter-of-fact money-taker, "they did not pay, and never charges that bit nothink—they're the 'Applause' that always goes in free."

Jekyll was told that one of his friends, a brewer, had been drowned in his own vat. "Ah!" he exclaimed, shaking on his watery face."

In one of our Western towns they passed an ordinance forbidding lavarre to sell liquors on the Sabbath to any person except travelers. The next Sunday every man in the town was seen walking about with a portmanteau in one hand and a pair of night-caps in the other.

A celebrated comedian arranged with his green-grocer, one Berry, to pay him quarterly; but the green-grocer was in the habit of coming before the quarter was due. The comedian, in great wrath, called upon the green-grocer, and, laboring under the impression that his visitor was doubtful, said: "I say, berry a pretty stuff, Berry you have got to be, to your bill, Berry, here it is for you." Your father, the elder Berry, would not have been such a Berry, Berry; but I shan't pay you till Christmas, Berry!"

Two ragged little urchins, whose parents paid more attention to the bottle than to the training of their children, were in the habit of seriously amusing their neighbors, who lived close by with their noise while at play in front of the house. One day they were both unusually noisy indeed, and told them to be quiet or go home immediately. "I'll go first, my dear," said one of the children to the other, "when us don't belong to she!"

They say there is truth in wine; but a drunken man can't be expected to tell the other truth.

People sometimes undertake to go ahead, and find that they have got a stage-fright.

QUERIES.—Somebody wants to know the names of the tunes which were played upon the feelings," and also if "the Rogue's March" was one of them? Also, what musician would like to know if "the light of other days" was ever played by the light of the moon? Also, whether a fiddle is not a slippery hold, and if people do not get fatigued by the exercise of fiddlesticks."

MR. NOGGS, speaking of a blind woodcarver, says, "While none ever saw him see, thousands have seen him carve."

A lady was once declaring that she could not understand how gentlemen could smoke. "It certainly shortens their lives," said she, "I didn't know that," replied a gentleman; "there's my father who smokes every blessed day, and he's now seventy-seven." "Ah, but," said the lady, reply, "if he had never smoked he might have been eighty by this time."

This is the style in which the fair ones in some parts of England convey the hint to bookcard evening: "Any of you gentlemen that can't ask a young lady home, can go to a bachelor friend, who was on a visit. "I have been asked for the last time to fetch one home, and I shall not be silly enough to have me," was the reply. "Then you haven't been down our way," was the triumphant rejoinder.

Madame Belvia for two years had widely tried to get her two dozen of crevats which Mr. L. a young fop, suspected of living a little at the expense of his friends, purchased, and had the cash in the coat he bill, couched in these terms: "Mr. L. to Madame Belvia, for value gave me." What does this mean?" asked Mr. L. "What are satin gravats?" "Why, sir," replied the milliner, with a curtsey, "it means that you have take a thief by the throat every morning."

When Cromwell first raised his money, an old cavalier looking upon one of the new pieces, said this inscription on one side, "God with us" on the other, "The commonwealth of England first," "well, he," said he, "God and the commonwealth are on different sides."

At Bristol a magistrate asked a prisoner if he were married. "Yes, your worship," was the reply. "Then," said the ship, amidst peals of laughter, "it's a good thing for your wife."

A philosopher and a wit were crossing from Dover to Calais, when a high swell rising, the philosopher seemed much disturbed, whereupon the wit thus addressed him: "Why," observed the wit, "that will suit your stomach to a T." "Sir," said the philosopher, "you know I am only for skimming the surface of things."

Why is the rudder of a steamboat like a public hangman?—Because it has a stern duty to perform.

A prince, rallying the fatness of a courtier, who had served him in many emblezzles, said he looked like an ox. "Sire," replied the courtier, "I would be glad to be so, but I know that I often had the honor to represent your Majesty."

A Dutchman's beast-reading colloquy is described thus: "She lofes Shon Mickle as petter as I, because he has cot a fine table-cloth on his face."

A sick cobbler must be regarded as being well when he begins to mend.

A BACHELOR'S IDEA OF WEDLOCK.—One of the casualties of life.

SEA-SIDE NOTE.—The desire for bathing is a very whitewashy sentiment.

There's no use in your ever taking a lazy man to task. He won't probably feel it a task.

What do we often drop, yet never stoop to pick up?—A hint.

It is perfectly natural that physicians generally should have a greater horror of the tan than any body else—because they are more likely to see sickness.

"I can't reconcile differences," said Septimus Harding. "For instance, there is nothing more natural in the country than a dead disagreement, and nothing less certain than disease."

Johnny remarked to his grandmother that old Mr. Cranshaw had the appearance of a person with one foot in the grave. "Well, Johnny, reply upon my word," said the aunt, "you're a precocious child if you can tell that." "Why, I thought I noticed she walked a little lame lately."

The man who imagined himself wise because he detested, some correspondent errors in a newspaper has been trying to get a perpendicular view of himself.

THE BEST THING OUT—Out of debt.

THE WORST THING OUT—Out of temper.

BURNING THE RAPPAHANNOCK RAILWAY BRIDGE, OCTOBER 13, 1863.

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC—GENERAL WARREN REPELLING HETH'S ATTACK AT BRISTOE STATIO

STRAGGLING SOLDIERS CROSSING THE RAPPAHANNOCK ABOVE THE BURNED BRIDGE.

N—HAZARD'S RHODE ISLAND BATTERY IN THE FORE-GROUND.—Sketched by A. R. Waud.—[See Page 711.]

THREADS.

THE metal sleeps in its hidden vein,
The blue-eyed flax waves over the plain,
The silk-worm spins on the mulberry leaf,
Days are spinning their joy and grief.

Threads are a-twining, manifold,
Of flax, hemp, cotton, and silk, and gold;
For joyous Beauty, for Soldier proud,
For work-day, cable, halter, and shroud.

From fields of sense, and mines of thought,
Threads of life are twisted and wrought:
We are weaving Character, weaving Fate,
And Human History, little and great.

VERY HARD CASH.

By CHARLES READE, Esq.

AUTHOR OF "IT IS NEVER TOO LATE TO MEND," &c.

CHAPTER XLIII.

ON Alfred's leaving Silverton, Mrs. Archbold was prostrated. It was a stunning blow to her young pretensions, and left her weary, desolate.

But she was too strong to lie helpless under disappointed longings. Two days she sat stupefied with the horror of it, after that she burst about her work in a fervor of half-crazy restlessness, and ungovernable irritability, quenched at times by fits of weeping. As she wept she cursed, but raged and tyrannized in public, she soon made Silverton and Overton Over, especially to those who had the luck to be of her sex. Toen Baker timidly remonstrated: at the first word she snapped him up and said a change would be good for both of them: he apologized; in vain: that very day she closed by letter with Dr. Wolf, who had often invited her to be his "Matron." Her motive, half hidden from herself, was to be any where near her favorite.

Installed at Drayton House, she waited some days, and coquetted woman-like with her own desires, then dressed neatly, but soberly, and called at Dr. Wycherley's in a new character, pleading who she was, with a bit of soft sawder, and asked to see Alfred.

She was politely but peremptorily refused. She felt this rebuff bitterly. She went home smug and thought over her cure. But Hannah's wholesome bo: offended pride now allied with strong good sense to wither a wild affection and, as it were, to cut off by the peremptory of its object, her wound healed, all but the occasional dull throbbing that precedes a perfect cure.

At this stage of her convalescence Dr. Wolf told her in an off-hand way that Mr. Hardie, a patient of distinction, in Overton Over, was coming to asylum, to be kept there by hook or by crook. (She was entrusted with Wolf's confidence, and he talked of these things to her in English.) The impenetrable creature assented outwardly, with no sign of emotion whatever, but one flash of the eye, and one heave of the bosom swiftly suppressed. She waited calmly and patiently till she was alone, then yielded to joy and triumph; they seemed to leap inside her. But this very thing alarmed her: "Better for me never to see him again," she thought. "His power over me is too terrible. Ah, good-by to the peace and comfort I have been building up! He will scatter them to the winds, like his."

She tried not to think of him too much. And, while she was struggling, Wolf let out that Alfred was to have morphia at dinner the first day; morphia, the accursed drug with which these dark souls in these dark places cure the reason away out of the head by degrees, or with a potent dose stupefy the victim, then act surprise, shrug a shoulder, and assume the ground for applying medical treatment to the doomed wretch. Edith Archbold knew the game, and at the word morphia Fry and Passion rose in her bosom irresistible. She smiled in Dr. Wolf's face, and thanked him, and secretly got herself up to be his him, and protect Alfred's reason, and win his heart through his gratitude.

She succeeded. I have related, to throw dust in Dr. Wolf's eyes: but she acted so admirably that some went into Alfred's. "Ah," thought he, "she is angry with herself for her amorous folly; and, with the justice of her sex, she means to spite poor me for it." He sighed; for he felt her tenderly would be fatal to him. To give her no fresh offense, he fell into her manner, and began with a world of distant respect. Then again, when she saw that he must have warned him against poison? Then again, if so, why had he not warned her? He cast his eyes one or two wistful glances at her; but the artful woman of thirty was impenetrable in public to the artless boy of twenty-one. Soon her passion could not put them on an equality.

That night he could not sleep. He lay wondering what would be the next foul practice, and how he should parry it.

He wrote next morning to the Commissioners that two of their number, unacquainted with the previous proceedings of the Board, had been surprised into making an order of transfer to an asylum bearing a very inferior character to Dr. Wycherley's; the object of this was clearly foul play. Accordingly, Dr. Wolf had already tried to poison his reason by drugging his beer at dinner. He added that Dr. Wycherley had now signed a certificate of his sanity, and implored the Board to inspect it, and discharge him at once, or else let a solicitor visit him at once, and take the requisite steps toward a public inquiry.

While waiting anxiously for the answer, it cost him all his philosophy to keep his heart from eating itself. But he fought the good fight of Reason: he invited the confidences of the quieter mad people, and established a little court, and heard their grievances, and by impartial decisions and good humor won the regard of the moderate patients, and of the attendants, all but three; Rooke, the head-keeper, a morose burly ruffian; Hayes, a bilious subordinate, Rooke's shadow; and Vulcan, a huge mastiff that would let nobody but Rooke touch him; he was kept in a large call, and formidable as a small lion, though nearly toothless with age. He was let loose in the yard at night, and was an element in the Restraint System; many a patient would have tried to escape but for Vulcan. He was also an invaluable howler at night, and so cooperated with Dr. Wolf's bugs and fleas to avert sleep, that vile foe to insanity and all our diseases, private asylums include.

Alfred treated Mrs. Archbold with a distant respect that cut her to the heart. But while woman wore sweetness and unobtrusive kindness, and bided her time. At last he gave her an opportunity, and it will be seen whether she took it.

In Drayton House the keepercess eclipsed the keepers in cruelty to poor patients. No men except Dr. Wolf and his assistant had a pass-key into their department, so there was nobody they could deceive, nobody to hold worth the trouble. In the absence of male critics they showed their real selves, and how wise it is in the asylum system to lock in the dark a defenseless female power females. With unflagging patience they applied the hourly torture of petty annoyance, needless humiliation, unprovoked insults, to the poor mad women; bored them with the poisoned gimlet, and made their hearts bleed. Their mis-inclinations. But anomaly and petty caprice were not enough for them, though these never fail to produce a terrible crop of misery, but with degrading and savage names. Billingsgate might have gone to school to Drayton House, found its vocabulary in love with a term that Othello hit upon; only they used it not once, but fifty times a day, and struck decent women with it on the face as with a scorpion's tail, and then the scalding tears were sure to run in torrents adown their silly, honest, burning cheeks. But as was not enough. They got a large tank in a flagged room, nominally for cleanliness and cure, but really for bane and torture. For the latest offense, when all other resources failed, they would drag a patient stark naked across the yard, and thrust her bodily under the cold water and again, and again, keep her down till almost gone with suffocation, and dismissing her more dead than alive to a corner, where the poor creature would, ranging in her ears, to get warm again in the cold. This my ladies called "tanking."

In the ordinary manner patients were never tanked without suffocating. But the immersion of the whole body in cold water was of itself a severe shock to strong constitutions, and in weak ones the circulation was weak; and, as medical treatment, hurtful and even dangerous. Finally these keepercesses, with diabolical ingenuity, were contriving to exhaust the twenty patients in this tank, and then make them drink that foul water for their supper.

"The dark places of the land are full of horrible cruelty."

One day they tanked so savagely that Nurse Eliza, after months of sickly disapproval, came to the new entered conclusion that it was wrong.

What was he to do? He seized the only chance of redress; he ran panting with indignation to Mrs. Archbold, and, bursting in on her imperiously, "Oh, Mrs. Archbold, you used to be kind-hearted—" and he could say no more for choking rising in his throat.

Mrs. Archbold smiled encouragingly on him, and said softly, "I am the same I always was—kind-hearted."

"Oh, thank you; then pray send for Nurse Eliza, and hear her complaint of the being done to the patients within a yard of us."

"You had better tell me yourself, if you want me to pay any attention to it."

"I can't. I don't know how to speak to a lady of such things as are done here. The nurse! the cowards! the devils! Oh, how I should like to kill them!"

Mrs. Archbold laughed a little at his enthusiasm (fancy laughing at what was done to a pack of women), and sent for Nurse Eliza. She came, and, in a homely manner, told a much worse story than she had Alfred. "And, ma'am," said she, whimpering, "they have just been taking one they had no business with at all, to a Mrs. Dale, her that is so close on her confinement. They tanked her cruel they did, and they her under water, and she is dead and gone. Ma'am, I saw the baby under her skin struggling at them using its poor mother so barbarous. It came into my mind, I couldn't bear it."

Alfred was walking about in a fury, and Nurse Eliza, in making this last revolving communication, turned her back on him. He saw it bear; but his senses were quick. I think he heard, by that, a movement quicker than them.

"Mrs. Archbold, you are strong and brave, for a woman; oh, do go in to them and take them by the wrist, and save this life out of them, the merciless, cowardly beasts! Oh that I could be a woman for an hour, or they would be men. I'd soon have my foot on some of the wretches."

Mrs. Archbold acted Ignition. "Come with me, both of you," she said, and led the way soon in the female department. Up came keepercesses civilly, smiling and courtesying to her, and pretending not to look at Adonis. "Which of you nurses tanked Mrs. Dale?" said she, sternly.

"Twasn't I, ma'am, twasn't I."

"Oh fie!" said Eliza to one, "you know you were at the head of it."

She pointed out two as the leaders. The Archbold instantly had them seized by the others—who, with treachery equal to their cowardice, turned eagerly against their fellow-culprits, to make friends with Power—and inviting all the sensible maniacs who had been tanked to assist or inspect, she bared her own statuesque arms, and, ably aided, soon plunged the offenders, screaming, crying, and whining, like spanked bitches whipped, under the dirty water. They swallowed some, and appreciated their own acts. Then she forced them to walk twice round the yard with their wet clothes clinging to them, hooted by the late victims.

"There," said Alfred, "let that teach you men will not own hyenas in petticoats for women."

Poor Alfred took all the credit of this performance; but, in fact, when the Archbold invited him to bear a hand he showed the white feather.

"I won't touch the blackguardesses," said he, haughtily, turning it off on the score of contempt. "You give them! Again! again! Brava!"

Signal retribution completed, Mrs. Archbold told the nurses if ever "tanking" recurred she would bundle the whole female staff into the street, and then have them indicted by the Commissioners.

These virtuous acts did Edith Archbold for love for a young man. Whether mad women or sane women, pregnant, or the reverse, were tanked or not, she cared at heart no more than about the sparrows that twitter on or in Ettrick's distant dale. She was retiring with a tender look at Alfred, and her pulse secretly unaccelerated by those scenes, when her self-love, when her grateful favorite appealed to her again.

"Dear Mrs. Archbold, shall we punish and comfort?" poor Mrs. Dale!"

The Archbold could have boxed his ears. "Dear boy," said she, "you shall study; you shall teach us all our duty." She visited the tanked one, found her in's cold room after it, shivering like ague, and her teeth chattering. Mrs. Archbold had her to the fire, and got her warm clothes, and a pint of wine, and probably saved her life and her child's—for love of a young man.

Why I think Mrs. Dale would otherwise have left this shifting scene, Mrs. Carey, the last woman in her condition they tanked and then turned into a flagged cell that only wanted one drop of water, to hold their room after motherhood, in which they bundled her out of the asylum to die. She died in a day or two, at home, but, unnoticed by the asylum; and they told the Commissioners she died through her friends taking her away from the asylum too soon. The Commissioners had nothing to do but believe this, and did believe it. Inspectors, who visit a temple of darkness, mercy, and hypocrisy, three times a year, know mighty little of what goes on there the odd three hundred and sixty-one days, five hours and a quarter, minus the Sundays.

"Now, Alfred," said Mrs. Archbold, "I can be a very wheedling, or know every thing; so you come to me when any thing grieves you; and let me be the agent of your charity."

She said this so charmingly he was surprised into kissing her fair hand; then blushed, and thanked her with his eyes. She established a chain between them. When he let too long elapse without appealing to her she would ask the advice about the case of this or that patient; and so she cajoled him by the two foibles she had discerned in him—his vanity and his humanity.

Besides Alfred, there were two patients in Drayton House who had never been insane; a young man, and a young woman; of whom anon. There were also three ladies and one gentleman, who had been insane, but had recovered years ago. This little incident, Recovery, is followed in a public asylum by instant discharge; but, in a private one, though not Sanity, is apt to enter the question of egress. The gentleman's case was scarce credible in the nineteenth century: years ago, being violently crazked, he had gone what Dr. Wycherley told Alfred was a sure sign of sanity; i.e. he had declared himself insane: and this being so reasonable as to assign his own order and certificates, and so imprison himself illegally, but with perfect ease; no consequences more than illegality from the guardians of the law! When he got what pain men call sane, he sent for your lunn, and, think your consols, and bury you in a pauper's shroud. As Mr. Aldridge was dead for those victims was to promise to try and get them out some day, D.V. But there was a weak-minded youth, Francis Beverley, who had the honor to be under the protection of the Lord Chancellor. Now a lunatic or a Softy protected by that functionary is generally a lamb protected by a wolf, and that wolf ex-officio the cruelest, cunningest, old manager and fleecer of innocents in Christendom. Chancery lunatics are the richest class, yet numbers of them are flung among pauper and even criminal lunatics, at a few pounds a year, while their committees buy four-fifths of the money that has been assigned to keep the patient in comfort.

Unfortunately the protection of the Chancellor extends to Life and Reason, as well as Fleece; with the following result:

* Arithmetic of my boyhood. I bear the world revolves some minutes quicker now.

In private asylums about forty per cent. are said to be cured.

In private ones twenty-five per cent. are at least; most of them poorish.

Of Chancery Lunatics not five per cent.

Finally, one-third of all the Chancery Lunatics do every six years exchange the living tombs they are fleeced and bullied in for dead tombs, where they rest; and go from the sham protection of the Lord Chancellor of England to the real protection of their Creator and their Judge.

These statistics have been long before the world, and are mere figures to the Skimmer of things, but tell a dark tale to the Reader of things: so dark, that I pray Heaven to protect me, and all other weak intellectual beings, from the protection of my Lord Chancellor in this kind.

Beverley was so unfortunate as to exist before the date of the above petition; and suffered the consequences.

He was an aristocrat by birth, noble on both sides of his house, and unluckily had money. But for that he would have been a laboring man, and free. My Lord Protector committed him with six hundred pounds a year maintenance-money to the care of his committee, the Honorable Fynes Beverley.

Now this corporate, yet honorable, individual, to whom confidence was committed, and solemnly Lane called him in its own sweet French the Schoolboy's emblem, was a gentleman of birth, breeding, and intelligence. He undertook to take care of his simple cousin: and how did he take care of was himself.

THE SUB-LESSEE'S SWINDLE.

1. The Honorable Fynes Beverley, Anglo-French committee, or crown tenant, sub-let Scrit Francis for £300 a year, pocketed £300, and pocketed his hands of Frank.

2. Mr. Heselden, the sub-tenant, sub-let the Scrits and his rights for ever for £150, pocketed the money, and washed his hands of it.

3. The £150 man sub-let him to Dr. Wolf at £60 a year, pouched the surplus, and washed his hands of it.

And now what on earth was left for poor Dr. Wolf to do? Could he sub-embezzle a Highlander's breeks? Could he subsist more than her skin from off the singed cat? Could he suck the core out of a nutshell, and throw away a grated cheese rind? Could he flay a skinned flint? Could he fleece a bog just after Satan had shaved it and put on a tonsure to egg?

Let no man dare to limit genius; least of all the genius of extortion.

Dr. Wolf could, comparatively more out of young Frank than did any of the preceding screws. He turned him into a servant of all work and bore many more money pulls, £45 out of the £60, or three-fourths, whereas the others had only bagged one-half. But by this means he got a nice servant without wages, and on half a servant's food, clearing £22 and 10 in three-quarters.

Victim of our great national vice and foible, Vicariousness, this scion of a noble house, presented in theory by the crown, vicariously subprotected by the Chancellor, sub-vicariously subsham-protected by his kin, was really flung unprotected into the fleece market, and let be pen—at the end of the long chain of subs, pros, vices, locos, shams, shuffles, swindles, and lies reaching the carpets, making the Lord Chancellor, the waiting the water, sweeping the rooms, and scouring the sordid vessels, of thirty patients by twenty. Of these twenty, one of whom was his equal either in birth or wealth; and of four menials, who were all his masters and mates at once. His work was always doing, never done. He was not the least mad nor bad, but merely of feeble intellect all round. Fifty luckless gentlemen's families would have been glad of him at £300 a year, and made a son and a brother of him, and he was pocketed by proxy by the Lord Chancellor. Thin, half-starved, threadbare, cut at elbows, the universal butt, scoffed at by the very lunatics, and especially ill-used by the attendants whose work he did gratis, he was sworn at, jeered, insulted, cuffed, and kicked, very often by the hard, hard life. And yet he was a gentleman, though a soft one; his uncle, his father, his cousins, were gentlemen, and all an indefinable stamp of race. How had it outlived such crushing, degrading usage? I don't know. Perhaps; how does any one survive the iron roller? Alfred soon found him out, and, to every body's amazement, especially himself, unconstrained gently but resolutely and eloquently, and soon convinced the majority, sane and insane, that a creature so meek and timid should be treated with kindness, not cruelty. One keeper, The Robin, alias Tom Wales, an ex-prize fighter, was a very hard nut to crack at first. Among the maniacs only one held out, and said contemptuously he couldn't see it.

"Well," said Alfred, "I'll not trouble him after this, and I'll lay a hand on you, and aid your intellectual vision."

Rooke and Hayes treated remonstrance with open and galling contempt. Yet the tide of opinion changed so, they did not care to defy it openly: but Rooke bullied poor Beverley now and then on the sly, and he never told. He was too inoffensive for this world. But one day, as Alfred was sitting with his door ajar, writing a letter of earnest expostulation to the Commissioners, who had left his first unanswered, he heard Hayes at the head of the stairs call roughly to "Frank! Frank!"

"Sir," replied the soft little voice of young Beverley.

"Come, you quick young shaver."

"I'm coming, Sir," and up ran Beverley.

"Here take this tray down stairs."

"Yes, Sir."

"Stop, there's a bit of bread for you." And

Hayes checked him a crust, as one throws it to another man's dog.

"Thank you, Sir," said Mr. Beverley, stooping down for it, and being habitually as hungry as a rat-catcher's tyke, took an eager bite in that position.

"How dare you eat it there?" said Hayes, brutally: "take it to your own crib: come, mizzle. And with that lent him a contemptuous kick behind, which, owing to his position, sent him off his balance flat on the tray; a glass broke under him; poor young Mr. Beverley us'ered a cry of misery, for he knew Hayes would not own himself the cause; Hayes cursed him for an awkward idiot, and the oath were off into a howl, for Alfred ran out at him brimful of Moses, and with a savage kick on the rump and blow on the ear administered unmistakably barbed him head foremost down the stairs. Alighting on the seventh step, he turned a somersault, and bounded like a ball on to the landing below, and there lay stupefied. He picked himself up by slow degrees, and glared round with bewildered awe and amazement up at the human thunder-bolt that had shot out on him and sent him flying like a feather. He shook his head, and limped silently away all bruises and curses, to tell Rooke, and concert vengeance. Alfred, trembling still with the rook Beverley to his room (the boy was as white as a sheet), and encouraged him, and made him wash pretty well, brushed his hair, dressed him in a decent Tweed suit he had outgrown, and taking him under his arm, and walking with his own nose majestically in the air, paraded him up and down the asylum, to show them all the best man in the house respected the poor soft gentleman. And the second thing it is to be young Beverley clung to his protector too much like a girl, but walked gracefully and kept step, and every now and then looked up at Alfred with a loving adoration, that was sweet yet sad to see. Alfred marched him to Mrs. Archbold, and told his tale; for the moment Hayes would misrepresent it, and get him into trouble. She smiled on the pair; gently deplored the novice's impetuosity, protested him not to go fighting with that great monster Rooke, and charmed him by saying, "Well, and think is a gentleman, when he is dressed like one."

"Isn't he?" said Alfred, eagerly. "And when finit is it he is always dressed like one? Whose fault that here's an earl's nephew Book in Hell?"

"Nor yours, Alfred, nor mine," was the hon. eyed reply.

In vain did Mr. Hayes prefer his complaint to Dr. Wolf. The Archbold had been before him, and the answer was, "Served you right."

These and many other good deeds did Alfred Hardie in Drayton House. But, as the days rolled on, and no answer came from the Commissioners, his anxiety, grief, and dismay left him less and less able to sympathize with the material but smaller wrongs around him. He became silent, distrait.

At last he came to Mrs. Archbold, and said, sternly, his letters to the Commissioners were intercepted.

"I can't believe that," said she. "It is against the law."

So it was: but law and custom are two.

"I am sure of it," said he: "and may the eternal curse of Heaven light on the cowardly traitor and miscreant who has done it." And he stalked gloomily away.

When he left her she sighed at this imprecation from his lips; but did not repent. "I can't part with him," she said, despairingly; "and, if I did not pay to post dear letters, W. W. would!" and the amorous crocodile shed a tear, and persisted in her double-faced course.

By-and-by, when she saw him getting thinner and paler, and his bright face downcast and inexpressibly sad, she shared his misery; ay, shed scalding tears that as yet could not dry him up; for her will was as strong as the rest of her was supple: and hers was hot love, but not true love like Julia's.

Perhaps a very subtle observer seeing this man and woman every day and spiritless together, and one house might have divined her secret. Dr. Wolf then was no such observer, for she made him believe she had a rising penchant for him. He really had a strong one for her.

While Alfred's visible misery pulled at her heart-strings, and sometimes irritated, sometimes melted her, came curious complications; one of which requires preface.

Mrs. Ellis was not the wife to trust blindly where her poor husband was concerned; she probed to the last a keepership that gave a small asylum near London, and kept by a Mrs. Ellis. "Women are not cruel to men," said the sagacious Lady Mary.

But, alas! if women are not cruel where sex comes in and mimics that wider sentiment Humanity, women are quite unequal. Largely gifted with that household virtue, Mrs. Ellis kept too few servants, and, save conscientiously, kept the house, too many strait-jackets, hobbles, muffs, leg-locks, body-belts, etc., etc. Hence half her patients poorly and wretchedly kept and tortured by cruel restraints administered not out of hearty cruelty, but female parsimony. Mrs. and Miss Dodd owned the house one day when the fair economist was out, and found seven patients out of the twelve kept out of mischief thus: one in a restraint chair, two hobbled like asses, two chained like dogs, and two in strait-waistcoats, and fastened to beds by webbing and straps; among the latter David, though quiet as a lamb.

Mrs. Dodd cried over him as if her heart would break, and made Miss Dodd shift him to a free asylum, where I believe he was very well used.

But here those dreadful newspapers interfered; a spring into sweet secluded spots. They diversified Mrs. Dodd's breakfast by informing her that the doctor of this asylum had just killed a patient; the mode of execution bloodless and sure, as became fair science. It was a man between sixty and seventy; an age at which the heart can seldom stand very much shocking, or lowering, especially where the brain is diseased. So they placed him in a shower-bath, hot enough to scald a lobster, without the falling water, which of necessity drives out air. In short, a vertical box with holes all round the top.

Here the doctor ordered him a cold shower-bath of unparalleled duration and fall of hour. To be followed by an unprecedented dose of tartar emetic. This double-barrelled order given, the doctor went away to dinner.

The water was down to forty-five degrees Fahrenheit. Half an hour's nower-bath at that temperature in a roomy bath would kill the youngest and strongest man in her Majesty's dominions.

For eight-and-twenty mortal minutes the poor old man stood in this vertical coffin under this cold cascade. So much of the column of cold water were in that his last hour, his last half hour, discharged upon his devoted head and doomed body.

He had to be helped away from this death-torment he had walked into his high spirits, poor soul.

Even this change awakened no misgivings, no remorse; though you or I, or any man or woman picked at hazard out of the London world at once have seen that he was dying, he was duly dosed by the fire with four spoonfuls of antimonial tincture—enough to kill a horse. Even this "Destructive Art of Healing" can not slay the slain. The old man lived seven days after; before it could hurt him he died of the bath; and his body told its own sad tale: to use the words of a medical eye-witness, it was "a picture OF ALABASTER." The death-torment had driven the whole circulation from the surface.*

Mrs. Ellis, the lawful widow relict of Sampson's assurance that this was the asylum of all others they would not settle another patient in until the matter should be sifted, got, did Eve Dodd to write to Dr. Wolf, and offer £300 a year if he would take David at once, and treat him with special eye-sweet.

He showed this letter triumphantly to Mrs. Archbold, and she, blinded by the temptation of a big, diamond-set ring from receiving Captain Dodd. He stared at her. "What, turn away a couple of thousand pounds?"

"But they will come to visit him; and perhaps see him."

"No, that can be managed. You must be on your guard: and I'll warn Rooke. I can't turn away money—on a chance."

So that was settled: himself locked into his room. This was unusual: for, though they called him a lunatic in words, they called him sane by all their acts. Dr. Wolf reported to the Commissioners were in the house.

Had he known who really was in the house he would have beaten himself to pieces against the door.

At dinner there was a new patient, very mild and silent, with a beautiful large brown eye, like some gentle animal's.

Mrs. Archbold very much struck with this eye and contrived to say a kind word to him after dinner. Finding himself addressed by a gentle voice, the new-comer rose from his chair, and made a sea scrape, and announced himself as William Thompson; he added with simple pride, "Able Seaman." Then he sat down, and looked again, "Just come aboard, your honor." After this, which came off glibly, he was shy thus addressed a second time. Alfred therefore moved to extract from him that he was rather glad to leave his last ship, on account of having had to fix a high elm-tree in the court-yard. Alfred had half a mind not to interfere. "Who cares for my misery?" he said. But his better nature prevailed, and he told the Robin he was sure going a thingumjerry rigging would do Thompson very good this harbor.

On this the men reluctantly gave him a trial, and he went up the tree with a certain dexterity and agility, but evident caution. Still Alfred quaked when he crossed his thighs tight over a limb of the tree that was not above fifty feet high carefully and minutely through the whole process of furling imaginary sails. However, he came down with manifest soothed mind. This strange, and, singular phenomenon, he was quite cool; and it was the spectators on deck who perspired.

"And what a pleasant voice he has," said Alfred's sister, "and what a mind: he is much like a mad voice. It is like—I'm mad myself."

"And he has got a fiddle, and plays it like a harper, by a man's account I suggested her. He won't touch it but when he has a mind."

At night Alfred dreamed he heard Julia's sweet, mellow voice speaking to him; and he looked, and lo! it was the able seaman. He could sleep no more, but lay sighing.

Ere the able seaman had been there three days, Mrs. Dodd came unexpectedly to see him; and it was with the utmost difficulty Alfred was smuggled out of the way. Mrs. Archbold saw by her leaving anxiety there would be frequent, and, unless Alfred was kept constantly locked up, which was repugnant to her, they would meet some day. She knew there are men who ply the trade of spies, and where to find them; she set one of them to watch Mrs. Dodd's house, and follow her hacks, in hopes of getting some clew as to when she might be expected.

Now it so happened that looking for one thing she found another. This gave her great hopes and courage. And then the sight of Alfred's misery was a temptation, and then he was beginning half to suspect her of stopping his letters. Passion, impatience, pity, and calculation, all three had the same end, and led to an extraordinary scene, so impregnated with the genius of the mad-house—a place where the passions run out to the very end of their tether—that I feel little able to describe it; I will try and indicate it.

One fine Sunday afternoon then she asked Alfred languidly would he like to walk in the country.

"Would I like? Ah, don't trifle with a prisoner," said he, sorrowfully.

She shook her head. "No, no, it will not be a happy walk: Dodge, who hates you, is to follow us with that terrible mastiff, to pull you down if you run. You would not give Dr. Wolf to consent on any other terms; Alfred, let us give up the idea. I fear your rashness."

"No, no, I will be prudent, I promise you. I have not seen a blade of grass this six months."

The accomplished dissembler hesitated, yield-ed. Then she went through the yard and out at the back door, which Alfred had so often looked wistfully at; and by-and-by reached a delicious pasture; a little meadow basin streamed across it. Nature never seemed so sweet, so divine, to Alfred before; the sun as bright as mid-summer, though not so hot; and the air fresh, yet genial, and perfumed with Liberty and the smaller flowers of earth. He sprang gilded rustling by his side, and dark eyes subdued their native fire into softness whenever they turned on him; and scarce fifty yards from the house a bully and a man-stiff ready to tear him down if he should break away from hearty's light hand, that rested so kindly on his arm. A young, and stout-hearted, and relished his peep of liberty and nature, though blotted by Vulcan and Rooke. He chatted to her with a flow in good spirits. She answered briefly, and listlessly.

At last she stopped under a young chestnut tree as if overcome by a sudden reflection, and turning half away from him leaned her head and hand upon a bough and sighed. The attitude was not unnatural, but it was studied. He asked her with innocent concern what was the matter; then hastily, should it prove so, and was. All her answer was to press his hand with hers that was disengaged, and, instead of sighing, to cry.

The nerves of a woman were set himself to comfort her—in vain: to question her—in vain at first, but by degrees she allowed him to learn that it was for her sake she wept; and so that he proceeded on the old, old plan, the man extorting from the woman bit by bit just so much as she was willing to say, and what he knew, and poured in a stream if let quite alone.

He drew from his distressed friend that Dr. Wolf had spoken of his case, and made special inquiries about the Dodds; that she had fortunately the unfortunate habit of this, and had questioned the person employed, hoping to hear something that might comfort Alfred. "Instead of that," she said, "I find Miss Dodd is like most girls; out of sight is out of mind with her."

"What do you mean?" said Alfred, trembling suddenly.

"Do not ask me. What a weak fool I was to let you see I was unhappy for you."

"The truth is the truth," gasped Alfred: "tell me at once."

"Well, I am afraid you will hate me; for I should hate any one who told me your faults. Well, then—if I must—Miss Dodd has a beau."

"It is a lie!" cried Alfred, furiously.

"I wish it was. But, alas! it is in fact, both of them clergymen: however, one seems the favorite; at least they are engaged to be married; and I fear, from what I have seen, she is not true to him. By what I hear she is one of the religious ones: so perhaps that has brought the pair to an understanding."

At these words a cold sickness rushed all over Alfred, beginning at his heart. He stood white and trembling, and shocked them, in the anguish of his heart, broke out into a great and terrible cry, like that of a young lion wounded with a poisoned shaft.

Then he was silent, and stood stock-still, like petrified despair.

Mrs. Archbold was prepared for an outburst; but not of this kind. His anguish was so unlike a woman's that it staggered her. He grew red and bad angels, to use an expressive though somewhat too poetical phrase, battled for her. She had a fine opportunity for his gratitude for life, to let him out of the asylum ere Julia should be Mrs. Hurd, and even liberty came too late for true love. She looked again at the statue of grief by her side: and burst out crying in earnest.

This was unfortunate. Shallow pity exuding in salt-water leaves not enough behind to guilt with its golden hue.

She only tried to undo her own work in part; to comfort him a little with commonplaces: she told him in a soothing whisper there were other women in the world besides this inconstant girl, others who could love him as he deserved.

He made no answer to all she could say, but just waved his hand once impatiently. Petty consolation seemed to sting him.

Then she began to feel impatient, angry. "How he clings to that fickle girl!" she said. "I might as well make love to a stone."

Then they stood both of them apart in sombre silence a while.

Her mood changed; she moved noiselessly toward him, and, standing half behind him, laid her hand softly on his shoulder, and poured her passion in his ear. "Alfred," she murmured, "we are both unhappy; let us comfort one another. I had pity on you at Silverton House, I pity you now; pity me a little in return. Help me out of this dreadful house, out of this revolting life, and let me be with you. Let me be your housekeeper, your servant, your slave. This news that has shocked you so has torn the veil from my eyes. I thought I had cooled my love down to friendship and tender esteem; but no, now I see you as unhappy as myself, now I can speak and wrong on one, I own I—oh Alfred, my heart burns for you, bleeds for you, yearns for you, sickens for you, dies for you."

"Oh, hush! hush! Mrs. Archbold. You are saying things you will blush for the next moment."

"I blush now, but can not hush; I have gone too far. And your happiness as well as mine is at stake. My young girl can understand as well as a man a man's love are: but I, like you, have suffered; I, like you, am constant; I, like you, am worthy of a lover: at my age a woman's love is bliss to him who can gain it; and I love you with all my soul, Alfred; I worship the ground you walk on, my sweet, sweet boy. Say you the word, dearest, and I will bribe the servants, and get the keys, and sacrifice my profession and my character for you! (see how sweet the open face of nature is, sweeter than any thing on earth, but love!); and all I ask is a little, little of your gratitude in return. Come, Alfred, to make you mine forever; and, if I fail, treat me as I shall deserve: desert me at once; and you will find me a generous enemy. I'll only ask for you; as I have lived for you ever since I first saw your beautiful face."

The passionate woman paused at last, but her hot cheek and heaving bosom and tender convulsive hand betrayed the agitation of her soul.

I am afraid few men of her own age would have resisted her, for voice and speech and all were full of pleading, and strange excitement, and, so reasonable, lads; she did not stipulate for constancy.

But Alfred turned round to her blushing and sorrowful: "For shame!" he said; "this is not love: you abuse that sacred word. Indeed, if you are unhappy, Mrs. Archbold, you have pitied me and Julia long ago, and respected our love; and sooner by giving me my liberty than any gain. I am not a fool: do you think I don't know that you are my jailer, and the cunningest and most remorseless I ever met all?"

"You ungrateful wretch," she sobbed.

"No; I am not ungrateful either," said he, more gently. "You have always come between me and that kind of torture which most terrifies vulgar souls; and I thank you for it. Only, if you could but feel the dreadful misery of my heart, I should thank you more still. As it is, I forgive you for the share you have had in that: you have been kind to me for life, and surely will ever know what you have been mad enough in an unguided moment to say; and for pity's sake talk no more of love: we mock my misery."

Mrs. Archbold was white with ire long before he had done this sentence. "You insolent creature," said she; "you spurn my love; you shall feel my hate."

"So I conclude," said he, coldly: "such love as yours is hard by hate."

"It is," said she: "and I know how I'll combine the two. You shall feel my hate, and you spurned me; ere long you shall love me, and I'll despise you; and not spurn you."

"Your conversation," said Alfred, feelingly, "is unintelligible."

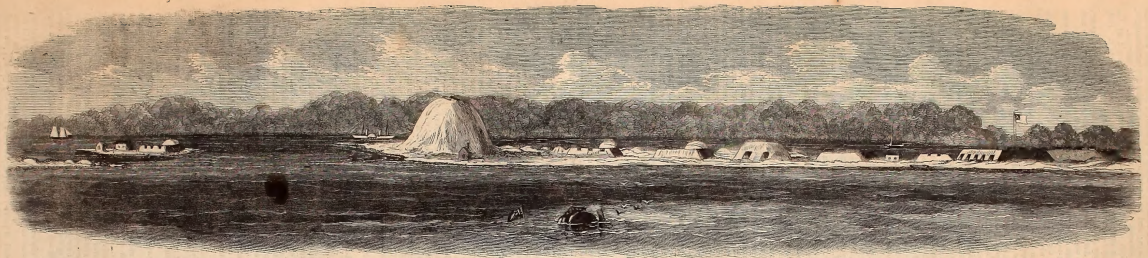
"What," said she, "don't you see how the superior mind can fascinate the inferior? Look at Frank Beverley; how he follows you about and worships you, like a little dog."

"I prefer his sort of affection to yours."

"A gentleman and a man would have kept that to himself: but you are neither one nor the other; or you would have taken my offer, and then run away from me the next day, you fool. Now you shall see what a woman's hate is here. Ah, you nimbre Frank's affection; well, you shall imitate it. You couldn't love me like a man, you shall love me like a cur."

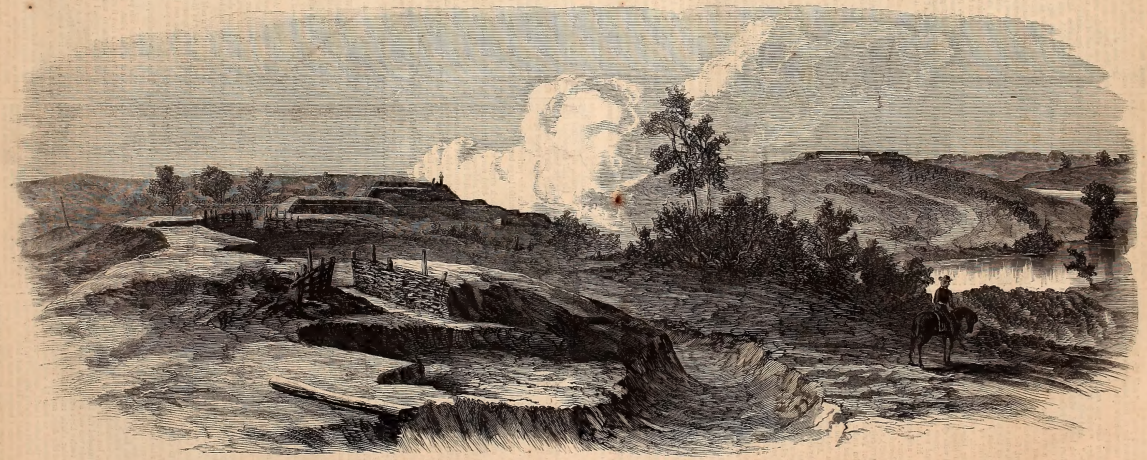
"How will you manage that, pray?" he inquired, quite mad.

"I'll drive you mad."



She kissed this fiendish threat out between her white teeth.

"Ay, Sir," she said, "hitherto your reason has only encountered men. You shall see now what an insulted woman can do. A brute you shall be ere long, and then I'll make you love me, dote on me, follow me about for a kennel, and think I'll leave off hating you, and love you once more, but not the way I did five minutes ago."



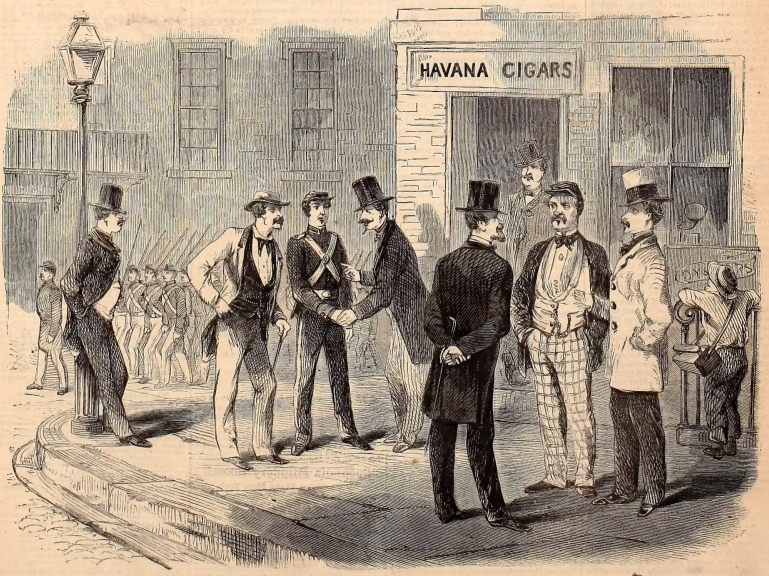
Then she depraved threat Alfred ground his teeth, and said: "Then I give you my honor that the moment I see my reason the least shaken, I'll kill you: and so save myself from the degradation of being your lover on any terms."

"Threaten your own sex with that," said the Archbold, contemptuously; "you may kill me between your hands: and the sooner the better. Only, if you don't do it very quickly, you shall be my property; my brain-sick, love-sick slave."

* The mode of execution is well known in the United States. They settle refractory prisoners with it periodically. But half an hour is not needed; twenty minutes will do the trick. Harper's Weekly, a year or two ago, contained an admirable wood-cut of a negro's execution by water. In this remarkable picture you see the poor darkey seated pour-ing, kneeling and pouring his life away under the sturdy cascade: and there stands the stalid torrent, pour-ing forward, stiff as a ramrod, pulling steadily string with a sort of drill exercise air, and no more compunction or affection about it than a mechanical engineer would have to pull strings or triggers on his own string being pulled by butler or fool. A picture well studied, and worth study.

REBEL BATTERIES AT NEW INLET, WILMINGTON, NORTH CAROLINA, AS SEEN FROM THE UNITED STATES STEAM SLOOP "IROQUOIS."—[SEE PAGE 711.]

WORKS THROWN UP NEAR THE RAILROAD BRIDGE OVER THE RAPPAHANNOCK.—SKETCHED BY A. R. WAUD.—[SEE PAGE 711.]



THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC—GAMBLERS AT THE PROVOST MARSHAL'S HEAD-QUARTERS.—[SKETCHED BY A. R. WAUD.]

GAMBLERS IN THE ARMY.

How General Patrick deals with gambling we discover from the picture above.

Mr. Waud writes: "Some inveterate players, belonging to the Ninety-third New York, were provided with a table, dice, and a tin cup for a dice-box, and, under charge of a guard, were kept at their favorite amusement all day, playing for beans, with boards slung on their shoulders with the word GAMBLER written on them. They did not seem to enjoy it, an attempt to make the most of their time and play for greenbacks being nipped in the bud. Dinner was also denied them, on the plea that gamblers have no time for meals. Much harm, no doubt, results from gambling; but it is useless to punish the men while it is so prevalent a vice with the officers."

Gambling has always been more or less prevalent in armies.

GAMBLERS, THIEVES, AND VAGABONDS—A SCENE IN WASHINGTON.—[SEE PAGE 711.]

COMING TO LIFE AGAIN.

A most wonderful death-in-life experience is that of Francois de Civille, who, to use his own words, was "thrice dead, three interred, and thrice, by the grace of God, restored to life." The mother of this gentleman, having died during pregnancy, was buried in her husband's absence without any attempt being made to save her offspring; but upon the return of the good man immediately afterward he caused her to be disinterred, when, by means of the Cæsarean operation, a living child rewarded his pious care. This child was five-and-twenty years old, and a captain in Rouen, when that story was taken by Charles IX. Being dreadfully wounded, and having fallen from the rampart into the ditch, some pioneers threw him, with another body, into a hole, and there covered him with a little earth. Here he lay for seven hours, until his faithful servant came at dusk and dug him up, when, finding some signs of life, he was removed to his own home, where he lay for five days and nights insensible and speechless. The city being taken by assault, the Seigneur de Civille, quiet his apartment for their own uses, threw him out of window upon a dunghill: and from this couch, which seems to have possessed more of these disadvantageous qualities which modern science ascribes to it, he was rescued after a few days by a relative, who removed him to a place of safety, where he obtained a perfect cure. Extraordinary as this story appears, it seems to have gained considerable foundation; nor was François de Civille a Gascon, as may be supposed, but a gentleman of Normandy.

An undoubtedly true experience of resuscitation is that of Margaret Dixon, of Musselburgh, who was hanged at Edinburgh for child-murder in 1728. There seems to be great doubt as to her being guilty of the offense of which she was charged; and therefore her wonderful escape is a satisfactory one strange. At the place of execution, while owning to many sins, she avowed her innocence even of the crime in question, and her husband—who had much to forgive—implicitly believed that statement. After the body had been suspended the usual time, it was delivered to her friends, who put it in a coffin, and sent it in a cart to be interred in her native place. The persons in charge stopped for drink at a public house on the way, and while they were refreshing themselves Mrs. Dixon gave indications to the ex-a-mi-ner in the shed of life's return. She was unbewishing, or, at all events, to get out also. Most of them ran away in terror, but on seeing the presence of mind to bleed her, and got her put to bed; and by the following morning she was well enough to walk to her destination. By Scottish custom, it seems, that a person upon whom judgment has once been executed can not suffer a second time, while the sentence of the law remains in force; and been executed is held to be dissolved. All that the King's Advocate could do, therefore, was to file a bill in High Court of Judiciary against the unfortunate sheriff for omitting to fulfill the law, which was accordingly done. The husband of the revived was married again privately within a few days of her resuscitation, and she was living as late as the year 1753.

In the second series of Captain Gronow's Recollections, just published, there is a curious anachronism of escape from premature interment.

In the retreat of the French army he tells us that General Oronau, a Corsican, second husband of the beautiful Countess Walewska, and a distant relation of the Bonaparte family, received a severe wound from the bursting of a shell, which killed his horse and several soldier who were near him. The General's aid-de-camp, on looking round, observed Oronau lying on his back, to all appearance dead, with the blood flowing from his mouth. A surgeon soon arrived, and declared that life was extinct. The aid-de-camp and a few soldiers commenced digging a grave; but the ground was hard, owing to the terrific cold that prevailed, that they could not make it deep enough to cover the body, and being pressed for time, they arranged the supposed corpse in decent order, and covered it with snow instead of earth. After the army passed the aid-de-camp reported to the Emperor Napoleon, who was not far off, the loss that the army had sustained in General Oronau, who was only twenty-six years of age, and the youngest officer of his rank in the army. The Emperor, who was very fond of the General, was deeply grieved, and exclaimed:

"Pour follow! He was one of my best cavalry officers!" and turning to one of his orderlies, desired him to go immediately and find out all about the wound of the deceased his death. The orderly, in order to satisfy himself upon this point, had the dead man taken out of the snow, and on looking at the wound observed that the body was still warm. Turn and flannels were accordingly heaped upon the corpse, which was placed upon a shutter and taken to head quarters. After much labor and perseverance, he was restored to life, to the joy of his friends, and to the whole army.

"General Oronau," concludes Captain Gronow, "is now (1863) a Marshal of France and Governor of the Invalides, and related the above anecdote to one of my friends last summer."

The most striking of all known cases of premature interment, however, is that related in La Causes Célèbres, and which has formed the text of many a tale, and the trellis work of many a mother tale, from the days of Scheherazade down to the present. It is the story of Gaspard, and Leigh Hunt in his beautiful Accord of Formosa.

Two tradesmen of the Rue St. Honoré, in Paris, being old friends, and possessing one a son and the other a daughter, had early determined, as their betters have often done, upon the marriage of these two young people. They looked forward to thus uniting their two "establishments" with the same pride that two country gentlemen sometimes feel in joining their adjacent estates by the union of the young squire and the heiress. But the latter are more fortunate than fathers in a similar position sometimes find themselves, since that which they had set their minds upon, their offspring were equally anxious to accomplish also. Not very long, however, before the time actually fixed for the celebration of these nuptials, each banker took a fancy to the young lady, and having won golden opinions from her parents, obtained her hand, all previous promises and contracts notwithstanding. They discovered that uniting the two establishments was not of such paramount importance after all, and that carpet-expertise was essential to the health of their beloved daughter. The dutiful girl obeyed their wishes without much opposition; but so far from improving her constitution, she fell into a state of morbid melancholy, which resulted in lethargy and apparent death; whereupon the banker buried her in a manner that left nothing to be desired. Now, like a virtuous young woman as she was, she had made a vow that she would not seem to present himself before her again, and to this prohibition he had bowed; but since she was interred, and given up to her husband, he thought it no harm to bribe the sexton of the vault in which she lay to let him have one farewell look at her loved face before its interment. He went and did look at it the more—it must be confessed—since once already she had fallen into a prolonged trance, which gave him a scintillation of hope that he might not be actually deceased even yet.

Having procured the night to his own house, and using every means of restoration he could think of, he really did succeed in bringing her back to life. His astonishment was, therefore, not unaccompanied was of course extreme, but we do not hear so much about her sorrow; and yielding to the many plausible arguments he urged in favor of his suit, she consented to accompany him to England, where they married, and lived together in much content. After several years, during which time they had a child, and feeling convinced that nobody would suspect his wife's identity, the husband returned to Paris, and with the aid of a false beard, which became suddenly upon the bereaved banker in the public street, the very man who had buried her, she might perhaps have pretended to be a spirit, or hit upon some other ingenious expedient to hoodwink the widower into the belief that he had risen from her former lover, the coincidence was a little too striking to be explained away.

The banker, who does not seem to have set any extraordinary value on her while she was his own, was transported with the desire of repossessing her, and laid his claim to her person as a legal tribunal. The cause was argued at length upon both sides. The advocate for the lover argued that, but for the fact of her having been put to existence, would have been dead, and neither the life of the husband nor any body else's; that her first husband had divested himself of all his rights to interring her, and even that he might think himself lucky in not having been called to account for consigning her to a living tomb. But although the spirit of the law might be with husband No. 2, the letter was against him, and the judge of the court was inclined to favor his adversary's suit, he prudently anticipated its decision by returning once more to England, where he and his wife have remained until the banker died. How the law of Great Britain would decide so extraordinary a matter, I am not aware; but I should think there is little chance of a husband who is now in existence being allowed to marry a second time. Dixon's case, besides that a resuscitated malefactor is no longer answerable for his crime seems to be the merest assumption; the sentence having been that he be hanged by the neck until he be dead; and if he be not dead, it is clear that the sentence has not been carried out, and that he is still subject to the law of the forfeit. The crown, of course, would be able to remit the penalty, but only by a free pardon, as it might have died in the first execution; and, indeed, there is a case in point.

In 1850, a criminal, named Walter Wyburhone, was hanged at Leicester, and having been cut down after the lapse of the usual period, was found to be yet alive. Some were for recommencing the execution, but the more humane took him to sanctuary, in the church of St. Sepulchre in that town, and the will was not further heard of; for, as Shakespeare says (God hath given thee life, and we will give thee pardon).

ADVERTISEMENTS.

The Human Hair.

How many persons abuse this delicate and beautiful ornament by burning it with alcoholic washes and plastering it with pomades that look as shabby for the wash, and is not absorbed. Burnett's Cocoaine, a compound of Cocoanut Oil, &c., is unrivalled as a dressing for the hair —is really absorbed, and is peculiarly adapted to its various conditions, preventing its falling off, and promoting its healthy growth.

EMPLOYMENT

At your own home. It is the greatest discovery of the age. Full particulars sent free, on receipt of two stamps. Address E. MUNRO BRIGGS & CO., Rochester, N. Y.

AGENTS WANTED.—Call and examine, or 10 samples sent free by mail for 25 cents, that retail for $2, specially needed by every person, by
R. L. WOLCOTT, 160 Chatham Square, N. Y.

Union Playing Cards.

Colored for Kings, Goddess of Liberty for Queen, and Major for Jack. 50 emblazoned cards to the pack. Eagles, Shields, Stars, and Flags are the suits, and you can play all the usual games. Price 75 cents by mail, postage free. Sold by all dealers. The usual discount to the trade. Send for a Circular. Address
AMERICAN CARD COMPANY,
450 Broadway, N. Y., or 166 William Street, N. Y.

A Supposed Incurable Disease Cured.

READ! REFLECT!

Annexed cure of BRIGHT'S DISEASE OF THE KIDNEYS is yet another triumph of the healing virtues of Brandreth's Pills. They have cured hundreds of just such cases, as well as Rheumatism; heavy weight about the heart and upper portion of the bowels; heavy pain about the head and neck; Headache; Neuralgia; Forgetfulness; Fighty or Nervous Apoplexy; Epilepsy; Pimples and Skin Diseases; Sore Throat, even ulcerated; Smallpox; Scarlet Fevers, even Yellow, Nervous, Bilious, and Typhoid; also, Bilious Colic; Jaundice; Pains of the Back, in the Bones; Bilious Diseases, and, in fact, all sickness whose cure can be reached through the organs of the stomach and bowels, or through the circulating blood, which BRANDRETH'S PILLS purify and equalize.

Wonderful cures are being effected every day; but how few persons will benefit their neighbors to be said! Invalids are indebted to Mr. Van Wart for this public acknowledgment of the merits of Brandreth's Pills. These pills will soon be in every home; they are the best aids to the consciousness of sickness, while the vital powers are strong, for that is the time to derive the most advantages from their use. When we have long been oppressed by vesting disease, and a medicine restores our health, it may prove its goodness, but how much better to have used it in the early stages, thereby gaining the medicine a better opportunity, and saving the patient months of suffering.

CASE.

Sing Sing, Oct. 14, 1861.

DR. BRANDRETH:

My Dear Sir:—I was taken sick two years ago with a severe severe pain in the region of the kidneys. Dr. A. M. Hoffman, of this place, pronounced it neuralgia. He treated me for some time, but getting no better, advised electricity: I consented, but the shock nearly killed me, and I received no benefit whatever. After this my legs became numb and paralyzed and my back and kidneys were tormented with most intense and continual pain. Drs. A. K. Koffman and G. F. Fisher told me I had Bright's Disease of the Kidneys. They treated me for a long time, but my sufferings were only more hopeless. Other eminent physicians then treated me, but did me no good, and gave my friends to understand that my case was incurable. So at length I gave up all hope, and never half or if I thought being totally paralyzed and much swollen; and I suffered terrible pain in the upper part of my body. My bowels were completely worn out from the purging, and no medicine produced a passage, and my urine was full of albumen. This was my condition five months ago, when my wife's sister, Mrs. Van Wart, induced me to take BRANDRETH'S PILLS, as she had used them herself and in her family many years with the best effect. Induced by her and my wife's entreaties I took the Brandreth Pills. They operated twelve hours afterward slightly. I continued taking nine every day for several weeks, their operation constantly increasing. I then took eighteen a day, a dose better, I diminished the dose one pill a day until I got to five. One afternoon, at three o'clock, about three months ago, I felt relief in my back, and my urine commenced operating vigorously. Suddenly I felt as if something gave way inside, and the stools were like egg and water mixed, several pieces of tissue away, of a most dark disagreeable color. The next day I felt very faint, and my neighbors came to see me die; but as soon as the faintness passed, I was much better, and for the first time in nearly two years, I was able to move, and stand upon my legs. I continued taking the pills, and in a very few days was able to walk across our room, and now am able to walk quite a distance. I have taken, altogether, nineteen boxes of BRANDRETH'S PILLS, and now, one pill a day is all I require. My health is nearly restored, my appetite is good, and I suffer hardly any pain anywhere, and every day I grow stronger. My neighbors look upon me as one risen from the dead, and I desire yet to publish my case, that those suffering from paralysis and kidney diseases may know how easily they may be cured by Brandreth's Pills.

ABRAM VAN WART.

We, neighbors and relatives, certify that the foregoing statement of Abram Van Wart is true.

A. B. REYNOLDS, Supervisor of Town of Ossining.
DAVID MCCORD, Ex-Loss Commissioner.
J. MALCOLM SMITH, Justice, and Clerk of Board of Supervisors.
ABRAM HYATT, U. S. Assessor, Tenth District.
JAS. NICHOLS, Loss Commissioner.

RACHEL COPPER,	LETITIA VAN VART,
RACHEL ANN SLATER,	SARAH A. CYPHER,
WILBUR F. VAN WART.	WILLIAM SMITH.

The whole Methodist Society would sign, as they know that the above is a true statement.

REV. RANDOLPH FOSTER, Pastor of the said church at Sing Sing.

Principal Office, No. 294 Canal Street; also No. 4 Union Square.

See that B. BRANDRETH is in white letters on the Government Stamp, to counterfeit which is Felony!

Sold by all dealers in medicine at 25 cts. per box, with full directions.

WANTED—DISABLED AND DISCHARGED SOLdiers, and others, maimed and crippled, can hear of a pleasant and profitable business by addressing P. O. Box No. 45, Philadelphia. (Sample free for 25 cents.)

Sponsalia Millinery Rooms,

12 Waverley Place, New York.

Madame Benedict, from the Rue de la Paix, begs to inform her customers and patrons she has just received direct from her House in PARIS a varied assortment of the highest novelties in Bonnets, Hats, Caps, Head Dresses, Neck Fixtures, and all articles appertaining to first CLASS MILLINERY.

ALL ARTICLES FOR SOLDIERS

At Baltimore, Washington, and all places occupied by Union troops, should be sent by HARNDEN'S EXPRESS, No. 25 Broadway. Circulars issued by low rates.

$75 A MONTH! I want to hire Agents in every county at $75 a month, expenses paid, to sell my new cheap Family Knitting Machine. Address
S. MADISON, Alfred, Maine.

Salesmen Wanted.

$75 a month, or commission allowed on sales. Apply to
J. WORTH & CO., Lawrence, Mass.

Our Best Choirs are Using

The HARP OF JUDAH, by L. O. Emerson, author of "The Golden Wreath," &c. A new collection of Music for Choirs, Musical Conventions, Singing Schools, and Singers' Clubs. Contains Anthems, Hymns, Quartets, &c., adapted to all grades of singers. Ten thousand copies have already been sold! 160 pages, Original Music and Arrangements, and Singing Schools are using it. Specimen pages (20 pieces) sent free. Price, boards, 35 cents; cloth, $3 50 per dozen. OLIVER DITSON & CO., Publishers, Boston.

Attention, Soldiers!

Every soldier should have a BADGE with HIS NAME and REGIMENT DISTINCTLY upon it. The subscribers have a badge for any soldier in the Army & Navy, with his Name, Company, and Regiment engraved upon it, on receipt of One Dollar. The above can be worn in place and style of Badge furnished by us. It can be fastened to any garment. Address

DOWD & MOORE,
Manufacturing Jewelers, 509 Broadway, New York.
N. B.—All kinds of Corps and Co. Plate, Enameled, in Red, White, and Blue, by the dozen, 100, or 1000.

THE "RIDGEWOOD" PATENT SMOKING CASE.

Most ingenious in its combination of the Meerschaum Tobacco Pipe, Cigar Case, Matches, and Tobacco Stopper, with a handsome Tobacco Pouch attached, filling the Pipe in a variety without any of the disgusts of waste of Tobacco, the whole steering freedom from all odor, and portable as a Cigar Case. It is made in every variety of Morocco, at $1 50, $1 88, $2 25, $2 50, and $2 75 to $5 75 and $6 00; also two inner leather Pouch Cases, which are found to excel its comfort, utility, and economy for all smokers, at the same prices. To the Army or Navy, it is a desirable friends nothing could be more acceptable. Sent to any part of the country, free of charge. Obtainable of Cos. CHARLES ANDERSON & SONS, sailing cuts, says: "I have purchased some articles here, but this is the greatest and most convenient campaign acquisition." Ridgewood, New York.

The Wood Smoking Tobacco,

Of superior quality and flavor, in packages to fit the Ridgewood Case, and for making, of larger packages for the general trade. Official Smokers, and Dealers are invited to examine these Goods. Supreme Excellence particularly called to them. Circulars sent on order. A liberal discount to Dealers. Single Cases sent by mail or express, paid, on receipt of price and 25 cts. All orders will receive prompt attention.

RIDGEWOOD MANUFACTURING CO.,
No. 294 Canal Street, New York, and Ridgewood, N. J.

SALISBURY, BRO., & CO.,

AGENTS FOR THE UNITED STATES FOR THE CELEBRATED

ALBERTINE

Extension Holders and Gold Pens,

Of the most handsome and durable construction, put up in three different cases of one dozen each, and not sold in any less quantities. They will retail for $3 each.

Price, per dozen	$10 25
" 5 gross	55 00
" 10 "	100 00

Sent by mail or express, prepaid. Address
SALISBURY, BRO. & CO., Providence, R. I.

6000 AGENTS wanted, to sell SIX NEW INVENTIONS in every County, Town, and Street. Sample by mail free: all pay great profits to Agents. Send 4 stamps and get 50 page particulars. DURHAM BROWN, Lowell, Mass.

J. H. Winslow & Co.

100,000

WATCHES, CHAINS, &c., &c.

Worth $500,000.

To be sold for One Dollar each, without regard to value, and not to be paid for till you know what you are to get.

SPLENDID LIST!

OF ARTICLES TO BE SOLD FOR ONE DOLLAR EACH.

100 Gold Hunting Cased Watches.....	$100 00 each.
100 Gold Watches.....	50 00 each.
200 Ladies' Gold Watches.....	25 00 each.
500 Ladies' and Gent's Silver Watches...	15 00 each.
1000 Vest and Neck Chains.....	5 00 to 10 00 each.
3000 Gold Band Bracelets.....	5 00 to 10 00 each.
3000 " "....	3 00 to 5 00 each.
2000 Cameo Brooches.....	4 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Mosaic and Jet Brooches.....	4 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Lava and Florentine Brooches...	4 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Coral, Opal, and Km. Brooches..	4 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Cameo Ear Drops.....	4 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Mosaic and Jet Ear Drops ...	4 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Lava and Florentine Ear Drops..	4 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Coral, Em., and Opal Ear Drops	4 00 to 8 00 each.
2000 Gent's Breast Pins.....	2 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Watch Keys.....	2 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Fob and Ribbon Slides.....	2 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Solid Gold Rings.....	2 50 to 6 00 each.
2000 Sleeve Buttons.....	2 50 to 6 00 each.
4000 Pairs Cuff Buttons.....	2 50 to 6 00 each.
4000 Stone Set Rings.....	2 50 to 6 00 each.
4000 Lockets.....	2 50 to 10 00 each.
8000 Sets Ladies' Jewelry.....	5 00 to 10 00 each.
10000 Gold Plate, Silver Wtd Holders	4 00 to 6 00 each.
10000 Gold Pens, with Silver Extension Cases and Pencils.....	4 00 to 6 00 each.

All of the above list of Goods will be sold for one dollar each. Certificates of all the various articles, stating what each one can be had for, will be put into envelopes, sealed up, and mixed; and when ordered, are taken out without regard to choice, and sent by mail, thus giving all a fair chance. On receipt of the Certificate, you will see what you can have, and then it is at your option to send one dollar and take the article or not.

In all transactions by mail, we shall charge for forwarding the Certificates, paying postage, and doing the business, 25 cents each, which must be inclosed when the Certificate is sent for. Five Certificates will be sent for $1; eleven for $2; thirty for $5; and one hundred for $15, and a hundred for $15.

Agents can make selling as Agents will be allowed ten cents on every Certificate ordered by them, provided their remittance amounts to one dollar. A copy of our list of prizes for every Certificate, and remit 15 cents to us, either in cash or postage stamps. Great caution should be used by our correspondents in regard to giving their correct address, Town, County, and State. Address

J. H. WINSLOW & CO.,

208 Broadway, New York.

National Union League, Army Corps and Regimental Badges.

We are now prepared to furnish League Pins; also, Army Corps and Regimental Badges of every description, in Solid Silver, Solid Gold, and Plated. Also a large assortment of Jewelry.

E. N. FOTHE & CO., Manufacturers of Jewelry, 208 Broadway, New York.

$200! $150! $100! $50! PREMIUMS.

To Editors and Others!

I will pay the above-named amounts for the best four articles on either my Soap, Saleratus, or Concentrated Potash.

The article must state the writer's experience in using the goods, and must be not less than ten lines, and be published in the editorial columns of any good fat-lily newspaper.

Any party wishing to compete for the above, and desiring further information, may address the undersigned. Each person writing and publishing a notice as above, will mail a marked copy of the paper containing the notice to me, and also write me by mail, giving full address.

The Premiums will be awarded on the first day of July, 1864.

B. T. BABBITT,

64 to 74 Washington Street, New York.

ENAMELED CHAMBER FURNITURE.—The best assortment of Enameled Furniture, in all the desirable styles, Walnut and Chestnut, Plain and Ornamented, in Suites. Also, Bedding Retail. Also, Mattresses and Palliasses. WARREN WARD, No. 377 Canal St., N. Y.

Printing Office for $12.

Every Man his own Printer.

THE LOWE IMPROVED PRINTING PRESSES are the best and cheapest portable Card and Job Presses ever invented, and have been awarded 58 Premium Medals. Amateurs, Druggists, and others can do printing or MAKING MONEY by using these Cards, Bill-Heads, Circulars, Labels, &c., for the trade, at trifling expense. Price of Presses: $7, 12, 19, and $25. Price of Office, with Press, $15, 25, 35, and $45. Send for a Circular to the

LOWE PRESS CO., 13 Water Street, Boston.

DO YOU WANT LUXURIANT WHISKERS OR MUSTACHES?—My Onguent will force them to grow heavily in six weeks (upon the smoothest face) without stain or injury to the skin. Sent by mail, post free, to any address, on receipt of money order. B. G. GRAHAM, No. 102 Nassau Street, N. Y.

H. A. HARVEY, 94 Maiden Lane, N. Y., TWINES, Bags, CORDAGE, and YARN, Steam Packing, Wick, CARPET WARP, Fish Lines, Blocking Cord, Lasso and Sagamore Tow, Wrining and Wrapping PAPER, Cotton Batting, and Paper Bags.

$60 A MONTH! We want Agents at $60 a month, Expenses paid, to sell our Everlasting Pencils, Oriental Burners, and 21 other articles. Circulars sent free. SHAW & CLARK, Biddeford, Maine.

MEEKS' CABINET FURNITURE

WAREROOMS,

No. 699 BROADWAY,

AND

333 and 335 Fourth Street.

The largest assortment of rich and plain furniture in the city, made of the very best well-seasoned and selected material, by the best workmen in the country, under the immediate supervision of the firm, whose reputation for excellence of manufacture has been established seventy years. Also, an assortment of superior COTTAGE FURNITURE.

☞ Goods packed and shipped to all parts of the world.

THE BEST BOOK TO SELL—

Agents and Newsmen will find a ready sale for HOW TO WRITE; HOW TO TALK; HOW TO BEHAVE, and HOW TO DO BUSINESS. Complete in one large gilt volume. Send for first post, for $2. Canvassing wanted. Address FOWLER & WELLS, No. 308 Broadway, N. Y.

ATTENTION, Officers and Soldiers.

HEAD-QUARTERS FOR ARMY CORPS, DIVISION, COMPANY, AND MASONIC FIRE.

Manufacturing Jeweler, 208 Broadway, Room No. 1.

On the receipt of $1, I will send you either an Army Corps, Division, or Co. Fin, enameled Red, White, or Blue, with your Name, Regiment, and Co., handsomely engraved upon it, or a Keystone Cross Pin, or Gen. Hooker's Old Division Pin, or Gen. Sedgwick's Badge Pin, or Gen. Grant's Vicksburgh Pin. Honorary Badges and Masonic Marks of every Description made to order promptly. Also Manufacturer and Wholesale Dealer in all kinds of Jewelry. Agents wanted in every Regiment, Hospital, and Vessel.

American Watches for Soldiers

AT REDUCED PRICES.

American Watches for Americans!

THE AMERICAN WATCH COMPANY give notice that they have lately leased a new style of Watch, expressly designed for Soldiers and others who desire a good watch at a moderate price. These watches are intended to displace the worthless, cheap watches of British and Swiss manufacture with which the country is flooded, and which were never expected to keep time when they were made, being refuse manufactures sent to this country because unsalable at home, and used here only for jockeying and swindling purposes.

We offer to sell our Watch, which is of THE MOST SUBSTANTIAL MANUFACTURE, AN ACCURATE AND DURABLE TIME-KEEPER, and in Sterling Silver Cases, Hunting pattern, at prices as low as a poor article can be bought, named Ancres and Lepines of foreign make, already referred to.

We have named the new series of Watches, WM. ELLERY, BOSTON, MASS., which name will be found on the plate of every watch of this manufacture, and is one of our trade-marks.

Sold by all respectable watch dealers in the loyal states. Wholesale orders only will be executed by

ROBBINS & APPLETON,

Agents of the American Watch Company,

182 BROADWAY, N. Y.

Diamond Pointed Gold Pens Retailing at Wholesale Prices.

Medium	Fox $2 25, in Silver ext. case, $3 75
Large	3 00 " " " " 4 50
Engrossing	3 75 " " " " 5 50
Commercial	4 50 " " " " 7 00
Mammoth	5 50 " " " " 9 50
Leviathan	7 00 " " " " 12 00

Also, Fountain Pens—one filling will write eight to fifteen hours. Gumless Goods. Send stamps for Circular.

GEO. F. HAWKES, Manufacturer,

54 Nassau Street, New York.

Printing-Press for Sale.

One Taylor Double Cylinder, five Rollers, Table Distribution, Bed 39x51. Price $3500.

Apply to HARPER & BROTHERS, 329 Pearl St., N.Y.

Cloaks and Mantillas.

BRODIE

The Leader of Fashions!

Opened his Fall Stock on Thursday, 8th inst.,

And as usual stands unrivaled for Style, Quality AND VARIETY.

300 Canal Street, New York.

HUBBARD BRO'S IMPORTERS of WATCHES NEW YORK

Are offering the cheapest, most accurate, durable, and saleable Watches in the American market! They are the sole employees in this country for the celebrated

Magic Time Observers,

The Perfection of Mechanism!

Being a Hunting, or Open Face, or Lady's or Gentleman's Watch combined, with Patent Self-winding Improvement.

A most pleasing novelty!—One of the prettiest, most convenient, and decidedly the best and cheapest timepieces for general and reliable use ever offered. It has within it and connected with its machinery its own winding attachment, rendering a key entirely unnecessary. The cases of this Watch are composed of two metals, the outer one being fine gold, and the inner, it has the improved rapid action lever movement, and is warranted an accurate timepiece. Every warranty given, per case of half dozen, $250. Sample watches in neat morocco boxes, $25. If sold by mail, 50 cents extra for registering, 25 cents.

Silver Watches!

First-Class Hunting Time-Pieces.

FOR ACCURACY OF MOVEMENT, BEAUTY OF MATERIAL, AND ABOVE ALL, CHEAPNESS IN PRICE, THESE WATCHES HAVE NEVER BEEN

UNIVERSAL APPROBATION!

An imitation so faultless that it can hardly be detected by mail examination, by the public generally, being of two metals, the outer one first quality Silver and the inner one Improved Gold, can not be recognized by visiting or heavy engraving, making it not only in appearance, but in durability, the exact resemblance of Solid Sterling Silver in existence.

The rush of business men in the army is a source of enormous profit, retailing, as they very readily do, at $25 and upward. Many hundred dollars can be made in a single pay-day by any one of ordinary business tact!

AT WHOLESALE ONLY! In Sunny Hunting cases, beautifully engraved, white enamel dial, and fancy gilt hands, a good watch for the money, Gold dozen, $36; package, $3 38; registering, 20 cts. Sold only by the case. Can be sent by mail or express.

Our imprortions are novelties produced by no other house, combining accuracy at time-keeping with the more elaborately and artistically finished, and offered at prices challenging competition from all other hands.

The press in all parts of the country voluntarily attest the superiority of our watches. The investment is emphatic, speaking directly to the point, in a manner not to be misunderstood.

"Particularly valuable for officers in the army, and travelers."—Frank Leslie's Gazette.

"Prettiest, best, and cheapest time-pieces ever offered."—N. Y. Illustrated News, Aug. 10.

"Exceed other manufacturers in point of accuracy and cheapness."—Public Ledger, Daily Gazette, May 9.

"An improvement on ordinary timepieces, and invaluable for travelers."—N. Y. Am. Railroad Journal, Aug. 9.

"Elaborately and artistically finished."—N. Y. Scottish American, July 30.

"Combine great accuracy as timekeepers."—Pittsburg, Pa., Chronicle, July 27.

"Very pretty and durable watches for the army."—N. Y. Army and Navy Journ. (Government organ), Aug. 30.

"One of the cheapest and most reliable lesson in economy."—Louisville, Ky., Journal, July 31.

☞ Canvassing Lecturers Agents wanted. No agents employed; buyers must deal directly with us. If money is sent to be expressed and is registered letter, it is at our risk! Orders will meet the most prompt and faithful attention.

HUBBARD BROS., Sole Importers,

Broadway, cor. Courtlandt St., New York.

SOLDIERS' COMPANY FINS.

Constantly on hand and Registered to Order, and sent free on receipt of Price.

Every Co. from A to M Solid Silver, $1.

Solid Silver, with Letters in GOLD Relief, $1 50.

Solid 18 K. GOLD, $4 50.

Corps Badges

Sent free by Mail or Express on receipt of Price.

Solid Silver, $1 50. Solid Plate, $1 00.

Enameled,

Solid Gold, $5. Solid Gold, $5.

Badges for the 1st, 2d, 3d, 5th, 6th, 11th, and 12th Army Corps.

1st Division Enameled Red, 2d Division White, 3d Division Blue.

Name but plainly written.

Terms Cash in advance. Send for a Catalogue.

Address J. G. PACKARD & CO.,

208 Broadway, New York.

☞ "INDISPENSABLE."—No Correspondent, Gentleman, Lady, Public Speaker, Teacher, nor Man of Business, will be without this New Hand-Book. HOW TO WRITE; HOW TO TALK; HOW TO BEHAVE, and HOW TO DO BUSINESS. A handy volume of 600 pages, for ready reference. Sent by first post, for $2. Agents wanted. Address FOWLER & WELLS, No. 308 Broadway, N. Y.

Broker's Stock of unredeemed goods for sale at $1 for each article, consisting of a variety of rich and valuable goods—worth from $5 to $10 each. On receipt of ten cents for Terms Address ANDREWS & CO., 105 Sudbury St., Boston, Mass.

MORAL PHILOSOPHY; or, THE DUTIES OF MAN CONSIDERED IN HIS INDIVIDUAL, DOMESTIC, AND SOCIAL CAPACITIES. By GEORGE COMBE. Reprinted from the Edinburgh edition, with the Author's latest Corrections. Large 12mo, price $1 25. New York: FOWLER & WELLS, 308 Broadway. A stereotyped copy.

"This book is a treasure. It is the only American edition of the Moral Philosophy containing the author's latest revisions. It should be in the library of every lover of humanity. Health, happiness, progression, come from the study of this stamp, and we heartily commend it to the world."

A Splendid Holiday or Bridal Present.

HARPER'S

Illuminated and Pictorial

BIBLE.

Including the Apocrypha. Superbly embellished by over Sixteen Hundred Illustrations, exquisitely engraved by Adams after Designs by Chapman, consisting of a Series of Rich Illuminations in Colors, comprising Frontispiece, Presentation Plate, Family Record, Title-pages, &c. The whole forming a sumptuous Folio Volume.

PRICES.—Morocco, gilt edges, beveled and paneled sides, $28 00; Morocco extra, gilt edges, $20 50; Full Calf, marbled edges, blank stamped, $18 00; Full Roan, marbled edges, $16 00.

Harper's Pictorial Bible is printed from the standard copy of the Authorized Version, and contains Biographical References, the Apocrypha, a Concordance, Chronological Table, List of Proper Names, Geographical Table, Table of Weights, Measures, &c. The large Frontispiece, Plates from the Old and New Testaments, Family Record, Presentation Plate, Historical Illustrations, and Initial Letters to the Chapters, Ornamental Borders, &c., from original designs, made expressly for this edition, by J. G. Chapman, Esq., of New York. In addition to which, there are numerous large Engravings, from designs by distinguished Artists of this City, France and England; to which a full Index is given.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers, New York.

For sale by A. WILLIAMS & CO., Boston; SMITH, ENGLISH & CO., Philadelphia; CUSHINGS & BAILEY, Baltimore; PARMELEE, TAYLOR, WINGATE; ROBERT CLARKE & CO., Cincinnati; KEITH & WOODS, St. Louis; S. C. GRIGGS & CO., Chicago; JACKSON & BURGESS, Buffalo, &c., &c.

☞ Sent by mail, postage free, on receipt of Price.

THE INDISPENSABLE HAND-BOOK.

HOW TO WRITE,	HOW TO BEHAVE,
HOW TO TALK,	HOW TO DO BUSINESS.

Is the handsome volume of 600 pages, for ready reference, sent by first post, for $2. Agents wanted. Please address FOWLER & WELLS, No. 308 Broadway, N. Y.

Sportsmen, Tourists, and Army and Navy Officers.

Powerful and Brilliant Double Glasses.

Portability combined with great power in Field, Marine, Opera, and Theatre Glasses, for out-door day and night double observation. They are confidently offered as a person to know what he is looking at, and the spectacles of the most transparent power to exaggerate, or improve the sight, without the distressing result of frequent changing. Catalogues sent by enclosing stamp.

SEMMONS, Oculist—Optician,

609½ Broadway, New York.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK, have just published

MARTIN POLE. A Novel. By JOHN SAUNDERS, Author of "Abel Drake's Wife," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

ELEANOR'S VICTORY. A Novel. By MRS. E. BRADDON, Author of "Lady Audley's Secret," "Aurora Floyd," &c. With Illustrations. 8vo, paper, 50 cents.

THE RING OF AMASIS. From the Papers of a Germ-cure for Every Day in the Year. Selected, Adapted, and specially Adapted, by REV. NELSON HEAD. Large 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

MISS MULOCK'S FAIRY BOOK. The best Popular Fairy Stories selected and rendered anew. By the Author of "John Halifax, Gentleman," "A Life for a Life," &c., &c. Illustrations. 16mo, Cloth, $1 00.

LIVE IT DOWN. A Story of the Light Lands. By J. C. JEAFFRESON, Author of "Live Hard or Die Hard," "Isabel; the Young Wife and the Old Love," &c. New Illustrated Edition. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

DRAPER'S INTELLECTUAL DEVELOPMENT OF EUROPE. A History of the Intellectual Development of Europe. By JOHN WILLIAM DRAPER, M.D., LL.D., Professor of Chemistry and Physiology in the University of New York, Author of "Treatise on Human Physiology," &c., &c. 8vo, Cloth, $3 50.

FANNY KEMBLE'S GEORGIA PLANTATION. Journal of a Residence on a Georgian Plantation in 1838-1839. By FRANCES ANNE KEMBLE. 16mo, Cloth, $1 00.

KINGLAKE'S CRIMEAN WAR. With a Sketch of the History of the Origin, and an Account of its Progress down to the Death of Lord Raglan. By ALEXANDER WILLIAM KINGLAKE. With Maps and Plans. Vol. I. 12mo, Vol. I. just ready. Price $1 50.

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE

TERMS.

One Copy for one Year	$3 00
Two Copies for One Year	5 00
An Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of Ten Subscribers, at $3 00 each, or 11 Copies for $30 00.
Back Numbers and Volumes can be supplied.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers, New York.

Circulation over 100,000.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

Single Copies Six Cents.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year	$3 00
One Copy for Two Years	5 00
And an Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of Ten Subscribers at $3 00 each, or 11 Copies for $30.

TERMS TO ADVERTISERS.—Seventy-five cents per line for inside, and One dollar per line for outside Advertisements.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS.

SHUTTING UP SHOP.

UNCLE SAMUEL. "What! shutting up shop, eh!"

MANAGING MAN OF THE COPPERHEAD HOUSE. "Yes! 'taint no use. Since the news from Ohio and Pennsylvania, we haint seen a customer, and the boss says to shut up quickly before New York ruins us outright."

FISK & HATCH,

Bankers and Dealers in Government Securities,

AND

AGENTS FOR THE UNITED STATES FIVE-TWENTY LOAN,

No. 38 Wall Street, New York.

Pins for every Co. from A to M.

Answering for similar design of the Founder's Courage. The letter representing the Company is in Bold Relief, and very conspicuous.

The undersigned will forward to any solicitor one of the above pins in solid silver, with name and regiment clearly engraved upon it, on receipt of One Dollar.

For Union Badges, see our inside advertisement.

Address J. G. PACKARD & CO., 203 Br'dway, N. Y.

FINE DRESS SHIRTS TO ORDER. UNRIVALLED

In Manufacture, Fitting, and Material.

At UNION ADAMS, No. 637 Broadway.

IVORY SLEEVE BUTTONS

OF STUDS—Bed, White, and Black, engraved with initials, Fac per pair, will be sent free, on receipt of the price by mail. For sale by WM. M. WELLING, manufacturer of Ivory goods, No. 478 Canal St., N. Y., sign of the Golden Elephant. Also Patent Compressed IVORY BILLIARD BALLS, 2 and 2¼ in., at $10 per set, 7 in. BAGATELLE, $8 00, 1¼ in., $6 00.

GUNS, PISTOLS, Military Goods,

FRENCH AND ENGLISH FANCY GOODS.

Also, a full assortment of

Jet, Coral, and Steel Goods.

Schuyler, Hartley & Graham,

19 Maiden Lane & 23 John Street, N.Y., & 27 Rue d'Enghein, Paris,

47 Hampton St., Birmingham, Eng.

Shults' Ointment, warranted to produce a full set of Whiskers in six weeks, or money refunded. Sent post-paid, for 30 cents. Address G. F. SHULTS, Troy, N. Y.

$1500 Young men, local and traveling agents, soldiers, &c., desiring connection with a business that will pay them for their spare time from $200 to $1500 per year, and no capital required. Can address P. Box 5074, New York.

A BEAUTIFUL MICROSCOPE

For 50 cts. (coin preferred), magnifying small objects 500 times. Five of different power for $1 00. Mailed free. Address F. C. BOWEN, Box 230, Boston, Mass.

A Bad Breath.—The Greatest Curse the human family is heir to. How many lovers it has separated—how many friends forever parted. The subject is so delicate that no person should suffer from it, and you are ignorant of the remedy. Here is radical cure, use the "BALM OF THOUSAND FLOWERS" as a dentrifice, night and morning. It also beautifies the complexion, removing all tan, pimples, and blotches, leaving the skin soft and white. Price 50 cents. For sale by all druggists.

The Trade supplied by HOWARD, SANGER & CO., 39 and 37 Chambers Street, N. Y., and for sale by all Druggists.

IMMENSE PROFITS

To be made selling our

STATIONERY PRIZE PACKETS.

Send for our New Circular.

G. S. HASKINS & CO., 36 Beekman Street, N. Y.

FISH'S PATENT LAMP HEATING APPARATUS

Boiling, Frying, Stewing—Steeping with the flame that lights the room.

Every Family should have One.

For descriptive Pamphlet and Price List, address W. D. RUSSELL, Agent, 266 Pearl St., N. Y. Agents wanted.

SOMETHING NEW.

The REBELLION as it was, and as it is. A WAR MAP in Sections showing LOYAL STATES, REBEL STATES, and territory taken from Rebels. All BATTLE-FIELDS to blood-red lines. Price 20 cents. GREAT COUNTY MAP of the UNITED STATES, in sheets. Send for terms. MAP AGENTS should send for terms.

H. H. LLOYD & Co., No. 81 John Street, N. Y.

E. & H. T. ANTHONY,

Manufacturers of Photographic Materials,

501 Broadway, New York.

Card Photographs.

Our Catalogue now embraces considerably over

FOUR THOUSAND

different subjects (to which additions are continually being made) of Portraits of Eminent Americans, etc., viz.:

72 Major-Generals,	123 Statesmen,
190 Brigadier-Generals,	127 Divines,
250 Colonels,	176 Authors,
84 Lieut.-Colonels,	30 Artists,
397 Other Officers,	172 Singe.
40 Officers of the Navy,	46 Foreign&Women.
141 Prominent Foreign Patriots.

2,500 STYLES OF VIEWS OF ART.

INCLUDING REPRODUCTIONS OF THE MOST CELEBRATED ENGRAVINGS, PAINTINGS, STATUES, &c.

Catalogues sent on receipt of Stamp.

An order for the Dozen PICTURES from our Catalogue will be filled on receipt of $1 80, and sent by mail, Free.

Photographic Albums.

Of these we manufacture a great variety, ranging in price from 50 cents to $50 each.

Our ALBUMS have the reputation of being superior in beauty and durability to any others.

The smaller kinds can be sent safely by mail at a postage of one cent per oz.

The more expensive can be sent by express.

We also keep a large assortment of

Stereoscopes & Stereoscopic Views.

Our Catalogue of these will be sent to any address on receipt of Stamp.

E. & H. T. ANTHONY,

Manufacturers of Photographic Materials,

501 Broadway, New York.

Friends or relatives of gentlemanly solitary men will confer a favor by sending their address to empty. They will be very acceptable. Box 5074, Brooklyn, L. I.

IF ZINE ALBUMS MADE TO ORDER for Contemporaries to present to their Pastor, or for other purposes, with suitable inscriptions, &c.

MUNN & CO.,

Solicitors of American and Foreign Patents,

And Publishers of the ILLUSTRATED SCIENTIFIC AMERICAN, 37 Park Row, N. Y. Pamphlets of information concerning Patents, FREE. Specimens of the PAPER, FREE.

$35 WATCHES. $35

Genuine Full-Jeweled American Lever Watches, in 4 Ounce Coin Silver Hunting Cases, Gold Joints, for $35.

Also every variety of good Watches at equally low rates. All orders from the Army must be pre-paid, as the Express Companies will not take bills for collection on soldiers.

J. L. FERGUSON, Importer of Watches, 208 Broadway New York.

BENJAMIN'S GOLD MEDAL TRUSS is deserving of, as it has always received, the highest premium. It retains the worst rupture with ease without pressure upon the seat of rupture. Never rusts nor weakens from use. It cures all recent and many long standing cases. No. 2 Barclay Street, N. Y., opposite the Astor House, formerly of 13 Beekman Street.

IF YOU WANT TO BE CURED OF Debility, L.Y.D.S.

Spring is the time to use DR. LEATHE'S

YELLOW DOCK SYRUP.

Which Purifies the Blood, Invigorates the Body, gives Tone to the Nerves, Strength to the Muscles, and Health to every Channel, Joint, and Limb.

One Dollar per Bottle. Sold by all other agents.

Depot, 120 CHATHAM Sq., N. Y. Sold 903 GRAND St.

Ask for LEATHE'S YELLOW DOCK SYRUP. Take no other. Established 1848. Sold by Druggists everywhere.

VINELAND.

LANDS.—TO ALL WANTING FARMS.—Large and thriving settlement, mild and healthful climate, 30 miles south of Philadelphia by railroad. Rich soil, produces large crops, which can now be seen growing. Twenty and fifty acre tracts, at from $15 to $20 per acre, payable within four years. Good business opening for Mason's, Farmers and others. Churches, schools, and good society. It is now the most improving place East or West. Hundreds are settling and building. The beauty with which the place is laid out is unsurpassed. Letters answered. Reports containing reports and giving full information sent to all who desire. Address CHAS. K. LANDIS, Vineland Post Office, Cumberland County, New Jersey.

From Report of Major Robinson, Agricultural Editor of the Tribune:—"Vineland has a most extensive fertile tract, a most desirable position and suitable condition for pleasant farming that we know of this side of the Western prairies."

PREPARE FOR THE HOLIDAYS.

There is no Gift or Present which compares with the Craig Microscope and Mounted Objects. As a source of amusement and instruction they are unsurpassed. This Microscope will be mailed, pre-paid, for $2 25; or with 6 beautiful mounted objects, for $3; or with 24 objects, for $5.

HENRY CRAIG,

337 Broadway, New York.

A liberal discount to the trade.

GOLD PENS AND CASES.

Retailed at wholesale prices. 14 kt. Gold Pen, Solid Silver Case, $1 50, warranted for one year, guarantee accompanying each Pen. Send for Circular. Agents wanted. Liberal discount to the trade. Address C. JOHNSON, 35 Maiden Lane, N. Y.

Learn to Skate in One Hour by using The American Parlor Or Floor Skate. Hard Rubber Rollers. Anti-friction Axles. Frederick Stevens, 214 Pearl Street, New York. 68 Kilby Street, Boston.

Something New!—Every Family and every Soldier must have it. Retail price $1. For an Agency address A. B. BALLOU & SON, Haverhill, Mass. ☞ Samples mailed to Agents for 30 cents.

EXTRA AND BEST

Inducements yet offered to Agents to sell our New Card Photographs—Rebel Traitors, Rebel Rogues, Vanities, Horse-racers—Soldiers' Smoking Pipes—Union Crystal Cement—Ice Strikers—Pocket Match Safes—Self-regulating Studs Fixtures—Stationery and Yankee Notion ☞ Price Packages.

Send for New Circulars and be convinced. Address RICHARDS & CO., Importers and Manufacturers, 58 Liberty Street, P. O. Box 2131, N. Y.

Fogg's Double-Action Patent Lever Skate Buckle.

Manufactured and for sale on Straps, at wholesale, by F. STEVENS, Manufacturer of Skates, Straps, and Leather Goods, 315 Pearl Street, New York, 68 Kilby Street, Boston.

A Household Word.—Buy your Housekeeping Articles at HASKINS' Variety Store, 36 Beekman St., N. Y.

Wheeler & Wilson's

Sewing Machines.

Have received Premiums at all the important State and Mechanical Fairs where exhibited this season. Foote's Patent Umbrella Lock Stands. 505 Broadway.

SONGS FREE.

A choice collection of new songs will be sent to any address on receipt of a three cent stamp to pay return postage. Address

J. L. CLAYTON, Georgetown, Ohio.

Central Park in the Stereoscope.

150 New Views, just published by

E. & H. T. ANTHONY,

501 Broadway, N. Y.

Also, Life in China, a new and very interesting series.

The Soldier's Gift To the Loved One at Home.

We will deliver Free, at any Express Office East of St. Joseph, Mo., any of our beautiful Albums of the value of $5 or upon, that may be ordered by members of the Army or Navy of the United States as Presents to friends at home. We manufacture elegant styles at all prices to $25, and higher.

E. & H. T. ANTHONY,

Manufacturers and Importers,

501 Broadway, N. Y.

DR. B. C. PERRY,

DERMATOLOGIST,

49 Bond Street, New York.

Formerly of 29 Winter Street, Boston, treats successfully all Diseases of the Scalp, Loss of Hair, and Premature Blanching. Also, removes Moth Freckles, and other Discolorations from the face, without injury to the texture or color of the skin. Consultations free.

For particulars enclose stamp for Circular.

American Enamelled

Metallic Collar Co.,

No. 94 Pine Street, New York.

Are now manufacturing their splendid Collars, which for shape, appearance, and durability are FAR IN ADVANCE of anything heretofore produced.

They are the inventors and manufacturers of the only real "TURN-OVER" COLLAR ever offered.

These Collars are infinitely SUPERIOR TO STEEL, being more pliable, and the material of which they are manufactured BEING A NON-CONDUCTOR, renders them free from the objectionable feature of the rust collar, viz.: the courting of that dangerous element, electricity, in the shape of lightning. Inclose $1 for a "Clincher," or $1 50 for a genuine "half turn-over" collar, to the AMERICAN ENAMELLED METALLIC COLLAR COMPANY, Box No. 5173 New York City Post Office, and receive it by return mail.

Metallic Artificial Legs.

Made of Corrugated Brass or other Metals. Patented Jan. 6th, 1863, by the Universal Joint and Artificial Limb Co.

Weight only Four Pounds.

Soldier's price, $50; Civilian's, $75. Send for a Circular. J. W. WESTON, Agt., 491 Broadway, N. Y.

AGENTS WANTED.—$2 positively made from 20 cts.; urgently needed by every person. Call and examine our new articles, or send 20 cts. (silver) for sample, worth $2. R. L. WOLCOTT, 170 Chatham Square, N. Y.

Miss Kate Denin,

The celebrated actress, says: "I have used HEGEMAN'S KARAKOLE for my hair, and find it the most elegant article for keeping it in full beauty and luxuriance that I have ever used. I can freely recommend it to every lady." Hegeman's Karakole is the most elegant hair dressing in use. Price 50 cents. Depot 66 CHATHAM St., N. Y.

Alcock's Japan.

Bivouac and Battle-Field.

Knapp's French Reader.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

Have Just Published:

ALCOCK'S JAPAN. The Capital of the Tycoon: a Narrative of a Three Years' Residence in Japan. By Sir RUTHERFORD ALCOCK, K.C.B., Her Majesty's Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to Japan. With Maps and Engravings. 2 vols. 12mo, Cloth, $3 00.

THE BIVOUAC AND THE BATTLE-FIELD; or, Campaign Sketches in Virginia and Maryland. By Captain GEORGE F. NORTON. 12mo, Cloth, $1 25.

KNAPP'S FRENCH READING-BOOK; CHRESTOMATHIE FRANÇAISE: Containing I. Selections from the best French Writers, with Copious References to the Author's French Grammar. II. The Plaster-Pieces of Molière, Racine, Boileau, and Voltaire; with Explanatory Notes, a Glossary of Idiomatic Phrases, and a Vocabulary. By WILLIAM I. KNAPP, Professor of Modern Languages and Literature in Madison University, N. Y. 12mo, Cloth, $1 25.

HARPER & BROTHERS

Have also Published:

HEADS DAILY WALK WITH WISE MEN. Daily Walk with Wise Men; or, Religious Exercises for Every Day in the Year. Selected, Arranged, and especially Adapted, by Rev. NELSON HEAD. Large 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

ROMOLA. A Novel. By the Author of "Adam Bede," "The Mill on the Floss," "Silas Marner," and "Scenes of Clerical Life." With numerous Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, $1 25; Cloth, $1 50.

KAY'S CONDITION OF THE ENGLISH PEOPLE. The Social Condition and Education of the People in England and Europe. By JOSEPH KAY, Esq., M.A., of Trinity College, Cambridge; Barrister at Law; and late Travelling Bachelor of the University of Cambridge. 12mo, Cloth, $1 00.

A DARK NIGHT'S WORK. A Tale. By Mrs. GASKELL. Author of "Sylvia's Lovers," "Mary Barton," &c. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.

ELEANOR'S VICTORY. A Novel. By Miss BRADDON, Author of "Aurora Floyd," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

GENERAL BUTTERFIELD'S OUTPOST DUTY. Camp and Outpost Duty. With Exercises for Drilling Officers. Extracts from the Revised Regulations for the Army, Rules for Health, Maxims for Soldiers, and Duties of Citizens. By DANIEL BUTTERFIELD, Major-Gen. Vols., U.S.A., Chief of Staff to General Hooker. Approved by the War Department. 12mo, Flexible Cloth, 60 cents.

A POINT OF HONOR. A Novel. By the Author of "The Morale of May Fair," "Creeds," "The World's Verdicts," &c., &c., &c. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.

HOOKER'S NATURAL PHILOSOPHY. Science for the School and Family. Part I. Natural Philosophy. By WORTHINGTON HOOKER, M.D., Professor of the Theory and Practice of Medicine in Yale College, Author of "The Child's Book of Nature," "Natural History," "First Book in Chemistry," &c. Illustrated by nearly 300 Engravings. 12mo, Cloth, $1 00.

☞ Any of the above Works sent by mail, post-paid, on receipt of price.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. VII.—No. 359.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 14, 1863. [SINGLE COPIES SIX CENTS. $3.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1863, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

THE CONSCRIPT.

He pinned to his coat the fiery badge,
Red, like the blood of those who had gone
When first our country called for aid,
And he said he would follow on.
He would go to the battle-field;
Like them he would proudly meet the foe,
Never to falter, never to yield,
Until treason were laid low.

"But there are many," he said, "would be Glad in your place to be enrolled."
But he cried, "When the land asks life from me,
Can I pay the debt with gold?
You starry flag in the air—
Beneath its folds I could even die!—
Who should fight to maintain it there,
If you held back such as I?"

"Once," he said, "in my school-boy days,
Reading of all our fathers braved,
When they dared to face a tyrant's wrath
To set free a land enslaved,

I wished I had lived just then,
When men had such gallant work to do;
And, now the chance has come round again,
I must make my dreams come true!"

So he left us all to fulfill his word—
The word once uttered in boyish glee—
"If foes should threaten my native land,
She may look for help to me!"
And he stands in the conscript ranks,
With a lofty a step and bearing high
As becomes a man who has grasped the sword
To maintain his rights or die.

And I thank God one is left us yet,
One honest man, valiant and strong,
To stifle down all selfish fear,
And himself try to conquer wrong.
Thank God for one freeman more,
Steadfast, and calm, and resolute,
Who would die in his country's cause before
He would call for a "substitute!"

THE NEGRO TROOPS IN THE SOUTHWEST.

We illustrate on this page a most interesting scene, namely, the address of Adjutant-General Thomas to the negro troops and the contrabands generally at Goodrich's Landing, Louisiana, on 4th October, 1863. Goodrich's Landing, sixty-five miles north of Vicksburg on the west bank of the river, is the head-quarters of General J. P. Hawkins, commanding the district of Northeast Louisiana and the colored troops there stationed, and of Mr. W. R. Field, President of the Board of Commissioners for the leasing of Government plantations. On Sunday, October 4, Adjutant-General Thomas requested the soldiers, officers, planters, and working hands to the Goodrich House, and addressed them on the various duties devolving upon them. The utmost attention was given by the entire audience; and it may safely be said that no so singular and impressive scene has ever been enacted during the war as the Adjutant-General of the United States Army addressing negro soldiers, civilians, and women and children, on the duties and responsibilities of freedom, and that in the most southern of all the Slave States. Our artist has drawn the scene from photographs taken on the spot.

The public will be interested to learn from Secretary Stanton's report, which will be laid before Congress next month, what progress has been made in the equipment and organization of negro troops. It is generally though vaguely understood that not less than 25,000 negroes are already in arms, on the Mississippi, in Louisiana, in South Carolina, and in Virginia. Some weeks since an official connected with the War Department stated that we should have 100,000 negroes in the field by New Year 1864. Now that no one but the most incurable Copperheads objects to the employment of negro soldiers, it is to be hoped that the officers who have the work of recruiting them in hand are prosecuting their task with energy. And it is also to be hoped that the President will lose no time in repairing one injustice of which they are the victims. They are not paid as much as white troops. This is all wrong. If they are expected to work and fight as bravely as their white comrades, they deserve to be paid as well. Thus far they have done excellently well. At Port Hudson, Helena, on Morris Island, and in other battle-fields they have proved, what no man of sense ever doubted, that under proper leadership they will fight as well as the men of any other race.

THE WAR IN THE SOUTHWEST.—ADJUTANT-GENERAL THOMAS ADDRESSING THE NEGROES IN LOUISIANA ON THE DUTIES OF FREEDOM.—[From Photographs.]

If Adjutant-General Thomas achieves his present purpose he will secure a most respectable name in history.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 14, 1863.

THE ELECTION.

NEW YORK has followed in the footsteps of Pennsylvania and Ohio, and gone for the Government by twenty thousand majority. The Legislature is strongly Union, and the State ticket is elected throughout. It is only a year that the election for members of Congressmen had not taken place this year: the State would have not then been disgraced by a Copperhead delegation at Washington, and a hulking, semi-loyal, semi-disloyal Governor at Albany. However, for what we have received let us all be duly thankful.

It was noticeable that, contrary to common experience, that class of persons who in other countries would be known as "the better class," i.e., men of education and means, abstained invariably voted the Union ticket. In former times as many merchants voted the Democratic ticket as any other. Now there seem to be no Democrats among the fancy buyers. The riots appear to have drawn a broad line of demarkation between loyal and disloyal men, and every one who has any thing to lose hastens to take his place in the ranks of those who are opposed to arson and murder. It looks as though the Copperheads were killing the old Democracy about as thoroughly as the "blue light" worthies killed the old Federalists.

The Government has now been fairly and squarely endorsed by the people of every Northern State—except New Jersey, which does not count. And it only remains for Mr. Lincoln to prosecute the war he has begun in with the same energy and perseverance which have thus far characterized his Administration, and all, in God's appointed time, will be well with the country.

DOMESTIC MANUFACTURES.

THERE are a number of articles in use in this country which can not be dispensed with. We consume a great deal more sugar than Louisiana and Texas could produce, even under the most favorable circumstances. Our people consume large quantities of tea and coffee, spices and hides, which can not possibly be produced in this country. We require likewise drugs, dyes, and various other minor articles of which the cost is moderate, all of which must come from abroad. Of these commodities the consumption is not likely to decrease, and the supply will be derived, hereafter as heretofore, from foreign parts.

But the aggregate of all these articles, which can not be obtained except from abroad, is very small in comparison with the export of food from this country. It might be expressed by the numeral 1, if our food exports, which are absolutely required by Europe, were expressed by the figure 2. If our imports of manufactures ceased altogether we should export three dollars for every dollar we imported, and the course of exchange throughout the world would run in favor of the United States.

No one who has studied trade on great general principles, and has realized the resources and progressive development of this country, can have failed to perceive that at some day, sooner or later, the focus of commerce and finance was destined to be removed from London, Frankfort, and Paris to New York, and the great clearing-house of the commercial operations of the business world was to be established finally in this city. This would have been at some time accomplished, even without political or revolutionary accidents, through the simple agency of the Asiatic trade, which, in the ordinary course of events, under the influence of steam and telegraph, must naturally centre at New York instead of London. But the slaveholders' rebellion has precipitated matters, and the prospect now is that we are going to largely increase our consumption of European manufactures, and increase our exports on a very brief period of time what is vulgarly known as the balance of trade will turn permanently in our favor, and New York will be the general mart for the exchanges of the world.

To descend to details. Every manufactured article imported from Europe now pays an average duty of 30 per cent., payable in gold. The present premium on gold makes that duty equivalent to 45 per cent. If gold should rise to 160 or 170, as it did last January, the duty would be 60 per cent. And the enhancement of the importer is not limited by the premium on coin. To do business safely he must watch the gold market hour by hour. If he sells goods he must instantly buy his exchange, or run the risk of seeing his profits swept away by a fluctuation caused by the speculative schemes of the Jews of William Street. If he buys his bills when he receives his goods a fall in gold may compel him to sell them at a heavy loss. So that really there is no business in this country, except faro banking, which is so purely speculative and gambling in its nature as importing foreign goods.

The remedy is simply in home manufacturing. Within a year quite a number of German importers have turned their attention to manufacturing in this country. They have imported the raw material, where it could not be produced here, and they have employed the workmen. Examples of all kinds have been established in this city and in the neighborhood, and the articles produced have realized handsome profits for the manufacturer. There is no earthly reason why we should not make all the hardware, all the dry goods, and all the articles of luxury and use which are required even by the most fastidious of the rich.

On such subjects appeals to patriotic feeling always fall dead. But interest appeals to all classes. And the fact that now, and hereafter for some years, we can and shall be able to make every manufactured article in this country cheaper than it can be imported from abroad, will pretty surely lead to a manufacturing furor among our people. This is one of those popular notions which can be encouraged by any man who undertakes, seriously and energetically, to manufacture here the articles we have heretofore imported from abroad, with a reasonable profit per centage, and will furthermore have the satisfaction of having done his share toward emancipating his country from dependence on foreign nations.

BRADY'S GALLERY.

THERE are very few establishments in the city better worth visiting than the Photographic Gallery of M. B. Brady, to whom this journal is indebted for nine-tenths of the portraits it publishes. Nowhere else can so extensive and in one sense so valuable a collection of art treasures be witnessed. For the last twenty years there has hardly been a celebrity in this country who has not been photographed here; and when the history of American photography comes to be written Brady's more than any other man, will be entitled to rank as its Father.

Many? As an still remember the old gallery at the corner of Fulton Street and Broadway, where Mr. Brady first began to telegraph interesting characters for the sake of more fame. People used to stroll in there in those days to see what new celebrity had been added to the collection, and "the last new portrait at Brady's" was a standing topic of conversation. Pretty soon the city became too large and small, and Brady moved to the well-known rooms in 359 Broadway, where he made his reputation. There, by great exertion and labor, he managed to collect the likenesses of all the prominently unrivaled in the world. The Presidents and Secretaries during aive or six consecutive administrations; Senators and Congressmen compiled to an equal period of time; soldiers, sailors, diviues, editors, lecturers, authors, Garibaldi, Kossuth, Jenny Lind, Sontag; every body, male or female American or foreign, who had any claim to distinction, was sooner or later inveigled by the indefatigable Brady into his parlor, and left his or her head there. The consequence was, as we said, an accumulation of portraits of the most interesting and constituting materials for history of the very highest value. What would we not give now for a set of portraits of the Cæsars and Pompeys?

When the war broke out Brady attempted higher aims. With a camera he accompanied the army on the battle-fields of Bull Run. He photographed and seized, with mathematical accuracy and artistic skill, scenes that will live forever. Further camera went from his house to Charleston, and it will presently show us the effect of Gilmore's Greek fire on the cradle of secession. This revelation from the old track has not, however, diminished Brady's eagerness for portraits. The Prince of Wales and suite, the Russian Admiral and staff, the French and British Admirals, and a host of other celebrities, native and foreign, have been added to his collection since he moved to the corner of Tenth Street.

If any man deserves credit for accumulating materials for history, that man is M. B. Brady.

THE LOUNGER.

THE OLD GAG.

WHY all over Mr. Beecher our gratitude for the pleasant and effective way in which he silenced the mob in Liverpool, Manchester, and London. His perfect self-possession, his readiness, his jokes and his pluck won him the victory throughout. Another orator might have withered the mob with sarcasm, but he had only to open his mouth to make them laugh against them. He parried their blows, and at the same time struck home. There is no public speaker in this country who is fitted to do what he has done as Mr. Beecher, and the work he has begun in England will doubtless be continued by others. It is a profound and salutary impression as much upon British conceit as sense.

It is serpicious many that Mr. Beecher had to contront the mob in England, since he and all men of this views can now speak freely here at home. But the spirit against which he speaks, and against which the people of this country fight, is always and every where the same. Whether it is hanging a man in Georgia for saying that God made all men free, or burning a slave in Carolina because he is trying to seize his liberty, or murdering a man or child in New York because of their color, or "pitching into" rable mob" stilling discussion in Boston, or trying to stifle it in Liverpool, Manchester, or London, Slavery is the same old tyrant, to whom free speech is as dangerous as a match to gunpowder, and which always seeks victory by brute force.

In this country we have had enough of this kind of tyranny. Under the Constitution we have discovered that no one man's opinions are any more sacred than another's. If Southerners like slavery, they may say so. If Northerners hate it, they may say so; and the Constitution protects each in the expression of his views. In the celebrated Union-at-la-was, which it seems we are going to have again at the Vice-President, it was quite the other way. But in the Union-as-it-is we have got the gag out of our mouths. Nor does it look as if it were likely to be put into any body's mouth in British soil! Of course, every man knows that it is the American pimps and panders of slavery in England who, warning at the natives of their own kind, endeavored to stop, by threats and open riot, the meetings which Mr. Beecher addressed. The old serpent dies hard. But its head being under the heel of civilization, religion, common sense, and common humanity, whether it dart its poison in a great rebellion, or wriggle in a riot, or hiss in Copperhead speeches at home, and brawling interruption at public meetings abroad, its convulsions are but the throes of death.

THE THING TO BE DONE.

"WHY should Jefferson Davis' butler himself about the future?" cries a wiseacre. "Isn't it plain that the thing to be done is to fight?" Yes; but the question is, how to fight? Does Lincoln himself about the range of his guns? Isn't it plain that the thing to be done is to reduce Charleston? Is fighting all he has now to do? If Lee were defeated in Virginia and Bragg routed in Georgia, is then the work over, and our only duty to summon the troops home? If General Gilmore can not calculate the range of his guns, how can he take Charleston? If Lincoln, Stanton, and Halleck do not consider how they can secure peace, of what use is fighting?

Does any body seriously suppose that, when the two rebel armies are defeated, Davis & Company are going to say that they give it up, or that elections are to be held peacefully in Georgia or Virginia without the supervision of the national authorities? Yet if fighting is all, when fighting stops the war is over, and there is peace. Or take Tennessee at this moment. Thanks to its loyal men and the army of the Cumberland, with that at Burnside, the military forces of the rebels are expelled. Must Andrew Johnson, therefore, be regarded as back in the State of Tennessee, which has been always at least half loyal, a Governor must be maintained by the appointment of the United States, if there is not a milder treatment will answer for any wholly disloyal State? Or is Andrew Johnson a usurper and the rebel Governor of Tennessee still the lawful chief magistrate of that State?

Is a man every foolish if he considers the plan of his house when he begins to dig the cellar? Do you tell him that it is absurd to talk of his library and the size and shape of the dining-room, and the bow-window here, and the hot closet there, when the foundations of the cellar are not laid? Do you constantly say to him that the business is to lay the cellar and let the library and dining-room take care of themselves? Not unless you have lost your common sense. Why, it is exactly the same thing with the war? When the fighting is over, then what? Is that the end? When the cellar is laid, is there nothing more to be done?

There is a great deal more to be done. The Government of the country is to be settled upon principles of true democracy: and the sooner our minds consider what those foundations are the sooner peace will come. There is no plainer axiom of politics than the constant discussion of the significance of the war—its causes, its origin, its objects. Every man in the country may acquire some adequate advantage for the tremendous struggle. Does any body think that we have understood the teaching of Jefferson Davis? Does he not now return into the Senate of the United States? And yet how soon is he likely to be convicted of treason? Is not treason where it was consumed? The Constitution, according to the Copperhead papal, is sufficient to secure the success of a rebellion, but not to punish the rebels or authority. Is the chief Copperheads in New York claim that they are better Union men than Unionists men themselves, because they go for fighting and conciliation. By their own confession, then, there is something more than fighting to be done. But if we are right, the Copperheads may consider what they will do after fighting, why is General Butler so culpable that he also claims upon men shall do after the fighting? The gentle Copperheads ought not to forget that the time is past in this country when it was "convenient" for Jeff Davis and his political allies North and South to say and do exactly what they chose, and "unconstitutional" for their opponents to utter a word in the same. We may avow and, thanks to Jeff Davis, that, though his rebellion does not destroy the Union, it does destroy the despotism which nullified the Constitution and used the Union-as-it-was for its tool.

THE NATIONAL ACADEMY OF DESIGN.

Interesting non silent artes. The fine arts are still eloquent amidst the roar of cannon and through the thick smoke of battle-fields slowly and steadily the rich and well-proportioned building, the new Academy of Design, rises. The corner-stone was laid upon a day of general gloom. Men eminent in art, in letters, in oratory, spoke their cheering and consecrating words. It was, as Mr. Vice-President Gray remarked, the first temple of art upon this continent built and directed by the artists themselves. Nor was the time ill-chosen; for, as Mr. Godwin eloquently declared, the great civil strifes among nations have been the tempestuous spring which has ushered in the golden summer of all manner of intellectual fruits.

The subscription of the fund for the Academy building has been one of the most remarkable events of this memorable year. More than a hundred thousand dollars were subscribed within a few months or weeks, and this amidst the constant strain of the vast private subscriptions for the war. It is a fact too significant for Americans to forget, and too significant for foreigners to mention. It is very doubtful if Mr. Charles Mackay, who found plenty of time to say last summer that it was generally conceded the Union was hopelessly gone, found a moment to state that the men who were giving their children to fight and their money to support the war were also wise enough, as well as staunch, to be taking care that the future of the country which they intended to redeem should abound in every influence of beauty and truth. The readiness of the subscription to the Academy fund was the answer of the entire confidence of New York in the maintenance of the Union. The future will own its grateful debt to the artists of to-day in New York, that they have remembered it and their countrymen so well that they chose this hour as the one in which to begin their work.

And, indeed, as the temple rises into graceful completion, who shall say that its developing strength and symmetry are dedicated to the service of the purest beauty, do not fitly symbolize that vaster structure of Union and Liberty, which, with steady strokes and toil and blood, the brave hearts and hands of the people are building? The event was more significant than the newspapers made it. But History, looking for the proofs of the national purpose and faith and spirit, will not forget it.

KNOWING WHAT YOU WANT, BUT NOT HOW TO GET IT.

"I CAN see," lately said a cynic, "that in the next Senate are two parties: one knowing exactly what it wants, and the other ignorantly exactly ignorant or what it wants."

It is pretty true. There are but two parties, and they are well described by the critic. One wants the maintenance of the Union. Its policy is therefore perfectly clear. It distinctly asserts every measure which will secure and confirm that result. The other wants political power, and it doesn't see exactly how to get it. That explains its conflicting assertions and contradictory action. In Ohio it declared for peace at any price. Ohio voted its record from the lake to the river. In Iowa therefore it declared for the war, and against the conduct of the war. That also was of no use. In New York it declared itself the strongest war party. Its success, therefore, in New York would make every thing else sluggish and feeble, and reveal the fact that it had no principle whatever in regard to the Union and the country, and was every where ready to do nothing except to discover how it might return to power. In the State of New York the ticket of this party was supported by men who radically and utterly disagree upon the question of the war, or who, at least, profess to disagree. The M'Clellan wing and the Ben Wood wing have supported the nominations. But in Manager Wood's war policy that of General M'Clellan's' and, like Ohio, which wing has controlled?

The party calling itself "the Democracy" professes to be the strong war party. Yet a great deal of the Union arms would have helped their ticket. They claim to be the true Union party. Yet Jefferson Davis and every rebel leader wishes their success. Which are the dupes or the deceivers, the Copperhead leaders or the rebel chiefs? A party, therefore, which sees that the steady and victorious prosecution of the war must annihilate it, yet which has no hope of securing power but by seeming to favor the war, will inevitably prevent the success which the cynical critic deserved, of not knowing what it wants.

Let it be so. But not by the means, of which it is ignorant. It wants political power at any price. Nor is it too harsh to say that if it could procure that consummation by favoring immediate peace, upon the basis of compromise or separation, looking to future reconstruction, it would not hesitate to adopt that policy. The only security that is afforded by virtue of its alliance with a system which permanently paralyzed the Constitution, and is now seeking to destroy it. That system and its rebellious effort are equally doomed. And as they go, so go their props and appendages. As slavery sinks, so Democracy forever—a party which called itself democratic to serve slavery, and consequently repudiated every democratic principle whatever.

A scorpion girt with fire knows what it wants, but not how to get it. A confused scorpion knows not how to get it. It wants life; but how shall it pass through the fire?

THE AGRICULTURAL BUREAU.

WHILE we have been engaged in this engrossing war a new Department of the Government has been established, and has risen to be the highest practical value. Its operations are necessarily so quiet that they do not startle words and sensation, but have been properly estimated. Establishing the most trusty relations with every part of the country, and receiving the most accurate and faithful accounts of the variety, extent, progress, and result of all the crops in the country, it sends every month into the hands of every farmer in the land, it he chooses to take it and read it, a full description of the precise condition of the agriculture of the whole country, and thus destroys speculation in food. It shows what the crop is, and inferentially what the price ought to be. It distributes flowers, and seeds, and vegetables, and grain, and trees. It supervises the experiments which single cultivators might feel themselves to be too humble to make, and disseminates the results. Its machinery gives it facilities which no private farmer can command; and the great benefit which France has always derived from its agricultural bureau will be renewed and surpassed in the United States.

No jubilee could be more advantageous to the farmer, and none deserves from him a more cordial and effective sympathy. Every farming club and horticultural or pomological society which has not established relations with it is the loser by the delay.

AS YOU WERE.

THE gentleman who calls mad rioters and assassins his friends, lately said in a public speech that spite of the Vice-President we will have the Union as it was. His friends responded with "tremendous applause." But in one or two little things, perhaps, the Union will not be so much as it was in the palmy days of Buchanan as in those of Washington.

For instance, in the Union as it was ten years ago Mr. Horatio Seymour, of New York, could go into Carolina or Georgia and say what he pleased of public affairs, and Mr. William H. Seward, of New York, his equal fellow-citizen, could not. In the Union as it will be, and as it was when it was made, Mr. Horatio Seymour will have no privileges which Mr. Seward has not.

Then in the Union as it was two years ago chattel slavery existed in several of the States. But in the Union as it was meant to be by the fathers, but in the Union as it will be, there will be no chattel slavery in those States.

Again, in the Union as it was when Mr. Seymour was for the first time Governor of New York, and again when Murray Victorius lady of large those charming views of the delights of slavery which she reproduced in her book, it was enough to secure great reputation as a "national statesman, that a man should become the nimble lackey of slavery. In the Union as it will be the test of nationality will be devotion to liberty and human rights, and not to the interest of an aristocratic party.

The Union as it was in the days of Washington, Jefferson, and Mr. Alexander H. Stephens, was made by men who believed that Slavery was only a curse. The Union as it was in the days of Buchanan, Toucey, Cass, Floyd, and Thompson, was officered by men who were resolved that slavery should live and grow. That is the Union which our worthy Governor says he desires to have. The Union as it was and as it will be not Vice-President Johnson's pronounce. Do we mean not think that the country will have Vallandi, Bond, Seymour, and Fernando Wood, or Washington, Jefferson, and Abraham Lincoln?

THE NEW GOSPEL OF PEACE.

THE second book of this most universally popular and admirably compiled anthology of the year has just appeared. Like the first book, it owes nothing to elaborate advertising or vigorous puffing. Indeed it is a remarkable fact in the history of the literature, that the first part was quietly issued and apparently quietly ignored by the press, but gradually widely read and loved and duly appreciated upon every newspaper stand, and was intimately known to every circle in the country. The actual service it was doing for the good cause of peace at the time. Like the pamphlets of Defoe, it is not about the easy encouragement and delight of pleasant people, who love to trenchant liberty in countries the admirable of the most intelligent public. Our political satire writers have been governed by the best contempt or above general comprehension. The true wit and power of some of them have commended them themselves to the purely literary classes, but they have not commanded the interest and laughing assent of the great busy crowd of the country. The sale of the first book of Mr. Nasby-Locad is already prodigious, and that of the second will doubtless be like unto it. It treats events of the day in verse. It even adopts the practice of the editorials of the New Gospel as seen in the standard New York in July. The chaos of novelty is naturally wanting, but it seems to us not less racy that the earlier part.

The authorship remains a secret. Claims are now asserted for some source beyond Albany, possibly among the fastnesses of the Hudson. The work has been attributed to a score of literary gentlemen in the city. But the author and the publisher guard their secret well; and whoever he may be the writer of "The New Gospel of Peace" has secured his place in the memorabilia of the war.

THE CASTILIAN.

THE Archduke Maximilian of Austria is an accomplished one of the cleverest princes in Europe. That may or may not be a praise. That he should, and the Mexican adventure allaying in the comprising. For to can not wear the crown at home and to be emperor and representative of a nation—for, of course, his must be his own proposition—is a chance which he can not willingly forego. He says, indeed, that he must have a popular call to the throne. But his next friend of France under stands exactly how popular calls to the throne are managed, and that all look to the wanting. The call must have guarantees. But guarantee is a strong word. He only doubtless accepts in recognition. Yet it seems hardly possible that he would have gone so far long it upon a Mexican throne sustained by French bayonets.

If it is asked whether every nation is not interested in having a permanent and peaceable government in Mexico, the answer is every nation is. But if then it be asked whether every nation is not much more interested in the maintenance of the principle that revolution shall mingle in the internal affairs for itself, is the answer any less plain? If Louis Napoleon could add that the Mexican Government could then would not secure the friendship, and therefore the means to occupy a port and pay himself, the pleading would have been unfortunate, but he could have had some reason. But to occupy a foreign country which is on more over threaten the peace or power of France, is an assertion as any view of Gheugis Khan's, and is an act which threaten the peace of the world by subverting existing principle of international equity.

It will scarcely compensate for so gross an offence that the ambitious of Almonte & Co. "received the highest pitch" upon occasion of their introduction to Maximilian: "for on leaving the presence one of them declared that the very sight of this incomparable Princess would be worth to her august husband an army of forty thousand men; and that there was not a single partisan of Juarez who, at the aspect of the Archduchess Charlotte, would not become an enthusiastic Imperialist." She spoke to them "in the purest Castilian." So if an emissary of Juarez should offer a throne and Kingdom to any Prince or Duke in Europe we should all be charmed, should we not, if his wife should address him in the purest English? The Mexican conquest, thus far, is—excepting the lives it has cost—a comedy. But it may become a tragedy at any moment from which the present Castilian could not extricate the loveliest Princess.

THE OPERA.

THE Opera goes bravely on. As we supposed, Roberto Devereux was a failure; but Jone is the most magical success of a new opera since the Puritans. It seems hard to persuade managers that it is not enough that a work should be new to the natural public. It must be new to the artistic public to success. True to his vocation as an enterprising manager, however, Mr. Maretzek offers us still another new and very famous work—the Favorita—with one of the most delightful of the older operas, Lucrezia Borgia. For Medori there could not be a better part. Her quavery and tragic style is peculiarly fit her for Lucrezia; while Mazzoleni's passionate tenderness give to Gennaro a newer charm.

The Opera is so evanescent a pleasure in the city that it is necessary to bring it back again from time to time when they can hear the finest operas most adequately sung at the Academy. That time is now.

CARLYLE.

SINCE the melancholy glibe of Carlyle at this country we have heard little of him until we have this picture of him by Mr. M. D. Conway. He is still at work upon his Frederick:

"The scene of Work, Carlyle, remains in his room, grimly facing the grim phantom of the Old King—neither of them disposed to rest. You may see him sometimes with a wide-awake hat going out on horseback, generally toward Croydon, which Johnson's life has made one of his Meccas; but the rule seems to have little exception in it. Carlyle has in his study nineteen different portraits of Frederick, and more are hoped for. Among the latest acquisitions which hour upon the life he is writing. Every other person connected with the subject seems to be long excluded from his study. The spiritualists, of which there are not a few in London, say that he is possessed by the spirit of Frederick, and that his own personality in all things he writes now about slavery or any thing else, and that when the life is completed he will be free to write of spell, and be clothed and in his right mind. The grief of both wife and husband that the publication was not over the late will utterance of Carlyle is terrible. They regard it as the result of a very morbid state of mind and body, and it is probable that the publication will be delayed until in future relieve to allow such melancholy exposures as this will appear. Those in the house who can best sympathize with Carlyle who know him well; for he is utterly unable to suppress his feelings, and the most sympathetic who think him as mean and selfish as themselves are sure to get, if they approach him, a fearful snubbing."

ADVERTISEMENTS

ARMY AND NAVY ITEMS.

By direction of the President of the United States, Major-General B. F. BUTLER, United States Volunteers, has been appointed to command the Department of North Carolina, and the Department of Virginia and North Carolina, Major-General JOHN A. DIX, United States Volunteers, Major-General BUTLER, will report in person for orders to the Adjutant-General of the Army.

CHARLES R. ELLET, commanding the Mississippi Marine Brigade, died suddenly on 19th ult., at Bunker's Hill, Illinois.

Lieutenant MORRIS S. SHUTTERAW, executive officer of the Ironsides, has been promoted to the rank and ordered to the iron-clad Weehawken, vice Lieutenant-Commander WILLIAM GAMBLE, assigned to the command of the Patapsco.

There is no probability now that General HEINTZELMAN will resume command of the Department of the South—work having elapsed since he reported for duty.

Admiral DAHLGREN has issued a congratulatory handbill, and is guzzling in fresh and spirits. He expresses great confidence in the success of the land and naval military operations against Charleston, and that at no distant day.

Major-General HUNTER has left Washington on an inspecting tour to the army's outer line of defences.

General ANGER will in a few days be relieved from duty in the Department, and proceed to his home in Detroit, Michigan.

Colonel D. T. CHANDLER, formerly of the old regular army, and recently colonel of the 44th New York, is now in while attempting to make his way into Virginia, has received from several Southern men as a state prisoner, and is held for exchange.

General H. H. CRITTENDEN arrived in Springfield, Illinois, on 9th inst., from his home at Frankfort, Kentucky. He spent a few days in Chicago, and thence came to his command.

Major-General BANKS's army and navy friends in Massachusetts will be glad to learn that he is improving in health.

Major-General HALLECK has issued an order for the muster out of service of the 1st Regiment of Cavalry, Missouri Volunteers, now at Alexandria on September 30, and then had its organization and discipline broken up by the re-grouping it in chalk on a dead-wall in town, over his own signature.

An effort is making to gather the remains of those who fell in the battle of Fredericksburg, and to give them a proper burial-ground, as is to be done at Gettysburg, Pennsylvania.

A court-martial, of which Colonel GRAY, 85th Michigan Volunteers, is President, has been appointed for the trial of military offences.

Captain BENJAMIN F. SANDS has been detached from the Dacotah, and ordered to the command of the Fort Jackson.

Captain JAMES ALDEN has been ordered to the command of the Powhatan.

Lieutenant RODERICK PERRYMAN has been ordered to the Ino.

Lieutenant S. D. GROSSMAN has been ordered on special duty to NEW YORK.

Lieutenant-Commander WM. D. WHITING, commanding the Octorara, has been detached from her and ordered North for a new and larger command. Lieutenant-Commander S. LIVINGSTON BREESE will succeed him.

Commander PETER CROSBY has been detached as Fleet Captain of the North Atlantic blockading squadron, and ordered to command the Florida.

We were in error in stating lately that private ELIAS Hoffman, of Company A, 7th Army of the Potomac, belonged to Onkelonk's Mounted Rifles. Both Private Hoffman and the members of Onkelonk's Cavalry Onkelonk's Mounted Rifles are one of the finest best-ordered regiments in the service.

MAP SHOWING THE SCENE OF GENERAL HOOKER'S RECENT FIGHT.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

A FIGHT NEAR BRIDGEPORT.

THE following has been received of the battle:

CHATTANOOGA, TENNESSEE, Oct. 19, 1863.

Major-General H. W. HALLECK, General-in-Chief:

SIR,—In the fight of last night the enemy attacked General Geary's division, posted at Wauhatchie, on three sides, and broke his camp at one point, but was driven back in short order, leaving in the hands of the latter the remainder being held in reserve.

General Howard, while marching to Geary's relief, was attacked in the flank, the enemy occupying in force two commanding points on the road to Trenton.

General Howard immediately threw forward two of his regiments, and took both at the point of the bayonet, driving the enemy from his breast-works and across Lookout Creek.

In this brilliant success over their old adversary, the conduct of the officers and men of the Eleventh and Twelfth corps is entitled to the highest praise.

GEORGE H. THOMAS, Major-General.

THE RESULTS.

The following has also received:

CHATTANOOGA, TENNESSEE, Oct. 21—11.30 P.M.

Major-General H. W. Halleck, General-in-Chief:

Since the fight of the night of the 28th the enemy has not disturbed us.

General Hooker took many prisoners, among whom were four officers and one colonel and three are. He also captured nearly a thousand Enfield rifles. His loss was also heavy. Our killed, officers and men, both and wounded.

G. H. THOMAS, Major-General.

GENERAL GRANT TAKES THE COMMAND.

HEAD-QUARTERS, MILITARY DIVISION OF THE MISSISSIPPI, NASHVILLE, KENTUCKY, Oct. 18, 1863.

In compliance with General Order No. 337, of date Washington, D. C., October 16, 1863, the undersigned hereby assumes command of the "Military Division of the Mississippi, embracing the Departments of the Ohio, Cumberland, and Tennessee."

The headquarters of the Military Division of the Mississippi will be in the field. All reports and returns required by army regulations and existing orders will be made.

THOMAS SUPERSEDES ROSECRANS.

GENERAL ORDERS—No. 342.

HEAD-QUARTERS, DEPARTMENT OF THE CUMBERLAND, CHATTANOOGA, TENNESSEE, Oct. 19, 1863.

In obedience to the orders of the President of the United States, the undersigned hereby assumes command of the Army of the Cumberland.

In assuming the control of this army, so long and ably commanded by Major-General ROSECRANS, the undersigned confidently relies upon the hearty co-operation of every officer and soldier of the Army of the Cumberland to enable him to perform the responsible duties devolved upon him.

The officers on duty in the various departments of the staff at these head-quarters will continue in their respective places.

All orders heretofore published for the government of the army will remain in force until further orders.

GEORGE H. THOMAS,
Major-General United States Volunteers.

ROSECRANS'S FAREWELL.

GENERAL ORDERS—No. 341.

HEAD-QUARTERS, DEPARTMENT OF THE CUMBERLAND, CHATTANOOGA, TENNESSEE, Oct. 19, 1863.

The General Commanding announces to the officers and soldiers of the Army of the Cumberland that he leaves them under orders from the President.

Major-General THOMAS succeeds him, in compliance with orders, will assume the command of this army and department.

The chiefs of all the staff departments will report to him.

In taking leave of you, his brothers in arms, officers and soldiers, the General wishes you that your new commander comes not to you, as he did, a stranger. General Thomas has been identified with the army from its first organization. He has led you often in battle. He has shown prudence, discretion, courage, and true patriotism you may look with confidence that under God he will lead you to victory.

The General Commanding doubts not you will be as true to yourselves and your country in the future as you have been in the past.

To the officers and brigade commanders he tenders his cordial thanks for their valuable and hearty co-operation at all times in his command.

To the chiefs of the staff departments and their subordinates, whose duties have been so onerous, he owes a debt of gratitude for their fidelity and untiring devotion to duty.

Commanding officers will see that soldiers, farewell, and may God bless you.

W. S. ROSECRANS, Major-General.

THE ATTACK FROM CHARLESTON.

The latest news we have from Charleston is taken from the Richmond Sentinel of the 21st, three days later than we have had before. It states that the bombardment of Fort Sumter was renewed on the evening previous, but has yet taken place. From sundown on Wednesday until sundown on Thursday one thousand two hundred shots from fifteen-inch mortars and three hundred pounder Parrotts have been thrown against the fort. The rebel loss is severe wounded. On the evening of the 20th, General Gilmore's forces opened fire from the mortar battery at Cummings's Point upon the northeast angle of the fort. The batteries opposite Fort Wagner, on Morris Island, the centre battery and Cummings's Point battery, with the addition of the monsters "Swamp Angel" and "Lucy Somler," says the Whig, "still goes on, but this fire is much slower. Our batteries fire slowly and deliberately. The enemy at present pays no attention to them.

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.

The news from Washington indicates approaching active operations in General Meade's army. All the available troops under the command of General Martindale, the Military Governor of the capital, have been ordered from duty and sent to the field. They will be supplied by the Invalid Corps. The One Hundred and Seventh Pennsylvania has already been ordered, and left on 20. It appears that recent information concerning the movements and strength of the enemy will enable General Meade to take some decisive measures at once.

AFFAIRS IN LOUISIANA.

The troops under General Banks are moving through Western Louisiana, as is supposed, with the ultimate object of recovering Texas from the rebels. At last accounts, the Nineteenth Army Corps, under General Franklin, had passed Carrevel to Opelousas, eighty miles and ten on 22d of October, without meeting a great deal of resistance, notwithstanding the fact that the enemy in large force of infantry, cavalry, and artillery attempted to make a stand about five miles from the town. Carrying out the order, however, which has actuated them in all their movements so far during the campaign, they quickly routed the rebel rear advance, and are reported to have gone to Alexandria. The head-quarters of the Thirteenth Army Corps Alabama Army Corps are still at Vermillionville, and all the troops are in fine health and well supplied. At New Orleans an expedition, under General Dana, composed of veteran troops, was being fitted out. Its precise destination is, of course, not divulged, but the general opinion is, that it is intended for some point on the Texas coast. The enlistment of colored soldiers was going on rapidly in the city, and Port Hudson had been the scene recently of the destruction of rail-works, tanneries, and other rebel property across Lake Pontchartrain to Mississippi.

A DROLL COPPERHEAD PLOT.

A curious Copperhead plot in Ohio has come to light. The plan for effecting the release of imprisoned rebels in Camp was as follows: When the prisoners are a banquet, which they were to be given on the day they take leave. The prison guard was to be shot by outside parties, and were were to be thrown over the walls to the prisoners. The prisoners once out with their axes were to break open arms, and then they were to storm the penitentiary, release John Morgan and other Confederate officers, and the whole party were then to storm for the Ohio River and cause near Maysville. Cathcart was to go along and receive a commission in the rebel army as a reward for his services. Cathcart was arrested at the house of the Rev. Sabin Heath, through the arrested Heath, whom Mr. Valandigham wrote to the year 1861, that the United were honestly divided."

SUFFERINGS OF UNION PRISONERS.

The arrival of a boat-load of sick Union soldiers at Annapolis from Richmond reveals a most horrible tale of starvation on the part of the rebels to the unfortunate Union prisoners. Those who survived living were mere skeletons, of whom one-third will probably die, and eight had died, at Annapolis on the way from Richmond.

CONSCRIPTION FRAUDS.

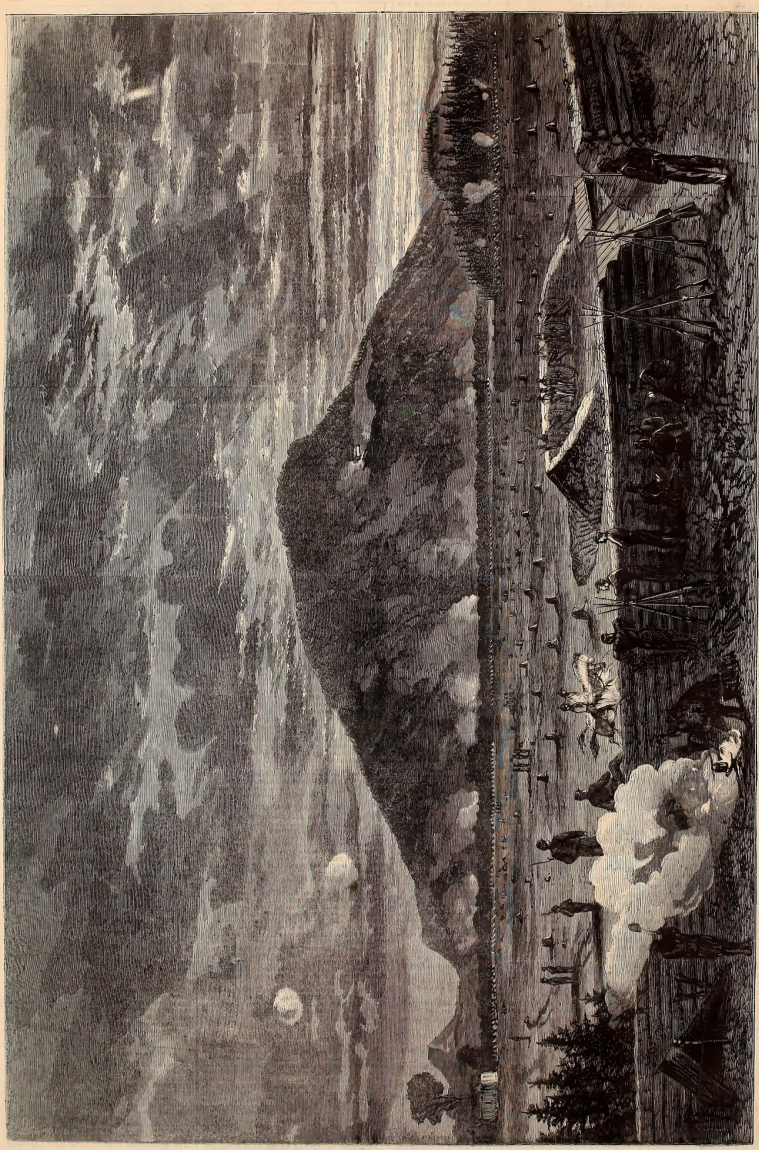
The Richmond Enquirer of the 17th inform, on the question of the Confederate currency, says: "The condition of the currency is now as alarming as ever. Its issues since has risen even above the excitement of military movements. Every new quarter of a million increases the schemes, expedients, and remedies are daily centers; Rossini over the country, and suggestions of every character and description are urged. One thing is certain and indisputable, that the present financial management is an utter and absolute failure, rendered so not by Mr. Memminger, but by the people themselves. The funding scheme of Mr. M. could succeed only by the prompt and prohibiting co-operation of the people, by courage ward and continuing to convert the currency into bonds. It is not succeeding for the reason that is why the people have failed. The fact that they have not and will not voluntarily do so currency is an important matter for legislative consideration."

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

MORE BRUTALITY.

Two other members of the Hibernia Volunteers, the Secretary of War and the Solicitor-General, have made speeches on the American war. Both have been the source of much pursuit by the Government, and the cause of much sensibility.

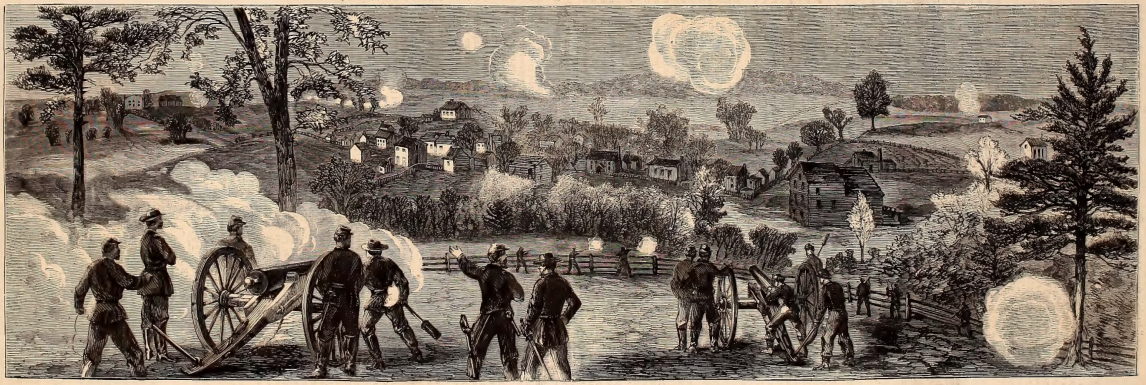


MR. BEECHER AT EXETER HALL.

The Rev. Henry Ward Beecher delivered a lecture on the American war at Exeter Hall, London, on the 20th of October. The hall was crammed to overflowing, and outside crowds were unable to obtain admission. He was carried into the hall on the shoulders of policemen, being totally unable to make his way through the crowd. The lecture was a perfect success.

CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.

THE PIRATES AND THE "VANDERBILT."



Journals from the Cape of Good Hope, dated to the middle of September, contain some very interesting reports of the movements of the rebel privateer Sea to Sea Mason's Boy and off the coast. The Vanderbilt having reached Simon's Bay, Captain Semmes evidently took off his cruiser to avoid her. After this the American traders commenced to move about more freely, still keeping near to shore, however. The South African pilot who took the Alabama out of Table Bay reports Semmes on the receipt of his renunciation, and formed a very poor opinion of his liberality of the treatment of the vessels under his consequence. The writers at the Cape describe the Alabama as a fine vessel. The Vanderbilt towed a disabled Dutch vessel into port.

LOOKOUT MOUNTAIN—SKETCHED BY THEODORE R. DAVIS FROM OUR WORKS ON CHATTANOOGA CREEK.—THE REBELS SHELLING OUR CAMPS.—[SEE PAGE 727.]

THE FRENCH IRON-CLAD FLEET.—[SEE PAGE 727.]

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC—BUCKLAND, SCENE OF A CAVALRY SKIRMISH WITH STUART.—SKETCHED BY A. R. WAUD.—[SEE PAGE 727.]

VERY CASH.

By CHARLES READE, Esq.

AUTHOR OF "IT IS NEVER TOO LATE TO MEND," ETC.

CHAPTER XLIV.

After a delirious but bitter and deadly Alfred naturally drew away from his inamorata. But she, boiling with love and hate, said bitterly, "We need not talk Mr. Rodds into our secrets. Come, Sir, your arm!"

He stuck it out ungraciously, and averted his head; she took it, suppressed with difficulty a pesty desire to pinch, and so walked by his side; he was as much at his ease as if promenading Jaughes with a panther. She felt him quiver with repugnance under her soft hand; and prolonged the irritating contact. She walked very slowly, and told him with much meaning she was waiting for a signal. "Till then," said she, "we will keep one another company." Biting this word with her teeth as it went out.

By-and-by a window was opened in the asylum and a white cloth hung out. Mrs. Archbold pointed it out to Alfred; he stared at it; and after that she walked him rapidly home in silence. But, as soon as the door was double-locked on him, she whispered triumphantly in his ear:

"Your mother-in-law was expected. That is that signal was to let me know she was gone."

"My mother-in-law!" cried the young man, and tried in vain to conceal his surprise and agitation.

"Ay; your mother-in-law, that shall never be: Mrs. Dodd."

"Mrs. Dodd here!" said Alfred, clasping his hands. Then he reflected, and said, coolly: "It is false; what could she come here for?"

"To see your father-in-law."

"My father-in-law? What, is he here too?" said Alfred, with an incredulous sneer.

"Yes, the raving maniac that calls himself Thompson, and that you took to from the first. he is your precious father-in-law—that shall never be."

Alfred was now utterly amazed, and bewildered. Mrs. Archbold eyed him in silent scorn.

"Poor man," said he, at last; and hung his head, sorrowfully. "No wonder the sight of me went so to my heart. How strange it all is? and how will it all end?"

"In your ruin, a madman instead of an insolent fool," hissed the viper.

At this moment Beverley appeared at the end of the yard. Mrs. Archbold whistled him to her like a dog. He came running zealously. "Who was that chap? and what I was out?" he inquired.

"A polite lady, madam: she said Sir to me and thanked me."

"That sounds like Mrs. Dodd," said the Archbold, quietly.

"Ah, but," continued Frank, "there was another with her: a beautiful young lady; oh, so beautiful!"

"Miss Julia Dodd," said the Archbold, grimly.

Alfred panted, and his eyes roved wildly in search of a place to escape and follow her; at last could not be far off.

"Any body else, Frank?" inquired Mrs. Archbold.

"No more ladies, madam; but there was a young gentleman all in black; I think he was in clergyman; or a butler."

"Ah, that was her husband that is to be; that was Mr. Hurd. She can go nowhere without him, not even to see her old boss."

At these words, every one of them an adder, Alfred turned on her furiously, and his long arm shot out of its own accord, and the fingers clenched like an eagle's claw. She saw, and understood, but never flinched. Her vindictive eye met his dilating flashing orbs unflinchingly.

"You pass for a woman," he said, "and I am two wretch—I mean men." He turned away with a deep convulsive sob, and, almost staggering, leaned his brow against the wall of the house.

She had done what no man had as yet succeeded in; she had broken his spirit. And here a man would have left him alone. But this subjected beauty put her lips to his ear, and whispered into it: "This is only the beginning." Then she left him, and went to his room and stole all his paper, and pens, and ink, and his very almanac; he was to have no communication now, except to brood, and brood, and brood.

As for Alfred, he sat down upon a bench in the yard, a broken man: up to this moment he had hoped his Julia was as constant as himself. But no; either she had heard he was mad, and, with the unhesitating cruelty that belongs to her sex, hops, not hearing from him at all, believed herself forsaken: and was consoling herself with a clergyman. Jealousy did not at first infuriate Alfred. Its first effect resembled that of a heavy blow. Little Beverley found him seated on a bench, and ran to the Robin. The ex-prize-fighter brought him a thimbleful of brandy: but he would not take it. "Ah, no, my friend," he said, "that can not cure me; it is not my stomach: it is my heart. Broken! broken!"

The Robin sneered muttering. Little Beverley kneeled down beside him, and kissed his hand with a humble devotion that savored of the canine.

Yet it was tender, and the sinking heart clung to it. "Oh, Frank!" he cried, "my Julia believes me mad, or thinks me false, or something, and she will marry another before I can get out, to tell her all I have endured was for loving her. What shall I do? God protect my reason! What will become of me?"

He moaned, and young Frank sorrowed over him, till the harsh voice of Rooke summoned him on some sanitary duty. This dismissed, he came running back; and sat on the bench beside his crushed benefactor without saying a word. At last he delivered this sapient speech: "I see. You want to get out of this place."

Alfred only sighed hopelessly.

"Then I must try and get out," said Frank, stoutly.

Alfred shook his head.

"Just let me think," said Frank, solemnly; and sat in silent looking like a young owl: for thinking soon puzzled him, and elicited his intellectual weakness; whereas in a couple of minutes his cunning, unquilty as half the world, and but for his official, officious Protector, might just as well have been sentinel at the Swan, at Keele and Chambermaid at the Wolf.

So now force and cunning had declared war on Alfred, and feebleness in person enlisted in his defence. His adversary lost no time: that afternoon Rooke told him he was henceforth to occupy a double-bedded room with another patient.

"If he should be violent in the middle of the night, sing out, and we will come, if we hear you," said the keeper with a malicious smile.

The patient turned out to be the able seaman. Here Mrs. Archbold aimed a double stroke; to make Alfred's misery acute, and show him how very mad his proposed father-in-law was. She thought that, if he could once be forced to realize this, it might reconcile him to not marrying the daughter.

The first night David did quiet and paraded an imaginary deck for four mortal hours. Alfred's sleep was broken; but he said nothing; and David turned in again, his watch ended.

Not a day passed now but a blow was struck. Nor was the victim passive: debarred writing materials, he set down his thoughts on copies of the Times, and secreted them: then catching sight of some ink-blots on the back of Frank's clothes-basket, he practised secretly off, melted them in a very little water, and with a toothpick scrawled his wrongs to the Commissioners; he rolled the slip of paper, sealed it, and wrote outside, "Good Christian, keep this half-crown, and take the writing to the Lunacy Commissioners at Whitehall, for pity's sake." This could be watched, and when nobody was looking flung his letter, so weighted, over the gates: he heard it fall on the public road.

Another day he secreted a spoonful of black stewed prune-juice, diluted it with a little wine, and wrote a letter, and threw it into the road as before: another day, hearing the Robin express disgust at the black for which Mrs. Archbold injected, he drew him apart, and offered him a hundred pounds to get him out. Now the ex-prize-fighter was not to be bought; indeed fallen, and a great detester of foul play. What he saw made him now side heartily with Alfred; and all he wanted, now to be indemnified for his loss.

He looked down and said, "You see, Sir, I have a wife and six to think of."

Alfred offered him a thousand pounds.

"That is more than enough, Sir," said the Robin; "but as you see I have like a weakness, the contrast chairs, and all the paraphernalia, were not to be had for the asking, and disposed upon at once if found, they would look like things scorned and dismissed from service: for Wolfe, mind you, professed to have escaped from them."

Alfred asked what was up, and found all this was in preparation for the quarterly visit of the Commissioners: he learned, too, from the Robin that Drayton House always knew when they were coming, and the very nonces of the two thunderers that they ought to suspect.

Mrs. Archbold communicated her knowledge to off-hand terms. "It is only two old women, Richard and Mary."

The gentleman thus flatteringly heralded arrived next day. This is only the beginning." With a grand benevolent head, bald front and silver hair, and the gold-headed cane of his youth, now a signifier of age. He was not the ordinary looking little chap enough: with this merit, he was what he looked. They had a long interview with Mrs. Archbold first, for fear they should carry a naked eye into the asylum; Mr. Bartlett, acting on instructions, very soon entered about Alfred. Mrs. Archbold's face put on friendly concern directly. "I am sorry to say he is worse than he was when you last saw him: he nearly so well. We have given him walks in the country, too; but I regret to say they did him no real good: he is more violent than ever, and now he shuns the other patients, which he used not to do." In short, she gave them the impression that Alfred was a moping melancholiac.

"Well, I had better see him," said Mr. Bartlett, "just as a matter of form, you know."

Alfred was accordingly sent for, and naked with an indifferent air how he was.

He said he was very well in health, but in sore distress of mind at his letters to the Commissioners being intercepted by Mrs. Archbold or Dr. Wolf.

Mrs. Archbold smiled, pityingly. Mr. Bartlett caught her glance, and concluded this was one of the patient's delusions. (Formula.)

Alfred surprised the glances, and said, "You can hardly believe this, because the act is illegal. But a great many illegal acts, that you never detect, are done in asylums. However, it is not a question of surmise: I sent four letters in the regular way since I came. Here are their several dates. Pray make a note to inquire whether they have reached Whitehall or not."

"Oh, certainly, to oblige you," said Mr. Bartlett, and made the note.

Mrs. Archbold looked rather discomposed at that.

"Also now, gentlemen," said Alfred, "since Mrs. Archbold has had a private interview, which I see she has abused to poison your mind against me, I claim a simple justice a private interview to disabuse you."

"You are the first patient ever told me to walk out and leave the room-groom," said Mrs. Archbold, rising white with ire and apprehension, and sweeping out of the room.

By the time she reached the gentlemen she gave the enemy a point in the game; for, if she had insisted on staying, Mr. Bartlett was far too weak to have refused her. As it was, he felt shocked at Alfred's rudeness, and so small a thing as justice did not in his idea counterbalance so great a thing as discourtesy; so he listened to Alfred's tale with the deadly apathy of an unwilling hearer. "Pour on: I will endure," as poor Lear says.

As for Dr. Terry, he was pictorial, but mild: effaced, emptied of brains by all-scraping Time. If he had been detained that day at Drayton House, and Frank Beverley sent back in his place, Alfred would have had no small hope attached to him, less to the nation, and nothing to mankind.

At last Mr. Bartlett gave Alfred some hopes he was taking in the truth; for he tore a leaf out of his memorandum book, wrote on it, and passed it to Dr. Terry. The ancient took it with a smile, and seemed to make an effort to write; but his hand dropped simultaneously from his finger and his mind.

Not a question was put to Alfred; so he was fain to withdraw, and his withdrawer addressed, and caught Mrs. Archbold at the keyhole. "Noble adversary!" said he, and stalked away. Mrs. Archbold was in a rage, and no sooner did the inspectors come out, and leave the coast clear, than he darted in and looked for the paper Mr. Bartlett had given to Dr. Terry.

He found it on the floor, and took it eagerly up; and full of hope and expectation, read these words:

"WHAT IS THE NAME OF THE STUFF THE MATRON GIVES YOU? I SHOULD LIKE TO BUY MRS. BARTLETT ONE LIKE IT.

Alfred stood and read this again, and again. he smiled, and his eye rested on symbolical meaning in the words. High-minded, and deeply impressed with his own wrongs, he could not conceive a respectable person, and fifteen hundred a year to spy out wrongs, being so heartless hard as to write this single comment during the inspection of a man being so gigantic an his. Poor Alfred learned this to his cost, that to put small men into great places is to create monsters. When he replaced the bitter truth, he put the story-hearted paper in his pocket, crept into the yard, and, for all the world, for all he could do, scalding tears ran down his cheeks.

"Homunculi quanti sunt!" he sobbed. "Homunculi quanti sunt!"

Presently he saw Dr. Terry come wandering toward him alone. The Archbold had not dared to leave the room safe; sanctimule had done that. Alfred, all heart-sick as he was, went to the old gentleman out of veneration for the outside of his office, and for Shakspeare—and pity for his bodily infirmity, and offered him an arm. The doctor thanked him sweetly, and said, "Very young man, I have no way thing to communicate?"

Alfred said that the ancient man had already forgotten his face, and so looking at him with that rare instrument of official inspection, he asked only, "Is there room sane; and consequently taken him for a keeper.

How swiftly the mind can roam, and from what a distance it can gather materials of a thought! Flashed like lightning through Alfred's mind this line from one of his pets, the Greek philosophers:

Και γαρ ο μεγιστος των κακων αρχη τοις τε καλοις.

And this is the greatest stroke of art, to turn an evil into a good.*

Now the feebleness of this aged Inspector was an evil: that feebleness was to turn it into a good. Shade of Plato, behold how thy disciple worked then! "Sir," said he, sinking his voice very much, "I am sorry I had I am a poor man, you won't say I told you: it's as much as my place is worth."

"Of course, strict confidence," replied Nestor, very gravely for his note-book: he extracted at at last like a loose tooth, fumbled with it, and dropped it: it was received up fuming inwardly.

The ancient went to write, but his fingers were weak and hesitating, and by this time he had half forgotten what he was going to say. Alfred's voice quavered with impatience; but he fought it down, and offered as coolly as he could to write it for him: the offer was accepted, and he wrote down in a feigned hand, very clear,

"DRAYTON HOUSE, Oct. 5. A sane patient, Alfred Hardie, confined here from interested motives. Has written four letters to the Commissioners, all intended to intercept. Has communicated to me in confidence by an attendant in the house. Refer to the party himself, and his correspondence with the Commissioners from Dr. Wycherley's: also to Thomas Wales, assistant attendant: and to Dr. Wycherley: also to Dr. Eskell, and Mr. Abbott, Commissioners of Lunacy."

After this stroke of address Alfred took the first opportunity of leaving him, and sent Frank Beverley to him.

Thus Alfred, alarmed by the hatred of Mrs. Archbold, and dismayed with jealousy, assured all his intelligence and played many cards for liberty. One he kept in reserve; and a trump card too. That, having written to the Commissioners, he did not hesitate, but out pocketed, up sleeve, and drew blood from his arm, and with it wrote once more to the Commissioners, but kept this letter hidden for an ingenious purpose. What that was my reader shall divine.

CHAPTER XLV.

We left Julia Dodd a district visitor. Visiting in a dense parish she learned the depths of human misery, bodily and mental.

She visited an honest widow, so poor that she could not afford a farthing dip, but sat in the dark. When friends visited her they sometimes brought a candle to talk by.

She visited a cripple who often thanked God sincerely for having her the use of one thumb.

She visited a poor creature who for sixteen years had been afflicted with a tumor in the neck, and had lain all those years on her back with her head in a plate; the heat of a pillow would have killed it, Julia found her hanging by one and yet content to stay: and praising God in all the lulls of that pain, which was her companion day and night.

But were I to enumerate the ghastly sights, the stifling loathsome odors, the vulgar horrors of a single district, the young lady from the view of my readers would endure on paper for love of truth, what she endured in the love of God and of Him whose servant she aspired to be.

Probably such sacrifices of selfish ease and comfort are never quite in vain; they tend in many ways to heal our own wounds: I won't say this suffering is more than atonement, but it is realized far more vividly by a spectator. The grim heart-breaking sights she saw wrayed Julia's conscience against her pretty life: the more so when she found some of her most afflicted ones resigned, and even grateful. "What," said she, "have they all that I have not? suffering, bow so cheerfully to the will of Heaven, and have I the wickedness, the impudence, to repine?"

And then, happier than most district visitors, she was not always obliged to go to the poor: she had a confine her consolations to good words. Mrs. Dodd was getting on famously in her business: Julia had taken a partnership in it, and Co., and was inspecting eighty ladies, as well as working: her salary and profits together were not less than fifteen hundred a year, and her one luxury was charity, and Julia its minister. She carried a good honest basket, and those you might see her Bible-wedged in with wine, and meat, and tea and sugar: and still, as these melted in her round, a little spark of something warm would sometimes glow in her own sick heart. Thus by degrees she was attaining, not earthly happiness, but a grave and pensive cheerfulness.

Yet across it gusts of earthly grief came sweeping to time; but these she hid till she was herself again.

To her mother and brother she was kinder, sweeter, more thoughtful than ever. They looked on her as a saint; but she knew better; and used to blush with honest shame when they called her so. "Oh dear, pray don't," she would say, with unaffected pain. "Love me as if I was an angel; but do not praise me, that makes me so proud and stuck up in my own world. I am not a Christian yet, nor any thing like one."

Returning one day from her district, she sat down to take off her bonnet in her own room, and presently heard snatches of an argument, that went on in the next room—and little ears of hers that could almost hear through a wall. The two concluding sentences were sufficiently typical of the whole discussion.

"Why disturb her?" said Mrs. Dodd. "She is getting better of 'the wretch;' and my advice is say nothing about it, and keep her so."

"But then it is so unfair, so ungenerous, to keep any thing from the poor girl that may concern her."

At this moment Julia came softly into the room with a curiosity hidden under an air of angelic composure.

Her mother asked After Mrs. Beecher, to draw her attention elsewhere. She replied, that Mrs. Beecher was no better, but very thankful for the wine Mrs. Dodd had sent her. This answered its purpose without any suspicion: Harry sat and by Edward, and fixed two loving imploring eyes on him in silence. Edward read. This feeble creature was the scab, and make him talk ungenerously. It did. She was close to him, and remained at the end of the room.

"Look here, Jo," said he, putting his hands in his pockets, "we two have always been friends as well as brothers, and I want your opinion: it does not seem like a friend to keep things dark?" then to Mrs. Dodd: "She is not a child, mother, after all; and how can it be wrong to tell her the truth, or right to suppress the truth? Well then, Jo, there's an advertisement in the Times, and it's a regular riddle. Now mind, I don't really think there is any thing in it; but it is a droll coincidence, very droll; if it won't there are ladies present, and one of them a district visitor. I would say, d—d droll. So droll," continued he, turning to Julia, "that I should like to punch the advertiser's head."

* And this is the greatest stroke of art, to turn an evil into a good.

"Let me see it, dear," said Julia. "I dare say it is nothing worth punching about."

"There," said Edward. "I've marked it."

Julia took the paper, and her eye fell on this short advertisement:

ALLEEN ARGON.—DISTRUST APPEARANCES.

Looking at her with some anxiety, they saw the paper give one sharp rustle in her hands, and then quiver a little. She forced her head over it, and strug scemed to swim. But she never moved; they could neither of them see her face, she defended herself with the printed sheet. Letters cleared again, and, still hiding her face, she studied, and studied the advertisement.

"Come, tell us what you think of it," said Edward. "Is it any thing? or a mero coincidence?"

"It is a pure coincidence," said Mrs. Dodd, with an admirable imitation of cool confidence.

Julia said nothing; but she now rose and put both arms round Edward's neck, and kissed him fervidly again and again, holding the newspaper tight all the time.

"There," said Mrs. Dodd: "see what you have done."

"Oh, it is all right," said Edward, cheerfully. "The British firemen is getting hugged no end. Why what is the matter? have you got the hiccough, Jy?"

"No; no! You are a true brother. I knew all along that he would explain all if he was alive: and he is alive," kissing the "Times" violently more than once; this done, she fluttered away with it to her own room, ashamed to show her joy, and yet not able to hide it.

Mrs. Dodd shook her head, sorrowfully: and Edward began to look a trifle old and downcast as he had done wisely. I omit the discussion that followed. But the next time his duties permitted him a visit there, Mrs. Dodd showed him the "Times" in her turn, and with her pretty white taper finger pointed grimly to the following advertisement:

ALLEEN ARGON.—I do DISTRUST APPEARANCES. But if you ever loved me explain them at once. I am expecting for you from you 4-day since.

"Poor simple girl," said Mrs. Dodd; "not to see that, if he could explain at all, he would explain, not go adding on one enigma after another to mystification. And to think of my innocent dove putting in that she had something for him from his sister; a mighty temptation to make a wretch!"

"It was wonderfully silly," said Edward; "and such a clever girl, too; but you ladies can't stick to one thing at a time; begging your pardon, mamma."

Mrs. Dodd took no notice of this remark.

"To see her lower herself so!" she said, "O, my son, I am ashamed." And Mrs. Dodd kissed her check against Edward's, and sighed.

"Now don't you cry, mammy," said he, sorrowfully. "I can't break every bone in his skin for your comfort."

"Heaven forbid!" cried Mrs. Dodd, anxiously. "What, are you not aware she would hate you?"

"Hate me! her brother!"

"She would hate us all, if we laid a finger on that wretch. Pray interfere no more, love's foolish child, talking to me about women, and how to plain you the working of their hearts: and a good thing for you." She then put on maternal authority (nobody could do it more easily) and solemnly forbade all violence.

He did not venture to contradict her now: but cherished his resolution all the more, and longed for the hour when he might take "the wretch" by the throat, and chastise him, the more pointedly the better.

Now, the above incident then revealed Julia's real heart, which she had been hiding more or less all this time from those who could not sympathize with her, took eventually a turn unfavorable to "the wretch." So he might well be excited. Her quiet and settled love had always been that Alfred was dead. Under the immediate influence of his father's example, the belief for a moment believed he was false; but so true and loving a heart could not rest in that opinion. In true love as long as there is any shadow of uncertainty, there is a world of faith and credulous ingenuity. Now, as Alfred had never been seen about town, nobody could say he was married so another, there was a grain of uncertainty as to his unfaithfulness, and this her true heart magnified to the mountain.

But now matters were another face. She was sure he had written to the advertisement, and possibly care for that old hero, and what appearances to explain away? and who but he knew they took in the Morning Intelligencer? She would wait for the explanation she had invited. She read the advertising column every day over and over.

Not a word came.

Then her womanly pride was deeply wounded. What, had she coaxed an explanation where most ladies would have listened to none; and coaxed it in vain!

Her high spirit revolted. Her heart swelled against the repeated insults she had received: this last one filled the bitter cup too high.

And then her mother came in and assured her he had only inserted that advertisement to keep her in his power. He feared you are receiving, and that you are admired by others more worthy of your esteem.

Julia cried bitterly at these arguments, for she could no longer combat them.

And Mr. Hurd was very attentive and kind. And when he spoke to Julia, and Julia turned away, her eye was sure to meet Mrs. Dodd's eye imploring her secretly not to discourage the young man too much. And so she was gently pulled by one, and gently thrust by another, away from her first lover and toward his successor.

It is an old, old story. Fate seems to exhaust its malice on our first love. For the second the road is smoother. Matters went on so some weeks, and it was perfectly true that Mr. Hurd escorted both ladies one day to Drayton House, as Julia's request, and not Mrs. Dodd's. Indeed, the latter lady was secretly hurt at his being allowed to come with them.

One Saturday afternoon, Mrs. Dodd went alone to Drayton House, by appointment. David was at his bank. Julia had received no knowledge of her. Mrs. Archbold told her a quiet, intelligent patient had taken a country house for a month or two, and this was adding much to his happiness. "May I see him to thank him?" asked Mrs. Dodd. "Certainly," said Mrs. Archbold. "I'll inquire for him." She went out, but soon returned, saying, "He is gone out for a walk with the invalid, and is not quite such a match for his and amusement as we can; we hope soon to send him out altogether, cured." "Truly kind and thoughtful," said Mrs. Dodd. And very soon, she kissed Mrs. Archbold, and pressed a valuable brooch upon her: and then took leave. How sorry, at this gate she encountered Mr. Hurd. Mrs. Archbold said she would go back for it. Mrs. Dodd did not hesitate. Mrs. Archbold had insisted, and settled the question by going. She was no sooner in the house than young Frank Bevery came running to Mrs. Dodd, and put the missing parcel officiously into her hand. "Oh, thank you, Sir," said she; "will you be so kind as to tell Mrs. Archbold I have it." And with this they parted, and the porter opened the gate to her, and she got into her hired cab. And, as she drove off, she let a loud sound, was lost in the sorrowful thoughts of what had been, and what now was. Four wks, each visit to Drayton House opened her wound afresh. On reaching the stones there was a turnpike. On this occasion she had counted out the purse and paid it. As she drew back to her seat, she saw out of the tail of her feminine eye the edge of something white under the cushion. She took up the parcel, and found a written paper pinned on to it: she detached this paper, and examined it with a sort of mechanical curiosity. It consisted of a long slip about an inch and a quarter broad, rolled like tape, and tied with pink ribbon. This ribbon had not tied inside, of course, but she read the superscription: it was firmly but clearly written, in red ink, and ran upward.

Of the words I shall only say at present that they were strange and startling, and struck direct on the wife's intelligence and tender heart of Mrs. Dodd was overpowering. They knocked at her heart; they drove her from it again; they grew more eloquent than a thousand speeches: and the next moment she felt a little faint; for she knew now the appeal was not to her, but to her sister, being very fit to pass between the heart of woe and the heart of pity. She smelt at her salts, and soon recovered. She was a woman of nerve, and womanly bosom swelled so with the milk of human kindness that her breath came short. After this, though she guessed what was in it, "Ah, that I will, poor soul; this very moment." Now, by this time she was close to the house.

She stopped the cab at the door, and asked the driver if his horse was fresh enough to carry her to the board of Admiralty in Whitehall, Sir," said she. "Lord bless you, ma'am," said the cabman, "Whitehall? why my mare would buy you there and brought back in an hour, let alone Whitehall."

Reassured on that point Mrs. Dodd went in to get a few necessaries for her visit, but, as she stood in the passage, she heard her children's voices, and also a friend's; the genial, angry voice of Sampson Dodd, senior.

She thought, "Oh, I must just show them all the paper, before I go with it!" and so she put little bits of things with things with Sarah, mounted the stairs, and arrived among them singularly apropos, as it happened.

Mrs Like Sampson, who make many foes, do also make many friends, and these are of the old school, and faithful friends themselves. The boisterous doctor had stuck to the Dodds in all their distresses: he had not only given them his money, it certainly was not his fault: for almost his first word, when he found them in a lodging, was, "Now, Dodd, let me have that little purse, pen and ink, and I'll just draw ye one; for a hundred." This he finished politely to Mrs. Dodd, he expostulated. "Come clear—Msdam, how on arith can ye go on in such a place as that without money?" he said.

He returned to the charge at his next visit, and scolded her well for her pride. "Who ever heard of letting your own flesh and blood starve, chick, from an old friend like me? Come now, behave! Just a woe chick: I'll let y' off for fifty."

"Give us your company and your friendship," said Mrs. Dodd; "we value them above gold: we will not rob you dear child whom we have as many fingers on our hands as other people."

On the present occasion Dr. Sampson, whose affectionate respect for the leading London physicians has already been manifested, was lavishing specially against certain specialists, whom, in the rapidity of his lusty eloquence, he called the Mad Ox. He favored Julia and Edward with a full account of the manifold enormities he had detected them in during thirty years' practice; and so descended to his present grievance. A lady, an old friend of his, was being seen in a certain street, by one of these beasts, because she had got money and relations, and had once been delirious. "And why was she delirious? because she had a brain-fever: she got well in a fortnight." This lady had thrown a letter over the wall addressed to him; somebody had posted it: he had asked the Commissioners to let him visit her; they had declined for the present. "Yon Board always sides with the strong against the weak," said he. So now he had bribed the gardener, and make a midnight assignation with the patient; and was going to it with six stout fellows to carry her off by force. "This is my recipe for alleged Insanity," said he. "The business will be more like a medieval knight carrying off a courteous nun out of a convent, than a good physician saving a pashient from the Mad Ox. However, Mrs. Sampson's in the secret; I daresay she will approves it; for she doesn't. She says, 'Go quietly to the Board of Commissioners, Sir.' 'My dear, Board's no sort of cattle that go too slow for Sampson, and no match at all for the Mad Ox.'"

At this critical moment, or soon after, Mrs. Dodd came in with her paper in her hand, a little flurried for once, and, after a hasty courtesy, said,

"Oh, Dr. Sampson, oh, my dears, what wickedness there is in the world! I'm going to Whitehall this moment; only look at what was pinned on my parasol at Drayton House."

The writing passed from hand to hand, and left the readers looking very gravely at one another. Julia was quite pale, and her lip quivered. Ali were too deeply moved, and even shocked, to make any comments; whilst the doctor, in a low voice, read like a cry from the writer's heart to their hearts.

> "If you are a Christian, if you are human, pity a sore distress, and help a friend, and take this to the heart of Lassage at Lincoln's Inn. Say by treachery from her I love, who intercepted the first paragraph, pens and paper kept from me, I write this in the dark, with a fork and my blood on a rim of the Prince. Say she is dead direct if to some one who has authority, and can feel for another's agony."

Dr. Sampson was the first to speak. "There, said he, "I told you so." "didn't I tell you? This man is sane. There's sanity in every line."

"Well, but," said Edward, "do you mean to say that is a madman's letter?"

"Mai—dear—Sirr. Mankind niver changes. Whatever the muscles of man can do in the light, the mind and soul can feel of man will consent to do in the dark."

This said—it was a word.

Mrs. Dodd, too, was for action, not for talk. She bade them all a hasty adieu, and went on her good work.

Ere she got to the street door she heard a swift rustle behind her; and it was Julia flying down to her, with flushed and sparkling eyes and quick impetuosity, that had seemed dead forever. "No, no," she cried, panting with generous emotion; "it is not to be sent. I am torn from him I love, and by some treachery I dare say: and I have suffered, oh you shall never know what I have suffered. Yet it is me, oh pray, pray, let pray give it see. I'll take it to Whitehall."

CHATTANOOGA.

On page 724 we reproduce a picture drawn by our special artist, Mr. Theodore R. Davis, representing Chattanooga, Tennessee, close to Chattanooga. On 18th Mr. Davis wrote:

"HEAD-QUARTERS OF MAJOR-GENERAL GRANGER, CHATTANOOGA, October 18.

"For some time after the fight at Chicamauga Lookout Mountain was considered as a signal-station by Captain Cole and Lieutenant Howgate, with a small party, who one day received notice to quit from General Longstreet in the valley. Rope had then been for some time signaling over the heads of the rebels camped below.

"Since the rebels have taken possession they have built fortifications on the opposing where the seminary is situated, half-way up the mountain, into which they 'can occasionally shell our camps.'

Since the above was written an important change has taken place, and Lookout Mountain has once more passed into our hands. A dispatch from Chattanooga, dated the 24th, says: "A division, main under Colonel Stanley, of the Eleventh Ohio regiment, floated fifty pontoons down the river in the dead darkness of the morning, and, after a short ferry, and surprised and drove the rebels from the ridge on the south side, opening communication with the refugees. The rebels are flanked, and must evacuate Lookout Mountain."

A second dispatch says, "General Hazen, with two brigades of General Palmer's division, attacked the enemy on Lookout Mountain and drove him from his position."

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.

On page 725 we publish a view of BUCKLAND, Virginia, the scene of a recent cavalry skirmish, from a sketch by A. R. Waud. Mr. Waud writes:

"Buckland is a Warrenton place, where the Broad Run crosses the road. It contains about two dozen houses, a wooden factory, and a dilapidated mill, and is a very picturesque, although an unpicturesque place. The Run is very pretty, having all the characteristics of a mountain stream. On Monday with this October, Kilpatrick's command met the rebels under Stuart. Davies's brigade had crossed the river, and proceeded along this pike to reconnoitre, when a heavy force was discovered moving upon our left flank. Before this General Custer's brigade had to give way, recrossing the river, and taking position on the hill to the east of it. The rebels divided, Hampton on following Davies as he retreated up the Run to find a crossing, and Stuart engaging Custer with overwhelming forces, pressing him back upon Gainesville. General Davies succeeded in getting his men over the river at a most unpromising place; looking at it next day, it seemed almost impossible for guns to get across as they did. Considering the entire surprise of our troops, the rebels did not make much out of it, about 200, principally mere prisoners, being our loss.

"Mr. Hunton's family, consisting of his wife, three daughters, and some servants, took refuge in the cellar. Hampton's battery planted itself on both sides of the house, and the sharp-shooters behind its corners and the trees and fences, all which throw scars from the round bullets. No one was hurt."

THE "DUNDERBERG."

We devote pages 728 and 729 to a large illustration of the great steam ram Dunderberg, which William H. Webb is building for the Government. She will be, when launched and armed, the most powerful man-of-war afloat. She is 578 feet long, 68 feet wide, and 32 feet deep. The armor on the side is 6½ feet thick of timber and 4½ inches thick of iron; on the casemate it is 3 feet of wood and 3½ inches of iron. She will have two turrets, with two guns in each turret, and 4 in each. She will have six broadside and two pivot guns in the casemate. Her hull will be bulkheaded, with yards and sails. The forward part of the vessel, for 50 feet of solid timber and iron, constitutes the ram. The engines are 6000 horse-power, which will give her probably 16 miles an hour. It is not likely that the Dunderberg will be ready for service for a year, the magnitude of her proportions requiring immense time and labor.

In contrast with the Dunderberg we reproduce, from a French paper, a picture of the leading vessels of the Imperial iron-clad fleet. The vessels are two-deckers, armed on the old style, and differ in rig from the modern vessels of the navy simply in being clad with iron and armed with a ram. The iron mail is about 4½ inches thick. This squadron set sail from Cherbourg on 27th September for an experimental cruise. While at sea, some distance from Brest, it encountered a severe gale, which seems to have astonished the captains. The vessels slipped so much water that the officers' quarters were deranged, and sea-sick men were washed overboard. On the morning after the storm the squadron was dispersed, only one vessel remaining in sight of the flag-ship. It is evident that these vessels could not be trusted to cross the ocean.

THE LATE GENERAL LYTLE.

We publish on page 732 a portrait of the late GENERAL WILLIAM H. LYTLE, who fell, gallantly leading his men to the attack, at the battle of Chickamauga, on 20th September last.

William H. Lytle was the son of a gallant soldier distinguished even by Robert Lytle, and was born at Cincinnati in the year 1837. He entered the army young, and served in the Mexican war as captain. At the close of the war he studied law, and served several terms in the Ohio State Legislature. At the outset of the present war he commanded the Ohio militia at Camp Harrison, and subsequently accepted the Colonelcy of the Tenth Ohio Volunteers. At Carnifex Ferry he commanded a brigade, and largely contributed to drive Floyd and Wise out of that part of Virginia. It was there he received his first wound. In the battle on the troops stood firm under the enemy's fire, when he gave the command to "charge." When they had crossed just half the distance to the rebel works their gallant leader fell. The impetus was gone. His men, with a sense of duty, refused to leave the work for some time, neither advancing nor retreating, but at last fell back to the woods. The enemy, finding themselves unable to assault this portion, recrossed Carnifex, and abandoned this strong-hold. When scarcely recovered from this injury Lytle returned to the field, first to the command of the Bardstown Camp of Instruction, and then of the Seventeenth Brigade, under General O. M. Mitchel. In the battles just out of the range of the battle of Carnifex, Lytle was again wounded, at Perryville, by a musket-ball in the thigh, which kept him a week's captivity, was exchanged. It was here that the gallant conduct of the young hero wrung unstinted praise from all, and won the love and admiration of his own people. In the spring of 1863 his appointment as Brigadier-General of Volunteers passed the Senate. At that time up to his death he served with General Rosecrans. Thus in each successive autumn of the war Lytle was wounded, at Carnifex Ferry, at Perryville, and then on the brilliant career of the young General closed on the bloody field of Chickamauga.

We have spoken of Lytle the soldier; in conclusion we may say a few words of Lytle the poet. His fame will be grasped by general publicity to his writings, and consequently but few of his productions have found their way into the public journals. We have one of his best in the poems, in which "he, being dead, yet speaketh," and speaks to the gay votary of pleasure, saying, "Arise, go forth, and be likewise!":

> "Ye not the time for dalliance soft
> In gentle ladies' bowers?
> Again the Roman eagle's wing aloft,
> And dares to trail its towers.
> Again the sons of our fathers were
> Silent in their exultant rage,
> And we with all the strength of years,
> When marching forth to battle.
>
> From every wooded mountain-side,
> From every dingled valley,
> Our hunters, with their rifles wide,
> Invite the brave to rally.
> And far to East, and far to West,
> Our iron line advances,
> While Freedom's fire, by freemen blessed,
> In glory o'er us dances.
>
> But when the birds of morning sing,
> And all the wars are over,
> Our barrels at your feet we'll fling,
> And kiss our forts of clover.
> We'll sit we say 'tis time to rest,
> As gayly drums shall rattle,
> Before our conquering colonies head,
> When marching home from battle.

THE "DUNDERBERG," THE GREATEST MAN-OF-WAR IN THE WORLD, A

AS SHE NOW APPEARS IN WILLIAM H. WEBB'S SHIP-YARD.—[See Page 727.]

THE NEW BATTLE-CALL.

Unroll our flag beat the long roll once more!
Call up the North as you called her before.
Up from the work-shop, the office, the plow—
She responded before, she will answer you now!
In Freedom's warfare what freeman can lag?
Beat the old battle-call under the flag!

Call the young men, in the prime of their life,
Call their mothers, their sisters, their wives, for they
Blessed if they live, and revered if they fall,
They who respond unto Liberty's call.
Where the air thickens with Copperhead brag,
Beat the old battle-call under the flag!

Hoist up the flag to its stout staff again,
Swearing that treason shall leave there no stain;
Soon will it float in a vigorous gale—
Bear up its folds with unwavering clasp;
Where our tired soldiers their weary feet drag,
Beat the old battle-call—beat for the flag!

On to the fields where our brothers have gone—
Side by side, under the flag we'll press on.
Charging the foe in the place of the slain,
Fight till old glory shall triumph again!
Our country calls us, what freeman can lag,
While the old battle-call beats for the flag?

DAISY'S DUTY.

I.

My mother finished Dora's letter, reading quite to the end before she spoke, wiping her spectacles carefully and replacing them in their case with a hand somewhat tremulous.

"Well, Daisy, it appears to me to be your duty to go to Rose a while. The child is not happy, and I am afraid there are still wrong somehow. This paper is blotted with tears, the writing is unsteady, and it is dated at midnight. All this makes me think that Harry is not what he should be, and she is so young; and rash that she must have some one to teach her how to be wise and patient, and how to bear the lot I fear is hers. Read it, Daisy, and tell me if it is not so."

Forest little golden-haired child-wife—dear little sister Rose—our Rose, unhappy? Ah, how can it be? Mother must be mistaken.

So I read the letter over two-light sketchy paragraphs of things and people she had seen, and places she had been, yet all ending with the incidental remark, "I wish you had all been with me, Daisy."

"Tired, Rose tired? who used to race over the hills and dales like a deer and laugh at fatigue."

Then an allusion to the concert where she was not present, "because Harry had an engagement with some gentleman—she thought about last night, and how it lived her so well and truly, and how much company its prattle would be when she was all alone—ah, poor Rose—that mother's gift, and Rose is lonely had unhappy! I seem to see her dark-blue eyes looking inquiringly into mine while I read her letter. "Come to me, Daisy;" "I long to lay my head on your shoulder and rest."

"Rest?" Is the child weary? Has the stout arm failed her on which the fruit of Eden trusted to ashes on her lips, leaving only bitter memory there? I must go and see.

So mother and I sat with clasped hands until the sun had set. I listening to her wise counsels as to my course in the unenviable position I was about to take, when I must bear in mind the words "Blessed are the peace-makers." But I could not speak to her how! I was so glad to go to the great town of Carmichrook where Rose lived—could not even in the coming twilight tell her how sensible it is but lately grown as dear sweet there as well as Rose, for it was all so strange and new yet that Dr. Arnot cared a little bit for me—for me, no longer young; not pretty, nor bright; or wise, only a quiet, pale, gray-eyed woman of twenty-eight, one of his nurses. I could not tell her this summer time, that had slipped away and hidden behind the shadow of the passing year, was bright for me, a summer summer time to me, because a tall, dark man with wondrous eyes and winning voice was by my side whenever I walked or rode or when he brought what will forever be to a point as truly as I might their tints, who listened while I sang homely simple songs, and then told me of the old romantic and dutiful legends of Germany, where three years of his life had been passed. And that was the cause of the calling upon before he was Dr. Arnot, only Tyrrell Arnot, Rose's little beau, and we were all merry children together. I was not jealous in the slightest as we walked so fairly Rose, and how he loved her in those pleasant days, for I thought the one love of his lifetime had come to him as it had to me this summer, when wandering by brook and woodside I found life suddenly grown so bright. Ah me! and yet I remember, with a turn of sadness, an incident as trifling as to be hardly worth recording, that haunts me yet.

We had wandered off, Tyrrell and I, down the glen, over the stones and by the falls, until we reached a deep pool where the little stream turned abruptly around a rock and whirled down a slight descent on the other side, and then went singing off quite out of sight. It very likewise we set our tiny craft afloat in a miniature harbor just above us, two gay leaves (the scarlet one was Tyrrell and the golden one mine), and a silk in their quiet haven and soon moved out on the swift current. Down we went through the quiet shore while scarlet hovered near. Then on the same ripple they were borne over the curving wave to dash down with the bubbles. Away went the scarlet sometimes dancing here and there, but in the shadow of the fall the yellow taken stopped forever, only now and then upborne by the swell of the wave beyond its haven. Still I watched the gay red leaf till it flung itself ashore, where the thorn of a wild rose held it until the evening wave snatched it from all torn and tattered, a worthless thing.

I could but sigh as this childish trial was going on, but Tyrrell's gay laugh, as he said, "A false, unfaithful emblem," banished the thoughts that came unbidden. I threw no more autumn leaves on the shining water.

And now that Tyrrell's summer holiday is over and he is on his rounds again among the sick and suffering in Carmelcrook, I smile and turn my face away with a strange gladness as mother says, "I must do my duty." Ah, if duty ever always so pleasant. I will cheer and comfort Rose if she is sorry. I will nurse her if she is sick. I will try to calm the tempest that may be fraying out, and teach the child her patient devotion my win a recreant back; yet through all this there will run the tune of the song that I shall sing, that I shall grasp his hand and hear his pleasant voice as he greets "Little Daisy" once more.

"Little Daisy!" How glorious it will sound, and how good he is to pick up a faded daisy to wear on his heart, instead of the blushing blooms of spring-time.

II.

CARMELBROOK, November 10.

I OPENED my eyes on Rose—my own weak age in this pleasant town, an inmate of Harry Dale's fine house, a guest of sister Rose. I find her looking very thin and at times haggard, but the least flush sends the blood to her beautiful cheek and she is blooming as the rose itself.

It was evening when I arrived, and Harry met me at the train, very cordial, as is his wont to greet a stranger. To my inquiry for his wife he answered, "Oh, Rose is well enough—a little nervous now and then. You must try and cure her of that," and then he spoke of the concerts the season promised with the anticipation of a boy.

I asked, "Does Rose like so much going out?"

"Ah, well, not very much, I think—like the same set of people that I do. I hope she will learn to adopt herself to my tastes by-and-by; but she is a little country girl yet, and has not the people "fast" whom I consider very nice people to know. We have some charming friends in town that you don't fancy them." And thus he rattled off, while I grew very quiet, and wondered if I should like the "capital fellows of our club" any better than Rose did.

How bright and happy the dear child looked as she opened the door for us, and how she showers her caress as she laid her golden head on my shoulder and clasped me close, saying meantime, "What a darling Daisy's love seems to be now." Then followed questions and answers about mother and home, and the horses and cows, the flowers and trees at Greenbrier Farm. Ah, how the remembrance of the little housewife did the horors of her table right gracefully, after which my welcome was a visitation to the nursery to see baby Claude in his rich asleep.

Harry called after us, "I am going out a while with Tyrrell Arnot, dear; I shall be back soon."

Rose said, "Very well," in a disappointed little weak voice; but instantly rallied, and stepped lightly up before me to show me the pretty nest and lovely a creature as ever nestled in a mother's arms. We sat by the nursery fire and chatted until 12 when Harry came, and Rose, with a little yawn, sighed and she turned away to go, I saw for the first time that weary, weary look of sadness that became too distressing to me, and involuntarily I breathed aloud a petition, added to my silent prayer, "O God help her!"

I could not sleep, and it was not until after the old church-clock had tolled out "two" that I heard a clumsy step following the sharp click of another door-latch, and I knew that Harry had come home.

The next morning Rose was very pale and quiet, and apologized for her "nervousness" at breakfast, saying that he had a bad headache. Whether she knew that I must guess the truth or not I know not; but I felt that the kind-hearted little woman never spoke one word to tell the tale, but with true woman's tact secured the negligence and want of attention that I saw she was well at once. Night after night a different plea, or none, accounts for his absence, until at last I cease to look for his interest in the home concerned his own hearth or household. With all this Harry Dale is not a bad man, but a thoughtless one now and when "capital fellows of our club" claim such a man, he finds it easier to stifle the reproach of conscience for slighting home and wife than stand the temptation to wine and cards, to song and midnight mirth, and pleasant praises from applauding lips.

And Rose? I shrink from telling it to her, clinging close to my side; and sometimes, as I hold her head on my shoulder, she cries silently, and I kiss her forehead, and wipe her tears away; and though we speak no word, she knows right well how sorry I feel for her. Sometimes I fear to better than: a wife may speak no word to shame the man who should be what he is not, until the pain and grief of a cold and broken vow shall free her or lay her in the grave.

And Tyrrell—Dr. Arnot? I have seen him twice. He comes with a cheery voice; and I think his agreeable chat and musical talents divert Rose more than any thing else can do. She is an exceedingly brilliant performer on the piano of great sweetness; and I listen enchanted as Tyrrell's voice and hers are united in melody. We listen for his coming eagerly, and, when here, how swiftly the evenings speed away! and yet I seem to feel as though it were "Tyrrell" and "Daisy" only "Dr. Arnot." He calls me "Little Daisy," and tells me I am growing handsome, every day bidding me look in the glass and see if I don't; my eye is glancing, and how my cheek is flushed with bloom. Dear Tyrrell—I tremble to think that I have been false to well; that I have allowed this late autumn passion to run riot as though I were a romantic school-girl. Already I feel a dull pain when he forgets to take my hand at parting, or when I find that my poor songs are better left unsung, while Rose shall trill her bird-like notes. 'Tis an old story—"Who loves, suffers." I am glad I have said no word to Rose or mother about this thing; for if—

November 20.

I have had such a horrid dream, and, waking, it haunts me yet.

I thought that I saw a traveler on a tortuous path, where cliff, and crag, and dark ravine were clothed in flowers. Haunting leaves and shining blossoms crept over ledges whence slimy snakes looked forth and hissed as he passed, and yet he only smiled and wandered gayly on, catching at the gay sprays that straightway withered in his grasp; slipping sometimes, but always going down, down—a dizzy chasm, dim, and peopled with nameless horror. Faces, heavy with debauch and stained with the blood of murder, and hands dripping with red wine held up bright goblets to his lips. But as he stooped to quaff it a creature—woman, and yet appalling in her white trailing wings—struck it from his grasp. Twice she foiled; but again, with loving persistence, she touched him with one little hand, and with the other she shielded the poison-draught.

Maddened, he struck her backward until she reeled and fell; and then I saw the face of Rose, all torn and bleeding, as she clasped the chasm's brink the traveler turned. 'Twas Harry Dale who clutched the air as, faltering, he fell. But who was it that stooped over me but sister Rose—that gathered her up and bore her drooping weight—and why did the gay flowers grow dim in his arms? Dim not long; they brightened, they bore her up, they waited her heavenward among the pure.

Dreams—a fancy, nothing, but why could I not see the third one's face? The brown locks and flowing beard mesthinks I know.

December 12.

I am thinking about home to-night. I feel uneasy. I long to see mother, who loves me so truly, I know. I fancy how she will look by the cozy fire now, with ready Judy Pip beside her—Pip loves me too, or did. I wonder if he will forget me. I am thinking of Pip, and remembering still —Rose and Tyr—I mean Dr. Arnot. Claude has been very ill with fever, but is out of danger now. It is not strange that I should be so grateful to Dr. Arnot, who, under God, has saved her boy. Nay, it was not strange that, when the crisis had passed through which Tyrrell had watched him, while Harry, with rough words about a woman's nervousness, had joined the gay party at the club, Rose, with breaking heart and heart full of passionate thanks, should stoop and kiss the hand that had given back her child.

But why should he turn pale, and drop his eyes, and walk away, as though he were unmanned? I could not speak to him in my duty. Rose is young and fair, alone and slighted by the heart that should be her home. She turns to the voice that listened to her sorrow in the sun.

Still the tremulous chord of music thrills through the house, and still my weary heart goes back to Harry, dear mother, I must go home; and yet I may not leave the child, but, faithful to my trust, I must try to keep her right. I can speak no word of warning, may give birth to that which now I only guess or dread. I dare not tell Harry to guard the heart that he has held so lonely; for he is so fiery and impatient none can tell the consequence; and to Tyrrell I may not, must not breathe a word. It is not that I love them both, but I must guard the child from herself and the recoil of a love unpriced. Still I will not be suspicious or cruel. I will go down to-night, and laugh, and chat, and say good-night with a pleasant smile, and never sigh when I miss the parting words that always fall to my ear—if I can. The scarlet leaf is floating on, and the golden waif is close inshore.

III.

GREENBRIER FARM, June 6.

HARRY has gone to the war. There has been sad work—a long debauch, a bitter quarrel when Rose's outraged spirit rose against a blow—ay, a blow on her white shoulder, and she has come home to me. I know how I tried to do my part to win Harry back. I plead with him by all that I thought might move him to pause in his mad career—by his mother's grave, by his baby boy and injured wife, to stop the headlong race toward the fiery chasm—but in vain. Let with passionate oath and angry word he has gone to the battlefield—perhaps to death.

I am on a battle-field, too, though there are no cannons here, no sounding drums, nor waving flags in sight. Rose tells me to-day that Dr. Arnot is coming here to see Claude a moment, and as she tells me she turns her face away from mine, and a pink flush steals up her white cheek to her brow.

I must speak. I must warn the child. She can not, she must not creep toward the dizzy verge from which Harry has retreat; she must not sell the wings of her soul, and mine must be the hand to fling her back. She does not see the precipice, poor child! but it is none the less there.

June 10.

With both arms twined around her, with her face hid on my shoulder, I whispered the fearful word of warning to little Rose. She spoke no word at first, but the single exclamation, "Oh, Daisy!" told me how the arrow quivered in the eye of truth.

After a while she raised her head and kissed me, saying, "Forgive me, Daisy, I was so lonely, and so longed for a kind voice, I didn't think. You don't know, Daisy, how hard it is to love as I loved Harry, and have to show one's love thrown back." And I, Daisy, gave no answer back.

IV.

August 8.

IT was a year ago yesterday since Tyr—since Dr. Arnot and I set bright leaves voyaging on the stream that flows through the glen, and I was weak enough to go there yesterday. Two months ago I wrote to Dr. Arnot as a sister might for a younger sister's sake, telling him, with no harsh word or vain reproach, how ill report might condemn this visit, for already gossip grabbed of the handsome doctor who had once been between Harry Dale and his wife. And that though we knew the demon that had been the real cause was intemperance, yet a woman's name must not be coupled thus with his. It was a hard thing for me to do; but neither father nor brother were left to us, and I would now throw this shadow on the few years mother yet might live. And so he came no more, nor sent a line or message, and the weary past began to look shadowy and unreal.

I wandered off with Claude in the solemn stillness of the summer afternoon. Rose had gone I knew not whither. The post that day had brought her the first letter that had come from Harry. She showed it to me not, but quietly laid it on the great wood-fire in the kitchen, and with only a gipsy flit over her sunny head had rumbled off. I suppose it was bitter and unforgiving. If it were kind, I, who knew how she had watched and waited for it, would have seen the pleasant knowledge in her face.

The birds were singing as merrily as they did a year ago; I heard the same stream just as gladly—but ah! they bore no charm. Claude chattered as we walked, and clasped my hand lovingly, and the childish touch somehow gave me comfort and strength. After a while we stopped to gather flowers, and Claude flew about like a butterfly, I moved on a step further to catch a glimpse of the spot where I had dreamed so sweet a dream beside the great rock when: the water whirled around so swiftly.

There was a flutter of a ribbon—a glimpse of a white dress. I held my breath, and twining my arm around a bending sapling I saw there—yes, there. On an old moss-covered tree trunk, her hat, with its blue ribbons, thrown backward, sat Rose. Her face was turned away and covered with one hand, while the other was held tight within Tyrrell Arnot's own, and the doctor's voice was inaudibly saying, "Forgive me—pity me, Rose, dear Rose."

I was so strong as I had thought, for a mist not born of the waterfall came over my eyes, and, with the appearance of the nightmare, I tried to speak and could not. My grasp relaxed—I fell; and then it must have been that I cried out; for I knew nothing more until I found myself in Tyrrell's arms, still faint and bleeding. Not so faint but that I could rise and writhe myself from out his clasp, and, with a cry that I know must pierce the scarlet leaf should drift farther on." And then I relapsed into dreams again. But I saved her—yes, I saved her from my young Rose; the white wings are untainted yet; the pure heart has vowed to me and to her God that not a stain shall come on the name of Claude Dale's mother, though she be Harry Dale's forsaken wife. O God! I thank thee. And now I must sleep and rest; and by-and-by, when Tyrrell Arnot is forever away from her, I'll pray that God may send him peace.

October 20.

I have been sick—a sickness full of weary visions and troubled dreams, of restless nights and wailing days; a sickness out of which I woke with arms and joy for but one only one Rose—dear mother's. Pale and worn I ask for Rose, and they tell me she is ill. I catch a glimpse of Claude, and find Rose in his room in his crib—and in my persistent inquiry they tell me how Harry Dale came back to die with fever, and how Rose is lying ill in the room over your head, Daisy dearie! How strange it seems that Time would not wait for me at all! I shall get up soon and see Rose.

November 5.

They told me last night that I might see her, and so in many wrappings I journeyed to her room. O God, open my eyes that I may see! In this low, a worthless wayside daisy flung down in the dust; but raise her up, the fair bright Rose that used to be a flower for the angels! Clasp my poor hands in prayer. I try to say "Thy will be done!" but the cry dies on my lips, the petition falters on my tongue. I look at an angel, she looked with an unearthly loveliness as, holding my hand in her own, she spoke those peaceful words—as the call to her she wandered had come home to die on her breast; to bless her for her efforts to win him back to love and purity; to implore pardon for one as she asked it of her God, for the bitter sorrow he had brought to her; to pray the prayer He will never disregard—"Lead me not into temptation but deliver me." "And Daisy," and she pulled me closer, "dear Daisy, I am so glad you were faithful to your duty! Your good angel will be saved you when I shall not."

There was a hush, a silent moment, and she whispered, "Claude." She clasped him close, and laid his cold cheek beside her own. Tyrrell and said, feebly, "I give him to you, Daisy—to you and mother." Then, holding both our hands together, she tried to sing the old hymn we had sung in Sunday-school so long ago:

"Jesus, lover of my soul,
Let me to thy bosom fly," and even as the last sweet, faint, unsteady notes died out the Rose was transplanted to His breast, in bloom forever more.

And now in Greenbrier cottage only mother and I are alone again. Nay, not alone, for a golden-haired boy like a sunbeam in the quaint and quiet house, and the music of childish laughter wakes the echoes that have been silent so long. And I—am patient; a little sad—but calm if yes, but happy when dear mother says, in her pleasant way, "Dear Daisy always does her duty."

January 7.

Thirty-two—an old maid in truth. How long ago it seems since I heard words of love, and now I shall never hear them again. I can go now down to the glen without that bitter pain that used to bear me company. It can do no harm now to sit and dream of what I might have been when some one far away clasped Little Daisy to his heart, and left a kiss on her pale cheek before he went away. How handsome he was! and spite of all the sin and weakness that came after, how good! I wonder if he will ever marry—if he will ever come back—I wonder. And so "the old maid" sat on the gray rock by the river all alone, and wondered where the scarlet leaf had gone ashore. She did not look up when footsteps came nearer; she only sat with her two hands laid lightly together across her knee, and watched the foaming water. By-and-by on the current there floated by two autumn leaves, of gold and scarlet pinned together with a thorn. Ah, how she flushed and started then, and how evermore there sounded above the din of falling water a few low words, "Daisy, may't they float together now?"

Beside her, with outstretched arms and longing eyes, stood Dr. Tyrrell; but she, not proud to give a word or sign, although the heart within her breast gave a great leap, and shot the hot blood through her face, would not be pleaded still:

"Oh, Daisy, I have been mad, and blind, and wicked, I know, but I have asked forgiveness on the Master, and surely you will not be more unkind than He has been! I am a way-worn, weary man. I have never known rest since we sat here together. Oh, take me, Daisy, to your pure heart once more; and though the thorn has pierced your breast and mine, still let it bind us to each other for all time to come. Won't you, Little Daisy?"

It was the pleading tones of the only man I ever loved; it was the eyes whose light had stirred my spirit to its depths; it was an arm, beloved still, that waited to enfold me; and slowly unclasping my locked hands, I laid them both in his, and looked once more in the dear face grown so sad and worn.

And now I shall be Tyrrell's happy wife, and Claude and mother will be with us always. Every summer, when we go to Greenbrier church-yard, we will see to it that the wild rose thrives and blooms above two silent graves; and a peaceful life lies stretching out—how far I know not—for the Doctor's wife. And when that life is ended, may she hear the echo of her mother's words—"Little Daisy has done her duty!"

OUR COUNTRY

It is all ours:—
Ours from the placid western sea
To the emerald eastern slopes;
Ours by our fathers' history,
Ours by our children's hopes.

It is all ours:—
Ours from the ranch hikes' crystal waves
To the silver southern foam;
Ours by the changeless right of graves,
Ours by the tides to come.

It is all ours:—
Ours by the homes that deck the land,
Ours by the pathways trod;
Ours by the aged stars demand,
Ours by the gift of God.

It is all ours:—
Ours by the patriot's holy love,
Ours by his deathly throe;
Ours by the starry flag above,
Ours by the blood below.

It is all ours:—
Ours by the freeman's sacred creed,
Ours for humanity.

NEST.

SIRE had turned the dress inside out and upside down; she had sponged the breadths, and pressed and relined them, and gored the skirt by way of amendment to the fashion; and having finally gotten on the bottom braid, discovered a spot, a large, conspicuous, unfathomable, unshakable spot. Victoria, as usual, rose superior to the emergency, and proposed "plaiting" (horrible word! suggestive of pinions), so as to be applied to the spot; and Nest, being a domestic coward, and exactly fitted by nature to tear her elder sister's yoke, began, with secret delight, to rip her lady's maid's gown, out of which the plaitings were to come forth, pinwise, in the same spot that she would have set about a century of stitch fashion, had Victoria ordered them to be applied.

Fingers and scissors only being required for ripping, thought Nest, free to go where they liked—back a year, to a day as fair as this was scowling, and as cool as but only September, with all the hints of summer in its sky, but a deeper peace, and for flowers, an occasional scarlet flare or yellow bough showing in the green hillsides, and for the last languid plash of the low brook, the cool, swift rush of the clear water making strongly over the stony bottom of the stream, and only an occasional butterfly, or dancing wing of some brown or yellow butterfly, for the flirt, and drone, and buzz, and humming of the thousand living, happy things, of a summer day; and through all, and a part of its peace, a something unspeakably strange and tender, that made you sure of the autumn presence.

Dale Hawthorne and Nest had taken the road to the water. Nothing could be lovelier or sweeter, unless it were Nest herself: a little girl, hardly coming well up to Dale's shoulder, white, rosepink, with the whiteness of a milk lily, thick brown hair, that rippled where she would let it loose from round braids, very lovely brown eyes, and a faculty of being beautiful—a glow of her whole face that was neither color nor sparkle, but something more expressive—a certain subtle charm of femininity in all she touched and all she wore, from her soft flowing dress to her little slippers, and a dependence of manner unconsciously declaring to masculine strength. Dale Hawthorne was wise in his generation, and all that summer had tried to win this shy thing by a tender, thoughtful tact, and a perception quick for all her needs and likings, rather than by blunt admiration. It was easier and surer to make himself indispensable than to track this nature, wild as a forest bird, through the thousand surprises and feints and evasions that but for him, as for all others, cause the time when self-control should be off guard, and catching! and suddenly he told her, almost in spite of himself, that he loved her.

She grew away from his grasp like a pettish child.

"Don't talk like that, Mr. Hawthorne. We came to hunt leaves, and there is a lovely one, only it hangs so high. Can you get it for me?"

Hawthorne looked earnestly into her face. It was flushed and pouting, nothing more; feeling, if there were any, was resolutely ignored. And when she had neither heart nor soul, but he had hurried fortune, and so vexed that fickle dame. He had spoken while concealment was yet possible, and Nest had defended herself with the natural girlish instinct. So, blanching himself, he swung from the bank by a lower bough, reaching toward the branch she had shown him, and in his vexation taking little or no precaution, the treacherous support, a cold, dreary walk, she found Dale waiting for her at the gate. He laid aside her cloak, vet with the drizzling rain that had just set in, and drew her into the library with a quiet resolution that she could by no means oppose, saying,

"Nest, you must hear me, Nest."

She glanced up at him as she stood before the fire, holding up her little bodygrow to the blaze, and hastily looked away again. He came closer and took her hand.

"I think Nest was unfair the other morning," he commenced, somewhat tremblingly, "and I am sorry for it, Nest. But I have a right to something—to the truth, unquestionably. And an answer. You have not told me whether or no you can love me. It is not very much to ask."

Nest drew herself hastily away from him and the fire, and steadily toward the door, which he could barely see the tip of one small ear and her burning cheek.

"The answer, Nest," he repeated.

Still she would not speak. It seemed no words for him. If he could not divine, she would not help him. He leaned forward to look in her averted face, and saw that she was trembling violently, and scarcely able to support herself. With a sudden move he caught her, drew her close to him.

"If you will not speak, I shall take such answer as suits me best."

And this time she did not hid him let her go.

At all this she looked back now, across a year of absence and a civil war, with a sort of foreboding, as at some happy vision remembered. For months she had heard nothing from Dale, who had been ordered by his chief to join the Federal army on the outbreak of the war. All around her were bitter against the Union. They themselves had suffered bitterly from her elder sister, her only relative, was never done bemoaning their losses, and reminding her that they had a neighbor at the "Oaks," whose loyalty needed such severe testing, or, when every evening Geoffrey Fenwick rode in at their gates. Her fingers delayed over their work, that the three might be worn at his house. She hated all this shallow pretense. She would have been glad to have staid at home with her sorrow, that the three might be worn at his house. She hated all this shallow pretense. She would have been glad to have staid at home with her sorrow, and feared that evening a cold and cheerless face to the "Oaks."

The sky, that all day had lowered, now began to shrink and to shiver, and the wild wind, that stripped the trees by armfuls, and whirled the brown leaves fiercely along the sodden paths; but Mrs. Hall glowed in the substantial comfort and splendor—a pleasant contrast to the gloom without. The great hall breathed a summer-like warmth, and the drawing-room and broad winding staircase showed dimly in the early twilight, through which came resting Bessie Brent's fresh, bright face and golden hair, a pretty vision, to admire Nest's plaitings.

"You haven't seen them in the light," answered Nest, bluntly. "The velvet is not new, and the silk is that old purple one. It was Victoria's thought. I don't like it as it was."

On this hint that great creature took Bessie in hand with innumerable learned details; and while Miss Fenwick was at the feet of this Gamaliel, Nest slipped away to the drawing-room. It was unlighted, except by the gleam of the fire on the brass knobs of the grate and there she espied a glance of a mirror, and the scent of violets met her like a friend. She went to the fire and sat down before it, and nestled in her lap, and looking absently into the blaze. She had fallen into a despair of every thing. She had parted with Dale, if not from him. He could have written her if he had chosen—if he would, if he had cared; but he had not written, and now, on the eve of battle, she was tired of contention. Geoffrey Fenwick's persistency gave her no respite, and given the fact of his liking, Nest's theoria made of him such a sordid, pitiful thing; and these old walls, if they could not shut out unhappiness, might at least keep it from her sight and memories. Could he but know it, Geoffrey Fenwick's chance had never been so fair as on that night when, coming in from his stormy ride he found her sitting there by his

"Nest, you don't tell me I was wrong again. I am fully conscious that I played both brute and fool with beautiful impartiality. The question is, not what I said, but how I said."

"Place her in the wrong?"

"That is, relinquish the pursuit."

"Not at all, Nest. Case you. I am sure of that; how I know it, my secret; but her pride is her tyrant, and now that it is backed by a consciousness of right, is too strong for both her and you. You must divide the enemy; make her conscience your ally!"

"I, how?"

"I have shown you the road, and told you the weak point in the fortress. A soldier asks no more."

On that Dale smoked his cigar and matured his plan of action; first patience, second patience, third patience, actively carried out. Nest begun to relent and doubt herself, and then in a flight, lest it should be suspected, went from coldness to positive insolence. Dale smiled at that (he saw now the excellence of being in the right), and went on with his quiet patience and unyielding care and courtesy till Nest began to soften. Then Dale let her feel a subtle something in his calm kindness that would make her further trifling; self-respect ready for reconciliation, but refusing further abasement; and in the light of this his changed manner it occurred to Nest that she was treating him very ill, and for small cause playing an unworthy and unlovely part; yet how to amend she knew not, and so tossed about between doubts and pride, behold her divided against herself. It was in this stage, the pendulum back one evening from a cold, dreary walk, she found Dale waiting for her at the gate. He laid aside her cloak, vet with the drizzling rain that had just set in, and drew her into the library with a quiet resolution that she could by no means oppose, saying,

"Nest, you must hear me, Nest."

She glanced up at him as she stood before the fire, holding up her little bodygrow to the blaze, and hastily looked away again. He came closer and took her hand.

"I think Nest was unfair the other morning," he commenced, somewhat tremblingly, "and I am sorry for it, Nest. But I have a right to something—to the truth, unquestionably. And an answer. You have not told me whether or no you can love me. It is not very much to ask."

Nest drew herself hastily away from him and the fire, and steadily toward the door, which he could barely see the tip of one small ear and her burning cheek.

"The answer, Nest," he repeated.

Still she would not speak. It seemed no words for him. If he could not divine, she would not help him. He leaned forward to look in her averted face, and saw that she was trembling violently, and scarcely able to support herself. With a sudden move he caught her, drew her close to him.

"If you will not speak, I shall take such answer as suits me best."

And this time she did not hid him let her go.

At all this she looked back now, across a year of absence and a civil war, with a sort of foreboding, as at some happy vision remembered. For months she had heard nothing from Dale, who had been ordered by his chief to join the Federal army on the outbreak of the war. All around her were bitter against the Union. They themselves had suffered bitterly from her elder sister, her only relative, was never done bemoaning their losses, and reminding her that they had a neighbor at the "Oaks," whose loyalty needed such severe testing, or, when every evening Geoffrey Fenwick rode in at their gates. Her fingers delayed over their work, that the three might be worn at his house. She hated all this shallow pretense. She would have been glad to have staid at home with her sorrow, that the three might be worn at his house. She hated all this shallow pretense. She would have been glad to have staid at home with her sorrow, and feared that evening a cold and cheerless face to the "Oaks."

The sky, that all day had lowered, now began to shrink and to shiver, and the wild wind, that stripped the trees by armfuls, and whirled the brown leaves fiercely along the sodden paths; but Mrs. Hall glowed in the substantial comfort and splendor—a pleasant contrast to the gloom without. The great hall breathed a summer-like warmth, and the drawing-room and broad winding staircase showed dimly in the early twilight, through which came resting Bessie Brent's fresh, bright face and golden hair, a pretty vision, to admire Nest's plaitings.

"You haven't seen them in the light," answered Nest, bluntly. "The velvet is not new, and the silk is that old purple one. It was Victoria's thought. I don't like it as it was."

On this hint that great creature took Bessie in hand with innumerable learned details; and while Miss Fenwick was at the feet of this Gamaliel, Nest slipped away to the drawing-room. It was unlighted, except by the gleam of the fire on the brass knobs of the grate and there she espied a glance of a mirror, and the scent of violets met her like a friend. She went to the fire and sat down before it, and nestled in her lap, and looking absently into the blaze. She had fallen into a despair of every thing. She had parted with Dale, if not from him. He could have written her if he had chosen—if he would, if he had cared; but he had not written, and now, on the eve of battle, she was tired of contention. Geoffrey Fenwick's persistency gave her no respite, and given the fact of his liking, Nest's theoria made of him such a sordid, pitiful thing; and these old walls, if they could not shut out unhappiness, might at least keep it from her sight and memories. Could he but know it, Geoffrey Fenwick's chance had never been so fair as on that night when, coming in from his stormy ride he found her sitting there by his

"Nest, you don't tell me I was wrong again. I am fully conscious that I played both brute and fool with beautiful impartiality. The question is, not what I said, but how I said."

"Place her in the wrong?"

"That is, relinquish the pursuit."

"Not at all, Nest. Case you. I am sure of that; how I know it, my secret; but her pride is her tyrant, and now that it is backed by a consciousness of right, is too strong for both her and you. You must divide the enemy; make her conscience your ally!"

"I, how?"

"I have shown you the road, and told you the weak point in the fortress. A soldier asks no more."

On that Dale smoked his cigar and matured his my pride thus that a boy should push me from it with its little dimpled hands. I have found yet no opposing circumstance in my life that I could not break by force of my resolve, and I have no fear of failure now. I care more for you than for all the other objects of my life, and I am willing to bestow on you more time, more endurance; but believe me, child, it is only the days or years that are doubtful; the result is inevitable."

Nest looked him up at a ring flashing on her hand—a diamond cross on a shield of black enamel. Geoffrey caught the glance.

"He will not return to you. He has forgotten you. Why had I been in Sahara you should have heard from me. I would have come to you, another kiss, if I had been certain of being shot as a spy the next moment."

A little color had deserted Dale herself; but Geoffrey's taunt roused her to contradiction.

"He is true," she cried out, passionately. "My life on his honor! Geoffrey Fenwick, I am weary of all this, to the very death. Give me six months of rest. Help me your honor that for that time I shall have rescite from your persecution. In that time I shall hear from him—or—he shall be dead—I—"

She had not time to conclude when Geoffrey seized her hand and covered it with kisses. She pulled it from him quickly.

"Six months of rest," she said, emphatically. "I am his yet."

"As you will," returned Geoffrey, coldly; "six months will soon be past."

She shivered at that. Why had she given her self so little a time? Why had she bound herself at all? She would have given ten years of her life to have undone her work. She wrote at once to Dale telling him what she had done, asking him to come and save her, "if he thought her worth it." She made no answer for herself. If his love was not strong enough for that, she would stand condemned. That done, she set herself to wait—a thing so easy to write of, so cruelly hard to do. She counted the days, at first confidently, then with a dull terror. She never once thought that he was dead; for, though she did not even say it to herself, she felt in her heart that his spirit must have burst even the bonds of death to find her out; and he would answer surely; he must write now; when—she could not face the rest of the sentence. She never even flushed it to herself. Geoffrey kept faith with her honor. He counted the weeks, but till the time was past he never once spoke to Nest of his love, and Victoria and every acquaintance might have done; but when they were past he claimed her almost savagely. He would listen to no delay of claim. Nest, cut off by her own folly from the possibility of further opposition, sat down in a tony quiescence, while Bessie and Victoria, the trousseau and the wedding-feast, and the day, hastened madly and hopelessly on to her wedding day.

They had agreed out her wedding dress where it should first meet her opening eyes; heavy silk, and priceless lace, and filmy veil—a hateful spectre that she had tried in vain to banish by force and weakness: there were diamonds flashing through half open cases, and wreath, and gloves, and handkerchief in their boxes; and old Judith come to awaken her. It was no wretched dream as she had half hoped. Another miserable day gone, however. The crisis had wakened her to that miraculous quickness of thought and perception that seems the special property of such times, and she almost detected something unusual in the old woman's look, a strange solemn exultation. She raised herself among the pillows. "Well, Judith?" she asked, eagerly.

"There like we hab no weddin' to-day, Miss Nest. Massa Johnston and he men, dey all run away in de night, and de Linkum men comin' fast as ebber dey can, and de Yankees killed all de men at de fort, and de white folks dey all scare, and run for dey libes. Never seen such scratin' times since I was born. Dey men run dis way, and dat, scream, pull, haul; 'clare to massy, of it don't make de wood stan' on end! De carriage folks, dey all run away, too, and de Yankees, dey come in a big diffy dollar for de doleenst old hack; never put eyes on such no count bosses!"

Not one word of this but had Nest heard.

"The Union army coming," she repeated. "Oh, Judith! the Union army!"

"Laws yes, honey! Don't 'spec' I raise such bullabaloo as dis yer for nothin', do yer? Seen de Linkum army and dey eyes; it stonds all still, and de streets dey am just a show, wid de piles ob boxes, and passels, and trunks dat's in 'em. Tell ye, I hain't nuffin gathered for my own Sabbaths' like mad, tellin' every one to make tracks. All de folks am gone 'cep' de niggas. 'Spec' dey'll stay. Yes see for dem."

Nest sprang up and began to dress herself, saying to herself all the while that Dale must be dead, and cried it in her own not, it was the only possible that he was in Grant's army, and granting that, he still could not be free for her; but that he had hoped, and she went down stairs with a smiling face, and took all Victoria's bewailings serenely, and answered all Geoffrey's fastidious care at her hair of the color that Dale liked. Soldiers began to file through the city, and Nest's face went down to the river. They were Floyd's troops, the men who had cut their way through Grant's forces, and escaped from the beleaguered Fort Donelson. Nashville resumed its business doings, and the Secessionists brought out their stores and feasted these invincible heroes, and then they extolled as their future saviours, till on a sudden the men again took up their onward march. Beaten already, they had no mind to face the exulting foe.

Then whatever was left in Nashville betook itself to flight, if it could, and whatever was evil came forth. It was like Geoffrey Fenwick to come to them then, walking unarmed through the distracted streets.

"There is no danger," he said, coldly, to Victoria, "except from our own scoundrels, who are bent on stealing; and the Federal troops will soop put an end to these disorders. The Rev. Mr. Davis has taken refuge with me, and this afternoon I shall bring him and Bessie over. The only misfortune is that we must defer our tour, as I must remain to protect my property."

He was speaking to Victoria, but at this last he looked toward Nest. She sat motionless. He hardly knew if she had heard. All past, all future time, eternity itself, were centred in these few hours between now and her marriage. Geoffrey had come, bringing the clergyman and Bessie. They were urging her to dress; they made her go up stairs, where she sat passive under their hands, turning and moving as they told her: a woman of marble might have been dressed as was Nest Grainger for her wedding.

Dale had written to Nest over and again. The letters had not reached her for the best of reasons. Geoffrey, who always brought them their mails, had recognized post-mark and handwriting, and quietly destroyed those of Dale's; put them out of the way just as he did his honor when it interfered with his will. Close on that, Dale was wounded and spent three months in the hospital, and several more at home, in recruiting his health. The first letter that he got on joining his regiment was that in which she told him of her promise to Geoffrey. He wrote at once, and Geoffrey burned that like the rest. Leave of absence was not to be hoped for; but Dale kept up courage, for they were ordered on to Tennessee. Fort Henry fell, and they planted themselves before Fort Donelson. The Confederate Generals were fully alive to the importance of the post and poured in reinforcements. The garrison worked manfully, and at night constructed batteries as if by magic. Dale was mad with impatience. These walls stood between him and Nest; and if the siege were prolonged till Johnston were reinforced affairs might wear an ugly aspect: ankle-deep in mud and water he worked foremost among our gallant men. The iron-clads stormed away at the fort, the rebel guns answered stoutly. End as it would, the contest was plainly to be short or easy one. Then could be but have fancied himself a match for Johnston's army, I think Dale might have forgotten military duty and run away—so intolerable was his anxiety.

On the third night the beleaguered garrison made a sortie. They had hoped to surprise the hostile camp; but General Grant, making a reconnoissance in person, espied them even in the storm and darkness. Came then a short, sharp struggle; it was too cold to reload the rifles, and they fought with bayonet and bowie-knife, struggling soundlessly in the snow. The garrison were driven back, and Dale got a cut in the arm that did him good: gave him less time to think about Nest. Ed

The siege dragged on two weary days, then Floyd and Pillow cut their way out and Buckner surrendered. Terms of capitulation—surrender—all took time. Dale's uneasiness rose to positive agony. He asked and obtained leave to precede the Federal advance on Nashville; but even there difficulties beset him. He knew nothing of Nest's whereabouts, and in the general confusion and terror found it almost impossible to obtain information. He rode from street to street like a madman—was misdirected; and when at last he stumbled on the old Grainger place it was deserted. Nest had gone to Oak Hall. Then more questioning, more fruitless searching, and a ride of several miles without the city before he reached the "Oaks."

THE LATE BRIGADIER-GENERAL LYTLE, KILLED AT CHICAMAUGA.—(See Page 737.)

Geoffrey Fenwick himself answered his eager, imperative knock, and had no need of the Federal uniform to divine who stood before him. He stepped back.

"You will find Nest there, Mr. Hawthorne," he said, with a strange smile.

Dale scanned him hastily. Nest had no brother; besides his instinct taught him that this was a foe. This, then, was the "Geoffrey" of whom she had written. He did what he had never done in battle, turned white, and stood trembling, unable to advance a step. Geoffrey stood silent, surveying him with a cold and cruel look. Then a low murmur in the drawing-room rose into a sudden, passionate exclamation, and with a swift rush and rustle, as though she had broken from some detaining grasp, Nest came to the doorway. Her eyes rested first on Geoffrey, and from him went to that other still figure facing him. She did not cry out, but grew so mortally pale that Geoffrey thought her fainting, and moved hastily toward her; but without looking at him she went straight to Dale.

"So you came," she said, low. "You were true, after all. Bless you for that! though it is too late."

"On the contrary," observed Geoffrey, "Mr. Hawthorne is just in time—to congratulate you."

"The misery that I have wrought," went on Nest, looking no more at her husband than if he had been the stone hound over the doorway, "will recoil chiefly on myself, as it should. You can, you must, forget the woman who would not prefer your memory, dead, or even false, to this man's devotion."

Dale put his hand to his head like one stunned.

"Why should you think me false, Nest? I wrote you, again and again."

"I never received a line," she answered, growing whiter yet, if that were possible. "Yet I might have known! Oh! feel that I was! Small use now, however, to blame or question. Here is your ring. Give it to some woman worthier to wear it; and when you tell her of me, speak as gently as you can. Say she was weak, very weak, but I believe she honestly loved me."

The last words came out falteringly, and even as she spoke she threw up her hands and staggered blindly. Dale sprang forward, caught her, kissed her despite of Geoffrey; and then, relinquishing her to the frightened women, went sighing away, before her merciful unconsciousness should be over.

Nest lives to the outward world as Geoffrey's wife; but between her and him she has built a wall of separation that he may never hope to pass; and Bessie and Victoria whisper fearfully to each other that she seldom speaks, and never of her own accord.

Dale is fighting on, and courts Death in the front of every battle, who sends him honors instead, at which he smiles grimly.

A SUCCESSFUL FORAGING PARTY AT THE WEST.

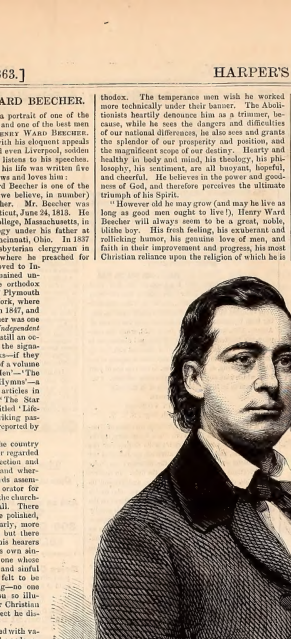
REV. HENRY WARD BEECHER.

We publish herewith a portrait of one of the greatest living preachers, and one of the best men of our time—the Rev. HENRY WARD BEECHER. All England is ringing with his eloquent appeals in favor of our cause; and even LIVERPOOL, solden in pro-slavery corruption, listens to his speeches. The following account of his life was written five years ago by one who knows and loves him:

"The Rev. Henry Ward Beecher is one of the many children (thirteen, we believe, in number) of the Rev. Lyman Beecher. Mr. Beecher was born in Litchfield, Connecticut, June 24, 1813. He graduated at Amherst College, Massachusetts, in 1834, and studied Theology under his father at the Lane Seminary, in Cincinnati, Ohio. In 1837 he was settled as a Presbyterian clergyman in Lawrenceburg, Indiana, where he preached for two years, and then removed to Indianapolis, where he remained until he was called by the orthodox Congregational society of Plymouth Church, Brooklyn, New York, where his ministry commenced in 1847, and still continues. Mr. Beecher was one of the founders of The Independent newspaper, to which he is still an occasional contributor, over the signature of a star. His works—if they may be so called—consist of a volume of 'Lectures to Young Men'—The Plymouth Collection of Hymns'—a collection of some of his articles in The Independent, called 'The Star Papers,' and a volume entitled 'Life-Thoughts,' made up of striking passages from his discourses, reported by an admiring hearer.

"Probably no man in the country is more generally known, or regarded with a more personal affection and enthusiasm. Wherever and whenever he speaks, vast crowds assemble; and he is the only orator for whom all the halls and all the churches every where are too small. There are American orators more polished, more elegant, more scholarly, more graceful, more rhetorical, but there is no one who improves his hearers with a deeper sense of his own sincerity and manliness—no one whose sympathy with suffering and sinful men of all conditions is felt to be sweeter or more ennobling—no one whose affluent imagination so illuminates, and whose tender Christian heart so purifies, the subject he discusses.

"Mr Beecher is identified with various causes; but his independence remains untouched, and he works in his own way. He is a temperance man, but something more. He is an anti-slavery man, but something more. He is an orthodox Congregationalist, but something more. 'God works by the Church just as far as he can,' said he, in one of his discourses, 'but the stream of his working overflows and runs in a hundred ducts besides.' In like manner his chief sympathy and hope are for man, and they run in a thousand rills of speech and action. Whatever hedges, cramps, confines, or in any manner thwarts human development, is the enemy with which he deals, and the combat is jubilant and triumphant. He rejoices in his strength and in his work. He sends his words for the right, ringing home like the anvil strokes of a blithe blacksmith singing at his forge.



"When he rises to speak his face is full of a lambent light—humorous, and sly, and sweet—a kind of happy, boyish innocence and confidence, which directly win sympathy and interest—so that the orator is eloquent before he has spoken. His discourses are generally prepared, but as the tide of feeling rises it overbears the limits of the preparation; his imagination floats and soars beyond the course marked out, and, like a strong bird dipping and wheeling, and darting in the summer air, with the lights of heaven and the colors of earth glancing and glittering upon his plumage, his mind decorates his thoughts with an infinite of exquisite illustration drawn from every department of nature—so felicitous, and charming, and novel, that the happy hearer believes, with Cicero, that a great orator is truly a rarer triumph of nature than a great poet.

"Mr. Beecher's voice is not especially musical, nor of great range; his action is vehement and dramatic rather than graceful; and the violent contrasts of effect—the sharp, loud cry and muscular movement, followed by a relaxed frame and ordinary conversational tone—are sometimes unpleasantly suggestive of a poor style of clerical declamation. But the next moment some gush of humor lights like a sunbeam upon the level of the discourse, or some lovely sentiment touches it with tender pathos, and thousands of eyes, bright alternately with smiles and tears, proclaim the power which is not to be described or criticised—the magnetic sympathy and persuasion, without which grace and elegance, and music and learning, and wit and fervor, do not suffice for eloquence.

"The secret of Mr. Beecher's influence and success with all kinds of minds lies in his broad and sweet humanity. It is both sweet and wise. Liberal Christian, as they are usually called, wonder why he remains within the limits of a creed so orthodox. The temperance men wish he worked more technically under their banner. The Abolitionists heartily denounce him as a trimmer, because, while he sees the dangers and difficulties of our national differences, he also sees and grants the splendor of our prosperity and position, and the magnificent scope of our destiny. Hearty and healthy in body and mind, his theology, his philosophy, his sentiment, are all buoyant, hopeful, and cheerful. He believes in the power and goodness of God, and therefore perceives the ultimate triumph of his Spirit.

"However old he may grow (and may he live as long as good men ought to live!), Henry Ward Beecher will always seem to be a great, noble, lolitle boy. His fresh feeling, his exuberant and rollicking humor, his genuine love of men, and faith in their improvement and progress, his most Christian reliance upon the religion of which he is essefully tried. To this end he welcomes the ever-increasing immigration, for whose labor the untracted Western wilds are waiting. He cheers the ship that he sees from his study window, sparkling on the bay, and rich with those who shall be developed into citizens and the parents of citizens. Every Sunday three thousand people in the morning, and three thousand in the evening, hear him expound the Gospel of Christ in this humane and catholic spirit. Every night in every week, except during his summer rest, somewhere and in some way, either at prayer-meetings—at revival meetings—at lyceums—in halls—in school-houses —in theatres—under the trees—from the steps of public buildings—he is preaching, with a text or without a text; and the substance of his discourse is the song of the angels, 'Peace on earth, goodwill to men!'

"Yes—but 'Sharp's rifles,' and laying corner-

REV. HENRY WARD BEECHER.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]

a teacher, will always keep the bloom of youth upon his heart, and its fire in his soul, however Time may brush the hue from his cheek and quench the light in his eye. His youthful appearance is such, that, upon first coming to this neighborhood to preach, he went one Sunday to the church, and, seating himself quietly in the pulpit, was presently warned off by the sexton. 'What do you mean?' said Beecher. 'Why, we don't allow boys up here,' sternly replied the sexton. But Beecher allows boys. No man has a livelier love for children, and more sympathetic intelligence of their tastes, and wishes, and habits. Some of the most striking and beautiful passages of his lectures and sermons are thoughts and illustrations of childhood and youth; and his eye would moisten with hope, and admiration, and longing over a leave boy or a happy girl, as it would, with sorrow and prayerful earnesty, over a sinful fellow-man.

"He is an American in the best and truest sense. There is nothing mean, or narrow, or sectional in his fraternal and national feeling. He believes that this republic was founded for the great experiment, and that it will be fully, fairly, and successfully tried. To this end he welcomes the ever-increasing immigration, for whose labor the untracted Western wilds are waiting. He cheers the ship that he sees from his study window, sparkling on the bay, and rich with those who shall be developed into citizens and the parents of citizens. Every Sunday three thousand people in the morning, and three thousand in the evening, hear him expound the Gospel of Christ in this humane and catholic spirit. Every night in every week, except during his summer rest, somewhere and in some way, either at prayer-meetings—at revival meetings—at lyceums—in halls—in school-houses —in theatres—under the trees—from the steps of public buildings—he is preaching, with a text or without a text; and the substance of his discourse is the song of the angels, 'Peace on earth, goodwill to men!'

"Yes—but 'Sharp's rifles,' and laying corner-stones of armories, and addresses to military companies, how about all these things?

"His answer would be short and simple: Holman meant for human ends. Because we are to love men, we are not, therefore, to let them murder our children, nor lay waste society. Mr. Beecher does not take a position without understanding it and himself. He rolls up his sleeves and stands to his guns, and whoever attacks it must expect no fair-weather fighting. He occasionally explodes a false rumor about himself with a witticism, sometimes pours in sparkling satire and severe truth-telling; and whoever interrupts him in a speech or a lecture, or in conversation, either playfully or seriously, will find that he has but burnished and sharpened the weapon he opposed.

"Mr. Beecher is of medium height, with a florid complexion, and large, soft, humorous blue eyes. His mouth is full and firm, and free poetic than the general character of his face. His bodily appearance is heightened by the hair brushed behind his ears. His dress is always simple and half negligent, like his manner. One very warm Sunday in the dog-days, when he was fresh from the West, he preached in a light linen coat. But he does nothing eccentric for the sake of eccentricity. He is discreet and thoughtful. He fights substances, and not shadows. No man is more liked by his opponents, because no man is more generous to them. A characteristic American, large-hearted, large-handed, large-minded, more learned in men than in books, clear-sighted and loyal and self-confident, he has already written his name upon the times and upon the hearts of his countrymen."

At the outbreak of the war Mr. Beecher threw himself into it with his accustomed energy, spoke and wrote on the loyal side, and came at last into the field. Last spring he went to Europe, and within a few weeks he has been speaking in England on the subject. In many places he has been well received; in others the influence of the aristocracy and the Southerners has proved too far to be interrupted and insulted. At Liverpool his lecture was a scene of the most shameful disloyalty and riot. It would give us great pleasure to have space to republish his speeches; but we can only find room for a couple of striking extracts from the address delivered at Manchester. Speaking of the probable duration of the war, he said:

> The question of war, under the circumstances in which war is now carried on in our country, is simply a question of time. [Cheers.] The population is with the North. The wealth is with the North. [Cheers.] The education is with the North. [Cheers.] The right doctrines of civil government are with the North. [Cheers, and a voice, "Where's the justice?"] It will not be long before one thing more will be with the North—victory. [Loud and enthusiastic cries of cheers.] Men on this side are impatient at the long delay; but if we can bear it, can't you? [Laughter.] You are quite at ease ("Not yet"); we are not. We are not materially affected in any such degree as many parts of our own land are now. [Cheers.] But if the day shall come in one year, in two years, in ten years hence, when the old Stars and Stripes shall float over every State of America— [Loud cheers, and some disturbance from one or two.] Oh, let him (the chief disturber) have a chance. [Laughter.] We will take a turn about; I will say the sentence, and you shall make the response. [Laughter.] I am a Congregationalist, but I can make a very good Episcopal minister too. [Loud laughter.] I was saying, when interrupted by that sound from the other side of the house, that if the day shall come, in one, or five, or ten years, in which the old honored and historic banner shall float again over every State of the South; if the day shall come when that which was the accursed cause of treason and darkness and destruction shall be dead and gone (cheers); if the day shall come when from the Gulf States there shall be liberty of speech as there never has been (cheers); if the day shall come when there shall be liberty of the Press, as there never has been; if the day shall come when men shall have common schools to send their children to, which they never have had in the South; if the day shall come when the land shall not be parceled in gigantic plantations, in the hands of a few rich oligarchs [loud cheers], but shall be parceled out to honest freemen, every man owning his little [renewed cheers]; in short, if the day shall come when the simple ordinances, the fruition and privileges of civil liberty, shall prevail in every part of the United States, it will be worth all the dreadful blood, and tears, and woe. [Loud cheers.] You are impatient; and yet God dwelleth in eternity, and has an infinite leisure to roll forward the affairs of men, not to suit the last impulsence of those who are but children of a day, and can not wait or linger for long, but according to the infinite circle on which He measures time and events. He expedites or retards as it pleases Him; and if He heard our cries or prayers, not this world would the months revolve but peace would come. But the strong crying and prayers of millions have not brought peace, but only thickening war. We accept the Providence: the duty is plain. [Cheers and interruption.]

In answer to some queries put for the purpose of embarrassing him by a pro-slavery Englishman with regard to the recognition of slavery in the Constitution, he observed:

> All the slave States stand on the radical principle that a slave is not for purposes of law any longer to be ranked in the category of human beings, but that he is a piece of property, and to be treated to all intents and purposes as a piece of property; and the law did not blush, nor do the judges blush nowadays who interpret that law. [Hear.] But how is it that the Constitution of the United States, when it begins to speak of these very same slaves, names them? Does it call them "slaves?" Does it speak of them as to "property?" Is little itself up as if consciously inspired with the grandeur of the thought and dignity of man, and says, "Persons held to service." [Hear and cheers.] Go to South Carolina, and ask what she calls slaves, and it says "things:" and the old Capitol of Washington ridiculously reverberates, "No, persons!" [Laughter.] Go to South Carolina, and her fundamental article says she looks upon slaves as "things;" and the Constitution says "No persons!" [Hear.] Go to the charter of Louisiana, or to the common State laws, their Constitution, and still that doctrine of devils is enacted—that slaves are "things." Legislatures upon three for whom Christ felt mortal anguish in Gethsemane, and redeemed on the death on the cross, have law call them still "things" and "chattels;" and still in spite of the clause in the Constitution of the United States says "persons." [Cheers.] What was it then, when the country was advanced so far beyond recognition in the period of our national formation, that stopped that word "persons" from being recognized as property? It was the wonderful dexterity of cotton throughout the world, which, by its commercial value, is arising from the invention of the cotton gin, had become a power of value. Slaves that before had been worth from $200 to $300 a piece rose to $500, $600, and $700 any one-third of our adherence to the world law. Then whispered they because words $700, and half the law went [cheers and laughter]: then $800 or $900, and then there was no end of doing so until law [cheers and laughter]: then $1000 or $1200, and slavery became one of the institutions on the Mount. [Cheers and laughter.] When Moses wrote his laws, delivered by the Highest, he wrote them on tables of stone; but when the devil, though his mission, wrote his laws, he wrote them on silver. [Cheers and laughter.] When Christ spoke his holy Mount stood [cheers and laughter]: they are the lineal descendants of those men who before trembled the golden calf. [Cheers.]

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

A CELEBRATED physician once said to Lord Eldon's brother, Sir William Scott, rather more flippantly than becomes the gravity of his profession, "You know, after sixty, a man is always either a fool or a physician." The honest scribe replied, in an insinuating voice, "Perhaps he may be both, doctor."

MRS. PARTINGTON says she prefers the Venus de Medicine to any statue she knows of.

"WE have a gentleman in our town," writes a correspondent, "who is fond of using high-flown language. He sometimes makes very laughable mistakes, as witness the following: He had the head of grandma in the Sunday school celebration in our neighborhood not long since, and after one of the speeches, he addressed the audience, telling them that they would now have some social noose on the brass band."

MODERN DEFINITIONS.

Distant Relations—People who imagine they have a claim to rob you if you are rich, and insult you if you are poor.

Bottle—A beautiful, but useless insect, without wings, whose colors fade on being removed from the sunshine.

Hermaphrodite—An accident rot, said to have been fashionable among young gals and wives, but now entirely out of use, practiced only by the lower orders.

Editor—A poor wretch who every day empties his head into his mouth, and his mouth into the world.

An old Scottish woman, wishing to cross the river Forth, hesitated to enter the ferry-boat, because a storm was brewing. The boatman asked if she would not trust in Providence. "No, no," said she, "I will no trust in Providence as long as there is a bridge at Stirling."

"THERE'S sweet music in dreams," said an old gentleman. "Yes, there may be," said his wife; "but I hear nothing of it, among a snore."

"MOTHER," said a little girl, "can a door speak?" "Certainly not, my love." "Then why did you tell Anna to answer the door this morning?"

"THE Pilgrim of a desert will
Should never let want confound him,
For he at any time can eat
The sand which is around him.
"It might seem odd that he could find
Such palatable fare,
Did we not know the sons of Ham
Were fond and unalloyed lovers."

If you want to be a "swell" of the first water, get the dropsy.

"PRAY keep your seat," as the cockney sportsman said to the wild turkey.

A certain Scotch friend of ours, who is not a member of the temperance society, being asked by a dealer to purchase some fine old Jamaica rum, gravely answered, "To tell you the truth, Sir, I canna say I've very fond of rum: for if I do take the rum inadvertent, it's very apt to give a body the headache!"

YOUR LIKENESS OR YOUR LIFE!

Aspirants for fame in a photographic frame
Have a passion so morbid to hang in the street,
That the study of nature yields the crown of the town
Rebuke famous the mortal whom fare you don't meet.

When Mr. White looks black, does he change color?

A college student being examined in Locke, where he speaks of our relations to the Deity, was asked, "What rebels do we neglect?" to which he answered, with much simplicity, "Poor relations, Sir."

THE EDITOR'S REPLY TO CORRESPONDENTS.

A correspondent, answering to our address,
Transmitting, signed himself X. Q.
The editor in bitter read,
And begged he might be X. Q. Z.

A few mornings since we were relating to our family the fact of a friend having retired upon his decision a fine little male infant, whom he adopted, when one of the obtuse brunettes observed,—"Po, dear, will he his stepson, won't it?" We thought it would, decidedly.

Miss Jemima Wilhelmina, when her parents refuse to allow her to go to a ball, is said to nail bas a fool at home.

It is a paradox that loose habits stick tighter to a fellow than any other kind, and, in fact, that tight people very often wear them.

"YOU'LL break my heart," as the cake said to the hatchet.

If you want to get into a fat office hire yourself to a soap-boiler.

A child, like a letter, often goes astray through being badly directed.

Why is an attorney like a minister?—Because he studies the law and the profits.

A DRAWN BET.—Queen Elizabeth's portrait.

Never trouble trouble till trouble troubles you.

MR. MAIR, a Scotch minister, was rather short-tempered, and had a wife, named Rebecca, whom, for brevity's sake, he called Bess or Becky. He kept a dog, too, and among other curries this one was very frequent: "Becky and I had a terrible quarrel, and I deserve to be hanged, for much she had been on a visit to the minister went to Edinburgh, and told the story to a minister and his wife there, who said, very politely, "Well, he must have been an excellent husband to Mair. My husband and I sometimes, too, have a 'tiff,' but each time after it he's ever humble!"

A Yorkshire jockey had occasion to go to France. When he arrived at the custom-house he was surprised to hear the men speaking French, the women speaking French, and indeed the children jabbering away in the same strange tongue. In the height of the perplexity which the circumstance had involved him in, he was awakened to his senses by the cock crowing, whereupon he burst into a wild exclamation of thanksgiving and praise, and exclaimed, "Thank goodness, there's English at last!"

HOW TO GET RID OF YOUR COLDS.—Rub them over with tanned cloves, and let your foot hang out of bed one night or two, and the mice may nibble them. If the mice do their duty the cough will be sufficient.

DR. WISE, writing to Hamilton's garden at Cobham, expresses his surprise at the prodigious growth of the trees. "Sir," says he, "replied Mr. Hamilton, "remember they have nothing else to do."

A certain writer boasts that he directs all his shots at error. It is all that he has to shoot at, for he never gets within gunshot of the truth.

An officer on a field-day happened to be thrown from his horse, and as he lay sprawling on the ground said to a friend who came to his assistance, "I thought I had improved in my riding, but I find I have fallen off."

TO WHOM IT MAY CONCERN.—Many persons write poetry (?) and keep it, and send them to an office to be corrected—if in editor's office vote a "house of correction."

Old birds are not caught with chaff; young women are often caught with nothing else.

The purpose of an unmarried woman is generally like herself—single.

Our griefs are no doubt deeply interesting to ourselves; they are great bores to our friends.

To what class of periodical literature do soldiers contribute?—To reviews.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

BURNETT'S

Standard Flavoring Extracts

For Cooking Purposes.

Lemon,	Peach,	Rose,	Cloves,
Celery,	Orange,	Vanilla,	Ginger,
Nutmeg,	Cinnamon,	Nectarine,	Almond.

THE SUPERIORITY OF THESE EXTRACTS CONSISTS IN THEIR

Perfect Purity and Great Strength.

We select the following Testimonials:

POPULAR HOTELS.

"Pre-eminently superior to all others for culinary use."
FARREN HOUSE, Boston.

"Superior to any we have ever used."
REVERE HOUSE, Boston.

"Have used your Extracts for several years, and regard them the best in the world."
FIFTH AVENUE HOTEL, New York.

"Our test has proved them unrivaled."
ST. NICHOLAS HOTEL, New York.

"Have been found really superior by thorough and exclusive use in our Establishment for years."
CONTINENTAL HOTEL, Phila., Pa.

"Possess all the rare qualities claimed for them."
EUTAW HOUSE, Baltimore, Md.

"Far superior to any in the market."
WILLARD'S HOTEL, Washington, D. C.

MANUFACTURERS AND PROPRIETORS,

JOSEPH BURNETT & CO.

BOSTON.

Books by return Post to any Post Office in the U. S.
GOOD BOOKS BY MAIL.—We send all Books prepaid by return of FIRST MAIL, at publishers' prices. Address
FOWLER & WELLS, No. 389 Broadway, N. Y.

HOSTETTER'S
CELEBRATED
STOMACH BITTERS

THE SOLDIER'S SAFEGUARD.—This is the title bestowed upon HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS by an officer of the United States Army, writing from the Valley of Virginia. He says in a letter to the proprietors—"Since I have been in the army many doctors have come over. Your Bitters have been regularly and systematically, as a preventive against the bilious fevers so common and so destructive here, they have stopped the desired end, and you may therefore claim for your celebrated Tonic the favorable designation of the 'Soldier's SAFEGUARD."—Wherever it has been tried in the army, the results has been the same. The soldiers themselves are clamorous to have it substituted for the pernicious liquors now used as stimulants in the military hospitals. Its well-known basis, Spirits of Rye, the purest stimulant, in the opinion of chemists, that can be produced from any substance by any process, and this medicine improved by medication with a combination of the finest tonic, anti-bilious, and corrective herbs, barks, gums, roots, &c., known to modern pharmacy. Hence HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS—the best and only preventative in malarious districts and the most powerful of all recuperants in cases of debility and utter physical prostration—should be in every army hospital and convalescent camp, and should form a portion of the medicine stores of every regiment in the field. Given promptly to the wounded, it would save the lives of thousands who must otherwise die of exhaustion on the battle-field.

Sold by all Druggists and Family Grocers.

Hostetter's Stomach Bitters,

PREPARED AND SOLD BY
HOSTETTER & SMITH, PITTSBURGH, PA.
Depot for New York, 482 Broadway.

Salesmen Wanted.

$75 a month, or commission allowed on sales. Apply to HALE & CO., Newburyport, Mass.

ALL ARTICLES FOR SOLDIERS

At Bellknap, Washington, and all places occupied by Union troops, should be sent by HARNDEN'S EXPRESS, No. 74 Broadway. Sutlers charged low rates.

$75 A MONTH!—I want to hire Agents in every county at $75 a month, expenses paid, to sell my new cheap Family Knitting Machine. Address
S. MADISON, Alfred, Maine.

AGENTS WANTED—Call and examine, or send stamp for circular, to Wheeler & Wilson, that retail for $2, urgently needed by every person.
E. L. WOLCOTT, 170 Chatham Square, N. Y.

How the United States
CAN SAVE
50,000,000
DOLLARS
PER ANNUM.

The Importance of BRANDRETH'S PILLS as a remedial Agent is become more and more known. There is now no doubt but if used by all classes when sick, the sum of disease would be greatly reduced. But if adopted by Medical Authority in the Army of the United States, a clear saving of FIFTY MILLIONS OF DOLLARS would be made, by securing the health and lives of our brave soldiers.

MORE TESTIMONY.

BRANDRETH HOUSE, New York, Oct. 29, 1863.

DR. B. BRANDRETH—Sir: I noticed, in the New York Herald of this date, a letter from some of the surviving members of Co. F, 25th Regt., N. Y. S. Vols., extolling your valuable Pills, which I fully and freely endorse, having been in command of the company from the 1st day of August, 1861, until the 3d of June, 1863, when the company was mustered out of the service, and discharged in this city. The percentage of men reported sick during that time was much less than in any other company of the Regiment, owing, as I fully believe, to the free use of your Pills, which were not supplied to the other soldiers. I believe them to be invaluable, as a family or in the field.
Respectfully yours,
JOHN VICKERS
Co. F, 25th Regt., N. Y. S. V.

We, the undersigned, some surviving members of Company F, Seventeenth New York State Volunteers, hereby certify that we used BRANDRETH'S Pills during our two years service, and do hereby attribute the fact that our constitutions are uninjured by the necessary hardships and privations of a soldier's life in the field. In costiveness, dysentery, intermittent fever, and typhoid fever, their prompt use cured us in a few days. Our health was often restored without our having been entered on the sick list; in fact, a single dose of four or five pills usually cured what, under the regular treatment, would have been a serious sickness. Others, who appeared to be sick in no danger of dying, but who used the remedies prescribed by the regimental surgeon, either died or were sick for weeks in the hospital.

When we left Troy, in June, 1861, you gave us a supply of these pills, and we feel sure, from our experience, that if every officer was supplied with this medicine the general health of the army would be greatly improved. For ourselves it is our sole remedy, knowing all our wants in the way of physic, and we have known and tested it from our childhood, and our parents before us.

SING SING, Oct. 24, 1863.

J. D. SMITH, Captain.
WILLIAM LEE.
THEODORE CROFUT.
G. H. DEARING.
FRANCIS J. JENNINGS.
LEWIS B. COX.
WM. W. CAMPBELL.
W. J. CHARLTON.
ELLIS JONES.
WILLIAM VAN WART.
ALBERT WESLEY.
REF. WILSON WESCOTT
BENJAMIN F. BROWN.
DENNIS SHAY.
JOHN W. GRIFFIN
JAMES B. CROFUT.
WILLIAM HOLMES
BORGE R. WATSON.
W. W. RYDER.
FREDERICK HART.

T. B. LACY, First Lieutenant, 38th New York Vols.
M. C. EARLE, First Sergt. Co. D, 176th Regt. N. Y. V.
CALEB S. FRISBIE, Co. B, 5th New York Vols.
WM. KEPPEL, Co. B, Berdan's Sharpshooters.
CASSIUS BISHOP, Co. E, 19th New York Vols.
WM. KNIGHT, Co. I, 6th New York Artillery.
ABRAHAM BUTLER, Co. I, 6th N. Y. Artillery.
MILLARD F. LANNING, Musician, 1st N. Y. Vols.

PRINCIPAL OFFICE, No. 294 Canal Street.
Also sold at No. 4 Union Square, and by all dealers.
See B. BRANDRETH in white letters in on the Government stamp, which secures the genuine.

American Watches
For Soldiers
AT REDUCED PRICES.

American Watches for Americans!

THE AMERICAN WATCH COMPANY give notice that they have lately issued a new style of Watch, expressly designed for Soldiers and others who desire a good watch at a moderate price. These watches are intended to displace the worthless, cheap watches of British and Swiss manufacture with which the country is flooded, and which were never expected to keep time after they were ready, being refuse manufactures sent to this country because unsalable at home, and used here only for jumping and swindling purposes.

We offer to sell our Watch, which is of our most substantial manufacture, as accurate and reliable TIME-KEEPERS, and Sterling Silver Cases, Hunting pattern, as nearly as low a price as is asked for the fancy-named Aurora and Leginna of foreign make, already referred to.

We have named the new series of Watches, WM. ELLERY, Jr., Model, which name will be found on the dial plate of every watch of this manufacture, and is one of our trade-marks.

Sold by all respectable watch dealers in the loyal states.

Wholesale orders should be addressed to

ROBBINS & APPLETON,

Agents of the American Watch Company,

182 BROADWAY, N. Y.

Printing-Press for Sale.

One Taylor Double Cylinder, five Rollers, Table Distribution, Bed 32x51. Price $2500.
Apply to HARPER & BROTHERS, 329 Pearl St., N.Y.

A Splendid Holiday or Bridal Present.

HARPER'S
Illuminated and Pictorial
BIBLE.

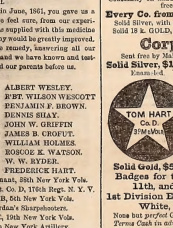
Including the Apocrypha. Superbly embellished by over Sixteen Hundred Illustrations, engraved and engraved by Adams after Designs by Chapman, exclusive of a Series of Rich Illuminations in Colors, comprising Frontispieces, Presentation Plate, Framed Record, Title-pages, &c. The whole forming a sumptuous Folio Volume.
PRICES.—Morocco, gilt edges, beveled and panelled sides, $22 00; Morocco extra, gilt edges, $23 00. Full Calf, marbled edges, blank stamped, $18 00; Full Roan, marbled edges, $9 00.

Harper's Pictorial Bible is printed from the standard copy of the American Bible Society, but contains Marginal References, the Apocrypha, a Concordance, Chronological Tables, List of Proper Names, General Index, Tables of Weights, Measures, &c. The large Frontispieces, Titles to the Old and New Testaments, Family Record, Presentation Plate, Historical Illustrations, and Initial Letters to the Chapters, Ornamental Borders, &c., are from original designs, made expressly for this edition, by J. G. Chapman, Esq., of New York. In addition to which, there are numerous large Engravings, from designs by distinguished modern artists in France and England; to which a full Index is given.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers, New York.

For sale by A. WILLIAM & CO., Boston; SMITH, ENGLISH & CO., Philadelphia; CORNISH & HALSEY, Baltimore; FRANCK TAYLOR, Washington; ROBERT CLARKE & CO., Cincinnati; KEITH & WOODS, St. Louis; E. GRIGGS & CO., Chicago; DAWSON & BROTHERS, Montreal.

Cloaks and Mantillas.
BRODIE,
The Leader of Fashions!
Opened his Fall Stock on Thursday, 8th inst.,
And as usual stands unrivaled for Style, Quality, AND VARIETY.
300 Canal Street, New York.



SOLDIERS' COMPANY PINS.

Constantly on hand and Engraved to Order, and sent free on receipt of Price.

Every Co. from A to M Sold Silver, $1.
Solid Silver, with Letters in GOLD Initial, $1 50.
Solid 18 k. GOLD, $4 50.

Corps Badges

Sent Free by Mail or Express on receipt of Price.
Solid Silver, $1 50. Solid Silver, $1 50.
Enamel-1-4 Enamelled.

Solid Gold, $5. Solid Gold, $5.
Badges for the 1st, 2d, 3d, 5th, 6th, 11th, and 12th Army Corps.
1st Division Red, 2d Division Blue, 3d Division White, 3d Division Blue.
None but perfect Goods sent.
Terms Cash or Satisfactory. Send for a Catalogue.
Address C. L. EALCH & CO.,
209 Broadway, New York.
Successors to
J. G. PACKARD & CO.

H. A. HARVEY, 84 Maiden Lane, N. Y., TWINES, Brass and Iron Wire Cloth and Yarn, Steam Pumps, Wells, CARPET WARP, Fish Lines, Blocking Cord, Lasts, Twine and Netting, Seines, Nets, and Wrapping PAPER. Envelopes, and Paper Bags.

Diamond Pointed Gold Pens Retailing at Wholesale Prices.

Medium	Fan $0 85, in Silver ext. case,	$0 75
Large	" 0 75	" 1 50
Engraving	" 0 75	" 1 50
Commercial	" 1 00	" 1 50
Hunter's	" 1 00	" 2 00
Admiral	" 1 00	" 2 50

Also, Fountain Pens.—one filling will write eight to fifteen hours. Sent free by mail. Address
GEO. F. HAWKES, Manufacturer,
64 Nassau Street, New York.

EMPLOYMENT

At your own house. It is the greatest discovery of the age. Profits 100 per cent. Demand staple as Flour. Full particulars free. Address with stamp,
Address C. MUNRO BROWN, 74 Bleecker St., N. Y.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

Have just published

MARTIN POLE. A Novel. By JOHN SAUNDERS, Author of "Abel Drake's Wife," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

ELEANOR'S VICTORY. A Novel. By MISS BRADDON, Author of "Aurora Floyd," "John Marchmont's Legacy," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

DAILY WALK WITH WISE MEN. Religious Exercises for Every Day in the Year. Selected, Arranged, and Adapted, Principally, for Boy. REUBEN HEADS. Large 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

THE RING OF AMASIS. From the Papers of a Germ-ician. By the Author of "Uncle Ralph." Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth.

ELEANOR'S VICTORY. A Novel. By M. E. BRADDON, Author of "Aurora Floyd," "John Marchmont's Legacy," &c. With Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

ALCOCK'S JAPAN. The Capital of the Tycoon: a Narrative of a Three Years' Residence in Japan. By Sir RUTHERFORD ALCOCK, K.C.B., Her Majesty's Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to Japan. With Maps and Engravings. 2 vols. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00.

THE BIVOUAC AND THE BATTLE-FIELD; or, Campaigning in Virginia and the Siege of Yorktown. By Captain GEORGE F. NOYES. 12mo, Cloth, $1 25.

☞ Any of the above Works sent by mail, post-paid, on receipt of price.

J. H. Winslow & Co., 100,000
WATCHES, CHAINS, &c., &c.
Worth $500,000.

To be sold for One Dollar each, without regard to value, and not to be paid for till you know what you are to get.

SPLENDID LIST!

OF ARTICLES TO BE SOLD FOR ONE DOLLAR EACH.

100 Gold Hunting Cased Watches	$100 00 each.
100 Gold Watches	50 00 each.
200 Ladies' Gold Watches	35 00 each.
500 Ladies' and Gents' Watches	15 00 each.
2000 Vest and Neck Chains	5 00 to 10 00 each.
2000 Gold Pens, with Gold Pencils	5 00 to 10 00 each.
2000	5 00 to 8 00 each.
3000 Cameo Brooches	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Mosaic and Jet Brooches	4 00 to 6 00 each.
1000 Coral and Florentine Brooches	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Coral, Opal, and Em. Brooches	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Cameo Ear Drops	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Mosaic and Jet Ear Drops	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Coral, Opal, and Em. Ear Drops	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Cornel, Em., and Opal Ear Drops	4 00 to 6 00 each.
5000 Gent's Breast Pins	2 50 to 6 00 each.
3000 Watch Keys	2 50 to 4 00 each.
5000 Tooth and Shell Combs	2 00 to 4 00 each.
5000 Sets of Room Studs	2 50 to 6 00 each.
5000 Sets of Bosom	2 50 to 6 00 each.
6000 Plain Rings	2 50 to 5 00 each.
6000 Stone Set Rings	2 50 to 5 00 each.
6000 Lockets	2 50 to 5 00 each.
5000 Sets Ladies' Jewelry	5 00 to 10 00 each.
10000 Gold Pens, Silver Mtcl Holders	4 00 to 8 00 each.
10000 Gold Pens, with Silver Extension Cases and Pencils	4 00 to 6 00 each.

All of the above list of Goods will be sold for one dollar each. Certificates of all the various articles, stating what each one will have, are first put into envelopes, sealed up and mixed; and when ordered, are taken out without regard to choice, and sent by mail, the party giving all a fair chance. On receipt of the Certificate, you will see what you can have, and then it is at your option to send one dollar and take the article or not.

In all transactions by mail, we shall charge for forwarding the Certificates, paying postage, and doing the business. No Certificate will be sent to inform where the Certificate is sent for. Five Certificates will be sent for $1, eleven for $2, twenty-three for $3, and a hundred for $15.

AGENTS.—These setting as Agents will be allowed ten cents on every Certificate ordered by them, provided their remittances amount to one dollar. Agents can sell them 12 cents for every Certificate, and remit 15 cents to us, either in cash or postage stamps. Great inducements are offered by our correspondents in regard to giving their correct address, Town, County, and State. Address

J. H. WINSLOW & CO.,
105 Broadway, New York.

$200! $150! $100! $50!
PREMIUMS.
To Editors and Others!

I will pay the above named amounts for the best four articles on either my Soaps, Saleratus, or Concentrated Potash.

The article must state the writer's experience in using the goods, and must be not less than ten lines, and be published in the editorial columns of any good family newspaper.

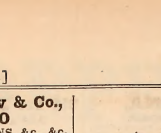
Any party wishing to compete for the above, and desiring further information, may address the undersigned. Each party writing and publishing a notice as above, will mail a marked copy of the paper containing the notice to me, and also write me by mail, giving full address.

The Premiums will be awarded on the fourth day of July, 1864.

B. T. BABBITT.
64 to 74 Washington Street, New York.

ENAMELED CHAMBER FURNITURE.—The best assortment of Enameled Furniture in all colors and styles, Walnut and Chestnut, Plain and Decorated, in Suites. Wholesale and Retail. Also, Mattresses and Palliasses. WARREN WARE, No. 317 Canal St., N. Y.

Printing Office for $12.
Every Man his own Printer.



THE LOWE IMPROVED PRINTING PRESSES are the best and cheapest portable Card and Job Presses ever invented, and have been awarded Silver Medals and Diplomas. Merchants, Druggists, and others can save money by MAKING MONEY by using them. Cards, Bill-Heads, Circulars, Labels, &c., can be printed in a trifling expense. Prices of Presses: $7, 12, 18, and $28. Type of any Office, with Press, $12, 20, 35, and 45. Send for a Circular to the

LOWE PRESS CO., 13 Water Street, Boston.

STERLING'S AMBROSIA
DR. STERLING'S
AMBROSIA
is a stimulating, purifying extract of roots, barks, and herbs. It will cure diseases of the scalp and belching of the head; positively eradicates dandruff; prevents the hair from falling out or from turning prematurely gray, causing it to grow thick and long. It is entirely difficult from all other preparations, and can be relied on. Dr. STERLING'S AMBROSIA, containing two bottles, for sale by all Druggists.
Prepared by
DR. STERLING,
No. 5 Tremont Row, Boston.

DR. R. GOODALE'S
CATARRH REMEDY.
Kat. embalmeth Catarrh, heedeth not Breath, forever. Price $1. Send stamp for pamphlet. Depot, 619 Broadway, N.Y. NORTON & CO., Sole Agents.

THE BEST BOOK TO SELL.—Agents and Newsmen will find a ready sale for HOW TO WRITE; HOW TO TALK; HOW TO BEHAVE, and HOW TO DO BUSINESS. Complete in one handsome volume. Sent by first post, for $1. Address Wanted—Address FOWLER & WELLS, No. 308 Broadway, N. Y.

Meeks' Cabinet and Furniture Warehouse,
No. 609 BROADWAY, and 333 and 335 Fourth Street.

New and elegant Designs, of superior Workmanship, at reasonable prices, manufactured of the very best well-seasoned and selected materials, and—for the supervision of this, where reputation has been established seventy years. Every description of Furniture manufactured to order and executed promptly.
Goods packed and shipped to all parts of the world.

Attention Officers and Soldiers!
HEAD-QUARTERS FOR ARMY CORPS, DIVISION, COMPANY, AND MASONIC FUR.
B. T. HAYWARD, Manufacturing Jeweler, 203 Broadway, Room No. 1.

On the receipt of $1, I will send you either Army Corps, Division, or Co. Pin, coin-silver Red, White, or Blue, with your Name, Regiment, and Co. handsomely engraved upon it, or a Kinsley Coon Pin, or Each Holder's Oil Division Pin, or Gen. Sickles's Emblematic Pin, or Gen. Grant's Vicksburgh Pin, or a fine Gold Pen and Pencil, or a New Style Locket and Vest Chain, or Seal Stone, California Diamond or Chased Ring. Masonic Emblems and Masonic Marks of every Description made to order promptly. Also Manufacturer and Wholesale Dealer in all kinds of Jewelry. Agents wanted in every Regiment, Hospital, and Vessel.

Attention Officers and Soldiers!
HEAD-QUARTERS FOR ARMY CORPS, DIVISION, COMPANY, AND MASONIC PINS.
B. T. HAYWARD, Manufacturing Jeweler, 203 Broadway, Room No. 1.

On the receipt of $1, I will send you either Army Corps, Division, or Co. Pin, coin-silver Red, White, or Blue, with your Name, Regiment, and Co. handsomely engraved upon it, or a Kinsley Coon Pin, or Each Holder's Oil Division Pin, or Gen. Sickles's Emblematic Pin, or Gen. Grant's Vicksburgh Pin, or a fine Gold Pen and Pencil, or a New Style Locket and Vest Chain, or Seal Stone, California Diamond or Chased Ring. Masonic Emblems and Masonic Marks of every Description made to order promptly. Also Manufacturer and Wholesale Dealer in all kinds of Jewelry. Agents wanted in every Regiment, Hospital, and Vessel.

DEAF? DEAF?
Deafness.—Sound Improved by Tubes. Can be concealed, and enables deaf persons to hear at public assemblies. Send for a descriptive pamphlet to
J. HASLAM, Cor. of John and Nassau St., New York.

SOMETHING TO LET! PLEASANT AND PROFITABLE! Good Trade, ready made, and good profits. Agents wanted. Address, with stamp, FOWLER AND WELLS, 308 Broadway, New York.

Insoles, Belts, and Armlets.
SECURED BY LETTERS PATENT OF THE UNITED STATES AND GREAT BRITAIN.

These articles are purely Vulcanized Rubber, and are designed to prevent perspiration, which is excited by the moisture of the feet and body, diffusing a healthy and curative influence over the whole person of the wearer, being an effective cure for Rheumatism, Cold Feet, Gout, &c., and all nervous and chronic diseases.
METTAM & CO., PROPRIETORS.
Insoles, $1 00; Belts, Armlets, $1 00; per pair, 50 cents additional. Office 429 Broadway. Send for circular.

Cristadoro's Hair Dye.
THE BEST IN THE WORLD.
Cristadoro's Hair Preservative.
Catalogues sent by mail. Beds for sale everywhere, and applied at No. 6 Astor House, N. Y.

SALISBURY, BRO., & CO.,
AGENTS FOR THE UNITED STATES FOR THE CELEBRATED
LABRETTINE
Extension Holders and Gold Pens.

Of the most handsome and durable construction, put up in elegant cases, and sold at prices to suit all, which in any less quantities. They will retail for $3 each.

Per dozen	$18 00
" gross	50 00
" 5 gross	100 00

Sent by mail or express, prepaid. Address
SALISBURY, BRO., & CO., Manufacturers, 8 I.

6000 AGENTS wanted, to sell SIX NEW INVENTIONS —two very recent, and of great value to families; all in great demand. Send 4 stamps and get 80 pages particulars. EUREKA BROWN, Lowell, Mass.

HORSES AT AUCTION.—The most valuable collection of TROTTING STOCK ever offered will be sold at public auction on the afternoon of Thursday, Nov. 19, Long Island, on THURSDAY, November 19, 1863, commencing at 10 o'clock, consisting of TELEVOTO CHIEF, the EUREKA MARE, SONTAG (a foal), and three of her colts by CHIEF.

A superior lot of Broad Mares in foal, and colts at their side, and yearlings; two-year-old, and three-year-old stallions and fillies, all sired by TELEVOTO CHIEF.

Also a few Road Horses, and the fine Jersey Bull POINT LOOKOUT (three years old), bred by SAMUEL THORNE, Esq.

Catalogues sent by mail on application to
JAMES M. MILLER, Auctioneer,
28 Pine Street, New York.

Attention, Soldiers!
Every soldier should have
A MOSQUITO NETTING WITH HIS NAME MARKED ON IT.
CIRCULARS SENT FREE.
Subscribers will forward to any soldier the full size of the solid Silver Badge, with his name engraved thereon, on receipt enclosed upon it, on receipt of $1 00. The above cut represents size of badge and style engraved. It can be fastened to any garment. Address

DROWNE & MOORE,
Manufacturing Jewelers, Providence, R.I.
N.B.—All kinds of Corps and Co. Pins, Enameled, in Red, White, and Blue, on hand and made to order.

THE INDISPENSABLE HAND-BOOK.
HOW TO WRITE, HOW TO BEHAVE,
HOW TO TALK, HOW TO DO BUSINESS.
Is one handsome volume of 600 pages, 12mo. Sent by first post, for $1. Agents wanted. Please address FOWLER & WELLS, No. 308 Broadway, N. Y.

"INDISPENSABLE."—No Correspondent, Gentlemen, Lady, Public Speaker, Teacher, or Man of Business, should be without this New Hand-Book. HOW TO WRITE; HOW TO TALK; HOW TO BEHAVE; and HOW TO DO BUSINESS. A handy volume of 600 pages, 12mo. Sent by first post, for $1. Agents wanted. Address FOWLER & WELLS, No. 308 Broadway, N. Y.

Sportsmen, Tourists, and Army and Navy Officers.
Powerful and Brilliant Double Glasses.

Powerfully combined with great power in Field, Marine, Theatrical, Opera, and general use—not day and night double perspective glasses, all these distinctly a person to know him at from 2 to 6 miles. Spectacles of the greatest known magnifying power to strengthen and improve the sight, without the distressing result of frequent changes. Catalogues sent by enclosing stamp.
SEMMONDS, Opticians—Opticians,
609 Broadway, New York.

THE "RIDGEWOOD" PATENT
SMOKING CASE.

Most ingenious in its combination of the Metallic Case, containing Pipe and Stem. Matches and Pipe Cleaner, with a handsome Tobacco Pouch attached, filling the Pipe by a valve, without use of the fingers or waste of Tobacco, the whole securing freedom from all odor, and portable as a Cigar Case. It is made for service, of various styles, at $1 50, $1 88, $2 25, $2 50, and $2 75 to $3 75 and $5 00; the two latter richly plated and engraved. Nothing can excel its comfort, utility, and economy for all smokers. As a Present to friends nothing could be more acceptable. For the Soldier it is invaluable. Also

The Ridgewood Sterling Tobacco.

Of superior quality and flavor, in package of various sizes. A liberal discount to Dealers. Single Cases sent by mail, post, on receipt of price and 25 cts.
RIDGEWOOD TOBACCO CURING CO.,
Office 429 Broadway, cor. Howard Street, New York.

BUSINESS AGENCY.
The best Pianos, Melodeons, Sewing Machines, &c., furnished at less than usual prices. Also Books and Stationery, and Articles for Soldier's Use.

Address GEO. G. SAXE, 37 Park Row, N. Y. Refer, by permission, to Messrs. Harper & Brothers, D. Appleton & Co., Carlton & Porter, and others.

Just what every Family wants. Patent Self-Adjusting Lamp Burner for Hand Lamps and Lanterns, burns Kerosene Oil with a brilliant light without chimney, smoke, or odor. Saves 25 per cent. Only $2 Extra $6., N. Y. Agents wanted. Send for Circular. Sample sent free for $2. American Inspirator awarded 1st Premium and Medal, 1863.

Union Playing Cards.
Cabinet for King, Goddess of Liberty for Queen, and Major for Jack. 52 enameled cards to the pack. Eagles, Shields, Stars and Stripes, Flags, and Arms of the United States for pips. Two packs, in case, mailed, free on receipt of $1. Liberal Discount to Trade. Send for a Circular, &c.
AMERICAN CARD COMPANY,
257 Broadway, N. Y., or 165 William Street, N. Y.

$75 50 PAYS Board, Washing, Fuel, and Tuition in common English, at Hedden Street Institute, Claverack, Columbia, Co., N. Y., for half a year, from Nov. 9 to April 8. Superior advantages for young Ladies in Music, Painting, and Oil Painting. Recreation Rooms, Chapel, Gymnasium, and Bowling Saloon under one roof. Six merited Premiums and their families live in the institution, and board with the pupils. For catalogue address the Rev. ALVAH PLACE, A.M.

Sponsalia Millinery Rooms,
12 Waverley Place, New York.

Madame Bradley, from Rue de la Paix, Paris, hopes to inform her numerous Patrons she has just received direct from her House in PARIS a varied assortment of the highest novelties in Bonnets, Hats, Caps, Head Dress, Nets, Flowers, and all articles appertaining to first class Millinery.

$60 A MONTH! We want Agents at $60 a month, or allow a large commission, to sell our Encyclopedia of Useful Arts, Celestial Barometer, and 12 other articles. 12 circulars sent free. SHAW & CLARK, Biddeford, Maine.

HUBBARD BRO'S
IMPORTERS of WATCHES
NEW YORK.

Are offering the cheapest, most accurate, durable, and salable Watches in the American market! They use the sole escapement in this country for the celebrated

Magic Time Observers,
The Perfection of Mechanism!
Being a Hunting, or Open Face, or Lady's or Gentleman's Watch combined, with Patent Self-winding Improvement.

A most valuable invention, by which the most convenient, and decidedly the best and cheapest timepiece for general and reliable use ever offered. It has within it and connected with its machinery its own winding attachment, rendering a key entirely unnecessary, the cause of this Watch are composed of two metals, the outer one being like 18 carat gold. It has the improved ruby action lever movement, and is warranted an accurate timekeeper. Every Watch carefully examined, per case of 12, $204. Sample watches in a neat morocco boxes, $18. If sent by mail, the postage is 36 cents; registering, 50 cents.

Silver Watches!
First-Class Hunting Time-Pieces.

FOR ACCURACY OF MOVEMENT, BEAUTY OF MATERIAL, AND ABOVE ALL, CHEAPNESS IN PRICE, THESE WATCHES ARE NOT EXCELLED.

UNIVERSAL APPROBATION
An imitation so faultless that it can hardly be detected by the most experienced judges. The material being of two metals, the outer one fine quality Silver and the inner one German Silver, it can not be recognized by cutting or heavy engraving, making it not only in appearance, but in durability, the best substitute for Solid Sterling Silver in existence.

The sale of these watches in the army is a source of enormous profit, retailing, as they very readily do, at $25 and upward. Many hundred dollars can be made in a single day by any one of ordinary business tact!

A WORD WHISPERED IN YOUR EAR.—Agents, homestricken and unable, write a manuel start, and future and bonds, to good reasons why by the Rev. Dana, 1866 pages, $3 38; registering, 50 cts. Sold only by the case. Can be sent by express.

Our inspections are novelties produced by no other house, combining the most active and reliable agents, by more elaborate and artistically finished, and offered at prices ridiculously low compared with their value.

The press in all parts of the country voluntarily attest the superiority of our watches. No American watch was capable, seeking directly to the public, in a manner not to be misunderstood.

"Particularly valuable for officers in the army, and travelers."—Frank Leslie's, Oct. 31.

"Prettiest, best, and cheapest time-pieces ever offered."—N. Y. Illustrated News, Oct. 31.

"Exceed other manufacturers in point of accuracy and elegance."—Boston Post and New Yorker, May 9.

"An improvement on ordinary timepieces, and invaluable for military men."—N. Y. Mercantile Journal, Aug. 9.

"Elaborately and artistically finished."—N. Y. Sunday Atheneum, July 30.

"Combine great accuracy as timekeepers."—Pittsburg, Pa., Chronicle, July 27.

"Very pretty and durable watches for the army."—N. Y. Army and Navy Journ. (Government organ), Aug. 29.

"One of the oldest and most reliable houses in business."—Louisville, Ky., Journal, July 31.

Hubbard Bro's will be sent, on application only, to St. Louis, Cairo, Louisville, Washington, and all places North of these cities, with the full discretion as follows: If you can not send South of these points, as the Expresses prefer not making collections on such uncertain localities, as that it will be necessary for buyers in the United States to send a voucher for every watch, that in all instances, requires an advance remittance of two dollars or more as proof of sincerity. Those residing in the army, quarter-d at or near those cities, can make purchases without any fear whatever, as they can keep their goods before payment is required. Those in the interior of rebeldom will be sent to send payment in advance, will please send by Express, when practicable; if not, send by mail in a registered letter; if you are a Negro citizen, send us an order in any letter, not marking in any manner as to cross or authority. No information whatever will be made from our prices, neither will Watches be sold in any less quantities than as specified above. To Agents employed. Buyers must deal directly with us!

HUBBARD BROS., Sole Importers,
Broadway, cor. Courtlandt St., New York.

The Solicitor to his Mother. Bulwin to Pulwer, a sequel to "Lucretia; or, the Children of Night." Onnitos, 700 tunes, for Flute or Violin, $1. "Union Selection," for Flute or Violin, $1. "Union Selection," for Flute and Six Violin Strings, 75 c., mailed. Musical Instruments repaired. Prospectus Free. Address as above.

MORAL PHILOSOPHY; or, THE DUTIES OF MAN CONSIDERED IN HIS INDIVIDUAL, DOMESTIC, AND SOCIAL CAPACITIES. By GEORGE COMBE. Reprinted from the Edinburgh edition, with the Author's last improvements. Complete in one large volume, price $2 50. New York: FOWLER & WELLS, 308 Broadway. A colemporary says:

"This book is a treasure. It is the only American edition of the Moral Philosophy published. Its author's latest revisions. It should be in the library of every lover of humanity. Philosophy, Psychology, and Science from the works of this stamp, and we heartily commend it to the world."

DO YOU WANT LUXURIANT WHISKERS OR MUSTACHES?—My Onguent will force a heavy growth in six weeks, even upon the smoothest face without stain or injury to the skin. Price $1—sent by mail, free. Address with stamp, Box 4444 Boston Post Office. R. G. GRAHAM, No. 169 Nassau Street, N. Y.

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE
TERMS.

One Copy for one Year	$3 00
Two Copies for One Year	5 00

An Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of Ten Subscribers, at $3 00 each, or 11 Copies for $35 00.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE and HARPER'S WEEKLY, together, one year, $5 00.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers.

Circulation over 200,000.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
Single Copies Six Cents.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year	$3 00
One Copy for Two Years	5 00

And an Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of Ten Subscribers, at $2 50 each, or 14 Copies for $35.

TERMS TO ADVERTISERS.—Seven cents Cash per line for inside, and One dollar per line for outside Advertisements.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers.

ADVANTAGE OF "FAMINE PRICES."

SICK BOY. "I know one thing—I wish I was in Dixie."

NURSE. "And why do you wish you was in Dixie, you wicked boy?"

SICK BOY. "Because I read that quinine is worth one hundred and fifty dollars an ounce there; and if it was that here you wouldn't pitch it into me so!"

FISK & HATCH,

Bankers and Dealers in Government Securities,

AND

AGENTS FOR THE UNITED STATES FIVE-TWENTY LOAN,

No. 38 Wall Street, New York.

Just Published and for sale by News Agents generally.

"The Hunters."

An Indian Tale of intense interest and excitement. Also Ten Cent Song Book No. 5.—"THE YANKEE SAILOR'S SONG BOOK, containing a remarkably choice collection of songs. Also "THE GHOST OF WELL DEAN." Price of each 10 cents.

IRWIN P. BEADLE & CO.,
137 William Street, N. Y.

PREPARE FOR THE HOLIDAYS.

There is no Gift, or Present, which compares with the Craig Microscope and Mounted Objects. As a source of amusement and instruction they are unsurpassed. This Microscope will be mailed, postage paid, for $3 75; or with 6 beautiful mounted objects, for $5; or with 24 objects, for $8.

Address, HENRY CRAIG,
335 Broadway, New York.

A liberal discount to the trade.

BILLIARD BALLS.

Patent compressed Ivory Billiard Balls, 2¼ and 2⅜ in., $16 per set. 1¾ in. Bagatelle, $6 per set. 1¼ in. Bagatelle, $4 per set, will be sent on receipt of the price. Manufactured and for sale by J. M. WELLING, 307 Canal St., New York, sign of the Golden Elephant.

GUNS, PISTOLS, Military Goods,

FRENCH AND ENGLISH FANCY GOODS.

Also, a full assortment of

Jet, Coral, and Steel Goods.
Schuyler, Hartley & Graham,
19 Maiden Lane & 22 John Street, N. Y.,
15 Rue d'Enghein, Paris,
47 Hampton St., Birmingham, Eng.

Pins for every Co. from A to M.

Annexed is a fac-simile design of the Sonnets Company Pin. The letter representing the Company is in Bold Relief and very conspicuous.

The undersigned will forward to any soldier one of the above pins in solid silver, with name and regiment clearly engraved upon it, on receipt of One Dollar.

For Cooks Badges, send our list to side advertisement.

Address C. L. BALCH & CO., 305 Broadway, N. Y.
Successors to J. S. PACKARD & CO.

WANTED! WANTED!

Do you want Splendid Whiskers or Moustaches?

HUNTER'S ONQUENT will force them to grow luxuriantly in six weeks upon the smoothest face without stain or injury to the skin. Also on Bald Heads in ten weeks. Two Boxes for $1 in. Postage free. Address

C. HUNTER & CO., Box 674, Milwaukie, Wis.

IMMENSE PROFITS

To be made selling our

STATIONERY PRIZE PACKETS.

SEND FOR OUR NEW CIRCULAR.

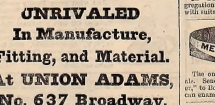
G. S. HASKINS & CO., 30 Beekman Street, N. Y.

A Beautiful Complexion free from Tan, Pimples and Freckles, may easily be procured by using the "BALM OF THOUSAND FLOWERS." For shaving it is unsurpassed. It is composed of pure oil, honey, and other valuable articles, highly perfumed by its own ingredients, and when used for washing, night and morning, renders the skin soft and white, and free from blemish. Price 50 cents.

The Trade supplied by HOWARD, SANGER & CO., 39 and 197 Chatham Street, N. Y., and for sale by all Druggists.

$7. WATCHES. $7.

A Beautiful Engraved Gold-Plated Watch, Lever Cap, small size, English Movements, perfect time-keeper. Sent free by mail, in neat case, for only $7. A Solid Silver, same as above, $7. Specially adapted to the ARMY. ULLAS, D. BOSTON & CO., 37 & 40 Ann Street, N. Y.



Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper, of Aug. 29, says: "Messrs. BOSTON & CO. have assembled very desirable things in a watch — cheapness and reliability. Turn it in what way for $7 a person can have a excellent timekeeper, there will be greater punctuality in all the affairs of life."

NATIONAL BATTLE PIN.

McClellan, Grant, Rosecrans, Banks, Meade, Gillmore, Burnside, Hooker, Foster, and Sigel. All are the same pattern as the cut, only differing in battle-grounds and dates. Perfect photograph likeness in each pin. Plated back and front in fine gold. By enclosing $1, a sample will be sent by mail. Agents wanted in every and the army. The undersigned has the exclusive right of manufacture, and the inventor of this beautiful keepsake and record of gallant acts.

LOUIS PHILLIP, 160 Broadway, N. Y.

FINE DRESS SHIRTS TO ORDER. UNRIVALLED In Manufacture, Fitting, and Material. AT UNION ADAMS, No. 637 Broadway.

Shults' Onguent. warranted to produce a full set of Whiskers in six weeks, or money refunded. Sent post-paid, for 30 cents. Address C. F. SHULTS, Troy, N. Y.

Amalgam Bells.

Cheapest and best for Churches, Schools, Farms, Factories, &c. Equal in tone and durability to any other metal, and two-thirds less weight. Over 10 cts. per lb. Send for a circular to the manufacturers, John B. Henderson, late PRATT, ROBINSON & CO., 109 William St., N.Y.

The Soldier's Gift
To the Loved One at Home.

We will deliver free, at any Express Office East of St. Joseph, Mo., any of our beautiful Albums of the value of $5 or more, that may be ordered by members of the Army or Navy of the United States or Prussia to friends at home. We manufacture elegant styles of all prices to $75, and higher.

E. & H. T. ANTHONY,
Manufacturers and Importers,
501 Broadway, N. Y.

CHLOASMA,
OR MOTH PATCHES.

Blemishes on the face, called Moth, are very annoying, particularly to ladies of light complection, as the discolored spots on the skin show more strongly in blondes than on brunettes, but they contribute greatly in marring the beauty on either; and anything that will remove such patches without injuring the skin in texture or color, would no doubt be considered a great improvement in modern science. Dr. B. C. PERRY, 49 Bond Street, having for many years made a specialty of treating diseases of the skin, will guarantee to remove Moth Patches and other discolorations from the face without injury to either texture or color of the skin. His success in this, as in other branches of his specialty—DISEASES OF THE SCALP and LOSS OF HAIR—will warrant him in guaranteeing a CURE IN EVERY CASE. For particulars enclose stamp for circular. No charge for consultation. DR. B. C. PERRY, 49 BOND STREET, NEW YORK.

$35 WATCHES. $35

Genuine Full-Jeweled American Lever Watches, in 4 Ounce Coin Silver Hunting Cases, Gold Joints, for $35.

Also every variety of good Watches at equally low rates.

All orders from the Army must be pre-paid, as the Express Companies will not take bills for collection on soldiers

J. L. FERGUSON, Importer of Watches,
266 Broadway New York.

MUNN & CO.,

Solicitors of American and Foreign Patents,

And Publishers of the ILLUSTRATED SCIENTIFIC AMERICAN, 37 Park Row, N. Y., Supplies all information concerning Patents, free. Specimens of the Paper, free.

Central Park in the Stereoscope.

150 New Views, just published by
E. & H. T. ANTHONY,
501 Broadway, N. Y.

Also, Life in China, a new and very interesting series.

E. & H. T. ANTHONY,
Manufacturers of Photographic Materials,
501 Broadway, New York.

Card Photographs.

Our Catalogue now embraces considerably over

FOUR THOUSAND

different subjects, to which additions are continually being made of Portraits of Eminent Americans, etc., viz.:

71 Major-Generals,	137 Divines,
193 Brigadier-Generals,	116 Authors
220 Colonels,	39 Artists,
84 Lieut.-Colonels,	123 Singers,
597 Other Officers,	46 Prominent Women,
60 Officers of the Navy,	147 Prominent Foreign Portraits.

2,500 COPIES OF WORKS OF ART.

Including a representation of the most celebrated Engravings, Paintings, Statues, &c.

Catalogues sent on receipt of 10cents.

An order for One Dozen PICTURES from our Catalogue will be filled on receipt of $1 00, and sent by mail, free.

Photographic Albums.

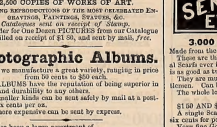
Of these we manufacture a great variety, ranging in price from 50 cents to $50 each.

Our ALBUMS have the reputation of being superior in durability to those of any other make.

The smaller kinds can be sent safely by mail at a postage of twenty cents each.

The more expensive can be sent by express.

We also keep a large assortment of



Stereoscopes & Stereoscopic Views.

Our Catalogue of Views will be sent to any address on receipt of Stamp.

E. & H. T. ANTHONY.
MANUFACTURERS OF PHOTOGRAPHIC MATERIALS,
501 Broadway. New York.

Friends or relatives of prominent military men will confer a favor by sending us their likenesses to copy. They will be kept carefully and returned unharmed.

$5 FINE ALBUMS MADE TO ORDER for Companies or Regiments, at Publication Price, or for other purposes, with suitable inscriptions, &c.

The only enameled "Turn-over" Collar made in metal. Send $1 50 for a "Turn-over" or $1 for a "Choker," to Box 6713, and they will be sent by return mail. American enameled Metallic Collar Co., 94 Pine St., N. Y.

AGENTS WANTED.—$2 positively made from 20 cts.; the regular retail price of every person. Call and examine, or ten samples sent free by mail for 20 cts.; retail for $2, by J. L. WU. GIFT, 109 Chatham Square, N. Y.

The Beard.

If over 18, and your Beard, Moustaches, &c., is of feeble, scanty, retarded growth, the use for a short time of the Tonic Swamp Sharsh Balsam will stimulate them thereby to a very fine and vigorous growth. Has been thoroughly tried and found infallible. 50 cts., $1, and $2 each sealed, and postpaid. Particulars of the Discovery at Shiloh, April, 1862, of this remarkable Balsam, in a sealed paper, free. Address JOHN RAWLINS, 197 Broadway, N. Y.

Wheeler & Wilson's

Sewing Machines.

Have won the Highest Premiums at all the important State and Mechanical Fairs where exhibited this season. Forte's Patent Umbrella Lock Stands. 505 Broadway.

$15 Per Day Easy $15
And a Watch Free.

Employment for everybody, male and female. 100,000 men, women, and children wanted to act as our Agents in every Town and Village throughout the U. S. to sell our immensely popular, recently-enrolled, and splendid cash Income PIKE STATIONERY, ENGRAVER, and YANKEE NOTION PACKAGES, containing fine Writing Materials, such as Paper, Pens, Pencils, Envelopes, Blotters, Beautiful Engravings, Fashion Plates, Designs for Comic Valentines, Cottage Keepers, Home Ornaments, Camping Out Companions (for Soldiers), Parlor Amusements, Letter Writer's Guide, Medical Prescriptions, Many Ways to Get Rich, Likenesses of Military Heroes, Union Designs, Gents' Pocket Calendars for 1863, Yankee Notions of All Kinds, rich and costly Presents of Fashionable Jewelry, Rare Recipes, Gaming, and Many Advts., &c., &c., the whole worth, if bought separately, many dollars. Price each Package only 25 cents retail. Wholesale rates to Agents very low, from 100 to 200 PER CENT. PROFIT ALLOWED. Our Packages stand sun or even, alone, and alone all competitors, and have long been acknowledged as the leading and only real valuable and standard Articles of the kind now manufactured. Packages of all descriptions put up by the 1000 for Sellers, Peddlers, Wholesale Dealers, &c. Goods sent by Express safe to ALL PARTS of the army South or Southwest. A SILVERED SIDED SILVER WATCH, EVERLAST MOVEMENTS, and correct timepieces, presented free to each person who acts as our agent. Send for our new Circular, containing Extra Premium Inducements, and free. S. C. HICKARDS & CO., 102 NASSAU ST., N. Y. The Great Original, Largest, and Oldest Price Package House in the World.

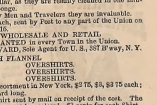
VINELAND

LANDS.—TO ALL WANTING FARMS.—Large and thriving settlement, mild and healthful climate, 30 miles south of Philadelphia by railroad. Rich soil, produces large crops, which can now be seen growing. Twenty and forty acre tracts, at from $15 to $20 per acre, payable within four years. Good business opening for MANUFACTURERS and others, churches, schools, and good society. It is now the most improving place East or West. Hundreds are settling and building. The beauty with which the place is laid out is unsurpassed. Letters answered. Pamphlets containing reports and giving full information will be sent free. Address CHAS. K. LANDIS, Vineland Post Office, Cumberland County, New Jersey.

From Report of Seton Robinson, Agricultural Editor of the Tribune: "It is one of the most extensive fertile tracts, in an almost level position and suitable condition for pleasant farming that we know of this side of the Western prairies.

GOLD PENS AND CASES.

Retailed at wholesale prices. 14 kt. Gold Pen, Solid Silver Case, $1 00, warranted for one year, guarantee accompanying each Pen. Send for a circular. Pens repointed on receipt of 25 cents.



E. S. JOHNSON, 15 Maiden Lane, N. Y.

Learn to Skate in One Hour by using The American Parlor Or Floor Skate, Hard Rubber Rollers, Anti-friction Axles. Frederick Stevens. 215 Pearl Street, New York. 63 Kilby Street, Boston.

A BEAUTIFUL MICROSCOPE

For 30 cts. (coin preferred), magnifying small objects 500 times. A set of different powers, $1 00. A fine Microscope, $5 00. Address F. C. BOWEN, Box 2939, Boston, Mass.

3,000 dozen pure Roman Scarfs.

Made from the Finest and Most Costly Silk.

These are the most fashionable, elegant, and economical Scarfs ever imported, as they never ravel, one Scarf is as good as two.

They are much worn in Europe by both ladies and gentlemen. Can be worn with either pin or ring.

The whole lot will be retailed at

WHOLESALE PRICES!

$1 50 AND $2 EACH.

A single Scarf sent by mail on receipt of the cash, and 25 cents for postage.

Very fine Gold Plated Scarf Pins or Rings

At $1 25 each.

S. W. H. WARD,
No. 397 Broadway, New York.

STEEL COLLARS

ENAMELED WHITE.

Having the appearances and comfort of linen, have been worn in England for the last two years in preference to any other collar, as they are readily cleaned in one minute with a sponge.

To Military Men and Travelers they are invaluable.

Price $1 each, sent by mail to any part of the Union on receipt of $1 10.

WHOLESALE AND RETAIL.

AGENTS WANTED in every Town in the Union.

S. W. H. WARD, Sole Agent for U. S., 397 Broadway, N. Y.

FRENCH FLANNEL

OVERSHIRTS

DRAWERSHIRTS.

OVERSHIRTS,

the largest assortment of any house, $2 75, $3, $3 75 each; all cut one yard long.

A single Shirt sent by mail on receipt of the cost. The cost of postage must be enclosed, or each Shirt will be sent by express, collect on delivery.

ENGLISH MERINO UNDERSHIRTS AND DRAWERS,

$2, $2 25, and $2 50.

SCOTCH LAMB'S WOOL UNDERSHIRTS AND DRAWERS

ALSO,

FINE WHITE SHIRTS

MADE TO MEASURE AT $3, $3½, $36, AND $40 PER DOZEN.

Self-Measurement for Shirts.

Printed blanks for self-measurement, list of prices, and drawings of different styles of shirts and collars sent free to every one.

S. W. H. WARD, from London.

No. 397 Broadway, New York.

Fogg's Double-Action Patent Lever SKATE BUCKLE,

Manufactured and for sale on Straps, at wholesale, by F. STEVENS, Manufacturer of Skates, Straps, and Leather Goods, 218 Pearl St., New York, 63 Kilby St., Boston.

A Household Word.—Buy your Housekeeping Articles at BASSFORD'S, Cooper Institute, New York.

$10 made Daily by all who send stamp to J. W. STEPHENS, Morristown, N. J.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. VII.—No. 360.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 21, 1863. [SINGLE COPIES SIX CENTS. $3.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1863, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

THE RUSSIAN BALL—IN THE SUPPER-ROOM.—[SEE PAGE 746.]

SOLDIERS' MARCHING SONG.

STEADILY we march along,
Join we in the marching song,
Hand to hand, and heart to heart,
Bearing each a soldier's part;
Come what will beneath the sun,
We are soldiers marching on;
'Neath the old flag, flying free,
Marching on to victory.

Steadily we march along,
Timing step to marching song;
What though roads be wet or dry,
Though be bright or dark the sky,
We are soldiers bound to win,
Marching on through thick and thin;
'Neath our banners, flying free,
Marching on to victory.

Steadily we march along,
Ringing out the marching song:
What though rough be soldiers' fare,
We are all our country's care—
All its hope and all its love;
And its flag is bright above,
Flying stainless, flying free,
As we march to victory.

Steadily we march along
To the soldiers' marching song:
Little care we, nothing fear,
If our country's foe be near;
We are ready for the fight,
For the battle of the right,
'Neath the old flag flying free,
Starry sign of victory.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 21, 1863.

A QUESTION OF ENDURANCE.

THE war has now reached a point at which the continued resistance of the rebels is a mere question of endurance. They are suffering privations as severe as were ever borne by a belligerent people. Their currency is depreciated in the ratio of 12 to 1, and while the soldiers and civil employés of Government are paid in this depreciated currency on the scale which was fair when that currency was at or near par, provisions, clothing, and all the necessaries of life have adjusted themselves to the depreciation, so that it takes a soldier's wages for a month to support his family for a day. Of manufactured articles—boots, shoes, dry goods, hardware of all kinds, agricultural implements, etc.—the stock has fallen so low that fabulous prices are asked and obtained by its fortunate possessors. The capture of Morris Island has nearly closed the port of Charleston, and within a month the blockade of Wilmington—the only port at which any considerable blockade running is now done—will also be sealed. When this happens, no more foreign goods will enter the Confederacy till the peace. On the other hand, the loss of the Mississippi Valley has cut off the chief supply of beef, as the advance of Burnside has curtailed the supply of cereals, and the occupation of Chattanooga has deprived the rebel foundries of the coal which was essential to their existence. Famine is so imminent at Richmond that the rebel journals confess their inability to feed the Union prisoners, and it is seriously proposed that our Government should send them beef and bread from Washington. The Governor of Georgia admits that the stock of provisions in that once opulent State is insufficient for the wants of the population; and General Bragg proposes a general seizure of all the lands in the Confederacy with a view to their being exclusively used to raise food for the army.

This picture is not exaggerated. Yet it is hardly possible to conceive a more complete aggregate of wretchedness. Without food, without clothes, without coal, without hope of succor from abroad, and with the ever-present Federal anaconda tightening its grip round them week by week and month by month, sometimes moving fast, sometimes slowly, but never losing an inch of ground once occupied, can it be possible to conceive a people in more cruel straits than the rebels? How long can they endure such a complication of miseries? To which side shall they look for relief?

Not to Europe, for there the rebel rams have just been seized, and public opinion seems to be once more turning against them. Not to General Lee, for his second attempt to invade the North and menace Washington has proved only less disastrous than his first, and he is now barely able to cover Richmond by making more fertile acres in Virginia a barren desert. Not to Bragg, for he, notwithstanding the victory of Chicamauga, has been unable to wrest the key of the Southwest—Chattanooga—from the grasp of Grant, and he knows full well that the next move in the game will be a resistless "unconditional surrender" movement on Atlanta. Not to cavalry raids and guerrillas, for they—though annoying to us—do no good to the rebels, and, on the whole, are probably more troublesome to Southern planters than to Northern armies. Not to the Peace Democrats of the North, for the fall elections have squelched them out pretty thoroughly. There is not a man, or a principle, or a point in the horizon to which these despairing rebels can look with the least hope of aid, comfort, or succor in their hour of misery.

They may burn a few trains, "gobble up" a few commissaries, surprise a few helpless detachments of Union troops—nay, even win a pitched battle or two here or there; but what then? In the truthful language of the Richmond Examiner, "Our [rebel] victories are somehow always fruitless and unproductive of results; they leave the great question of the war where they found it." How long will the rebels continue to struggle under such privations, against such odds, in so hopeless a cause?

The time has not come yet for an honest Northerner to express his opinion of the courage and fortitude which the rebels have displayed in this wretched contest. So long as the red hand of battle is uplifted they are our enemies, whom it is our duty to destroy—nothing more. When the time does come—as come it must—that failure and disappointment and privation and despair compel these poor people to abandon the struggle into which a blind and brutal oligarchy precipitated them, they may rely upon it that, in the words of that great and good man, Henry Ward Beecher, they will find the fatted calf ready for them throughout the North, and none more ready to relieve their wants than the very soldiers who are now crushing in the sides of the pasteboard Confederacy.

THE RUSSIAN BALL.

THE Ball is over, the music is hushed, the dances ended, the wine drunk, the costly laces and diamonds put back into their places. And now that the sounds of the revel are dying out it occurs to us that we have a headache, and we are saying wisely to each other that the ball was not, after all, so very sensible a thing; and that, when our brothers and our sons are dying on battle-fields, and thousands of brave Union soldiers, prisoners at Richmond, are being starved to death by the Southern chivalry, it is hardly decent for us here to be dancing, and making merry, and throwing away fortunes on diamonds. There is something in the idea. Should this number of Harper's Weekly fall into the hands of some poor wounded fellow at Chattanooga, or some half-starved Union prisoner at Richmond, the contrast between his own condition and that of the scented and perfumed dancers who figure in the ball picture may not improve his temper. "They are fiddling while I am dying," is the remark which would not unnaturally occur to him, and it would leave a bitter taste behind.

"What then?" says Shoddy. "Are we all to put on sackcloth and ashes for the war? Are Mrs. and the Misses Shoddy not to have an opportunity of displaying their beauty—to say nothing of the splendid dresses and the magnificent diamonds which I bought them with the proceeds of paper-money—simply because we are engaged in a war? The notion is monstrous! I pay for the war: taxes on my income, taxes on my clothing, taxes on my house, horses, carriages, silver, and every thing that I've got; I send my blood relations to the war to fight and die; I give money for bounties and money to the Sanitary Commission; I vote to support the Government. Having done all this, I submit that my duty is fulfilled, and that I may, if I choose, get up balls for Mrs. and the Misses Shoddy, and that they may enjoy them as becomes their age, their means, and their spirits. Dancing and balls are not bad things by any means. It is good that young people should enjoy themselves while they can. They will all find sorrow enough in life by-and-by. Besides, our Russian Ball had a political significance, and may render good aid to the Union cause."

Thus much Shoddy. And though his reasoning is likely to seem very shallow and very selfish to the brave suffering men on Belle Isle or in Castle Thunder, it must fairly be admitted that, in past time, balls and battles have often jostled each other, and the dying sounds of the dance have often mingled with the blast of the bugle. "There was a sound of revelry by night" within a few hours of the battle of Waterloo, and the dance was never more popular in Europe than during the Napoleonic wars. The Preacher gives the key to the apparent paradox when he says, "Let us eat, drink, and be merry; for to-morrow we die."

And now—good Shoddy, fair Mrs. Shoddy, and sweet daughters of the Shoddy house—that you have had your dance, and flirted with your Cossack, and flashed your diamonds in a thousand envious eyes; now that you have spent—so they say—over a million of dollars for one night's enjoyment, have you time and do you care to think of a suggestion by which your pleasure and our suffering heroes' needs may both be satisfied?"

There was a time, not many years ago, when a commercial crisis precipitated the poor of New York into great suffering. At that time large-minded men and women gave their thoughts to the subject, and while soup-kitchens were established by A. T. Stewart and others, fashionable ladies gave a series of calico balls, the rule of which was that every lady present donated the dress she wore to the poor. By this means thousands of poor girls and women, who would otherwise have gone half clad that bitter winter, were furnished with clothing. What say you now, ladies, to a the jewels worn to be given after the ball to the Sanitary Commission, which has our wounded soldiers in charge?

DIAMOND BALL,

If, as is stated, a million of dollars' worth of diamonds were worn at the Russian Ball, a million of dollars might be procured by such a Diamond Ball as we suggest—enough money to secure every comfort required by our wounded soldiers, and probably to save hundreds of lives which are now sacrificed for want of suitable attendance, clothing, and food. Could the jewels be put to a nobler use? Would not their radiance, in such a case, flash not only from wall to wall of the ball-room, but down through the vale of time to the most distant age, lighting the fame of New York women, and proving that they were worthy wives and daughters of the brave men who are dying for their country?

THE LOUNGER.

THE SANITARY FAIRS.

THE work of the Sanitary Commission is the great episode of the war. It is not a less remarkable popular rising and persistence than the armies and the fighting. When you think of the hands and brains and hearts all over the land that are working, thinking, and feeling all day long and every day for this great work, you feel only more profoundly than ever that any task whatever to which an intelligent people addressed itself, as the Free States have given themselves to this war, is sure of its triumph.

Behind the army in the field there is this supporting army twenty times larger. It is the vast reserve, constantly indicating its presence and cooperation. It is no reflection upon the sanitary zeal or method of the regular service, but it is a necessary supplement to the regular system. So sudden and tremendous a war, calling for armies to be improvised, called also for a sanitary care which should be as voluntary and extensive. And it has had it. The details of the operations of the Commission are amazing. Nor does the work cease or pause. Its organization is admirable. Its managers are zealous. Its hold upon the heart and purse of the country is firm. If any body has any thing to give for the relief or comfort of the soldiers, however small, it is received with thanks, and the facilities of the Commission cause it to be put exactly where it is most wanted.

The new event in its career is the fairs which are held all over the country. We hear of a most successful one in Portland, Maine, while that of the Northwest at Chicago is truly Northwestern in its scope, duration, and results. The whole country has contributed; and among its treasures is the paper which is only of secondary interest to the manuscript of the Declaration of Independence—the Emancipation Proclamation. The President's letter accompanying it to the Committee is one of the simple and earnest touches that have so deeply endeared him to the heart of the American people. It will be deposited in the archives of some Historical Society, richer by that sole possession than all the others in the country.

Meanwhile New England does not falter. For many months in all New England homes the busy preparation has been going on, and in December, we believe, the great Sanitary Fair will begin in Boston. Nobler work has not been done by any city than by Boston; and that no proof of its fidelity should be wanting, it has this year put its foot upon a false "democracy," and given its hand to that true Democrat, Governor Andrew. Boston fairs (for who dare speak of the Boston fair?) are famous. The Blind Fair and the Anti-Slavery fairs were the most successful ever known in the country. The fair of the Sanitary Commission will doubtless surpass them all.

TRUMPET-BLOWING.

IT is interesting to see that we can still blow our own trumpet, notwithstanding the war. One of the patriotic reporters of the Russian ball mentions the pleasing fact that, upon being told that all the decorations in the Academy had been put up since the close of the performance on the previous evening, the polite Admiral remarked that "only a people like the American could do that." It was very courteous in the Admiral, and there was really nothing else for him to say. But if we soberly suppose that we can make imposing fêtes in that way we ought to undeceive ourselves.

We take our pleasure sadly, as old Froissart described our ancestors. We are a grave people, not a gay; but it is the gay who make fêtes. Paris is transformed in a few hours, and restored again. On the Emperor's last fête day, the 15th August, the decorations of the city were superb, and every trace of them had vanished by noon of the next day. And the brilliant draperies hung from balcony and window in Rome, or in any Italian city, have a picturesque effect for which we are not yet bold enough. Then, too, there are the marvelous fire-works, the festal pyrotechny of Italy and France. Whoever has seen St. Peter's outlined in fire against the night sky will be grateful for our own displays; but he will hardly select them in comparison as heights upon which to crow the national Yankee-doodle-doo. It is not in that way that our genius most naturally or happily expresses itself. We spend plenty of money, and we employ all the taste we can. But a pretty and imposing festival of any kind results from the co-operation of a population, each individual of which has a taste for the picturesque.

We like to make money stand for every thing. But there are so many things that money will not buy. "All the ladies had diamonds on," says one enthusiastic reporter. But if a Roman woman, a Trasteveran, with her Junonine head and shoulders, and the glittering pins fastened in her coal-black hair, had entered the theatre, or a woman in Rachel's Thisbe costume, the broad, splendid effect would have been memorable. Picturesqueness, for instance, can not be bought easily.

We are a very great and good people undoubtedly, but there are some things we have not yet acquired. An ancient history, for example; or a great school of art—statues, pictures, cathedrals; and also a taste for the picturesque. We can fight, talk, make money, educate our children, go to church, spend money nobly and profusely, appreciate whatever is good, and hopeful, and true; but we can not make so pretty a fête as some other people who have not half the reasons for contentment and happiness that we have. Meanwhile we do the best we can, and neither Shakespeare nor Napoleon did more.

THE BALL.

THE strictly Lounging event of the week, of course, was the Russian ball at the Academy, which was as brilliant as the most ardent votary of the dance could desire. The theatre was resplendent, the toilets gorgeous, the crowd immense, the supper profuse, the music delightful; and the very crush, of which every body complained, gave every body a profounder sense of the great success in which they were sharing. It was a finer fête than that to the Japanese and to the Prince of Wales; but it had no profounder political significance than those glittering evenings. As to the crowd, it is always unavoidable upon such occasions. Choker, that remarkable young man, who has danced at every court and with all the princesses in the world, assures the Lounger upon his honor that he has been at balls at Willis's Rooms in London, "Almack's, you know—very cream of very cream—where you saw all the family jewels in England hung across the broad bosoms of ladies of historic name; and, 'pon my honor, you had to stand in one spot with your partner and merely jump up and down. Depend upon it, at a public ball where there is room to dance there is a sense of failure and desolation."

If any body wishes to appeal from that decision, he may. But the Lounger is content with it, and doubtless so also were the Russian officers. Whether in the fact that the menu, or, in the vulgar, bill of fare, was printed upon satin slips representing partly the American and partly the Russian flags, the officers detected a shadowy suggestion of an Americo-Russian alliance, who shall say? Yet he was doubtless the wiser man who read upon it only the fine French names for pies, cakes, and oysters. Cousin John over the water will, of course, have another explosion of sneers at the affection of the two great powers lying under the ban of civilization. But Cousin John has been hospitable to Russians in his time too. Why, here, in the very last English paper we chanced to be reading, of so late a date as October 25, are these very extraordinary words: "When Nicholas, Czar of all the Russias, was in London, a heart-and-soul tyrant, and the born enemy of all useful intellectual progress in the world, he was fondled by duchesses and countesses as the man among men. His victims were rotting in Siberian mines—the noble, the just, and the innocent; and he was waltzing in the honored palaces of the British aristocracy." Did ever a poor fellow with an unhappy disposition to throw stones live in such a brittle glass house as Cousin John Bull?

London was courteous to Nicholas, and New York is courteous to the Russian admiral. London may have had reason; New York certainly has. For Russia as a power has been positively friendly to us in our trouble. Has Cousin John, as a power, been so? Let him be reasonable. We have given the Japanese Princes, the Prince of Wales, and the Russian officers a pretty ball. Good-night, and joy be wi' ye a'! May we never be compelled to give either of them any other kind of ball than the Terpsichorean!

TO H. S., JERSEY CITY.

THE best investment for a working-man who has three or four thousand dollars for the purpose, and who must leave the country for a certain time, is in the United States five-twenties, the interest at 6 per cent., payable in gold, and the principal at the discretion of the Government. Deposit your money at the Sub-Treasury, where, in a few days, you will receive bonds and coupons. Deposit these with a Trust Company, and make the interest payable to any order you may choose.

HONESTY IN POLITICS.

AT a time when one of the most disagreeably notorious men in the country says that he must have a Judge in the city of New York, and has him, it is pleasant to find an instance of manly dignity and self-respect in a political candidate. Every honest voter will enjoy, as we do, the following letter written upon the eve of the late election by William Nicoll, candidate for State Senator in the First District. He was defeated, but the people of the district are not likely to forget him:

HUNTINGTON, LONG ISLAND, October 31, 1863.

DEAR SIR,—Yours of 27th inst. is just received. My answer can be of little service to you now, but yet I cheerfully give it.

If elected to the Senate, I shall go there entirely free to act for the best interests of the inhabitants of the district, and under no pledge or promise to any man, or association of men, to carry out or advocate any measures which shall appear to me, on full investigation, prejudicial to the public interests.

If your bill is right, and the best which can be, I should go for it. Unquestionably I should be in favor of giving to the people of Staten Island all the increased ferry facilities for which they ask; but I must know what they want before I can promise to aid them.

Certainly I shall make no promise, and imply no pledge, for the sake of securing the votes of any man who may be interested. Rather than that I much prefer my personal freedom of thought and action at home.

Very humbly and respectfully yours, etc.,

W. WOOD.

We advise every voter in Richmond, Queens, and Suffolk counties to cut out that letter and keep it, against the time when the district is looking for an able and faithful public servant.

FRENCH RAMS

THERE are six steam rams building in France for the rebels. It will be interesting to see if they become of them. But whether they sail or whether they are detained they will certainly render us no service. They will enable no one to say distinctly that we have been willing to admit, that Louis Napoleon's France is quite as hostile to us as the British governing class. There seems to be no reason to suppose that Louis Napoleon will do differently from his ally. If it is worth while for England to stop the rams, it will hardly seem to Napoleon, upon general grounds, desirable to let them go. But if he be resolved to remain in Mexico, the probability is that he will not detain them. Because to stay in Mexico securely he must do all that he can to keep this country distracted and divided. He will, of course, consider the risk of war and reprisals. But he has a trained army in Mexico—nearly of not less than fifty thousand men—a fleet cruising in the Gulf and on the coast, and the same army will be practically his ships. He will, therefore, have capital enough already here to begin the war upon. His army in Mexico will not be followed if he chooses to retire across the frontier, and it would be a weighty reinforcement to the rebels.

Would England allow him to account? That is a question which Louis Napoleon will gravely ponder before he resolves. But all his plans—the Mexican concept, the rams, and the open aid to the rebels—hang together. If his Mexican project be not determined, it betokens small wisdom all the rest, and a American policy. Our military situation, and the elections of the year, considered as a necessity for the Government and the war, can not but have great influence upon his decision, and it is not impossible that he may believe a reunited Union to be the surest and perfect right tax the resources of the nation for so long a time that he may, without fear of interference from us, establish and consolidate his power in Mexico. In that case he will detain the rams, awaiting any immediate occasion for war and relying upon the chances of the future.

TO A DYSPEPTIC PATRIOT

YOU say that you are for the Union of course but oh dear! the Union is gone. You declare that you are for the fighting it out; but oh dear! how comfortable it is to be four or five years off. You insist that all the money should be supplied to the Government; but oh dear! what reactions, and panics, and poverty are coming together. You will stand by the Government, of course, but oh dear! the age of statesmen has gone by.

How fortunate that Washington was not a dyspeptic, nor William of Orange, nor Lord Nelson. Fancy Nelson sailing in to the bay at Aboukir to engage the French fleet, and whining upon the quarter-deck, "I go for my country, of course, but oh dear! I wish I had had to begin by Jervis. I shall fight it out, but oh dear! how nice it was when was comfortably on shore. England expects every man to do his duty; but oh dear! my poor head legs and arms are going to be shot off. I stand by England, of course, but there's nobody fit to govern her! Oh dear! his have been sleepless nights! Would't De Brogs have trembled had he heard it? Would't the hearts of Ask and the wooden walls of England have felt themselves become like iron under such an impetus?

You are a dead dog upon the spirit with which alone this or any great war can be prosecuted. You give as much groaning as gold to the war, and while the gold furnishes arms to the soldiers the groan draws the charge. Why should any brave fellow fight for such a whining fellow-citizen as you? A nation of such whingeers and wan cynics would drive the earth off its axis.

When men go into battle, good friend, they do not march to the dead march in Saul, but to Yankee Doodle, or Mourir pour la patrie!

THE SOLDIER'S AID.

THAT the soldiers may know how many and how constant are the works of patriotic women in their behalf, the Lounger gather as extract from a letter lately received: "Can you find room in your columns for a notice of our little journal, its aims and objects? They are clearly expressed in the title—'The Soldier's Aid.' We feel that our armies are fighting for us, for our lives, our safety, and our freedom; and that we ask in the privilege of caring for and help those who suffer in our behalf, until the rebellion is crushed and the cause of order and freedom is victorious."

The little paper is issued by the Young Ladies' Aid Society of Rochester; and although the copy promised him has not reached the Lounger, he knows in advance, and gladly says, that its object and spirit are most timely and generous.

A NEW POLICY.

A RECENT Richmond Examiner contains a very important statement, which we wonder has not been made public by authority at Washington. "The Yankee Commissioner Mercdith," the Commissioner Robert Ould that Secretary Stanton had been opposed to any exchange of prisoners during the war, and that his policy had come to be the policy of his Government. Had it been earlier the practice of his Government it is pretty clear that the rebel army would be much weaker than it is, for there is no question that the paroled prisoners of each army are mustered into the rebel ranks. It is not surprising. It is but another proof of the curious dishonor of their conduct. It is not surprising, for an insurrection headed by Davis, Mason, Toombs, and the rest, who did not hesitate to receive the money of the government they were plotting to overthrow, must be tainted throughout with their dishonor. The only way to meet the conduct of the rebels in arming our paroled prisoners against us is to refuse to parole them. In the hard for those of our army who are captured, but such a course is the only hearty speak of the policy approve it most heartily.

COLOR-PRINTS

AMONG new and beautiful things we have seen nothing more delicate and interesting than the albums prepared by Goupil, Vibert & Co. These albums are of the usual card-photograph size, and represent birds, flowers, autumn leaves, mosses, butterflies, and moths, humming birds, little landscapes, and figures of children. A friend of the Lounger's, and an expert in all such dainty matters of printing, says that in this region, and he is master of the subject, "They are the best specimens of color-printing ever done in this country upon so small a scale." It may be believed it, and believe also that a man who has done so well will, as Mr. Frank says of himself, do better as fast as his machinery improves. The prints are neatly enveloped, and not dear, and the Lounger sincerely commends them as a most charming service for the album.

LITERARY.

"OUR Old Home" (Ticknor and Fields) is a collection of Mr. Hawthorne's writings drawn upon England. Their pure, sinewy, racy, idiomatic style is unsurpassed by the greatest masters of English literature. Their observation and subtle humor is delightful. Their sincerity is startling. The author unveils his mind with the confiding naïveté of Charles Lamb. But the tone of doubt and indifference, occasionally insinuated, as in the present volume, is a singular and unpleasant barium which convulses his country, is so painful, that the reader is in danger of believing invincible. We feel, as the author says, a dull, disheartening compassion who should prove to have no objection to infanticide. That the great English authors should read and study carefully our war is intelligible upon the assumption of their ignorance; but that one of the most gifted and fascinating of American writers should do so, is to care for, the very point of our contest is monstrous.

"The Social Condition and Education of the People in England," by Joseph Kay, M.A., of Trinity College, Cambridge, England (Harpers), is a book written by a most careful observer, himself an Englishman, at which John Bull may well stare aghast. We can not recommend it; but it is a work of permanent instruction, which should be pondered by every man who is deeply interested in the progress of civilization. It is a curious companion to "Our Old Home" of Hawthorne or Irving's "Sketch Book."

GONE.

"I'm only a short little poem,
Yet tender and threaded with woe;
And my heart knows the bond that hath summoned
These eastern days long ago.

Oh! hand lying cold on the bosom,
One clasp of forgiveness I crave:
To the kiss of the lips on the cheekless
Thy wrongs with the sod on thy grave.

But this, oh, how like an echo
It springs from the depths of years;
The wail of a young life crushed, burdened
By hopeless repinings and tears.

He died that his hopes. 'Twas at Charleston,
He fought well for the cause he loved well.
He was earnest and true to his country
As he had been to love. He fell.

His comrades—a few were beside him,
Companions in arms; they
Heard as he his last accents
With prayer breathed a name—it was mine!

They knew not his whole heart's sad story
Until, when they laid him to rest,
From his bosom they found they that fattened
My picture close over his breast.

The picture was old, worn and faded
By time, and by many a tear-drop that's hot;
But the love of the heart it had covered
Could change it, could never by years.

Oh! here in Life and in Death,
Fame may not thy glory record;
Thou hast won the true crown in the struggle,
And He shall give thee thy reward.

Oh, blest one! made perfect through suffering
And purified, thou canst behold,
Unclouded by passion, the Godhead,
The truths that here could not be told.

Oh, spirit so patient and loving!
Oh, heart beating still on the breast,
Oh, life worn with struggles and doubting!
All, all is now ended in rest.

ARMY AND NAVY ITEMS.

MAJOR-GEN. FOSTER and his staff arrived at this port on 5th, on board the French frigate Panama, bound for France. The Marshal the French Empire, the Duke of Pechin, and marched with his victorious army into Mexico.

Captain John Rodgers has been ordered to the command of the Wachusett, and Commander Clark to the Iosaiah.

The Secretary of the Sanitary Commission acknowledges the receipt of $6,000, in the proceeds of a concert given in Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Washington, for the benefit of the Sanitary Commission. Bravo, the celebrated actress.

It is reported that General Burnside's resignation has been accepted, and it is probable that General Foreya will succeed him in command of the Army of East Tennessee.

Lieutenant-Colonel LOOMIS, of the Sixth Illinois Cavalry, Germantown, Tennessee, was fatally shot by Major HERON, of the same regiment, on the 2d inst., in the course of an altercation at the supper-table. The immediate of the soldiers against HERON was so great that with difficulty they were prevented lynching him.

Captain JOHN M. WILSON, United States Corps of Engineers, a young officer distinguished for gallantry and skill in the Peninsular campaign, and brother-in-law of Major-General GRANT, is now in charge of the defenses of Vicksburg.

Captain RICHARD H. LEE, late of the Sixth New Jersey Volunteers, has been appointed Postmaster for Camden, in that State.

Lieut.-Colonel L. CARL, of the One Hundred and Fifty-ninth New York Volunteers, for some time past upon duty in the Provost-Marshal-General's Bureau at Washington, has been relieved from duty and ordered to join his regiment in the field. Major GEN. FRANK P. BLAIR, and has evinced signal executive ability in administering the affairs of a difficult and exacting post.

Major-General WOOL, U.S.A., is at present enjoying retirement at his home in Troy, upon the Troy. In consideration with a gentleman a few days since, who remarked that in his opinion Washington would be in the first rank in this particular Junction of the war," the General replied sternly, "Sir, I am a soldier of the old school vigor, "They don't want me. They think me too old."

Surgeon JAMES BIDDLE, of Philadelphia, now on a short leave, is ordered to Washington from a severe attack of bilious continent fever contracted during the memorable siege of Vicksburg. Dr. Biddle was on duty on Gen. GRANT'S staff from April to September, including the sickly season of the Lower Mississippi, and expects to be able to return to service in a short time in a Northern department.

Colonel JOHN MCNEIL, Second Regt. of Iowa, late of General GRANT'S army, has been appointed commercial agent of the Treasury Department at Memphis.

THOMAS FRANCIS MEAGHER has been reinstated in the United States military service, with permission to remain in its complement his old Irish Brigade.

Captain HERMAN, formerly Assistant Adjutant-General on the staff of Major-General DOUBLEDAY, has been appointed a member of the Board of Examination of which General LEE is President.

Colonel RICHARD H. RUSH, Assistant Provost Marshal, has been relieved from duty at the Invalid Corps Depot and Lieutenant-General CAHILL, his assistant, is left temporarily in charge.

Major FREDERICK TOWNSEND, Eighteenth United States Infantry, has been ordered to duty as Superintendent of Volunteer Recruiting Service at Albany, New York, and Major WILLIAM MAXWELL, Fifth United States, on the late Superintendent, has been ordered to join his regiment in the field.

The amount of work now progressing at the Brooklyn Navy-yard for the Government is very large. Ships are in the stream and on the stocks, preparing for sea as rapidly as possible. There are about 3,000 men on the pay-rolls of the different departments, and their monthly wages are not less than $150,000.

Lieutenant E. F. DAVENPORT has been ordered to duty at the Naval Academy.

Lieutenant BRET WILSON has been promoted to the rank of Lieutenant-Commander in the Navy.

Lieutenant PETER, recently appointed by his wife, Colonel GRIFFIN, and Captain HADGENTY and PEPPER, left Washington for Fortress Monroe on 10th to relieve General FOSTER.

Captain THOMAS and James WATSON, of the Eighth Connecticut Volunteers, were arrested on the 1st inst. on information near Portsmouth, Virginia.

Captain JOSEPH MCCLELLAND, Pennsylvania heavy artillery, was found dead in his bed last week, having retired the previous night in perfect health and spirits.

Lieutenant JOSEPH M. FEE, commanding the brevetor section of the Fifth United States Cavalry at Camp Pleasonton Newbern, North Carolina, was recently presented, at three parades, with a handsome sword and sash by his command.

Major-General B. M. PRENTISS, who, while a Brigadier-General, was taken prisoner by the rebels with his entire force at Shiloh, and who, after his return from captivity, formed one of the Fifth Army Corps, has received a well-earned promotion to a Major-Generalship soon after the rendering of the decision by which he was reinducted his resignation to the War Department, and it has been accepted.

Lieutenant-Colonel TOWNES, Provost Marshal of Alexandria, has been relieved of his command by an order from the War Department, and Captain GWYNN, Medical Inspector, General Sanitary Staff, has been appointed to the office.

General GRANGER, who was recently elected Governor of Mississippi is the name who was so seriously wounded and taken prisoner in the battle at Baton Rouge some months ago. He was formerly an Old Line Whig.

Lieutenant-Commander WORDEN'S resume has been detached from the Philadelphia Navy-yard as ordnance officer, and assigned to the command of the Canonicus.

Lieutenant-Commander PAUL SHIRLEY has been promoted to the grade of Commander.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC, after a long period of ease, is commencing to move forward again, and its advance has been heralded with victory. The division of General Prince held the south-bank of the river on the banks of the Pamunkanock—the former at Kelly's Ford and the latter at Rappahannock Station—Brandy Station, and drove them across the river, capturing eighteen hundred of the rebels, four guns, and many rebels with a number of guns. The loss of the enemy is killed and wounded is reported by Prince at one hundred, the loss of which is all—killed, wounded, and missing—is set down at from three hundred to four hundred. The Union loss is reported the Union loss is reported at from

Upon the lifting of the fog on the morning of the 8th, our forces were crossing the river and found little resistance in front. At four P.M. Sedgwick's advance had pursued the enemy to Culpeper Court-House, and Gregg's cavalry crossed the Rappahannock at Sulphur Springs to cover the right flank of the column above Brandy Station, and to operate on the Orange and Fitzgerald Railroad below Kelly's Ford to cover the left flank. Although there was a rain in the effect that General Kilpatrick occupied the city and heights of Fredericksburg on the 10th, in addition to hold them until the infantry could reach him.

MEADE' REPORTS

Of the Movements of the Army since the Potomac.

Saturday, Nov. 7—8:30 P.M.

Major-General Sedgwick advanced to the railroad crossing, where he drove the enemy to the river, assaulted and carried two redoubts with artillery, with his skirmishing a number of prisoners.

Major-General French advanced to Kelly's Ford, driving the enemy in small from across the river, and captured several hundred prisoners at the Ford.

GEORGE G. MEADE,
Major-General Commanding.

SECOND DISPATCH.

HEAD-QUARTERS ARMY OF THE POTOMAC
Saturday, Nov. 7—11 P.M.

General Sedgwick reports capturing this p.m. in his operations, four colonels, three lieutenant-colonels, many other officers, and over 600 men, together with four instruments.

General French captured over 400 prisoners, officers and men.

GEORGE G. MEADE,
Major-General Commanding.

LEE ON THE DEFENSIVE.

General Lee, it seems, declines to take up the gauge of battle which General Meade has suggested to him upon his acceptance. The Army of Virginia, excepting its rear-guard, have again ensconced themselves within their strong fortifications on the south bank of the Rapidan, or are making swift time toward Richmond. The Army of the Potomac, therefore, must bear with what grace it may the disappointment of its desire to bring about a decisive engagement.

CHARLESTON.

The firing Sumter is being continued both from Fort Gregg and Wagner and the Monitors. The bombardment is described by the Richmond Examiner as furious and incessant. The fire of the monitors on Sunday was of unusual fierceness, and replaced: but the old flag was so cut to pieces that the halyards of the Twelfth Georgia regiment was raised instead. On this ult. at four o'clock A.M., a portion of the new sea-wall fell in, burying a large division of the garrison. Over one thousand two hundred men were at work on it. Of these, fifty were freed at the time of the report.

AFFAIRS IN THE SOUTHWEST.

The rebel papers report that our advance has reached Rutherford's Mill, and our forces are consulting terrible depredations near Huntsville. The telegram maintains the same gallant, impictorial advantages, and that, unless the movements of our troops, which are now in progress, are interfered by the Union army at Chattanooga will be placed beyond doubt.

IS BRAGG FALLING BACK?

A dispatch from Chattanooga, of 10th instant, says that refugees from the rebel army report General Bragg to be evacuating his position in front of Chattanooga, and falling back to Rome or Atlanta. General Longstreet was said to be preparing a force for a raid on our line of communication at Bridgport.

THE WAR IN EAST TENNESSEE.

A dispatch from Knoxville, dated the 6th instant, says that East Tennessee is once more clear of rebels, with the exception of guerrillas, who hover around our wagon trains and infest our mail routes above. The fight at Rose's gorge resulted in the rout of the rebels. The loss was trifling, killed and fifty-two wounded. Colonel Garrard pursued the rebels beyond Kingsport.

BURNSIDE CHECKED.

The Siege of this city now:

"The New York Herald Grant has telegraphed hither that two of the most advanced positions of General Burnside have been captured by the rebels. Besides this, the rebels prisoners of half of two regiments that were holding them at the front.

THE WAR IN ARKANSAS.

Late advices from Arkansas state that General Steele now occupies the Arkansas, the reverse of the rebels, the rebel General Price, and over seven hundred Arkansans have come in and taken the oath of allegiance to Governor Johnson.

GENERAL BLENT IN DANGER.

Dispatches from Leavenworth, Kansas, say that the rebels under General Shelby, having escaped from our troops, crossed the Arkansas River at the mouth of nine thousand men, and were then marching on General Blunt, who had only a force of two thousand men, and could not, they say, withstand the attack as he is a heavy supply train behind for Fort Smith. General Blunt had received the number of his train, and was putting his force in a position to resist the enemy.

UNION MEETING AT LITTLE ROCK.

At the Union meeting held at Little Rock, Arkansas, on the 30th ultimo, resolutions were passed expressive of cordial support to the Union and the Administration, pledging the utmost support to uphold the supremacy of the Government, the full number of spirited and loyal addresses were made, and a committee was appointed to draft a constitution and report for the Central Union Club.

SKIRMISH IN WEST VIRGINIA.

CLARKSBURG, Nov. 8, 1863.

To Governor Boreman:

General Averill attacked Jackson's forces at Mill Point, Pocahontas County, on the 6th inst., driving the rebels from his position with trifling loss. Jackson fell back to the summit of Droop Mountain, where he was reinforced by General Echols with Patton's brigade and one regiment from Jenkins' command. The position in Mountain a strong one, and was strengthened by breast-works commanding the road. General Averill turned the enemy's left with his infantry, and attacked him in front with cavalry dismounted.

The victory was decisive, and the enemy's retreat became a rout. Our forces followed them with their arms and scattering in every direction.

The casualties fell chiefly, capturing many prisoners and a large quantity of arms, ammunition, etc.

We have captured Jackson's train, with his private wagons. Our loss in killed and wounded is about one hundred.

B. F. KELLEY, Major-General.

A NEW CAMPAIGN ON THE GULF.

An active campaign is now in progress in the Department of the Gulf. The naval expedition under General Banks was at Southwest Pass on the 30th ult., with the Commanding General on board the flagship Hartford. The fleet consists of sixteen steamships, and a large number of schooners and brigs as tenders. The list of war—the Monongahela, Oneaco, and Virginia—accompany the steamers.

OUR PRISONERS AT RICHMOND.

Mr. Robson, who was captured in the vicinity of Occoquan last October, and taken prisoner to Richmond, and in Alexandria, has, among other things, stated that Castle Thunder is the only room in Richmond where prisoners are allowed to purchase any thing. Shortly after the battle of Fredericksburg, the rebel authorities in Richmond issued an order forbidding the sale of provisions to Union soldiers, all to a famishing and starving condition. They were ten days on the road between the two places, and all they had to eat during that time was four hard crackers and a piece of bacon. On the cars they were taken to the Libby prison, where they lay two days longer without having their rations issued, and therefore from the time they had not a mouthful to eat. Some of them, who were fortunate enough to have a little money, paid as high as five dollars for a loaf of bread, but the officer in charge would not let it be carried them.

FOREIGN NEWS.

FRANCE.

THE REBEL RAMS STOPPED.

A DISPATCH from Washington, authorized by the Secretary of State, announces that the iron-clad vessels now building at Nantes and Bordeaux, for the service of the rebels, have been promptly arrested by the French Government, at the instance of Minister DAYTON.

THE MEXICAN DELEGATION.

The Paris Moniteur reports the reception of the Mexican deputation by Napoleon. The Emperor did not allude to Maximilian in any manner. It was thought the French Legislature would refuse to guarantee Maximilian's loan.

CHINA.

THE AMERICAN LEGION.

The accession of General FORREST brought his American legion, to the cause of the Chinese rebel leader, is treated by the British papers as an event fraught with serious consequences to the cause of the Emperor and the future government of the empire.

JAPAN.

THE KNOW-NOTHING MOVEMENT.

Accounts from Hakodadi, Japan, up to the 15th ult., state that the Ghief Minister of State, and three other Cabinet officers, had been murdered because of their advocacy of peace with Christian nations. All foreigners were ordered to leave Nagasaki, and refused to do so, whereupon the "Japanese government resigned."

TRAPPING REBEL GUERRILLAS IN THE WEST.

THE WAR IN EAST TENNESSEE—DRAWING ARTILLERY THROUGH THE MOUNTAINS—[See Page 742.]

THE WAR IN EAST TENNESSEE.

WE illustrate on page 741 a common incident of the war in East Tennessee—HAULING CANNON UP A MOUNTAIN ROAD IN BAD WEATHER. The Herald correspondent, writing from London, Tennessee, on 26th ult., thus describes the scene:

On Thursday last the reinforcements and down here from this reserve which are always in readiness at Knoxville to go mute up or down the line of railroad got orders to be prepared to take the march at any moment. The first orders came at night, and the immediate column of infantry, cavalry, artillery, wagons, and ambulances would have been seen wending their way by the light of the blue brilliant moon from their camp in the woods, esplanade, and groves to take position along the Loudon road. A great portion of the infantry was luckily spared what afterward proved to be a severe march, and was transported by rail to within a short distance of the scene of future operations. By ten o'clock it is the column got in motion, and while the cloth beneath our feet was still in our ears, the rain began to fall, and the mud which had been the road was gradually gilded into a thick, tenacious paste of mud and swamp, and the wagons mired and stuck fast to the great discomfort of mule flesh. The mules showed no impressive reserve by the pale light of the moon. Interjections so herculean, strong, sinewy, that the road rang and mingled here and there with the rumbling cannon and caissons, and the long line of baggage trains, whose white covers stood out like a ghostly ghost against the dark night, with all these—with impaired an air of mystery and awe to the whole scene, which seemed to pervade every one, and was broken only when some regiment was called halted with the indications of a halt. Silence. So silently, indeed, was the march effected that but few of the isolated along the road were aware that an army had passed.

Toward the gray dawn of morning that portion of the cavalcade which was not imperatively ordered to proceed directly through to Loudon halted by the wayside at the inviting house stood near to welcome us within its portals; in tent was pitched beneath whose canopy to shelter the wearied limbs; so performance we had need of making use of the best means at hand. Accordingly I have the tent in which embraced Lieutenant Keyes, of the Second Division Staff, and the writer, with all its economy, might shelter. We made a farm shed, and there, disposing ourselves upon the straw and rubbish which littered the floor, we slept the sleep raw and chilly—we were soon buried in "balmy sleep, tired Nature's" etc.

Morning came, and with it one of the most disagreeable days it his been my misfortune to experience. A heavy rain commenced at daylight, and fell in unceasing torrents until mid at night. The roads, as fluid as they could be before, became now almost impassable. Wagons sank to their bows in the liquid mud, mules fell down, and their fences and gave up the ghost; while drivers, teamsters, and artillerists became so covered with mud and mortar that it was difficult to distinguish them from the surrounding soil. However, by this time the inspiriting energy which characterizes the Yankee soldier, all obstacles were overcome, and by night the head of the column had reached its camping-ground with the main body of the Potomac.

At latest dates the rebels were concentrating their forces against Burnside, and his outposts have already been attacked. Col. Byrd, it is however, as the soldiers call him, has thus far shown himself capable of taking care of himself, and Meade will not give Lee too easy a task to do at home, so that we can rely upon it that no more troops can be spared from the rebel Army of the Potomac.

VERY HARD CASH.

By CHARLES READE, Esq.

AUTHOR OF "IT IS NEVER TOO LATE TO MEND," ETC.

CHAPTER XLVI.

IF we could always know at the time what we are doing!

Two ladies carried a paper to Whitehall out of charity to a stranger.

Therefore the whole sex was benefactress to a man she never spoke of but as "the wretch;" the younger held her truant bridegroom's heart, I may say, in her hand all the time, and was his protectress. Neither recognized the handwriting: for no man can write his own hand with a tooth-pick.

They reached Whitehall, and were conducted up stairs to a handsome room of spacious size and powerful brow, seated in a wilderness of letters. He waved his hand, and a clerk set them chairs: he soon after sat down to his pen, and went gravely forward to hear their business. They saw they must waste no time: Julia looked at her mother, and she took Alfred's petition off his desk, and handed it him with one of her eloquent looks, grave and pitiful. He seemed struck by her beauty and her manner.

"It was pinned on my parasol, Sir, by a poor prisoner of the Queen's Bench House," said Julia.

"Oh, indeed," said the gentleman, and began to read the superscription with a cold and wary look. But a beautiful visible to be read, he opened the missive, and ran his eye over it. The perusal moved him not a little: a generous flush mounted to his face: he rang the bell sharply. A clerk answered it; the gentleman wrote on a slip of paper, and said, curtly, "Bring me every letter that is signed with the name of Alfred all our correspondence about him."

He then turned to Mrs. Dodd, and put her a few questions, which drew out the main facts I have just related. The papers were now brought in. "Excuse me, madam," said he, and bent over them. "I believe the man is sane," said he, "and that you will have enabled us to baffle a conspiracy, a heartless conspiracy."

"We do hope he will be set free, Sir," said Mrs. Dodd, piteously.

"He shall, madam, if it is as I suspect. I will stay here all night but I will master this case, and lay it before the Board myself without delay."

Julia looked at her mother, and then asked if it would be wrong to inquire "the poor gentleman's name."

"Humph!" said the official; "I ought not to reveal that without his consent. But stay! he will owe you much, and it really seems a pity he should not have an opportunity of expressing his gratitude. Perhaps you will favor me with your address; and trust to my di cretion: of course, if he does not turn out as sane as he seems, I shall never let him know it."

Mrs. Dodd then gave her address; and she and Julia went home with a glow about the heart selfish people, thank Heaven, never know.

Unconsciously these two had dealt their enemy and Alfred's a heavy blow; had set the train to a mine. Their friend at the office was a man of another stamp. His absent Hall had fallen in with.

Meantime Alfred was subjected to homely mortifications and irritations. He guessed the motive, and tried to baffle it by calm self-possession. But this was a great ordeal to which he was before, because his temper was now exacerbated and his fibre irritated by broken sleep (of this Bedlam had a great contempt), by a hard pillow, flannel and poisoned by that cruel, that corroding passion, jealousy.

To crown that, while he was in prison a rival was ever at his Julia's ear, making more and more progress in her heart. This rival was now in the Queen's Bench one day and night; and perhaps all the maddeners human cunning could have invented were put in force by him. He had temples beat and his blood run boiling poison. Indeed, there were times when he was so distempered by passion that he could almost put in act of justice, and suicide a legitimate relief. For who could go on forever carrying Hell in his bosom, and not be a fiend in form? He began to go alone: to turn impatiently from the petty troubles and fathomless egotism of those companions who had been his friends, and his sure heart to pity. Pale, thin, and wobegone, he would creep about the Queen's Bench prison like Hall of Ebliis, whose hearts were a devouring fire. Even an inspector with a naked eye would see the change in Alfred. Another eye, that cold from a lunatic of the unhappiest class, the metaphysician:

"Ice hain a fur like a woman seeond."

Rooke had a hint to provoke Alfred to violence such as would put him in the power of the popular a patient to bodily restraint, composing draughts, and other quick maddeners. Rooke entered into the game with the two motives; he was devoted to Mrs. Dodd, and he hated Alfred, who had openly defied him and publicly insulted him about Julia Beverley.

One Saturday Alfred was ordered out to walk with Rooke in the prison yard. He made no objection; suspected, felt homicidal, suppressed the impulse, and by this self-command he got near to give that letter to Beverley with instructions.

But, all the walk, he was saying to himself that Julia was in the house, and he was kept away from her, and a rival with her; this made him sicken and rage by turns. He came back in a state verging on frenzy.

On entering the yard poor Beverley, who had done his bit of cunning, and by reasons now reposed more simplicity, came running, and said, "I've done it; she has got it."

"What have you done? Who has got what?"

"Don't tell, Frank."

"If you don't I'll shake your life out, you savage blackguard!" and he did shake him, and throttling him till he was black in the face.

Alfred's long-pent fury broke out: he brushed his teeth and shook his fists in Rooke's face.

Rooke bellowed with pain and anger, and, rushing at him incautiously, received a stinger that staggered him, and a second that laid him right eye. He took the hint, and put himself in a posture that showed he was not to be taken at a half-defense. He stopped two blows neatly, and returned a heavy one upon the ribs. Alfred staggered back and recovered himself: Rooke had, as Rooke pushed in too hastily to improve his advantage, caught him heavily on the other eye, but lost his own guard. Alfred, with his enfeebled Rooke to close; then came a sharp, short rally of re-arching blows, and Rooke, not to be outdone in that style of work, let out a terrific bout ensued, in which, Alfred being somewhat weakened by much exercise and rest, Rooke's great weight and strength enabled him after a severe struggle to fall with his antagonist under him, and knock his head about on the hard pavement. Then Hayes, who had stood prependently aloof, came in and helped handcuff him; they could not work up and down for the fiend Robin, who stood by with a professional air to see fair play.

"Ah, could iron is your best chance," he said, satirically. "Never you mind, Sir; you hit quick and well: I'll have at long odds in my bag: both his pepyers are in mourning." He added, "A cow can beat a man kneeling."

When Alfred was handcuffed they turned him loose. It soon transpired, however, that he was not a dangerous madman (Formula), and to be confined in the noisy ward.

On hearing this he saw the trap he had fallen into, and trembled; he asked himself what on earth he should do; and presently the saying came back to him, "Do the best you can under stroke of art to turn evil into good." He argued thus: Wolf's love of money is my great evil: he will destroy that money, do any thing for money. Then suppose I offer him money to be honest. He begged an interview with Dr. Wolf on business. This was accorded at once. He asked the doctor plump whether he received a large sum to detain him under pretense of insanity.

"Not v-r, considering the trouble you sometimes give, Mr. Alfred," said the doctor, dryly.

"Well, then, justice shall outbid rascality for once. I am a sane man, and you know it; a man of my word, and you know it. I'll give you a thousand pounds to let me out of this place."

Dr. Wolf's eyes sparkled.

"You shall have any bond or security you l ve; and the money within a week of my de l rance."

Dr. Wolf said he should be delighted to do it, if e could conscientiously.

At this piece of hypocrisy Alfred's cheek reddened, and he could not speak.

"Well, well, I do see a great change in you for the better," said Dr. Wolf. "If, as I suspect, you are a sane man, I will part with you without a thousand pounds or a thousand pence."

Alfred could not but hesitate in his reply.

"I'll tell you what, though," said the smooth doctor. "I have got two pictures, one by Raphael, one by Rembrandt."

"I know them," said the quick-witted Alfred; "they are worth more than a thousand pounds."

"Of course they are, but I would take a thousand pounds from you."

"Throw me in my liberty, and I'll make it guineas."

"We will see about that." And with this understanding the men of business parted. Dr. Wolf called Mr. Archbold then and there.

"Impossible," said she; "the law would dishonor such a bargain, and you would be exposed and ruined."

"But a thousand pounds!" said the poor doctor.

"Oh, he offered me more than that," said Mrs. Archbold.

"You don't mean to say so; when was that?"

"Do you remember one Sunday that I walked him out to keep clear of Mrs. Dodd? Have you not observed that he has not repeated the experiment?"

"Yes. But I really don't know why."

"Will you promise me faithfully not to take any notice if I tell you?"

The doctor promised.

Then she owned to him with manifest reluctance that Alfred had taken advantage of her kindness, had made love to her, had asked her for him, and made passionate love to her. "He offered me not a thousand pounds," said she, "but his whole fortune and his heart, if I would fly with him from these odious walls; that was his expression."

Dr. Wolf swung out of a corner of her eye that the doctor was turning almost green with jealousy: his artist proceeded to describe the scene across between her and Alfred, with feigned hesitation, yet minute detail; only she inverted the parts: Alfred in her narrative made the love to her; she listened abashed, confused, and tried all she could think of to bring him to better sentiments. She concluded this picture of history inverted with a sigh, and said, "So now he hates me, I believe, poor fellow."

"Do you regret your refusal?" asked Dr. Wolf, uneasily.

"Oh no, my dear friend. Of course my sentiment was that the woman at my age and in my position would have refused. But we poor women are tender slaves to our judgments." And the tender look done at the doctor's feet.

In short, she worked on him so, that he left Alfred at large unsuspected, and was no sooner gone to his other asylum six miles off than the calumniated was conducted by Hayes and Rooke through passages, doors, passages, and door after door, to a wing of the building connected with the main part only by a covered way. As they neared it, strange sounds became audible. Faint at first, they got louder and louder. Singing, roaring, howling like wolves. Alfred's flesh began to creep. He looked at the covered way: he would have fought to his last gasp sooner than go into it; but he was in their hands. He appealed to the keepers: but he had used them both too roughly; they snarled and forces him through the door and into the covered way. At the main part only by a covered way. As they neared it, strange sounds became audible. Faint at first, they got louder and louder. Singing, roaring, howling like wolves. Alfred's flesh began to creep. He looked at the covered way: he would have fought to his last gasp sooner than go into it; but he was in their hands. He appealed to the keepers: but he had used them both too roughly; they snarled and forces him through the door and into the covered way. At the end of this was a door with a grated wicket in it, with a fifty truckle-bed in it, and all the vessels of gotts-perche. Here he was surrounded by the desperate wretches he had left in the yard, scarcely knew but by report. Throughout that awful night he could never close his eyes for those gibbering fiends that assailed him. Singing, swearing, howling like wild beasts! His right hand, always reasonable and kind, he and works, ending each pious argument with a sudden rhapsody of oaths, and never slept a wink. Rooke and his neighbor alternately prayed and shouted, "Cain was a murderer, Cain was a murderer;" and howled like a wolf, making the night hideous. The opposite neighbor had an audience, and every now and then delivered, in a high strain key, "Let us curse and pray;" and then he would begin: "Brethren, let us work double tides." And then he would deliver a fiery fervent prayer, and forget it up immediately with a volley of blasphemy as terrific that coming in such a contrast they made Alfred's blood run cold. Sometimes he hear a poor creature so defy his Creator. No rest, no peace. When it was still the place was like the grave; and about noon, foul, shady, somebodious, burst a thunder-clap of curses, and set those poor demented creatures all yelling again like fiends. Then he would beat the iron ring. And a clock-like intervals a harmless but dirty idiot, who was allowed to range the ward, came and chanted through the keyhole, "Every thing is nothing, and nothing is every thing."

This was the only observation he had made for many years.

His ears assailed with horrors, of which you have literally no conception, or shadow of a conception, his nose poisoned with ammoniacal vapors, and the peculiar wild-beast smell that marks the true maniac, Alfred ran wildly about his cell trying to stop his ears and trembling for his own reason. When the fearful night-effect gave way, and morning broke, and he stood on his truckle-bed and see God's hoar-frost on a square yard of grass level with his prison bars, it refreshed his very soul, and affected him almost to tears. He was then, to his surprise, taken out, and allowed to have a warm bath and his breakfast with David and the rest: but suspect it was done to watch the effect of t l trial he had been submitted to. After breakfast he was taken to a place to go, be up on a bench and there exhausted nature overpowered him and he fell fast asleep.

Mrs. Archbold came by on purpose, and saw him. He looked very pale and peaceful. Ther. was a cut on his forehead due to Rooke's knuckles. Mrs. Archbold was struck with the young figure and haughty face seemed so unresisting and peaceful as he slept, indeed. That did not, however, prevent her setting her female spies to watch him more closely than ever.

He awoke and but refreshed, and found little Beverley standing by him with wet eyes. Alfred smiled and held out his hand like a captive monarch to his humble friend. "Jack, you'll be with you in the noisy ward again," sobbed Frank. "This is your last night here."

"Hey, Frank, you make my boots!" roared Rooke from an open window.

"Coming, Sir—coming!"

Alfred's next visitor was the Robin. He came, whispering, "It is all right with Garrett, Sir, and he has got a key of the door, but I'm not sure must get back to your old room, or we can't work."

"Would to Heaven I could, Robin; another night or two in the noisy ward will drive me mad, I think."

"Well, Sir, I'll tell you what you do: which we all have to do it at odd times: hold a candle to the devil: here she comes: I think she is very where she is, Sir," said the Robin. This then sauntered away, affecting nonchalance: and Alfred presently saw Mrs. Archbold and was affected. "Mrs. Archbold," said he, timidly, rising from his seat at her approach.

"Sir," said she, haughtily, and affecting surprise.

"I have a favor to ask you, madam. Would you be so kind as to let me go back to my room?"

"What, you have found I am not so powerless as you thought?"

"I find myself so weak, and you so powerful, that—you can afford to be generous."

"I have no more power over you than you have over me."

"I wish it was so."

"I'll prove it," said she. "Who has got the key of your room? Hayes?" She whistled, and said Hayes, and gave him a curt and imperious order before Alfred. Alfred thanked her mysteriously.

She smiled, and went away disposed to change her tactics, and, having shown him how she could torment, try soothing means, and open his heart by gratitude.

But presently looking out of her window she saw the Robin and him together; and somehow they seemed to be in close confidence, as to be plotting. The very suspicion was fatal to that effect. His discharge was a foregone thing. Meantime she set her spies to watch him, and tell her if they saw or heard any thing.

This could be done that very night: he was to get Thompson to go to bed early; and, instead of taking off his clothes, was to sit in readiness. "We have been plying Hayes already," said the Robin, "and, as soon as she is off, we shall begin upon Thompson the key: you and I will have it all larking in the drawing-room, off you go to Merrimashes."

"Thank you dear Robin! You have taken my breath away. But how about Vulcan?"

"Oh, we know how to make him amiable: a dog-fancier, a friend of mine, has provided the confectionery, and he has got a bottle of the confectionery, and he has got a bottle of the cordiable where dogs is concerned, which it is where: whereby Garrett draws the varmint into the scullery, and shuts him in, while I get the key from the table. It's All right."

"Ah, Robin," said Alfred, "it sounds too good to be true. What? this my last day here?"

"Yes, unless you prefer to creep very slowly till eight o'clock came. Then he easily persuaded David to go to bed; Hayes went up and undressed the dog and then: Hayes went up and undressed the dog and then: Hayes went up and locked. Hayes was drunk, but full of discipline. Alfred then put on the patient's clothes and her clothes; so Alfred made up a bundle for his portmanteau, and threw it out. Hayes eyed it suspiciously, but was afraid to interfere and inspect it closer; for his drunken instinct told him he would pitch on his head that moment: so he retired grumbling and dandling his dog.

At the end of the corridor he met Mrs. Archbold full dressed, and with a candle in her hand. She stopped him and asked what he expected him; and a little conversation followed that sobered Mr. Hayes for a minute or two.

Mrs. Archbold was no sooner gone to her little tea-party than all the first-class ladies and gentlemen were put to bed by the good sheep for the good of their health, and the keepers and keepresses took their place and romped, and made such a row sleep was not easy within hearing of them. They sat on the piano, they sang songs to a drum accompaniment played on the table, they danced, drank, flirted, and enjoyed themselves like school-boys. Hayes alone was glum: he sat in a corner and drank, and Garrett consoled him, drank with him, and soothed him with the balm of insensibility: in which condition they removed him under charitable pretences, and searched his pockets in the passage for the key of Alfred's room.

To their infinite surprise and disappointment it was not upon him.

The fact is, Mrs. Archbold had snatched it from him in her wrath, and put it in her own pocket. How far her suspicions went, how much her spies had discovered, I really don't know; but somehow or other not one word was in her mind, and, seeing Hayes in such a state, she would not trust him during her absence, but took the key away with her.

The Robin and Garrett knew nothing of this, and were all abroad; but they thought Rooke must have the key; so they proceeded to drink with him, and were just about to administer a really irritating soporific in his grog when they and all the merry party were suddenly startled by violent ringing at the bell, and thundering and kicking at the hall-door. The key jumped to their feet and balanced themselves, and looked half wild, half stupid. The women sat, and began to scream: for they had heard a story that has terrors for us all; peculiar terrors for them.

This alarm was due to a personage hitherto underrated in the establishment.

Mr. Francis Beverley had been TOOTSIED. So now, finding all the patients locked up, and their attendants romping in the drawing-room, he lighted seven fires, skilfully on the whole, for practice makes perfect; but, unaccustomed, he omitted one essential ingredient in a fire, and that was the grate.

To be plain, Mr. Francis made seven bonfires of bed-curtains, chairs, and other combustibles in the servants' garrets, lighted them contemporaneously, and retired to the basement, where he had taken the utmost means to deliver his friend out of Archbold House; and with a modesty, not of candor that characterizes the weak, proceeded to black his other bad masters' shoes with singular assiduity.

There was no wind to blow the flame; but it was a clear frost; and soon fiery tongues shot out of those seven-windows into the night, and lurid gleams burnished four more, and the old house was burning merrily overhead, and ringing with bells from the first floor.

But the neighbors saw, pointed, wondered, comprehended, shouted, rang, knocked, and surged round the iron gate. "Fire! fire! fire!" and "Fire!" went down the road, and men on horseback galloped for engines; and the terror-stricken porter opened and the people rushed in and hammered at the hall doors, and, when Rooke was drunk and opened, "Fire!" was the word that met him from a score of eager throats and glittering eyes.

"Fire! fire! Fire?" he cried.

"Where! Why, you are on fire. Blazing!"

He ran out and looked up at the tongues of flame and wisps of smoke. "Mother!" he roared. "Call the police. Fire! fire!" And he came back, and called to the man on sow. He ascended hastily to the third floor. Now the third floor of that wing was occupied principally by servants. In fact, the only patient was that one were Dodd and Alfred. Rooke called to the men below to send Hayes up to No. 75 with his key directly: he then ran down to the next floor, of which he had keys; and opened all the doors, and called to the inmates with a gleeful attempt at cheerfulness, belied by his shaking voice, "Get up, gentlemen; there is a ball and supper going on below." He was unable to utter the word "fire" to them. The other keepers were as rapid, each on his beat, and soon the more intrepid patients took the alarm and were persuaded or driven out half dressed into the yard, where they covered together in extremity of fear; but the fire began to rage, and shed like a lion and lighted up the whole interior red and bright. All was screaming and confusion; and then came a struggle to get the inmates out from the basement story. There was no time to handcuff them. The keepers resorted to the terror of the scene to cow them, and so opened the doors and got them out anyhow. Wild, weird faces, with glaring eyes and matted hair, leaped out and ran into the hall, and laughed, and danced, and cursed in the lurid reflection of the fire above. Hell seemed to disgorge its demons. Men recoiled from them. And would they did! They knew the asylum exploded, and the pieces fell tinkling on the marble hall fast as hail. The crowd recoiled and ran; but those awful phantasmal figures that had been so packed up the burning glass and ground it in his hands that bled directly: but he felt neither burn nor cut. The keepers rushed up to with draw them from so dangerous a place: all but one object still sudden lameness: that one struggled and yelled like a demon. The building of which fearful contest came a sudden thundering at a door in the third floor.

"Christ! What is that?" cried Rooke.

"It is Mr. Hardie," screamed the Robin. "You have him locked in."

"I told Hayes to let him out long ago."

"But Hayes hasn't got the key. You've got it."

"No, no. I tell you Hayes has got it."

"No, no! Murder! murder! Help!" one dead men. Run for Mrs. Archbold, somebody. Run! Here, hammers, hammers! for God's sake come and help me break the door. Oh, Rooke, Rooke!"

"As I'm a man Hayes has got the key," cried Rooke, stamping on the ground, and white with terror.

By this time Garrett had got a hammer, and he and Wales rushed wildly up the stairs to batter in the strong door if they could. They got to the third floor, but with difficulty, the smoke began to blind them and choke them, and fiery showers fell on them, and drove them back, smarting and choking. Garrett sank down gasping at the stair-foot. Wales ran into the yard uttering pitiful cries, and pointing wildly upward; but before he got there a hand had broken through the glass of a window up in the third floor, the pane white hand of a perishing prisoner, and clutched at the frame-work and tore at it.

At this hand a thousand white faces were now upturned amidst groans and wails. Some such as only multitudes can utter. Suddenly those anxious faces and gibbering eyes were turned like one, for an attempt, wild and unintelligible, but still an attempt, was about to be made to save that hand and its owner out of the very jaws of death.

Now among the spectators was one whose life and future were at stake on that attempt.

Mrs. Dodd was nursing a homesweet on this very neighborhood when the fire broke out. Her son Edward was coming at nine o'clock to tea, and, better still, to sleep. He was leaving the fire brigade. It had disappointed him; he found the fire-escape men saved the lives, the firemen only the property. He had gone into the business earnestly too; he had invented a thing like a treble pouch book, which could be fastened in a moment to the belt of a fireman, and thrown into the window, and would cling to the bare wall, if there was nothing better, and enable him to go up and help himself. But he had never got a chance to try it: and, per contra, he was on the engine when they were called up over a woman and baby in arm and collarbone in the Blackfriars road: and also when they were saving over a child in a cradle, and crippled him. All this seemed out of character, and shocked Edward: and then his mother could not get over it.

In a quarter of an hour he was to take off the obnoxious jacket forever, and was now lounging in the smoking-room, and quite glad of a run galloped up crying "Fire!"

"All right!" said Edward, giving a shout of "Where?"

"Lunatic Asylum. Drayton House."

Guess how long before the engine went to, and the engine tearing at a gallop down the road, and the firemen shouting "Fire! fire!" to clear the way, and Edward on the box with them.

When the report of fire swept townward past Mrs. Dodd, she turned: and saw the glow.

"Oh dear, oh dear," said she, "that must be somewhere near Drayton House." And full of the tender fears that fill such bosoms as hers for those they love, she left the tea-table: but she had ascertained that it was not Drayton House. Moreover, Edward's was the nearest station, so that little hope fled to her heart, and to tea. She sighed, and retraced her steps, and made timid inquiries, but could get no satisfactory information. Presently she heard galloping behind her, and the fireman's wild sharp cry of fire. An engine dashed past, and presently other horses came furiously, all on fire itself with red paint and polished steel gleaming in the lights: helmeted men sat erect, and the sight of one of those helmets looked a face like a fighting lion's, the eyes so dilated, the countenance in such towering excitement, that Mrs. Dodd thought fire sent as though galloping was too slow and he wanted to fly. In two minutes the engines, in one sought sight of one another as the engine thundered by, and he gave her a solemn ardent look and passed on. Before he had got the meaning look and eloquent gesture she knew it was something more than a common fire. She trembled and could not walk. Then, with a temporary weakness was followed by an influx of wild vigor: she forgot her forty-two years, and flew to lower road in the direction of Drayton water. Unfortunately she was too late to get any nearer than the road outside the asylum. She could see nothing, could hear, while her pale face and anxious eyes, the eyes of a wife and a mother, were bent on that awful roof. She saw with horror swiftly up behind her, and there she was wedged in. She was allowed her foot of ground to stand and look like the rest. Presently, from the midst of a mass of panting humanity, hers was one of the thousands of upturned faces lurid in the light of the now blazing roof. She saw with horror the hand break the window and clutch the frame: she gasped with the crowd at that moment when the fire caught, and her heart panted for her fellow-creature in sore peril. But what is this? The mob inside made a wide roar of hope: the crowd outside strain every eye.

A gleaming helmet overtops the outer wall. It is a fireman mounting a ladder to rescue in the mad-house yard. The crowd inside burst in a cheer. He had a rope round his loins; his face was to the men. He was seen to descend like a cat; higher, and higher, and higher, till he reached a branch about twenty feet above the window and so much apart from it laterally: the crowd cheered him lustily. But Mrs. Dodd, half distracted, was shrieking to Edward, "Go, to encourage him. "It is my child!" she cried, despairingly; "my poor reckless darling! Come down, Edward; for your poor mother's sake, come down."

"Dear heart," said a woman, "it's the lady's son. Poor thing!"

"Stand on my knee, ma'am," said a coachbuilder.

"Oh no, Sir, no. I could not look at him for the world. I can only pray for him. Oh, good people, pray for us!" And she covered her face, and prayed and trembled and sobbed hysterically. A few yards behind was another woman, who had arrived later, yet like her was weighed immovable. This woman was more terrorstricken than Mrs. Dodd: and well she might, for her lover who was hanging by his hands over the woman's name was Edith Archbold. The man who was now swinging by his hands and surging up toward heaven in waves of fire six feet high. Edward, scorched and half-blinded, managed to fasten his rope to the bough, and, calculating the distances vertical and lateral he had to deal with, took up rope accordingly, and launched himself into the air.

The crowd drew their breath so hard it sounded like a murmur. To their horror he missed the window, and went swinging back.

There was a cry of dismay. But Edward had never heard of failure. He tried the window; he went swinging by the rope back to the main stem of the tree, gave a fierce spurn with his feet, and by this means and a powerful gesture of his herculean loins got an inch nearer the window: back again, and with the same gesture and so he went swinging to and fro over a wider and wider space; and, by letting out an inch of cord each swing, his feet came at last within the window-ledge, then a little higher, then higher still, and now, oh sight strange and glorious—as this helmeted hero, with grim clenched and great eyes that stared unflinching at the surging flames and glowed supernaturally white in them and outward fire, swung to and fro on his frail support still making for the window—the heads of all the living fearing, admiring, panting crowd went surging and waving to and fro beneath; so did not their hearts only but their agitated bodies follow the motion of this hero as it rocked to and fro faster and faster through the hot air starred with snow-flakes and hail of fire. And those his fellow-firemen that had been frenzied made this supernatural effort, did they know their desperate danger? Were they afraid? No. One little hour ago Alfred sat on the bed, full of hope. Every minute he expected to hear the Robin put a key in the door. Then he was ready, and his money in his pocket. Alas! his liberator came not: some screw loose again. Presently he heard shouts of a great conflagration in the house. Feet ran up and down. Then came a smell of burning. The elm-tree outside was illuminated. He was glad of that, for it was in spite against the place. But soon he became alarmed, and hammered at the door and tried to force it. Impossible. "Fire" rang from men's voices. Fire crackled above his head. The elm-boughs began like a wild creature. He sprang up at the window and dashed his hand through, but fell back. He sprang again and tore his hand to more of the lights and work: he drew himself up nearly to the window, and then the wood gave way and he fell to the ground, and striking his head in his fall, nearly stunned himself; the flames roared fearfully now; and at this David, who had hitherto sat unconcerned, started up, and in a sentorian voice ordered order upon order to fuel every rag of suit and bring the rug to the door. His despair was a new aspect.

"Oh hush! hush!" cried Alfred, in vain. A beam fell from the roof to the floor, precursor of the rest. The flames, baffled within, burst outshore, and shouted a fresh set of orders proper to the occasion, so terribly alike are the angry voices of the commanders. Then Alfred implored him, and got him to kneel down with him, and held his hand, and prayed.

And, even as they knelt, Alfred and Alfred prayed, Death and Life met and fought for them. Under the door, Alfred's door, a thin stream of keyhole smuggled a hot stifling smoke, merciful destroyer running before fire: and the shadow of a gigantic fireman was seen to darken the door outside, and to come and go upon the wall. Alfred did not know what that was, but it gave him a ray of hope. Then the door grew gray for only for their bodies. (The crowd heard him and hushed itself breathless.)

The smoke increased faster, blinding and stifling; the giant shadow came and went. But now the greater part of the door was gray. Then suddenly the flaming timbers thundered down to the basement with endless clatter of red-hot dust, and the wall-paper fell off, revealing belched skyward a thousand jets of fire like a bouquet of rockets; and then a cloud of smoke. Alfred grew sick and faint, and muttered, "Oh, Crash! as if discharged from a cannon, came bursting through the window with the roar of an unleashed tempest, and with it a human figure, scream, a helmeted figure rope in hand, and alighted erect and commanding on the floor, amidst a shower of splinters and tinkling glass.

"Up men for your lives!" roared this fire warrior, clutching Alfred in a line to fireman Jackson plantedi express below, and in another moment was shooting up and down with the double burden, getting on it and holding his own rope by way of baloster cried "Now men, quick, for your lives." And, with the cry, he leaped through the ship, and downward, till Alfred assured him the captain had ordered it. He then descended directly, touched the outlook to Edward, whom he took for that officer, and went down the ladder; Alfred following.

Now the moment those two figures emerged from the burning pile, Mrs. Dodd, already half dead with grief for her son, and now for her husband: for all about him it was as light as day.

What terror! what joy! what gratitude! what pride! what a tempest of emotions!

But her fears were not ended; Edward, not to overweight the ladder, went dangling by his hands along the rope toward the tree. And his mother's eyes stared fearfully from him to the other, and her body trembled on her knees in mad descending cautiously, and then on his preserver, her son, who was dangling along by the hands with the rope between them. Her husband him royally, but she screamed and hid her face again. At last both her darlings were safe, and then the lusty cheers made her thrill with pride and joy, till all of a sudden they seemed to die away and the terrible fire to go out; and the sore-tried wife and mother drooped her head, and swooned away, wedged in and kept from falling by the crowd.

Inside, the mob parted and made two rushes, one on the rescued men, one on the gallant fireman. Edward, bewildered by the sudden change of curiosity and sympathy. They had to shake off hundred hands: and he was still pressing on, hurried then nearly off their feet.

"Gently, good friends, don't part us," said Alfred.

"He is the keeper," said one of the crowd.

"Yes, I'm his keeper: and I want to get him quietly away. This excitement will do him harm else: good friends, help me out by that door."

"All right," was the cry, and they rushed with him to the back door. Unfortunately this was about twenty yards off, and was subject this inconvenient. He fought his way and struggled after Alfred in silence. Presently, to his surprise, Alfred opened the gate and whipped out with David, leaving the door open. Rooke shouted and bellowed: "Stop him! he is escaping!" and struggled madly to the door: now another crowd had been waiting at the back, and seeing the door opened they rushed in and the doorway was jammed directly. In the confusion Alfred drew David after him, and they got off and had time to stay quiet, bolted behind an outhouse, and then ran across country for the first time.

To his horror David followed him, and with a madman's agility soon caught him.

He snorted like a frightened horse, and shouted cheerily. "Go ahead messmate; I smell blue water."

"Come on then," cried Alfred, half mad himself with excitement, and the pair ran furiously, and dashed through hedges and ditches, torn, bleeding, splashed, triumphant; behind them the burning mad-house, above them the spangled sky, the fresh free air of liberty blowing in their nostrils, and rushing past their ears.

Alfred's chest expanded, he laughed for joy, he sang for joy, he shouted for joy, he did not care where he went. David took the command, and kept snuffing the air, and shaping his course for the water. And so they rushed along the livelong night.

Free.

THE BRIDGE ACCIDENT AT CHICAGO.

On page 748 we illustrate the falling of the Rush Street bridge at Chicago, an accident which took place on March 1, 1903. The illustration is from a photograph by Mr. Alschuler. A Chicago paper thus describes the event:

A few minutes before the accident but evening the Iron bridge across the river at Rush Street broke in two while turning, and plunged a dozen horses, a street car and about fifty cattle into the river. Several were drowned. Owing to the fact that it was growing dark at the time of the accident, and to the hasty and confusion incident to the scene, it is impossible to obtain the exact number of the catastrophe. The following is all that could be ascertained:

A herd of fat cattle, numbering about one hundred and fifty, was being driven across the bridge, on the southern section, at a quarter before five o'clock. About sixty of these were on the bridge when the draw began to swing over, when the tug Friendville, having two small vessels in tow, approached from the south, and the bridge tender let it a signal to open the bridge. A minute afterward, and before they had time to stop their momentum, the engineer saw the cattle crowding over, and immediately reversed his engine, signalling the bridge tender to do the same thing. But it was too late. The bridge-tender saw the danger, and, with the presence of a collision, he commenced to swing the bridge, the north end of which was covered with cattle, and succeeded in being nearly. Of course this gave an immense preponderance to the south end of the bridge, and it broke in the middle of the bearings at the abutments: then the north end descended. It rode about twenty feet, and it had dropped about fifty feet, and then the whole weight of the structure being applied on the north end, the iron bridge broke in the middle with a tremendous crash, precipitating every thing into the river. The cattle were all thrown into the water, and, one on each side, and leaving but one narrow space through the middle.

There were on the bridge at the time Mr. James H. Dole, one of the oldest residents of the south side; James B. Dole, a minor—no relation to the former—and Mrs. Dole, wife of the latter, and four other persons. The two Mrs. Dole immediately ran to the north end of the bridge, and, passing among the broken material, being horribly mutilated, and escaped. Mr. James Dole still had charge of the team, and things were struggling in the water, shrieking for help, and all around were the unfortunate cattle. Looking about, and threatening mischief to their human companions, were the horses. The driver of the car was not injured at the time, and her exploits. Lewis Berry, sent off the first boat on the scene, and the first person taken off. She was quickly dispatched to the scene, and then the work of rescue began. This was not entirely successful, as animals were very thick in the water, and it was almost impossible to get anywhere near a drowning man during the first passengers. In consequence of this, and the rapidly increasing darkness, the rescuers were unable to the number of those in peril. The following is believed to be a correct estimate of the casualties:

The bridge-tender leaped from the platform overhead to the east bank. The engineer, who was in charge of one of the splinters, and escaped with only a few bruises received in falling. Mr. Dole was drowned, and his body

Mr. Dole escaped almost by a miracle, falling into the water unconscious, but was rescued by a passing steamer. The horse and buggy were lost. The animal was a rather valuable one—worth two hundred dollars.

One elderly gentleman secured one of the planks which had been thrown into the river by the breaking of the bridge, and three other men were picked up by the boats. The boy was also saved. He said there were seven children alongside him when the bridge broke. Nothing was seen of the rest. The boy's statement, however, is believed, as it is feared that both drivers were lost, nothing having been seen of them since the accident. Investigations are now going about the streets of the North Division, with no encouraging news of the disaster.

The horse car which fell into the river was taken to the Rush Street boat-house and hoisted on the deck thereof. He was rescued and taken away. In attempting to get him ashore the plank slipped and he again fell into the river. This task of effecting a second operation was much more difficult than the first. The animal was nearly drowned.

The majority of the cows swam to the dock without aid, and were picked up one by by the crowd. Of the others, two were seen to drown, and five others were killed or disappeared. The fact that the bridge was in the middle of the river to render recovery impossible. Several other remained unaccounted for, and at the time their nonsinge being plainly heard to a late hour last evening.

THE GREAT RUSSIAN BALL AT THE ACADEM

Y OF MUSIC, NOVEMBER 5, 1863.—[See Page 746.]

THE GREAT RUSSIAN BALL.

On pages 737, 744, and 745 we publish illustrations of the event of last week. THE GREAT RUSSIAN BALL AT THE ACADEMY OF MUSIC. It was undoubtedly the greatest ball ever given in this country, without excepting the ball to the Prince of Wales. Whether it was a success or not appears to be a matter of some uncertainty. We condense from the Herald report the following account of the decorations of

THE SALOON.

Inside the door a pleasant change in the Academy was perceptible at the very first step. Instead of the ordinary barrenness of the vestibule, and the comfortable crimness of furniture about it, and, instead of a gas-jet here and there in the foot lift only on an urgent occasion, a heavy ridge, delivered your ticket, and suffered your footfall at every step of the way, and when you passed on to the second story you were met by a group in the brilliant light, a lobby in which the gas was in triple place.

Even this was but the door of the foyer, where the lady leaves her cloak, and where the gentleman leaves his lady, while he passes down to the end of the lobby and deposits his overcoat, cap, etc. No surgery to pay—no charges by the hair-dresser—no charges at all. Returned to the lady in the same place she left it, with the same sort of very orderly confusion and very quiet, and mentally kept the lady to pay ready. More help is not necessary when there is plenty there, and help with needle and thread, too, to cover accidents. Let us every where have the spirit of life, and just as men and women go to Italy to commune with the spirits of antiquity in their monuments, so women come and wait all night to put a stitch here and there and feel amply repaid in the opportunity to study the dresses.

From the foyer one descried not as you came, but down the stairs at the other side, up the south stairs, and down the north. The work of all was done, one might suppose, and yet, simple as the idea was, it was a very considerable contribution to the general success. Red carpet down the stairs all on one soft Magenta-colored cloth; we turn to the left, and we are in the parquet, and are in the lobby.

Down the lobby, to the left, two elegant little retiring rooms were thrown open, and further down was the door of a quiet little temple for the especial delectation of those admitted to the cup that cheers but not inebriates. Here, as the said cup be filled with a decoction of the Arabian berry or the Chinese leaf. This is one of those delightful ideas that need only to be suggested; and in future no ball will be perfect without this very agreeable feature. It would be impossible to overpraise the quiet taste with which this feature was arranged. It was the perfection with which its object was carried out by Delmonico.

We could not but contrast between these rooms at once and those of the Academy, and each of whom holds up his flambeau before the eyes of his rendezvous, as if he meant to see it out. We pass down the two or three steps that are between the foyer and the floor, and find the floor in a state of softened light drawn by the line of the boxes. To the right and left of the centre of each, carried by very graceful vases of flowers, and in front, shutting out all the peripheries of the floor, and softening the whole into a space that the circle of the noblemen accurately makes, as it reaches the last box on the stage, we see immense lace curtains, with which the object was carried out by Delmonico.

We could not but contrast between these curtains at once and those of the Academy, and each of whom holds up his flambeau before the eyes of his rendezvous, as if he meant to see it out. We pass down the two or three steps that are between the foyer and the floor, and find the floor in a state of softened light drawn by the line of the boxes. To the right and left of the centre of each, carried by very graceful vases of flowers, and in front, shutting out all the peripheries of the floor, and softening the whole into a space that the circle of the noblemen accurately makes, as it reaches the last box on the stage, we see immense lace curtains, with which he object was carried out by Delmonico.

At the first and by a large, beyond which was seen, as from an open window, the stage, and which, on the other side this hall was repeated in mirrors, the white Superior appeared in full circle. It is circular in form, and as the floor is gaily lighted, and the boxes are filled with the beauty and fashion of the city, which here the bewilderment of the Academy is lost, and the lights and the mirrors from the hall we have described, the auditorium of the Academy, and around the room from the stage to the entrance. All else will have been repainted, all the gold regilt, and the whole, as in the front of the parquet, will imitate the boxes, which were formerly of a dingy red, but have received a delicate green. A richness of effect is produced in fe-tones of flowers, amidst the whole amphitheatre, and a very fine effect between the pillars on the stage, which are festooned in reality; and at the centre of each of these spaces were suspended basket-like baskets of flowers, of great fancy grouping fondicts, etc.

At the end of the stage the regent proscenium boxes were draped in Russian and American flags, and at the centre of the first tier was suspended a private box, the private box of the ship General Admiral, bearing at her mizzen the Russian flag, and at the fore the Stars and Stripes.

Even before the doors were thrown open crowds had assembled outside, and these, immediately upon the opening of the doors, began to stream in incessantly, seriously, promenade in earnest, in very full possible mode, magnificent and varied—ladies in silks and satins, of pink, pearl, white, blue, of all the possible varieties. Gold and silver lace, and from indigo till it melted into white; silks of green, crimson, purple, and yellow; silks ornamented and silks plain. And silks were not all, for there were ladies in velvet, and ladies in laces, and ladies in furs, in lace, in velvet, in hoods—ladies in head-dresses, and ladies with their plain little heads all alone with their own beautiful hair. Every body had diamonds on.

THE DANCING.

The order of dancing was as follows:

IN HONOR OF

THE OFFICERS OF THE RUSSIAN FLEET.

GRAND BALL,

AT THE

NEW YORK ACADEMY OF MUSIC,

November 5, 1863.

PROGRAMME.

Overture to "William Tell"..... Rossini.
Selection from "Norma"..... Bellini.
Russian and American National Airs.

ORDER OF DANCING.

1. Lancers, "Ethiqe"..... Helmesmuller.
Airs from "Dinorah"..... Meyerbeer.
2. Waltz, "Wine, Woman and Song"..... Strauss.
March, from the "Huguenots"..... Gerfulin.
3. Galop, "Fidelio"..... Hermannsdorf.
Airs, "Die Foecut"..... Verdi.
4. Quadrille, "Les Huguenots"..... Meyerbeer.
Selection from "Robert"..... Meyerbeer.
5. Polka Mazurka, "Sweetheart"..... Hermannsdorf.
Airs, from "Martha"..... Flotow.
6. Lancers, "Les Mousquetaires"..... Meyerbeer.
March, "L'Etoile du Nord"..... Meyerbeer.
7. Waltz, "Fleurette"..... Gerfulin.
Airs, "Traviata"..... Verdi.
8. Galop, "Le Postillon Joyeuse"..... Helmesmuller.
Duet, "Pollitori"..... Donizetti.
9. Quadrille, "Les Huguenots"..... Meyerbeer.
Ballad, "Rock me to Sleep, Mother"..... Tucker.
10. Polka, "Fleurette"..... Bergmann.
March..... Gerfulin.
11. Waltz, "Russian Linder"..... Strauss.
Airs, "Traviata"..... Verdi.
12. Lancers, "Les Mousquetaires"..... Meyerbeer.
Duet, "Soulevinde"..... Rossini.
13. Polka, "Le Petit Gerdete"..... Gerfulin.
Airs, "Traviata"..... Verdi.
14. Galop, "Jose"..... Hermannsdorf.
Airs, "Traviata"..... Verdi.
15. Quadrille, "Melodie"..... Verdi.
Airs, "Die Foecta Glocken"..... Donizetti.
16. Polka Redowa, "Frolic"..... Bergmann.
Ballad, "No One to Love"..... Tucker.
17. Lancers, "Orphee aux Enfers"..... Helmesmuller.
Airs, "Traviata"..... Verdi.
18. Waltz, "Wahlstimmen"..... Strauss.
March, "Flag of the Free"..... Gerfulin.
19. Galop, "Ergeleyen"..... Helmesmuller.
Airs, "Don Pasquale"..... Donizetti.
20. Waltz, "Schoben"..... Welenburn.
March, "Finale"..... Verdi.
21. Galop, "Uprising"..... Hermannsdorf.
Finale, "Adieu"..... Schubert.

The Herald reporter says:

Immediately after the Russians arrived the dance began. We call it a dance out of respect to conventional and popular prejudice. In truth it was a very wonderful and indescribable phantasmagoria of humanity. The frantic face struggling against the determined and desperate many. Had one chanced to know several persons present, it is not to be supposed that he might have been able to pick them out, but in the absence of any such circumstance and personal knowledge, it was mere nonsense to suppose that there was any particular person there. It was more man and more matter. As for a dance it was a mere array of crude materials, more in the shape of a huge tidal, but not a dance.

Order for the Russians. It is known, or should be, that these Scholz heroes are not the very largest of the human race—that they are small and wiry, and that it is to become of small men in such a jam? Lastly in the night—indeed, very early one after the morning—the rest of them in the embrace of great nebulous masses of music, and crushing, and pressing, and pushing, and the terrible torment, their eyes aglare, their hair blown out, and their very coats distended with the pressure, presented a condition in the endeavor to escape. What became of them we can not tell.

THE TOILETS.

The World reporter made a careful survey of the ladies' toilets, and reports as follows:

Among the most brilliant and striking costumes was a superb white moire antique, with border of scarlet velvet, covered with flounces of point lace. The corsage had velvets, diamond dew-drops, and humming-bird of green and gold.

Another was of black velvet, with garniture of lace and diamonds, the long trains of the dress being elaborately trimmed up, with diamond spray head-dress to correspond.

A very full dress of white Mechlin illusion was ornamented with a set of black lace, forming wide scarf, berthe, and long scarf sash upon the skirt. Garniture of pomegranate blossoms, composing half wreaths, and branches of the white and orange.

A superb dress was of lavender velvet, with ornaments of pink lace, diamonds, and ostrich feathers.

A crimson velvet dress was also very striking, with its garniture of gold Valenciennes lace and pearls.

A charming dress consisted of blue tarlatan, in wide plaits, with an open overdress of white illusion, bordered with black barbe lace; garniture of blue forget-me-nots and white roses.

A very striking costume consisted of white puffed illusion with a short train of rose-colored velvet, lined with lavender-silk with slender lace berthe; coiffure of narrow rosebuds, with long lappets of white lace and rose-colored.

A rich white moire antique was trimmed with deep double flounces, headed with a fall of white Honiton lace, roses, diamond and emeralds.

A robe of white moire antique was ornamented with immense medallions, which extended the entire length of the skirt, separated by wide bands of white satin and roses. A full wreath of the same flowers, and a coquet of a diamond aigrette, completed the costume.

A rich dress of gold-colored satin was completed by rich and massive gold ornaments, and a head-dress of gold and a golden butterfly.

A white moire antique was trimmed across the side in shaded clusters of pink lace, finished with dilet tassels; coiffure of pink and white flowers, with diamond orbits, with diamond pendants.

A bride was lovely in a dress of white corded silk, with long, slender sleeves, a high corsage, a veil, and ornaments of white auricles.

The beautiful dress attracted attention was of white pink moire, with flounces of white point d'Angleterre and garniture of pink roses, with diamond ornaments to corder.

A leading actress was also attired as usual in a rich robe of moire satin, trimmed with a deep flounce of point applique, looped up with bouquets of white camellias, and diamond cluster—cornelian set in violets, and diamond aigrette, ornaments to match.

Two very full dresses of white illusion, trimmed with a profusion of white gauffed silk and white satin ribbons, were embroidered with gold, and bunches of white hyacinths and scarlet geraniums.

A dress of rose-colored moire antique was elegantly trimmed with gold points and flounces, and on the front of the skirt, the spaces occupied with bunches of white and crimson roses.

A beautiful blonde wore a dress of dark maroon velvet, with an immense flounce of white lace. The body was finely ornamented with a bow and long ends of narrow velvet, the short sleeves, also, were finished with the same, rose high up over the arm; diamond ornaments.

A rich dress of white gauffed silk was ornamented with puffings of illusion over bands of rose-colored silk, surmounted by silk rosettes. Beautiful scarf of rose-colored silk crossed low down upon the back of the skirt, with a bow and ends and a small bunches of roses, and the toilet completed the costume.

The supper was of a novelty, and was strikingly exhibited in rich crimson velvet, edged with full illusion ruches upon a rich white satin ground. The corsage had a head-dress of crimson natins and white blossoms.

Nearly all the ladies appeared to have never have seen so magnificent a display except upon the occasion of the visits of Prince Napoleon.

THE SUPPER.

The Herald reporter says:

A covered passage, which had been erected in a few hours, led from Academy of Music to Irving Hall, where Delmonico had prepared the supper. This passage was also a work of considerable labor. Over the roof, from the ceiling, while the sides were draped in white muslin dotted with golden bees. Below, the floor was carpeted about, and rich carpets covered the floors. The passage connected at the hall with a grand staircase. The entrance was beautifully decorated. Statues, lights, and flowers were arranged in the most tasteful manner, while through the opened doors was seen the beautiful Delmonico hall in its most splendid array. The walls were draped with festoons of white muslin, and the pillars were wreathed with evergreens and flowers. Each side of the Hall were placed two broad Union shields. The effect was very beautiful and delicate, and reflected no little credit upon the proprietor of Irving Hall, under whose direction every thing was arranged. The supper place is beautiful; it is spacious and highly ornamented in every detail as compared with last night's supper.

The supp d'ord from the gallery was most effective. Long tables were arranged through the length of the immense Hall. These tables, under the charge of Delmonico, were set in the most elegant manner. Napkins, folded in every person, were in abundance, while the bright crystals and bouquets were arranged in the most elegant and most tasteful manner. On the table fronting the entrance were placed the Russian and American flags, tastefully draped. Interspersed among these were to be seen Alexander II. and President Lincoln. On pedestals of variegated carpet were the statues of Peter the Great and our immortal Washington. There were designs for fountains, statues of triumph, the rotunda of Athens, corruscopes of glory, devices rare and ingenious, all sweetly worked out. In fact, the table was a triumphant proof of the ability of our great caterer, and, indeed, of the whole establishment of his kind. As for the cuisines of the viands and the wines it is needless to say a word of praise. The name of Delmonico is a guarantee for excellence in these departments.

Throughout the supper the music was of the choicest kind, and rendered the most animated, most brilliant appearance. The beautiful toilets of the ladies, the glitter of their diamonds, the gay uniforms of the officers, all blended into a harmonious ensemble, which but added to the magnificent appearance of the Hall. Above the laughter of the guests and the loud popping of the Widow Cliquot Champagne were heard the strains of music, the odor of flowers and of the paten also mingled; and we must assert that if the Academy, with its waltzes, its quadrilles and polkas, surmount the guests, Irving Hall, with its splendid table and rich wines, was no less patronized. The correct passages we have constantly cited, and we observed that more than a necessary amount of care was taken by the guests to avoid intoxication, to repeat their visits to the Hall. We suppose its brilliant appearance was the attraction.

The bill of fare read as follows:

"SOIREE RUSSE."

Le 5 Novembre, 1863.

MENU.

HORS D'ŒUVRES.

Huitres a la poulette : Huitres en marinade : Boucines de gibier : Canapes de Foie d'ortolans : Smis-nitch a la Russe.

CROS POTEUR.

Sommons au beurre de Montpellier :
Filete de bouf a la Mazarin :
Galantine de cochon de lait garat de betelets :
Jambons de Westphalie a la moderne.
Truites a la Regence :
Pates de canvas back ducks :
Pates de gibier de toutes sortes :
Galantines de dindes aux truffes.

ENTREES.

Salades de volaille a la Russe :
Colelettes de pigeons en Macedoine :
Chaudfroid de filets de Bouvreuil :
Pain de gibier a la royale :
Timbales a la Strasbourg.

Canntones a la remoulade :
Boudins a la Richelieu en demi-deuil :
Aspics de filets de soles a la Victoria :
Timbales a la Conde :
Becassines a la Geoffroy.

ROTIS.

Cailles aux feuilles de vigne : Becasses bardees :
Faisane piquee : Grouses.

ENTREMETS, SUCRES ET DESSERT.

Savarins au Marasquin : Gateaux Genoise Monmorin :
Gateaux de mille-feuilles : Babins glacee au rhum :
Chocolat Meunier : Chantilly Nesselrode : Nesselrode Parfait Vanilla :
Meringues pannaches et Vanilloes.
Gelee Marasquin au vin de Champagne :
Gelees d'antrick Ordinaire :
Gelees de poires a la marechale :
Gelees au madere.
Paine d'abricots a la Parisienne :
Blanc manger rubanes au chocolat :
Gelees de fruits.
Gateaux : assortis : Biscuits glaces a la rose.
Corbeilles : Compotes : Fruits.

PIECES MONTEES ET GLACES.

Pierre le Grand : Washington :
Alexander II. : Lincoln :
La berceau des poblisters : La retende d'Athenes :
Le Temple de Neptune : Jerusalem a la Moderne :
L'arc de triomphe : Corbe jumelles d'obsadones :
Buttues a la parisienne : Le pavillon des sujets.

L'eight Americaine : Le canapa sur cuclo : Pouding :
Nesselrode : La bonne :
Colombes : Nesselrode Americaine : Les Dampbins :
Dinner : Madelaines : Meringues aux nouvelles :
Bombes spongadas : Cyclaus au cafe :
Chocolat : Citrons et Frises.
Etc., Etc., Etc.

The World reporter gives the following account of the edibles :

These viands and ornamental pieces did not appear in their native state; their pieces were connected with combinations of jellies, meats, vegetables, doves, and ornamental canopies. For a slice of bonnet turkey you had to partake an aigrette, or a fricassee, some cross evergreen, or remove an abutment or turret of congealed maple. Carving was thus attended with, and in fact suspended the knife. As the oration and ball is one which many have in trance on anticipation to see, we give, for the sake of history, an account of the principal edibles used, viz.:

Twelve thousand pounds of Russian poulette and 2000 pickled.

Twelve monster salmon—30 lbs. each.

Twelve hundred game birds.

Two hundred pounds of grapes.

Four hundred chickens.

One thousand pounds of tenderloin.

One hundred pyramids of pastry.

One thousand lobsters.

Three thousand five hundred bottles of wine.

FIRST TIME UNDER FIRE.

WHEN the President ordered the army to be called up by requisition, and the first regiment on the peaceful moneyed men of the North were roused to protect their persons by draining their pockets, it was marvelous how the militancy of adventure, and three hundred dollars, to offer myself as a recruit in the — Cavalry Regiment. So, under the protection of a strong body of artillery, I preserve us upon into single rank, march!" and as I obeyed the Order I saw our skirmishers slowly falling back through the wood and formed in front of our extreme left and in our rear. Then there was a pause. Presently a dull rumbling among the trees, and could discern a mass of men clustering together just upon their edge. With a thrill, I knew that the enemy was upon us. Another and very sensation was merged in a frantic desire to shoot, while every nerve within my body was shaking with excitement. Then I heard Major's voice, steady and cheerful, sounded along the line, with some sympathetic power calming my shaking nerves and making me conscious of myself. "Steady! Aim low! Front rank men, fire!" A blaze of light, also along our line, then a great sheet of explosion, and a blinding smoke, through which I could hear the bullets of the enemy as they whistled past. I could see nothing, but could the voice of the Captain from my right command, "Rear rank men, fire!" and as our second volley crashed forth, I heard the cheer, "Load and fire at will." And now it was pop! pop! pop! as fast as we could get the cartridges into our pieces, shouting and cheering as we did so, in answer to the rebel oateries. At length our cries met no response, I heard the officers command "Cease firing," the smoke swept away, and I found it was black night, through which I could just discern that I was one of about forty men, the remnant of the squadron; could hear a few slowly trotting back to the rear; could notice others on foot crossing the gallop beyond, and could discern a mass of dead horses and one or two dead men still lying at my feet.

For a few minutes the Captain let us remove the corpses and destroy the equipments of the dead animals, and then we withdrew triumphantly to our comrades, the Captain telling us once that we had done well, and then bewailing his fate that he commanded men who did not know how to wheel by fours. That was my first acquaintance with rebel bullets, and even the old soldiers said that it was the closest affair in which they had ever been engaged.

Two days afterward I heard, for the first time, the sound of a shell; and I might as well make a clean breast of it, once for all, by describing my sensations connected with that.

We were in the rear of the army as it fell back upon Centreville—not the line of skirmishers, but what they call the reserve, formed in line a little behind them. The rest of the cavalry had moved on after the infantry, leaving us to hold a hill from which the enemy might have annoyed them with artillery. We sat there without seeing any thing in particular, and wondering why the rebels did not come out of the woods beyond us; when suddenly there was a big puff of smoke at the edge of the trees, a loud bang, and a tremendous screech in the air above our heads, so close that the sound almost took my head off. I looked at the Captain, expecting to hear him say, "By fours, do something or other;" but, confound it! he only said, "Steady!" as there was another puff, another bang, and another screech, as a big black mass of iron struck the ground ten yards in front of us, bounded over our heads, and burst almost above us. It gave such a shock to my nerves that I could not do any thing but shake, and I felt as if I should have much preferred being under the ground to being above it. Those rebels banged away at us for half a dozen rounds, each time striking close to us, before I saw our skirmish-line come riding back at a walk, and heard the Captain give the order, "By fours, march! Right countermarch!" and back we started. Two files in front of me marched Dan E——, one of those fellows who always has his retort ready. I heard the man next to him scolding at Dan's crowding him out of place: "Why the deuce can't you follow your file-leader?" "Hang the file-leader!" answered Dan, pushing him harder yet; "they've got range on him." And as he spoke sure enough a shell came down and buried itself in the earth just where he would have been if he had kept in his place. I can tell you we all rather obliqued after that, and pretty soon we got safely out of fire.

Now I know what artillery and musketry are both like; and though I shall not shirk from my place, I sincerely hope that we will not be in it very soon again.

HOME FROM THE WARS.

"THERE'LL be a bitin' black frost on the hills to-night, I tell ye!" said Moses Atterly, as he threw an armful of oak logs, fringed with silver-gray moss, upon the stone hearth, and rubbed his hands cheerily before the red, roaring blaze that encircled the rude iron fire-dogs in drifts of ruby sparks.

He was a tall, wiry-looking old man, with mild hazel eyes, and a skin well-nigh as brown as the basket of butter-nuts that stood in the corner—a man whom you might easily fancy to have grown up among those rock-bound, wind-swept wildernesses, as one of the giant pines on the steep cliffs above had grown—stalwart, sturdy, and true to the very heart's core. The room was very plain, with no curtains at the narrow-paned windows, and no carpet save the odd zigzag veins in the hickory boards that formed the floor; yet there was an air of comfort in the splint-bottomed chairs, with their red moreen cushions, and the round table, neatly spread for the evening meal. Over the fire an apoplectic black tea-kettle kept up a dreamy song, and Moses Atterly's only child sat, with folded hands, in the chimney corner, watching the vaporous wreaths curling from the spout—a pretty, soft-eyed girl, with a late rose in her braids of glossy chestnut-brown hair, and straight, clearly-cut features—now in shadow, now all irradiated by the capricious torches of flame that played at hide-and-seek in and out among the crevices of the great bubbling, singing logs.

"Have you been to the post-office to-night, father?" said she, suddenly looking up as Moses gave the smouldering back log a sort of remonstrating kick.

"No; but I met Jim Grayling down by the hemlock hollow, and he said he was goin' straight there; so I told him to ask if there was any thing for our folks. He'll be here directly, I calculate, for it must be all of two hours ago."

"I am sorry," said Bessie, almost petulantly. "Father, I detest the very sight of that man!"

"My daughter!" remonstrated Moses, "that ain't accordin' to either sense or Gospel."

"Well, I can't help it, father," coaxed Bessie, stealing her soft, dimpled hand into the rough palm that lay on Moses Atterly's knee. "He always seemed to me like—"

She stopped suddenly—so suddenly that the late rose fell out of her hair and lay on the stone hearth—for, as she turned her head, she saw James Grayling standing beside them, unfolding a coarse white-and-red worsted comforter from about his neck. He stooped, without a word, and picked up the rose for her.

"Why, Jim!" said Farmer Atterly, "where on airth did you drop down from? I didn't hear you come in."

"Didn't you? I am sure I knocked loud enough," said Grayling, with a deep red flush slowly fading away from his cheek. "Pretty well to-night, Bessie?"

"I'm well enough," pouted Bessie, without looking at him, and tossing her recovered rose in among the glowing cinders. Somehow it had lost its charm after having lain in James Grayling's hand a second.

"Set down, Jim, set down," said the farmer, heartily. "Any mails for us to-night?"

"Nothing."

What a strange smile passed over his face as he saw the sudden downward droop of Bessie Atterly's eyelashes—the quiver around her mouth!

"Nothin'! That's queer. You see our Bessie's feelin' kind o' worried 'cause she don't hear nothin' from Henry Ives."

"I got a long letter to-night from my cousin, who is in the same company, you know. He says—"

James Grayling paused, a little maliciously, to note the eager sparkle in Bessie's eyes as she leaned forward with reddening cheeks and intent look.

"What does he say?" she gasped.

"Well, I'm afraid you'll feel badly about it; but he says Harry Ives was captured, with half a dozen others, by a skirmishing party about a week before he wrote."

"Captured!"

"Yes; and that isn't all. He says they didn't half believe Harry Ives cared whether he was carried down South or not; for he had taken a great notion to some pretty girl down in Virginia—a planter's darter—and—"

"I don't believe it, James Grayling," said Bessie, springing to her feet, with flashing eyes and passion-crimsoned forehead; "I don't believe a word of it. You are repeating some vile falsehood."

"I knew you'd feel bad," said Grayling, with provoking mildness, "but I thought you ought to know how matters stood. I can show you Sam's letter, if that will be any more satisfactory. I never had much faith in Harry Ives—a careless, dashing fellow, who—"

"Hush! I will not listen to another word," ejaculated Bessie, angrily, and with a certain strange dignity in her girl-face and slender form.

"Mr. Atterly," said Grayling, still with aggravating moderation and calmness, "how long is it since your daughter received a letter from Harry Ives?"

"Well, it's a pretty consid'able spell," said the old farmer; "but letters do take time to reach us, you know."

"Yes, particularly when they are never sent," sneered Grayling.

"Father, don't listen to him," sobbed Bessie, passionately. "If the whole world were to tell me Harry Ives was untrue I would not believe them."

And Bessie fainted quietly away, with her chestnut braids of hair drooping over her father's knee.

Poor child! Could she but have foreseen the weary months of waiting for the letter which never came from the far-off Southern hills, the hope deferred which maketh the heart sick, that were in store for her, she might have been sorry that she had not died, then and there, holding fast to that firm faith in Harry Ives's fidelity.

James Grayling, a crafty, patient man, bided his time. It came at last when the tender green of the hill-sides shriveled and grew brown under the starry, silent frosts of the bitter December nights, and the keen wind rushed with thunderous swell through the lonely pine-forests in these wild solitudes.

"Daughter, it's the dearest wish of my heart," said Farmer Atterly, solemnly, as he sat with Bessie in the old, silent room. "I'm gettin' well on in years; and if I could but see you married to some good and true man before I am taken away, I should rest easier in my grave. James Grayling has been almost a son to me these months of trial and trouble. He is coming for his final answer to-night. Let it be Yes!"

Bessie shuddered. That year of sick, wistful grief had changed her into a pale, fragile girl, with large, frightened eyes, ever roving from side to side, as if vainly seeking something which never came.

"Wait, father," she murmured, eagerly, as if pleading for sweet life itself: "wait a little longer—only a little longer!"

"I have waited, Bessie. It is a year and over since Henry Ives has sent you either word or message. He may be dead—better dead than a scoundrel!—but James Grayling has been as true as steel to me all this time. He deserves you, Bessie; and when you're once married you'll learn to love him. Shall we say this day month for your wedding, daughter?"

That night Bessie laid her cold hand in James Grayling's eager palm, and said "Yes," dreamily, to whatever he proposed. What had life left for her? As well be James Grayling's wife as any thing else, since God willed that she should live and suffer on, and the dreary path of years lay spread out before her listless feet!

The old smoke-stained walls were wreathed with feathery garlands of cedar and pine, with the scarlet berries of the mountain-ash glowing here and there; the great fire roared up the chimney with festive sound, and all the neighbors were gathered round Farmer Atterly's hearth-stone; for pretty Bessie was to be married that night.

"She don't look as a bride ought to, somehow," whispered Mrs. Deacon Jennings to her companion, Mahala Bird. "She seems to me jest like one o' them white snow-wreaths lyin' down in the holler yonder."

"Maybe it's that white dress," said Mahala; "but she does look like a corpse. Land o' Goshen! what be I a-sayin'? It ain't good luck to talk about corpses on a weddin'-night."

For the pretty bridemaids had just led Bessie in, robed in pure sheeny silk, with snowy geraniums in her hair, and not a vestige of color in her cheek.

"There! don't she look sweet?" said Susy Jennings. "Is it time to go into the parlor yet?"

"Massy, no, child!" said Mrs. Jennings; "not for an hour. Why, Jim Grayling hasn't come yet!"

So Bessie sat down in the midst of the assembled maids and matrons, and played with the white flowers in her bouquet, thinking, who knows of what? Perhaps a lonely grave under the cruel Southern stars—perhaps the fair face of the woman who had wiled her lover's heart away.

Somebody spoke to her; she looked up, and all of a sudden her frightened eyes traced a figure beyond the open door opposite to which she sat—a figure hurriedly pressing through the crowd.

"Where is she? I will see Bessie, wedding or no wedding! Who has a better right than I?"

The next moment the pale, white-robed bride lay like a fair, still statue in Henry Ives's arms.

"Stand off, I say!" he cried, fiercely. "Let no one come between me and the woman I love. I have earned her to be my wife—earned her by long months of pain and suffering—earned her by wounds upon the battle-field of the country she loved! Do you say she is to be married to James Grayling? What has James Grayling done with the letters I sent to his care?—with all the messages I intrusted to him? She had better be in her grave than married to James Grayling. Mr. Atterly, you are a just and a good man—judge between me and the treacherous fox I fancied was my friend."

"Harry, Harry!" faltered the old man, "I never dreamed o' this. Tell us about it, my boy, for my old head swims."

And Harry Ives, still holding Bessie to his heart, revealed the story of his own truth and James Grayling's duplicity. When he had finished the impassioned recital, Moses Atterly clasped the brown, strong hand between his own horny palms, and said, solemnly:

"My boy, I ask your pardon for every doubt that ever crossed my mind, and I thank the merciful Providence that has spared Bessie from being Jim Grayling's wife. We were calculatin' to have a weddin' here to-night, and it isn't too late yet, if Harry hasn't no objections to bein' married in his soldier clothes!"

"Father!" interposed Lessie, rosy as a whole bouquet of carnations blended into one, but Harry took her hands into his, whispering,

"Love! I shall not feel secure until I can call you wife," and the remonstrance died away upon her lips.

"Are you all ready, Elder Wilkins?" said Moses, "'cause I b'lieve the young couple is!"

Ah! she looked like a bride now, with the hazel light burning in soft fires under her long curled lashes, and the carmine dyes coming and going upon her cheek, like a proud and happy bride.

The ceremony was scarcely over before the silver chime of sleigh-bells sounded at the door, and James Grayling's voice was heard exclaiming:

"I'm afraid I am a little late, but the horse sprained his leg, and I had to change him at Squire Warrenton's. However—"

"Yes, Jim Grayling, you are a little late," said Moses Atterly, taking a prodigious pinch of snuff; "for my darter's married already."

"Married!" ejaculated Grayling, as if half uncertain whether his intended father-in-law were not a fit candidate for a lunatic asylum.

"Yes—to Harry Ives!"

As James Grayling's bewildered eye caught sight in the brilliantly lighted rooms beyond of the young soldier bending his tall head to listen to some whispered word from Bessie, he turned a dull, dead yellow, and a chill dew broke out around his mouth.

"What does this mean?" he asked.

"It means, Jim Grayling, that you're a scoundrel!" said the old man, with sudden fire flashing in his eyes. "There's the open door—leave this house before Harry Ives sets eyes on you, for he's a spirited lad, and mischief might come of it! And hark ye—never let me see your villainous face again!"

Silently, and like a wounded snake, James Grayling crept out into the chill darkness of the tempestuous night, a detected, disappointed man. And so effectually did he take Moses Atterly's advice, that the little village in the hollow knew his name and presence no more.

And Bessie Ives, the happiest little wife in the whole world, sings softly over her work, counting the days until, "when this cruel war is over," she shall welcome her soldier-husband back to the grand old pine forests of Maine once more.

THE FOURTEENTH AT GETTYSBURG.*

"COME, Fred, tell me all about that glorious fight which, you know, it was just my ill-luck to miss. If it had been such another whipping as we had at Fredericksburg, the Fates would probably have let me be there. I have heard several accounts, and know the regiment did nobly; but the boys all get so excited telling about it that I have not yet a clear idea of the fight."

"Here goes, then," said the Adjutant, lighting a fresh cigar. "It will serve to pass away time, which hangs so heavy on our hands in this dreary hospital."

"We were not engaged on the first day of the fight, July 1, 1863, but were on the march for Gettysburg that day. All the afternoon we heard the cannonading growing more and more distinct as we approached the town, and as we came on the field at night learned that the First and Eleventh corps had fought hard, suffered much, and been driven back outside the town with the loss of Major-General Reynolds, who, it was generally said, brought on an engagement too hastily with Lee's whole army. We bivouacked on the field that night.

"About nine o'clock the next morning we moved up to the front, and by ten o'clock the enemy's shells were falling around us. Captain Coit had a narrow escape here. We had just stacked arms and were resting, when a runaway horse, frightened by the shelling, came full tilt at him; 'twas 'heavy cavalry' against 'light infantry;' but Coit had presence of mind enough to draw his sword, and bringing it to a point it entered the animal's belly. The shock knocked Coit over, and he was picked up senseless with a terribly battered face, and carried to the rear."

"By-the-way, Fred, is it not singular that he should have recovered so quickly and completely from such a severe blow?"

"Indeed it is. He is as handsome as ever; but to go on. At four o'clock in the afternoon we moved up to support a battery, and here we lay all night. About dark Captain Broatch went out with the pickets. Though under artillery fire all day we were not really engaged, as we did not fire a gun. Some of our pickets, unfortunately going too far to the front, were taken prisoners during the night.

"At about five o'clock on the morning of the 3d Captain Townsend went out with companies B and D and relieved Broatch. As soon as he got out Townsend advanced his men as skirmishers some three hundred yards beyond the regiment, which moved up to the impromptu rifle-pits, which were formed partially by a stone-wall and partially by a rail fence. Just as soon as our skirmishers were posted they began firing at the rebel skirmishers, and kept it up all day, until the grand attack in the afternoon. Before they had been out twenty minutes, Corporal Huxham, of Company B, was instantly killed by a rebel bullet. It was not discovered until another of our skirmishers, getting out of ammunition, went up to him, saying, 'Sam, let me have some cartridges?' Receiving no answer, he stooped down and discovered that a bullet had entered the poor fellow's mouth and gone out at the back of his head, killing the brave, Chancellorsville-scarred, corporal so quickly that he never knew what hurt him. Presently Captain Moore was ordered down with four companies into a lot near by, to drive the rebel sharp-shooters out of a house and barn from whence they were constantly picking off our men. Moore went down on a double-quick, and, as usual, ahead of his men; he was first man in the barn, and as he entered the Butternuts were already jumping out. Moore and his men soon cleared the barn and then started for the house. Here that big sergeant in Company J (Norton) sprang in at the front door just in time to catch a bullet in his thigh, from a reb watching at the back; but that reb did not live long to brag of it, one of our boys taking him 'on the wing.' Moore soon cleared the house out and went back with his men. Later in the day the rebs again occupied the house, and Major Ellis took the regiment and drove them out, burning the house, so as not to be bothered by any more concealed sharp-shooters in it."

"Yes, I know the Major don't like to do a thing but once, so he always does it thoroughly the first time."

"It was in these charges for the possession of that house we lost more officers and men than in all the rest of the fight.

"About one o'clock in the afternoon the enemy, who had been silent so long that the boys were cooking coffee, smoking, sleeping, etc., suddenly opened all their batteries of reserve artillery upon the position held by our corps (the Second). First one great gun spoke, then, as if it had been the signal for the commencement of an artillery conversation, the whole hundred and twenty or more opened their mouths at once and poured out their thunder. A perfect storm of shot and shell rained around and among us. The boys quickly jumped to their rifles and lay down behind the wall and rail barricade. For two hours this storm of shot and shell continued, and seemed to increase in fury. Good God! I never heard any thing like it, and our regiment has been under fire 'somewhat,' as you know. The ground trembled like an aspen leaf; the air was full of small fragments of lead and iron from the shells. Then the sounds—there was the peculiar 'whoo?—whoo?—whoo-oo?' of the round shot; the 'which-one?'—'which-one?' of that fiendish Whitworth projectile, and the demoniac shriek of shells. It seemed as if all the devils in hell were holding high carnival. But, strange as it may seem, it was like many other 'sensation doings,' 'great cry and little wool,' as our regiment, and, in fact, the whole corps lost very few men by it, the missiles passing over beyond our position, save the Whitworth projectiles which did not quite reach us, as their single gun of that description was two miles off. Had the enemy had better artillerists at their guns, or a better view of our position, I can not say what would have been the final result; but certain it is, nothing mortal could have stood that fire long, had it been better directed, and if our corps had broken that day, Gettysburg would have been a lost battle, and General Lee, instead of Heintzelman, the commanding officer in this District of Columbia to-day.

"About three P.M. the enemy's fire slackened, died away, and the smoke lifted to disclose a corps of the rebel 'Grand Army of Northern Virginia,' advancing across the long level plain in our front, in three magnificent lines of battle, with the troops massed in close column by division on both flanks. How splendidly they looked! Our skirmishers, who had staid at their posts through all, gave them volley after volley as they came on, until Captain Townsend was ordered to bring his men in, which he did in admirable order; his men, loading and firing all the way, came in steadily and coolly—all that were left of them, for a good half of them were killed or wounded before they reached the regiment.

"On, on came the rebels, with colors flying and bayonets gleaming in the sunlight, keeping their lines as straight as if on parade: over fences and ditches they come, but still their lines never break, and still they come. For a moment all is hush along our lines, as we gaze in silent admiration at these brave rebs; then our division commander,

* REBEL BATTLE-FLAGS CAPTURED.

First Tennessee, captured by the Fourteenth Connecticut Volunteers at Gettysburg, July 3, 1863.

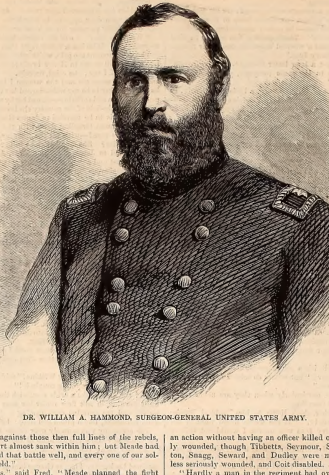
Fourteenth Tennessee, captured by the Fourteenth Connecticut Volunteers at Gettysburg, July 3, 1863.

Sixteenth North Carolina Regiment, captured by the Fourteenth Connecticut Volunteers at Gettysburg, July 3, 1863.

Battle-flag, State not given, captured by the Fourteenth Connecticut Volunteers at Gettysburg, July 3.

Battle-flag, State not given, captured by the Fourteenth Connecticut Volunteers.

'Aleck Hayes,' rides up, and, pointing to the last fence the enemy must cross before reaching us, says, 'Don't fire till they get to that fence; then let 'em have.'



"On, on, come the rebs, till we can see the whites of their eyes, and hear their officers command, 'Steady, boys, steady!' They reach the fence, some hundred yards in front of us, when suddenly the command 'Fire!' rings down our line; and, rising as one man, the rifles of the old Second Army Corps ring a death-knell for many a brave heart, in butternut dress, worthy of a better cause—a knell that will ring in the hearts of many mothers, sisters, and wives, on many a plantation in the sunny South, where there will be weeping and wailing for the soldier who never returns, who sleeps at Gettysburg. 'Load and fire at will!' Oh Heaven! how we poured our fire into them then—a merciless hail of lead! Their first line wavers, breaks, and runs; some of their color sergeants halt and plant their standards firmly in the ground; they are too well disciplined to have their colors yet. But they stop only for a moment; then fall back, colors and all. They fall back, but rally, and dress on the other line, under a tremendous fire from our advancing rifles: rally, and come on again to meet their death. Line after line of rebels come up, deliver their fire, one volley, and they are mown down like the grass of the field. They fall back, form, and come up again, with their battle-flags still waving; but again they are driven back.

"On our right is a break in the line, where a battery has been in position, but, falling short of ammunition, and unable to move it off under such a heavy fire, the gunners have abandoned it to its fate. Some of the rebels gain a footing here. One daring fellow leaps upon the gun, and waves his rebel flag. In an instant a right oblique fire from 'ours,' and a left oblique from the regiment on the left of the position, rolls the ragged rebel and rebel rag in the dust, rolls the determined force back from the gun, and it is ours.

"By-and-by the enemy's lines come up smaller and thinner, break quicker, and are longer in forming. Our boys are wild with excitement, and grow reckless. Lieutenant John Tibbetts stands up yelling like mad. 'Give it to 'em! give it to 'em!' A bullet enters his arm—that same arm in which he caught two bullets at Antietam: Johnny's gone now from his side: he turns quickly to his First Lieutenant, saying, 'I have got another bullet in the same old arm, but I don't care a d——n!' Heaven forgive Johnny! rebel lead will sometimes bring rebel words with it. All of 'Orse' are carried away with excitement; the Sergeant-Major leaps a wall, dashes down among the rebs, and brings back a battle-flag; others follow our Sergeant-Major: and before the enemy's repulse becomes a rout we of the Fourteenth have six of their battle-flags.

"Prisoners are brought in by hundreds, officers and men. We pay no attention to them, being too busy sending our lusties messengers after the now flying hosts. One of our prisoners, a rebel officer, turns to me, saying, 'Where are the men we've been fighting?' 'Here,' I answer, pointing down our short thin line. 'Good God!' says he, 'is that all? I wish I could get back.'

"Yes," I interrupted," Townsend told me that when he fell back with his skirmishers and saw the whole length of our one small, thin, little line pitted against those then full lines of the rebels, his heart almost sank within him; but Meade had planned that battle well, and every one of our soldiers told."

DR. WILLIAM A. HAMMOND, SURGEON-GENERAL UNITED STATES ARMY.

"Yes," said Fred, "Meade planned the fight well, and Hancock, Hayes, and in fact all of them fought it well. All through the fight General Hancock might be seen galloping up and down the lines of our bully corps, regardless of the leaden hail all about him; and when finally severely wounded in the hip he was carried a little to the rear, where he lay on his stretcher and still gave his orders.

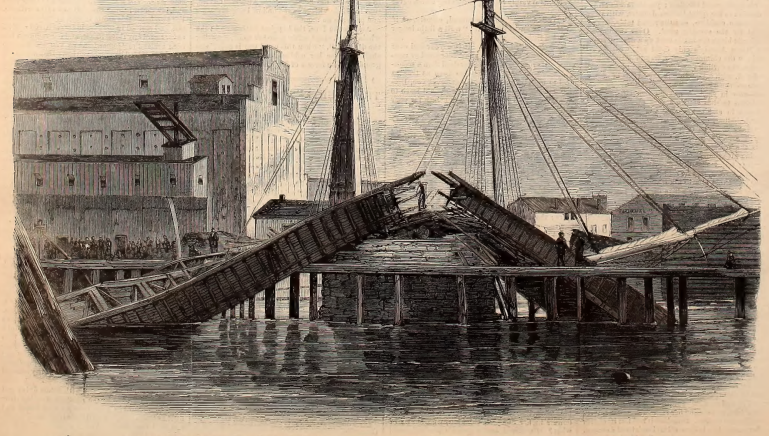
"The fight was now about over; there was only an occasional shot exchanged between the retreating rebel sharp-shooters and our own men, and I looked about me and took an account of stock. We had lost about seventy killed and wounded and taken prisoner, leaving only a hundred men fit for duty. We had killed treble that number, and taken nearly a brigade of prisoners; six stands of colors, and guns, swords, and pistols without number. For the first time we had been through an action without having an officer killed or fatally wounded, though Tibbetts, Seymour, Stoughton, Snagg, Seward, and Dudley were more or less seriously wounded, and Coit disabled.

"Hardly a man in the regiment had over two or three cartridges left. Dead and wounded rebels were piled up in heaps in front of us, especially in front of Companies A and B, where Sharpe's rifles had done effective work.

"It was a great victory. 'Fredericksburg on the other leg,' as the boys said. The rebel prisoners told us their leaders assured them that they would only meet the Pennsylvania militia; but when they saw that d—d ace of clubs (the trefoil badge of the Second Corps), a cry went through their lines—'the Army of the Potomac, by Heaven!'

"So ended the battle of Gettysburg, and the sun sank to rest that night on a battle-field that had proved that the Army of the Potomac could and would save the people of the North from invasion whenever and wherever they may be assailed.

"'Long shall the tale be told,
Yes, when our babes are old.'"



"Pshaw, Fred! you are getting sentimental. Let's go out in the air and have another cigar."

DR. WILLIAM A. HAMMOND,

SURGEON-GENERAL UNITED STATES ARMY.

DR. WILLIAM A. HAMMOND, the present Surgeon-General of the United States Army, whose portrait we give herewith, was born at Annapolis, Maryland, in 1828, and with his parents removed to Harrisburg, Pennsylvania, in 1832. At the age of sixteen he commenced the study of medicine with Dr. E. N. Roberts, of Harrisburg, and afterward attended lectures and graduated at the University of New York, in 1848. He then went to Philadelphia, and was engaged at the Pennsylvania Hospital until June 29, 1849, when he entered into the army. Ordered immediately upon duty to Santa Fe, New Mexico, he staid there three years, seeing much hard service and consequent exposure in the Indian wars, which brought on a functional disorder of the heart, and obliged him to retire from active service for a brief period. Upon his restoration to health he was sent to Florida for six months, then to West Point, from thence to Kansas and Fort Riley, where he remained for four years. As Medical Director he was on the Sioux Expedition, and in the same capacity on Exploring Expedition to the Rocky Mountains. Returning East with a somewhat disordered constitution, he nevertheless applied himself to severe study, but was eventually forced to take a trip to Europe for the recovery of his health. While in Europe he studied the army medical systems, visited laboratories, hospitals, museums, military camps and posts, thus unconsciously preparing himself for his present position, and upon his return with recovered health, after a year spent at Mackinaw in the service, he was appointed Professor of Anatomy and Physiology in the University of Maryland, at Baltimore, and also officiated as Surgeon at Baltimore Infirmary, and Lecturer on Clinical Surgery. Resigning his commission in the army, he remained in the University for about six months, when the rebellion having broken out he promptly offered his services to the Government, and accepted a subordinate position for below that to which his eminent abilities justly entitled him. Again in active service with General Patterson at Hagerstown, he was placed in charge of the General Hospital, afterward at Fredericksburg, and Baltimore with General Banks: at the latter place he organized an admirable hospital, and from thence he was sent to Wheeling, Virginia, as Medical Purveyor, and Inspector of Hospitals for Generals Rosecrans and Fremont. While here he made a capital report, and submitted plans for field hospitals which brought him prominently before the Government, and upon the dismissal of Surgeon-General Finley, he was selected to fill that important post upon the 25th of April, 1862, although the eightieth on the list of medical officers.

Dr. Hammond's contributions to Medical literature have been extensive and varied, and have procured for him a high stand among his professional brethren. Too numerous to notice in the brief space allotted us, many of them were the results of actual experiment upon himself.

TERRIBLE ACCIDENT AT THE RUSH STREET BRIDGE, CHICAGO.—FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY ALSCHUTZ.—[SEE PAGE 783.]

THE WAR IN THE SOUTHWEST—GUERILLAS HUNTING UNION MEN WITH BLOOD-HOUNDS.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE BATTLE OF BRISTOE STATION.

CAMP NEAR WARRENTON, VIRGINIA, Oct. 31, 1863.

The Editor of Harper's Weekly:

In Harper's Weekly of November 7, 1863, is a representation of the battle of Bristoe Station. Your correspondent, Mr. Waud, says: "On a hill in his rear (Warren's) staff [Meade's] and accompanying troops behind General Webb's Brigade—seen beyond the wind-mill pump, in front of a deserted cause."

That position was held by Ricketts's (Penn. rivals) Battery, Captain Arnold being over half a mile further down the railroad, and with the First Division, which brought up the rear. At the time of the position taken the enemy's lines were broken.

Your correspondent doubtless did not intend to misrepresent the facts of the case, but has done evident injustice to Captain Ricketts.

I am, Sir, yours respectfully,

C. B. BRIDEWAY,
First Lieutenant, Battery F, First Artillery, P. R. C.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

"I now's me," said Mrs. Partington, as the cane bore from school and threw his books into one chair, and his jacket into another, and his cap on the floor, saying that he didn't get the medal—"I now's me you needn't tell me you didn't get the medal, for certainly a more meddlesome boy I never knew in my natur, when the adversary comes round again you will get it."

Cardinal Aberrod had a large quantity of silver plate; and among other articles he possessed some table-cutlery, wrought in the form of different animals. A friend of his ecclesiastic received a salt-cellar made in the shape of a tiger, but forgot to return it for some time. At length, after the lapse of one or seven months, he sent it back, receiving at the same time the loan of another in the shape of a camel. The Cardinal declined to see the person who had brought the messages. "You are neat," said he, "if you agree to borrow one of my monsters." "Yes, your eminence; I am his steward. "You will be good enough to tell your master, then, that I lent him one in the form of a tiger, which is one of the swiftest animals on the earth, and he has sent me back a camel which is a turning; were I to lend him the tortoise, which is the type of the poor?" Not so—the labor of the poor make the pride of the rich.

A gentleman who had married a second time indulged in carrying on his sons in contrast to the beauties and virtues of his first consort. He had, however, barely discernment enough to discover that the subject was not an agreeable one to his present lady. "Excuse me, Madam," said he, "I am a little absent-minded sometimes for the dear deceased." "Upon my honor," said the lady, "I can not hardly believe that I am so sincere a mourner for her as you can be."

SENSITIVE.—A gentleman shaved an urchin who had a large slice of watermelon in his hand, and who was crying very bitterly. "My son," he exclaimed, "what are you crying about? Has your father whipped you?" "No sir—but he ain't on my brend—boo-hoo-o-o!" "Oh, is that all?" said the gentleman, very much relieved, "cry up your tater-trap. "It ain't so much the butter," retorted the little urchin; "it's the principle of the thing I'm mad."

"How is Europe bonded?" said a teacher to one of his little pupils. "I thou, he, she, it," was the reply. "For shame, dunce! Try again." "Oh, please, Sir, I remember now; that is the answer to one of my grammar questions, and I thought I was to be heard my grammar first."

"You say, Mr. Jay, that you saw the plaintiff leave the house. Was he in a hurry?" "Yes, Sir." "Do you know what caused the haste?" "I'm not certain; but I think it was the fact that I had a writ of attachment on his heels with." "That will do, Mr. Jay. Clerk, call the next witness."

"I'll take the shine out of you," as the eclipse said to the moon.

"You be hanged," as the washer-woman said to the clothes.

"I am transported to see you," as the convict said to the kangaroo.

"We pray for meats," as the fates remarked when they jumped into the frying-pan.

"What blessings children are!" as the registrar observed when he took the fees for registering them.

A judge in India is reported to have thus addressed a prisoner convicted of theft: "Man, prior to your existence," Prisoner at the bar, Providence has given you a good degree of health and strength, instead of which you go about the country stealing sucks."

Women should remember that men would often ring their unable bells sooner by using their tongues.

It is said that the pig ran away from the butcher because he had heard that prevention is better than cure.

Two batmen were talking at Brighton the other day, when one said to the other "whether the Prince of Wales ever went to church. "Lord bless you" said he, "what should he go there for? We never goes to church unless to pray for ourselves, but there are enough to pray for him."

Joanna Sotten, being in company with Charles the Bald, King of France, that monarch merrily said, "What is the difference between a hen and a bishop?" "The one sat upon the King, said, "Only the breadth of the table."

A person who looks at the world in somewhat gloomy colors, recently complained in M. Aubert's presence how hard it was to get on among grow old. "Stand at it," replied the veteran composer, "it seems to be the only means you discovered of enjoying long life."

A Yankee has invented a rat exterminator, consisting of a sort of powder snuff. The animal jerks his head off at the third attempt.

"Why don't you wheel the barrow of coals, Ned?" said a master to one of his sons. "It's not a very hard job; there's an inclined plane to relieve you." "Ah!" replied Ned, who had more relish for wit than work; "the plane may be inclined but I am not."

What commodity is always offended at coal?—The lee.

In what circumstances is a woman that wears stays?—Straitened circumstances.

The young fellow who makes engagements with the feline only to break them off is a beau of promise.

A LEGAL OPINION.—It is not libelous to call a man who has kicked you a coward, if his unmanliness was most popular in the spiritual world. The reply was, "Reading our own obituary notices."

A gentleman who was in arrears for several weeks' board and lodging, complained one morning that his coffee was not settled. "You had better settle for the coffee and then complain," said the landlady.

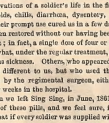
If a man has but one eye, let him put a wife, and she will be his other I.

ADVERTISEMEN'. I'S.

Baldness.

BOSTON, NOVEMBER 24, 1859.

Gentlemen: When I first used your Cocosine, I had been bald seven years. In the mean time I had tried a dozen different preparations, specially recommended for baldness (and all claiming to be infallible), without any beneficial effect.



The top of my household urged me to try your Cocosine, which I did, to please them, not having, myself, any faith in the power of man to restore my hair. I have used the contents of one bottle, and my bald pate is covered all over with young hair, about three-eighths of an inch long, which appears strong and healthy, and determined to grow.

In a word, your Cocosine is excellent—the best preparation for the hair I have ever known, and the only one which accomplishes more than it promises.

Very truly your obliged and grateful servant,

D. T. MERWIN.

MESSRS. JOSEPH BURNETT & CO., Boston.

Elliot's New Repeaters

Are now ready. The most safe, compact, durable, effective, sure, and reliable Revolvers made. Every large bale (No. 32 cartridges), are rapidly loaded and fired—conveniently carried in the vest—weight, five inches—four barrels—each rifled grain to bit. The Trade supplied.

ELLIOT ARMS CO., 99 Broadway, N. Y.

SOLDIERS' COMPANY PINS.

Constantly on hand and Engraved to Order, and sent free on receipt of Price.

Every Co. from A to M Sold Silver. $1.
Solid Silver, with Letters in GOLD Relief, $1 50.
Solid 18 k. GOLD, $3 50.

Corps Badges

Sent free by Mail or Express on receipt of Price.
Solid Silver, $1 50. Enameled. Solid Silver, $1 50. Enameled.

Solid Gold, $4. Solid Gold, $4.
Badges for the 1st, 2d, 3d, 5th, 6th, 11th, and 12th Army Corps.
1st Division Enameled. 2d Division White, 3d Division Blue.
Name but perfect Goods sent.
Terms Cash in advance. Send for a Catalogue.
Address C. L. BABCK & CO.,
99 Broadway, New York.

Successors to J. G. PACKARD & CO.

Watches! Watches!

The Cheapest and Best.

ARBANDALE & CO., 219 Broadway, invite attention to their globular watches. The astronomical of London Watch not only tells the time of day, but also motion, on a beautifully dial, a hand pointing only sufficiency precision to the day of the month! It has massive fine gold plate hunting case, full jewelled movements, Chronometer balance, and all the recent improvements. Everybody should have one $40 00

The Officer's Watch, a great favorite in the Army, has the prized movements, and is made in the handsome cases of sterling silver, beautifully engraved, containing the Patent Key Watch. Warranted to be correct, and the hour may be ascertained without opening the case. Patent Lever Watch, Silver $20 00

Send for circular describing all our Watches. We want agents in every Regiment and every one can supply liberal terms. All Watches sent out in good working order, properly regulated, warranted, and sent free of charge.

ARBANDALE & CO., 219 Broadway, New York.

H. A. HARVEY, 84 Maiden Lane, N. Y., TWINES, Boxes, CORDAGE, and Yarn, Steam Packing, Wick, CARPET WARP, Fish Lines, Blocking Cord, Lamp Cord and Surgeons' Tow, Writing and Wrapping PAPER. Envelopes, and Paper Bags.

NEW WORK FOR CANVASSERS.—Send for circulars of the "GEM OF CANVASSING BOOKS." Agents wanted for every county. Address E. P. HOYEY, No. 13 Spruce Street, New York.

How the United States

CAN, SAVE

50,000,000 DOLLARS

PER ANNUM.

The Importance of BRANDRETH'S PILLS as a remedial Agent is becoming more and more known. There is now no doubt but if used by all classes when sick, the sum of disease would be greatly reduced. But if adopted by Medical Authority in the Army of the United States, a clear saving of Fifty Millions of Dollars would be made, by securing the health and lives of our brave soldiers.

MORE TESTIMONY.

New York, Oct. 29, 1863.

DR. B. BRANDRETH—SIR: I noticed, in the New York Herald of this date, a letter from some of the surviving members of Co. F, 17th Regt., N. Y. S. Vols., extolling your valuable Pills, which I fully and freely endorse, having been in command of the company from the 1st day of August, 1861, until the 2d of June, 1863, when the company was mustered out of the service, and discharged in this city. The percentage of men reported sick during that time was much less than in any other company of the Regiment, owing, as I fully believe, to the free use of your Pills, which were supplied to the other soldiers. I believe them to be invaluable in camp or in the field.

Respectfully yours,

JOHN VICKERS
Captain Co. F, 17th Regt., N. Y. V.

We, the undersigned, some surviving members of Company F, Seventeenth New York State Volunteers, hereby certify that we used Brandreth's Pills during our two years service, and to them we attribute the fact that our constitutions in the main, the necessary hardships and privations of a soldier's life in the field. In contiveness, colds, chills, diarrhœa, dysentery, and typhoid fever, they prompt use acted in a few days. Our health was often restored without our having been entered on the sick list; in fact, a single dose of four or five pills usually cured what, under the old treatment, would subject us to a serious sickness. Others, who appeared to be sick in no respect different to us, but who used the remedies prescribed by the regimental surgeon, either died or were sick for weeks in the hospital.

When we left Sing Sing, in June, 1861, you gave us a supply of these pills, and I am sure, from our experience, that if every soldier was supplied with the medicine the general health of the army would be greatly improved. For ourselves, in the ever-moving, unwearying toil of our wants in the way of physic, and we have known and tested it from our childhood, and our parents before us.

Sing Sing, Oct. 26, 1863.

JOHN VICKERS, Capt.
J. L. BENNETT, 1st Lieut.
WILLIAM SEE, 1st Sergeant.
G H. DEARING, 2d Sergeant.
DENNIS LANG, 3d Sergeant.
ALBERT LANG, 4th Sergeant.
BENJ. F. BROWN, 1st Corporal.
WILLIAM HAMILTON, 2d Corporal.
NOAH W. MILLER, 3d Corporal.
THEO. CROFUT, Drummer.
GEO. B. COR, Drummer.

FRANCIS J. JENNINGS.
LEWIS B. COX.
WM. W. CAMPBELL.
WM. J. CHARLTON.
ELLIS JONES.
ALBERT WESLEY.
WM. VAN WART.
JOHN W. GRIFFIN.
JAMES B. CROFUT.
WILLIAM HOLMES.
ROSCOE K. WATSON.
WILLIAM W. HOLMES.
FREDERICK HUNT.
MARTIN SEE.
LEGIAH TUTTLE.
GEO. ACKERLEY.
JOTHOM CARPENTER.
ISAAM BEADLE.
CHAS. WRIGHT.
ALFRED WILKINS.
SANDFORD OLMSTEAD.
WILLIAM GRIFFIN.
FULLER CARPENTER.
GEO. AYLES.
JAMES BENTLEY.
WILLIAM J. P. HEWETT.
ROBERT W. WESTCOTT.
JNO. L. BREDENBURGH.
JACOB H. DYCKMAN.
THOMAS A. BARLOW.
JOHN W BODINE.
HENRY HANNAH.
JAMES M. DENNIS.
WILLIAM WALDRON.
EDGAR WALDRON.
JOHN CONOVER.
WARREN WRIGHT.
JACOB BAKER.
DAVID BAKER.

T. B. LANE, 1st Lt. 38th N. Y. Vols.
M. C. EARLE, 1st Sergt. Co. D. 176th N. Y. Vols.
WM. KNIGHT, Co. K, 1st N. Y. Art'y.
ABRAM H. MILLER, Co. I. 4th N. Y. Art'y.
MILLARD F. LANNING, Musician, 1st N. Y. Vols.
WILLIAM HOLMES, Co. F, Heavy's Sharpshoot.
CASSUS BISHOP, Co. E. 99th N. Y. Vols.
ELLIOT SEE, Co. B. 88th N. Y. Vols.
DANIEL GILLIS, Co. B. 124 M. N. Y. Vols.
CALEB S. FRISBIE, Co. B. 5th N. Y. Vols.

PRINCIPAL OFFICE, No. 294 Canal Street.
Also sold at No. 4 Union Square, and by all dealers.
See B. BRANDRETH in white letters in the Government stamp, which secure the genuine.

ALL ARTICLES FOR SOLDIERS
At Baltimore, Washington, and all places occupied by Union troops, should be sent by HARNDEN'S EXPRESS, No. 74 Broadway, New York, the largest low rates.

$75 A MONTH! I want to hire Agents in every county at $75 a month, expenses paid, to sell my new cheap Family Knitting Machine. Address S. MADISON, Alfred, Maine.

A magnificent Photograph of
The Russian Admiral Lisovski
Commanding the Russian Fleet in New York Harbor,
Sent to any address on receipt of 50 cents. Address
DAVIS ADAMS, Broadway P. O., New York.

"Moustaches and Whiskers in 42 Days."
Don't be bamboozled with QUACKERY. The "GREAT SECRET" explained in the "Book of Wonders." 32,000 sold. 12mo, cloth, 75c.; 8 for $1, post-paid. Address C. E. HUNTER & CO., Hinsdale, N. H.

Cloaks and Mantillas.
BRODIE,
The Leader of Fashions!
Opened his Fall Stock on Thursday, 8th inst,
And as usual stands unrivaled for Style, Quality, AND VARIETY.
300 Canal Street, New York.
The Greatest Little Books
Of Modern Times.
Now Ready the
First and Second Books
OF THE
New Gospel of Peace
According to St. Benjamin.
These little books have caused more talk and created a greater sensation than anything of the kind ever printed. Northern Peace Advocates are shown up in the most peculiar style. Price of each book 15 cents. Sent, postpaid, on receipt of 18 cents. Liberal terms to dealers.
SINCLAIR TOUSEY, 121 Nassau St., New York.

A Splendid Holiday or Bridal Present.
HARPER'S
Illuminated and Pictorial
BIBLE.
Including the Apocrypha. Superbly embellished by over Sixteen Hundred Illustrations, exquisitely engraved by Adams after Designs by Chapman, exclusive of a Series of Rich Illustrations in Colors, comprising Frontispieces, Presentation Plate, Family Record, Title-pages, &c. The whole forming a gorgeous Folio Volume.
Paper.—Medium, gilt edges, beveled and panel sides, $25 00; Morocco extra, gilt edges, $32 50; Full calf, marbled edges, blank antiques, $40 00; Full Turkey, marbled edges, $76 00.
Harper's Pictorial Bible is printed from the standard copy of the American Bible Society, and contains Marginal References, the Apocrypha, a Concordance, Chronological Table, List of Proper Names, General Index, Table of Weights, Measures, &c., &c. Large Type, Pearl Pica. Titles to the Old and New Testaments, Family Record, Presentation Plate, Historical Illustrations, Initial Letters to the chapters, Ornamental Borders, &c., are from original designs, drawn on wood by the artists, by J. G. Chapman, Esq., of New York. In addition to which, there are numerous large Engravings in the text, by distinguished modern artists in France and England; to which a full index is given.
HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers, N— ork.
For sale by A. WHELAN & CO., Boston; CHARLES DE SILVER & SON, Philadelphia; CUSHING & BAILEY, Baltimore; FRANCE TAYLOR, Washington; HENRY CLARKE & CO., Cincinnati; PETERS & WILSON, Louisville; R. S. GRAVES & CO., Chicago; DAWSON & BROTHERS, Montreal.

RICH LACES,

Just received by MILLER & GRANT, No. 768 Broadway, Mack, Chantilly Barbes, Point Applique Collars, Point Gaze Collars, Point Applique Sleeves, &c., guaranteed of high quality, and which are worthy the attention of purchasers.

Broker's Stock of unredeemed Goods for sale at $1 25 cash apiece. Also, a large assortment of fine and valuable goods worth from 75 cents to $200 each. Any person sending 25 cents, with the number wanted, will have what article they will receive. For other inducements send 3 cents for circular. Address
ANDREWS & CO., 108 Sudbury St., Boston, Mass.

The Printer's Devil. a handsome Illustration of Early and Miscellaneous Literature, will be sent six months on Trial for 25 cents. Send and get it. Puzzles, Prize Tales, and Valuable Prizes to Subscribers.
"Printer's Devil, 113 Fulton St., New York."

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK,
Have just published:
MARTIN POLE. A Novel. By Percival Sandreen, Author of "Abel Drake's Wife," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

ELEANOR'S VICTORY. A Novel. By Miss Braddon, Author of "Aurora Floyd," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

DAILY WALK WITH WISE MEN. Religious Exercises for Every Day in the Year. Selected, Arranged, and specially Adapted, by Rev. Nelson Head. Large 12mo, Cloth, $1 00.

THE RING OF AMASIS. From the Papers of a German Physician. By Bulwer Lytton (Owen Meredith). 12mo, Cloth, $1 00.

ELEANOR'S VICTORY. A Novel. By M. E. Braddon, Author of "Aurora Floyd," "Lady Audley's Secret," &c. With Illustrations. 8vo, paper, 50 cents.

ALCOCK'S JAPAN. The Capital of the Tycoon: a Narrative of a Three Years' Residence in Japan. By Sir Rutherford Alcock, K.C.B., Her Majesty's Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to Japan. With Maps and Engravings. 2 vols. 12mo, Cloth, $3 00.

THE BIVOUAC AND THE BATTLE-FIELD; or, Campaign Sketches in Virginia and Maryland. By Captain George F. Noyes. 12mo, Cloth, $1 25.

KNAPP'S FRENCH READING-BOOK; CHRESTOMATHIE FRANÇAISE; Consisting of Selections from the best French Writers, with Copious References to the Author's Grammar. By Charles Knapp, Professor of Modern Ancient Literature in Madison University, N. Y. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

KAY'S CONDITION OF THE ENGLISH PEOPLE. The Social Condition and Education of the People in England. By Joseph Kay, Esq., M.A., of Trinity College, Cambridge; Barrister at Law; and late Travelling Bachelor of the University of Cambridge. 12mo, Cloth, $1 00.

SEA-KINGS AND NAVAL HEROES. A Book for Youth. By John G. Edgar, Author of "History for Boys," "Boyhood of Great Men," "Footprints of Famous Men," "Wars of the Roses," &c., &c. Illustrated by 12 Steel Engravings. 12mo, Cloth, $1 00.

Any of the above Works sent by mail, post-paid, on receipt of price.

J. H. Winslow & Co.,
100,000
WATCHES, CHAINS, &c., &c.
Worth $500,000.

To be sold for One Dollar each, without regard to value, and not to be paid for till you know what you are to get.

SPLENDID LIST!!

OF ARTICLES TO BE SOLD FOR ONE DOLLAR EACH.

100 Gold Hunting Cased Watches	$100 00 each.
100 Gold Watches	60 00 each.
200 Ladies' Gold Watches	35 00 each.
500 Ladies' and Gent's Silver Watches	15 00 each.
3000 Vest and Neck Chains	5 00 to 10 00 each.
3000 Gold Band Bracelets	5 00 to 10 00 each.
3000 " " "	3 00 to 5 00 each.
3000 Cameo Brooches	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Mosaic and Jet Brooches	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Lava and Florentine Brooches	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Coral, Opal, and Em. Brooches	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Cameo Ear Drops	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Mosaic and Jet Ear Drops	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Lava and Florentine Ear Drops	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Coral, Em., and Opal Ear Drops	4 00 to 8 00 each.
5100 Gent's Breast Pins	2 50 to 8 00 each.
3000 Watch Keys	2 00 to 6 00 each.
5000 Fob and Ribbon Slides	2 00 to 6 00 each.
5000 Sets of Bosom Studs	2 50 to 6 00 each.
5000 Sleeve Buttons	2 50 to 6 00 each.
6000 Plain Rings	2 50 to 5 00 each.
6000 Stone Set Rings	2 50 to 6 00 each.
6000 Lockets	2 50 to 10 00 each.
5000 Sets Ladies' Jewelry	5 00 to 10 00 each.
10000 Gold Pens, Silver M'ted Holders	4 00 to 5 00 each.
10000 Gold Pens, with Silver Extension Cases and Pencils	4 00 to 6 00 each.

All of the above list of Goods will be sold for one dollar each. Certificates of all the various articles, stating what each one can have, are first put into envelopes, sealed up, and mixed; and when ordered, are taken out without regard to choice, and sent by mail, thus giving all a fair chance. On receipt of the Certificate, you will see what you can have, and then it is at your option to send one dollar and take the article or not.

In all transactions by mail, we shall charge for forwarding the Certificates, paying postage, and doing the business, 25 cents each, which must be inclosed when the Certificate is sent for. Five Certificates will be sent for $1; eleven for $2; thirty for $5; sixty-five for $10; and a hundred for $15.

Agents.—Those acting as Agents will be allowed ten cents on every Certificate ordered by them, provided their remittance amounts to one dollar. Agents will collect 25 cents for every Certificate, and remit 15 cents to us, either in cash or postage stamps. Great caution should be used by our correspondents in regard to giving their correct address, Town, County, and State. Address

J. H. WINSLOW & CO.,
208 Broadway, New York.

$200! $150! $100! $50!
PREMIUMS.

To Editors and Others!

I will pay the above-named amounts for the best four articles on either my Soap, Saleratus, or Concentrated Potash.

The article must state the writer's experience in using the goods, and must be not less than ten lines, and be published in the editorial columns of any good family newspaper.

Any party wishing to compete for the above, and desiring further information, may address the underisgned. Each person writing and publishing a notice as above, will mail a marked copy of the paper containing the notice to me, and also write me by mail, giving full address.

The Premiums will be awarded on the fourth day of July, 1864. B. T. BABBITT,
64 to 74 Washington Street, New York.

ENAMELED CHAMBER FURNITURE.—The best assortment of Enameled Furniture, in all colors and styles, Walnut and Chestnut, Plain and Ornamental, in Suites. Wholesale and Retail. Also, Mattresses and Paillasses. WARREN WARD, No. 277 Canal St., N. Y.

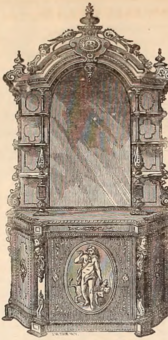
DR. STERLING'S
AMBROSIA
is a stimulating oily extract of roots, barks, and herbs. It will cure all diseases of the scalp and itching of the head; entirely eradicates dandruff, prevents the hair from falling out or from turning prematurely gray, causing it to grow thick and long. It is entirely different from all other preparations, and can be relied on.

PRICE $1 00 PER BOX, containing two bottles. DR. H. H. STERLING, Sole Proprietor, Depot No. 493 Broadway. For sale by all druggists.

HORSES AT AUCTION.—The most valuable collection of TROTTING STOCK ever offered will be sold at public auction on the farm of Mr. BOWNE, Flushing, Long Island, on THURSDAY, November 19, 1863—about 50 in number—consisting of TORONTO CHIEF, the EUREKA MARE, SONTAG (in foal), and three of her colts by CHIEF.

A superior lot of Brood Mares (in foal), and colts at their foot. Also yearlings, two-year-old, and three-year-old stallions and fillies, all sired by TORONTO CHIEF.

Also a few Road Horses, and the fine Durham Bull FOREST KING (three years old), bred by SAMUEL THORNE, Esq.



Catalogues sent by mail. Apply to
JAMES M. MILLER, Auctioneer,
28 Pine Street, New York.

All interested in the Art should send for the PHONOGRAPHIC VISITOR, No. 1, 7 cents, post-paid. Nos. 1 and 2, 12 cents. No. 2 explains the Phonographic Alphabet, given above, and all the more general principles of the Art. ANDREW J. GRAHAM, 491 Broadway, N. Y.

EMPLOYMENT

At your own homes. It is the greatest discovery of the age. Profits 100 per cent. Demand staple as Flour. Full particulars sent free, on receipt of two stamps. Address C. MUNRO BROWN, 74 Bleecker St., N. Y.

MEEKS' CABINET
FURNITURE
WAREROOMS,
No. 699 BROADWAY,
AND
333 and 335 Fourth Street.

The largest assortment of rich and plain furniture in the city, made of the very best well-seasoned and selected material, by the best workmen in the country, under the immediate supervision of the firm, whose reputation for excellence of manufacture has been established seventy years. Also, an assortment of superior COTTAGE FURNITURE.

☞ Goods packed and shipped to all parts of the world.

Attention, Soldiers!

In solid 18 k. gold, $3 50.

Every soldier should have a BADGE WITH HIS NAME MARKED DISTINCTLY upon it. The Subscribers will forward to any soldier in the Army a solid Silver Badge, with his Name, Company, and Regiment engraved upon it, on receipt of One Dollar. The above cut represents size and style of Badge furnished. It can be fastened to any garment. Address

DROWNE & MOORE,
Manufacturing Jewelers, 208 Broadway, New York.

N.B.—All kinds of Corps and Co. Pins, Enameled, in Red, White, and Blue, by the one, 100, or 1000.

American Watches
For Soldiers
AT REDUCED PRICES.

American Watches for Americans!

The American Watch Company give notice that they have lately issued a new style of Watch, expressly designed for Soldiers and others who desire a good watch at a moderate price. These watches are intended to displace the worthless, cheap watches of British and Swiss manufacture with which the country is flooded, and which were never expected to keep time when they were made, being refuse manufactures sent to this country because unsalable at home, and used here only for jockeying and swindling purposes.

We offer to sell our Watch, which is of THE MOST SUBSTANTIAL MANUFACTURE, AN ACCURATE AND DURABLE TIME-KEEPER, and in Sterling Silver Cases, Hunting pattern, at nearly as low a price as is asked for the fancy-named Ancres and Lepines of foreign make, already referred to.

We have named the new series of Watches, Wm. Ellery, Boston, Mass., which name will be found on the plate of every watch of this manufacture, and is one of our trade-marks.

Sold by all respectable watch dealers in the loyal states. Wholesale orders should be addressed to

ROBBINS & APPLETON,
Agents of the American Watch Company,
182 BROADWAY, N. Y.

Union Playing Cards.

Colonel for King, Goddess of Liberty for Queen, and Major for Jack. 52 enameled cards to the pack. Eagles, Shields, Stars, and Flags are the suits, and you can play all the usual games. Two packs, in cases, mailed free on receipt of $1. The usual discount to the trade. Send for a Circular. Address AMERICAN CARD COMPANY,
455 Broadway, N. Y., or 165 William Street, N. Y.

Something to Do—"pleasant and profitable." Good Books, ready sales, and good profits. Agents wanted. Address, with stamp, Fowler and Wells, 308 Broadway, New York.

DO YOU WANT LUXURIANT WHISKERS OR MUSTACHES?—My Onguent will force them to grow heavily in six weeks (upon the smoothest face) without stain or injury to the skin. Price $1—sent by mail, post free, to any address, on receipt of an order. R. G. GRAHAM, No. 109 Nassau Street, N. Y.

THE "RIDGEWOOD" PATENT
SMOKING CASE.

Most ingenious in its combination of the Metallic Case, containing Pipe and Stem, Matches and Pipe Cleaner, with a handsome Tobacco Pouch attached, filling the Pipe by a valve, without use of the fingers or waste of Tobacco, the whole securing freedom from all odor, and portable as a Cigar Case. It is made for service, of various styles, at $1 50, $1 88, $2 25, $2 50, and $2 75 to $3 75 and $5 00; the two latter richly plated and engraved. Nothing can excel its comfort, utility, and economy for all smokers. As a Present to friends nothing could be more acceptable. For the Soldier it is invaluable. Also

The Ridgewood Smoking Tobacco,

Of superior quality and flavor, in packages of various sizes. A liberal discount to Dealers. Single Cases sent by mail, paid, on receipt of price and 25 cts.
RIDGEWOOD MANUFACTURING CO.,
Office 429 Broadway, cor. Howard Street, New York.

BUSINESS AGENCY.

The best Pianos, Melodeons, Sewing Machines, &c., furnished at less than usual prices. Also Books and Stationery, and Articles for Soldier's Use.

Address GEO. G. SAXE, 37 Park Row, N. Y. References, Harper & Brothers, D. Appleton & Co., Carlton & Porter, and others.

Just what every Family wants. Savage & Co.'s No Chimney Burner for Hand Lamps and Lanterns, burns Kerosene Oil with a brilliant light without chimney, smoke, or odor. Saves 25 per cent. Office 202 Fulton St., N. Y. Agents wanted. Send for circular. Sample sent free for 50 cts. American Institute awarded 1st Premium and Medal, 1863.

6000 AGENTS wanted, to sell SIX NEW INVENTIONS—two very recent, and of great value to families; all pay great profits to Agents. Send 4 stamps and get 80 pages particulars. Ephraim Brown, Lowell, Mass.

Sportsmen, Tourists, and Army and Navy Officers.
Powerful and Brilliant Double Glasses.

Portability combined with great power in Field, Marine, Tourists', Opera, and general out-door day and night double perspective glasses, will show distinctly a person to know him at from 2 to 6 miles. Spectacles of the greatest transparent power to strengthen and improve the sight, without the distressing result of frequent changes. Catalogues sent by enclosing stamp.

SEMMONS, Oculists—Optician,
669½ Broadway, New York.

Books by return Post to any Post-Office in the U. S.
GOOD BOOKS BY MAIL.—We send all Books prepaid by return of FIRST MAIL, at publishers' prices. Address
FOWLER & WELLS, No. 308 Broadway, N. Y.

HOSTETTER S
CELEBRATED
STOMACH BITTERS

FEVER AND AGUE EXTINGUISHED.—Martyrs to intermittent fever, a word with you. The responsibility for your sufferings rests upon yourselves. Just as surely as you shake to-day, or will shake to-morrow, HOSTETTER'S CELEBRATED STOMACH BITTERS will extinguish the disease under which you labor. Had you taken this genial tonic as a preventive, you would have no need of it as a cure, for it renders the system impervious to all miasmatic fevers. But since you neglected the precaution, rid yourselves without delay of the complaint by resorting to the only reliable remedy. Break the chills with HOSTETTER'S BITTERS, and they will return no more. This is the experience of thousands, and it will be yours. Quinine is a slow means of relief; it is nauseous to the last degree; it is more dangerous than the malady itself; in many cases it utterly fails. How different is the effect of the BITTERS. Their curative action is rapid; they are agreeable to the palate; they are not only entirely harmless, but tend inevitably to strengthen the constitution and prolong life; they never have failed, and it is confidently assumed that they never can fail in any case of fever and ague, however inveterate in its character. To be without HOSTETTER'S BITTERS in any region infested with intermittent or remittent fever, is simply to reject safety and court disease.

Sold by all Druggists and Family Grocers.

Hostetter's Stomach Bitters,

Prepared and sold by
HOSTETTER & SMITH, Pittsburgh, Pa.
Depot for New York, 476 Broadway.

AGENTS WANTED.—Call and examine, or 10 samples sent free by mail for 20 cents, that retail for $2, urgently needed by every person, by
R. L. WOLCOTT, 170 Chatham Square, N. Y.

Printing-Press for Sale.

One Taylor Double Cylinder, five Rollers, Table Distribution, Bed 38x51. Price $3500.
Apply to HARPER & BROTHERS, 329 Pearl St., N.Y.

HUBBARD BRO'S
IMPORTERS of WATCHES
NEW YORK.

Are offering the cheapest, most accurate, durable, and saleable Watches in the American market! They are the sole consignees in this country for the celebrated

Magic Time Observers,

The Perfection of Mechanism!
Being a Hunting, or Open Face, or Lady's or Gentleman's Watch combined, with Patent Self-winding Improvement.

A most pleasing novelty. One of the prettiest, most convenient, and decidedly the best and cheapest timepiece for general and reliable use ever offered. It has within it and connected with its machinery its own winding attachment, rendering a key entirely unnecessary. The cases of this Watch are composed of two metals, the outer one being fine 16 carat gold. It has the improved ruby action lever movement, and is warranted an accurate timepiece. Price, superbly engraved, per case of half dozen, $204. Sample watches in neat morocco boxes, $35. If sent by mail, the postage is 36 cents; registering, 20 cents.

Silver Watches!
First-Class Hunting Time-Pieces.

FOR ACCURACY OF MOVEMENT, BEAUTY OF MATERIAL, AND, ABOVE ALL, CHEAPNESS IN PRICE, THESE WATCHES MUST INSURE

UNIVERSAL APPROBATION!

An imitation so faultless that it can hardly be detected by the most experienced judges. The material being of two metals, the outer one first quality Silver and the inner one German Silver, it can not be recognized by cutting or heavy engraving, making it not only in appearance, but in durability, the best resemblance of Solid Sterling Silver in existence.

The sale of these watches in the army is a source of enormous profit, retailing, as they very readily do, at $25 and upward. Many hundred dollars can be made in a single pay-day by any one of ordinary business tact!

At Wholesale only! In heavy hunting cases, beautifully engraved, white enamel dial, and fancy cut hands, in good running order, by the half dozen, $66; postage, $2 38; registering, 20 cts. Sold only by the case. Can be safely sent by mail.

Our importations are novelties produced by no other house, combining greater accuracy as timekeepers, being more elaborately and artistically finished, and offered at prices challenging competition from all other hands.

The press in all parts of the country voluntarily attest the superiority of our watches. Their encomiums are emphatic, speaking directly to the point, in a manner not to be misunderstood.

"Particularly valuable for officers in the army, and travelers."—Frank Leslie's, Feb. 21.

"Prettiest, best, and cheapest time-pieces ever offered."—N. Y. Illustrated News, Jan. 10.

"Exceed other manufactures in point of accuracy and elegance."—Phila. Army and Navy Gazette, May 9.

"An improvement on ordinary timepieces, and invaluable for railroad men."—N. Y. Am. Railroad Journal, Aug. 9.

"Elaborately and artistically finished."—N. Y. Scottish American, July 30.

"Combine great accuracy as timekeepers."—Pittsburg, Pa., Chronicle, July 27.

"Very pretty and durable watches for the army."—N. Y. Army and Navy Journ. (Government organ), Aug. 29.

"One of the oldest and most reliable houses in business."—Louisville, Ky., Journal, July 31.

☞ Watches will be sent, by express only, to St. Louis, Cairo, Louisville, Washington, and all places North of those cities, with bill for collection on delivery. We can not send South of those points, as the Expresses peremptorily refuse making collections on such precarious localities, so that it will be necessary for buyers in the disloyal States to send payment in advance. We shall, in all instances, require an advance remittance of two dollars or more as proof of sincerity. Thus our friends in the army, quartered at or near those cities, can make purchases without any fear whatever of loss, receiving their goods before payment is required. Those in the interior of rebeldom, who have to send payment in advance, will please send by Express, when practicable; if not, send by mail in a registered letter; if even that is impossible, send an ordinary letter, not marking in any manner so as to excite curiosity. No deduction whatever will be made from our prices, neither will Watches be sold in any less quantities than explicitly stated. No Agents employed. Buyers must deal directly with us!

HUBBARD BROS., Sole Importers,
Broadway, cor. Courtlandt St., New York.

The Soldier to his Mother. Babylon is Fallen; sequel to "Kingdom Coming," each 25 c. Musician's Omnibus, 700 tunes, for Flute or Violin, $1. "Union Collection," 50 duets for Violin and Piano, 50 c. Italian and Silk Violin Strings, 25 c., mailed. Musical Instruments repaired. Frederick Blume, 208 Bowery, N. Y.

Good Music for Winter Evenings.

The "Home Circle," a collection of choice Piano Music, 2 vols. "Silver Chord," a collection of Popular Songs, Ballads, &c. "Shower of Pearls," a collection of favorite Vocal Duets, with Piano Accompaniments;—one or all. Price of each, in cloth, $2 25; plain, $2 00. Copies sent by mail, post-paid, on receipt of price. OLIVER DITSON & CO., Publishers, Boston.

$60 A MONTH! We want Agents at $60 a month, expenses paid, to sell our Everlasting Pencils, Oriental Burners, and 13 other articles. 15 circulars sent free. SHAW & CLARK, Biddeford, Maine.

Salesmen Wanted.

$75 a month, or commission allowed on sales. Apply to HALE & CO., Newburyport, Mass.

HARPER'S
NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE

TERMS.

One Copy for one Year $3 00
Two Copies for One Year 5 00

An Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of Ten Subscribers, at $2 50 each, or 11 Copies for $25 00.

Harper's Magazine and Harper's Weekly, together, one year, $5 00.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers.

Circulation over 100,000.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
Single Copies Six Cents.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year $3 00
One Copy for Two Years 5 00

And an Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of Ten Subscribers, at $2 50 each, or 11 Copies for $25.

Terms to Advertisers.—Seventy-five Cents per line for inside, and One Dollar per line for outside Advertisements.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers.

JOHN BULL and LOUIS NAPOLEON descry upon the horizon a cloud about the size (and shape) of two Big Men's hands, and are frightened nearly out of their boots by the phenomenon.

FISK & HATCH,

Bankers and Dealers in Government Securities,

AND

AGENTS FOR THE UNITED STATES FIVE-TWENTY LOAN,

No. 38 Wall Street, New York.

PREPARE FOR THE HOLIDAYS.

There is no Gift, or Present, which compares with the Craig Microscope and Mosaic of Objects. As a source of amusement and instruction they are unsurpassed. This Microscope will be mailed, postage paid, for $3 25; or with 6 beautiful mounted objects, for $5; or with 24 objects, for $5. Address, HENRY CRAIG, 125 Broadway, New York. A liberal discount to the trade.

E. & H. T. ANTHONY,

Manufacturers of Photographic Materials,

501 Broadway, New York.

Card Photographs.

Our Catalogue now embraces considerably over

FOUR THOUSAND

different subjects in which editions are continually being made of Portraits of Eminent Americans, etc., viz.:

73 Major-Generals, 525 Statesmen,
190 Brigadier-Generals, 137 Divines,
239 Colonels, 176 Authors,
84 Lieut.-Colonels, 39 Artists,
207 Other Officers, 112 Stage,
60 Officers of the Navy, 46 Prominent Women,
147 Prominent Foreign Portraits.

2,500 COPIES OF WORKS OF ART.

INCLUDING MISCELLANEOUS OR THE MOST CELEBRATED ENGRAVINGS, PAINTINGS, STATUES, &c.

Catalogues sent on receipt of Stamp.

An order for One Dozen PICTURES from our Catalogue will be filled on receipt of $1 00, and sent by mail, Free.

Photographic Albums.

Of these we manufacture a great variety, ranging in price from 50 cents to $50 each.

Our ALBUMS have the reputation of being superior in beauty and durability to any others.

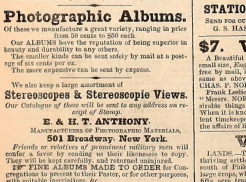
The smaller kinds can be sent safely by mail at a postage of six cents per oz.

The more expensive can be sent by express.

We also keep a large assortment of

Stereoscopes & Stereoscopic Views.

Our Catalogue of these will be sent to any address on receipt of Stamp.



E. & H. T. ANTHONY,

MANUFACTURERS OF PHOTOGRAPHIC MATERIALS,

501 Broadway, New York.

Friends or relatives of prominent military men will confer a favor by sending us their likenesses to copy. They will be kept carefully, and returned undefaced.

FOR FINE ALBUMS MADE TO ORDER for Congregations to present to their Pastor, or for other purposes, with suitable inscription, &c.

GUNS, PISTOLS, Military Goods,

FRENCH AND ENGLISH FANCY GOODS.

ALSO, a full assortment of

Jet, Coral, and Steel Goods.

Schuyler, Hartley & Graham,

19 Maiden Lane & 22 John Street, N. Y.,

15 Rue d'Enghien, Paris,

47 Hampton St., Birmingham, Eng.

Shults' Ongent, warranted to produce a full set of Whiskers in six weeks, or money refunded. Sent postpaid, for 50 cents. Address C. F. SHULTS, Troy, N. Y.

A Bad Breath.—The Greatest Curse the human family is heir to. How many lovers it has separated—how many friends forever parted. The subject is a delicate one, your nearest friend will not mention it, and you are ignorant of the fact. To effect a radical cure use the "BALM OF THOUSAND FLOWERS" as described, night and morning. It also beautifies the complexion, removing all tan, pimples, and freckles, leaving the skin soft and white. Price 50 cents, of all druggists. Sold by all druggists. The Trade supplied by HOWARD, SANGER & CO., 165 and 167 Chambers street, N. Y., and for sale by all Druggists.

Metallic Artificial Legs.

Made of Corrugated Brass or other Metals. Patented Jan. 6th, 1863, by the Universal Joint and Artificial Limb Co.

Weight only Four Pounds.

Soldier's price, $50; Civilian's, $75. Send for a Circular. C. WESTON, Act. of Secretary, N. Y.

FINE DRESS SHIRTS TO ORDER. UNRIVALLED In Manufacture, Fitting, and Material. At UNION ADAMS, No. 637 Broadway.

IMMENSE PROFITS

To be made selling our

STATIONERY PRIZE PACKETS.

SEND FOR OUR NEW CIRCULAR.

G. S. HASKINS & CO., 36 Bookman Street, N. Y.

$7. WATCHES. $7.

A Beautiful Engraved Gold-Plated Watch, Lever Cap, small size, Warranted a correct time-keeper. Sent free by mail, in neat case, for only $7. A Solid Silver, same as above, $9, specially adapted to the ARMY. CHAS. F. NORTON & CO., 28 & 40 Ann Street, N. Y.

Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper, of July 25, says: "Messrs. NORTON & CO. have combined two very desirable things in a watch—Cheapness and reliability. When it is known that for $7 a person can have an excellent timekeeper, there is no apology particularly in all the affairs of life."

VINELAND.

LANDS.—TO ALL WANTING FARMS.—Large and thriving settlement, healthy and moral. Only 40 miles south of Philadelphia by railroad. Rich soil, produces large crops, which command ready sale. Terms of sale fully sets forth, as from $15 to $20 per acre, payable in annual payments. Good business opening for mechanics and others, churches, schools, and good society. It is now the most improving place East or West. Hundreds are settling and building. The beauty with which the place is laid out is unsurpassed. Letters answered. Papers containing reports and giving full information will be sent free. Address CHAS. K. LANDIS, Vineland Post Office, Cumberland County, New Jersey.

From Report of Solon Robinson, Agricultural Editor of the Tribune:—"It is one of the most extensive fertile tracts, in an almost level position and suitable condition for pleasant farming that we know of this side of the Western prairies."

The Soldier's Gift

To the Loved One at Home.

We will deliver Free of freight charge, at any Express Office East of St. Joseph, Mo., one of our beautiful Albums of the value of $5 or more, that may be ordered by members of the Army or Navy of the United States or Presents to friends at home. We manufacture elegant styles of all prices to $25, and higher.

E. & H. T. ANTHONY,

Manufacturers and Importers,

501 Broadway, N. Y.

A Household Word.—BUY your Housekeeping Articles at BASSFORD'S, Cooper Institute, New York.

THE ILLINOIS CENTRAL RAILROAD TRAVERSES THE WHOLE LENGTH OF THE STATE, FROM THE BANKS OF THE MISSISSIPPI AND LAKE MICHIGAN TO THE OHIO.

THE ILLINOIS CENTRAL RAILROAD COMPANY

HAVE FOR SALE

1,200,000 Acres of the Most Beautiful Prairie Lands in the State,

IN FARMS OF

40. 80. 160. AND 240 ACRES AND UPWARD.

LYING ALONG

The Whole Line of the Illinois Central Railroad,

AT FROM

$8, $10, to $12 PER ACRE, ON LONG CREDIT.

☞ These RICH FARMING LANDS are situated near Markets, Schools, Churches, and all the Blessings of Civilization.

PRICES AND TERMS OF PAYMENT:

80 Acres at $10.00 per Acre, with Interest at 6 per cent. annually, upon the following terms:

Cash Payment,	$48 00	Payment in 4 years,	$256 00
Payment in 1 year,	48 00	" in 5 years,	232 00
" in 2 years,	48 00	" in 6 years,	216 00
" in 3 years,	48 00	" in 7 years,	200 00

40 Acres at $10.00 per Acre, with Interest at 6 per cent. annually, upon the following terms:

Cash Payment,	$24 00	Payment in 4 years,	$128 00
Payment in 1 year,	24 00	" in 5 years,	116 00
" in 2 years,	24 00	" in 6 years,	108 00
" in 3 years,	24 00	" in 7 years,	100 00

Those desirous of securing for themselves and families A COMPETENCY AND A HOME which they can call their own, will address

LAND COMMISSIONER, Ill. Cen. R. R., Chicago, Ill.

$35 WATCHES. $35

Genuine Full-Jeweled American Lever Watches, in 4 Ounce Coin Silver Hunting Cases, Gold Joints, for $35.

Also every variety of good Watches at equally low rates. All orders from the Army must be prepaid, as the Express Companies will not take bills for collection on soldiers.

J. L. FERGUSON, Importer of Watches,

208 Broadway New York.

The only enameled "Turn-over" Collar made in metals. Send $1 or 50 c. "Sample Collar" or $1 for a Chaser," to Box 5173, and receive it by return mail. Address enameled Metallic Collar Co., 94 Pine St., N. Y.

AGENTS WANTED.—$2 positively made in 20 cts.; urgently needed by every person. Call and examine, or ten samples sent by mail for 20 cts.; retails for $2, by R. I. WOLCOTT, 170 Chatham Square, N. Y.

MUNN & CO.,

Solicitors of American and Foreign Patents,

And Publishers of the ILLUSTRATED SCIENTIFIC AMERICAN, 37 Park Row, N. Y. Pamphlets of Information concerning Patents, FREE. Specimens of the PAPER, FREE.

Fogg's Double-Action Patent Lever

SKATE BUCKLE,

Manufactured and for sale on Straps, at wholesale, by F. STEVENS, Manufacturer of Skates, Straps, and Leather Goods, 215 Pearl St., New York. 68 Kilby St., Boston.

Learn to Skate in One Hour by using The American Parlor Or Floor Skate. Hard Rubber Rollers, Anti-friction Axles. Frederick Stevens, 215 Pearl Street, New York. 68 Kilby Street, Boston.

A BEAUTIFUL MICROSCOPE

Portable one, powerful, magnifying small objects 500 times. Five of different powers for $1 00. Mailed free. Address F. C. BOWEN, Box 230, Boston, Mass.

$15 Per Day Easy $15

And a Watch Free.

Employment for everybody, male and female. 100,000 men, women, and children wanted to act as our Agents in every Town and Village throughout the U. S. to sell our immensely popular, unequalled, and valuable extra large size PRIZE STATIONERY PACKETS, and VALUABLE NOVELTY PACKAGES, containing fine Writing Materials, such as Pens, Pencils, Penholders, Envelopes, Blotters, Beautiful Emblems, Ladies' Fashion Plates, Designs for Needlework, Cottage Keepsakes, Household Companions, Game Compositions (for Soldiers), Parlor Amusements, Letter Writer's Guide, Medical Preparations, Many Ways to Get Rich, Likenesses of Military Heroes, Union Designs, Gents' Pocket Calendars for 1863, Valuable Secrets of Life, Rich and costly Presents of Fashionable Jewelry, Rare Designs, Games, Army Advice, &c., &c., &c., the whole worth, if bought separately, many dollars. Price each Package only 25 cents retail. Wholesale rates to Agents very low, from 100 to 200 PER CENT. PROFIT ALLOWED. Our Packages stand same as ever, alone and above all competitors, and have long been acknowledged as the leading and only real valuable and standard Articles of the kind now manufactured. Packages of all descriptions up to $100 sent by Express. Publishers, Office Managers, &c. Goods sent by Express safe to ALL PARTS of the United States. Our Pamphlet, A DESIRED SUM WITHOUT WATCH, ENGLISH WORKMANSHIP, and correct timepiece, presented FREE to each person who acts as our agent. Send for our new Circulars, containing Extra Premium Inducements, sent free. S. C. RICARDS & CO., 102 Nassau St., N. Y. The Great Original, Largest, and Oldest Prize Package House in the World.

DR. B. C. PERRY, DERMATOLOGIST,

49 Bond Street, New York,

Formerly of 23 Bulfinch Street, Boston, treats successfully all Diseases of the Scalp, Loss of Hair, and Premature Blanching. Also, removes Moth Patches, and other Discolorations from the face, without injury to the texture or color of the skin. Consultation free.

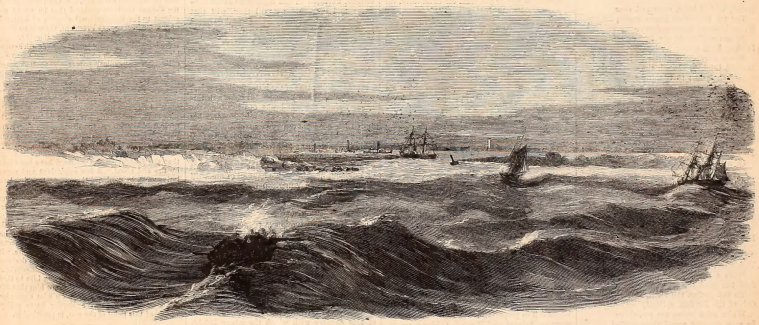
For particulars enclose stamp for Circular.

IVORY SLEEVE BUTTONS

OR STUDS.—Red, White, and Black, engraved with initials. The pair will be sent free on receipt of the price by mail. Also of Pearl, $1 00 per set each. For sale by WM. M. WELLING, manufacturer of Ivory goods, 207 Centre St., N. Y., sign of the Golden Elephant.

GOLD PENS AND CASES.

Retailed at wholesale prices. 14 kt. Gold Pen, Solid Silver Case, $1 50, warranted for one year. Original, Largest, and Oldest Price List published on receipt of 20 cents.



F. S. JOHNSON, 15 Maiden Lane, N. Y.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. VII.—No. 361.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 28, 1863. [SINGLE COPIES SIX CENTS. $3.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1863, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

LANDING OF GENERAL BANKS'S EXPEDITION ON BRAZOS SANTIAGO, TEXAS, ON NOVEMBER 2, 1863.—SKETCHED BY A STAFF OFFICER.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

THE ARMY OF THE CUMBERLAND—BRIDGING THE TENNESSEE UNDER A REBEL FIRE FROM LOOKOUT MOUNTAIN.—SKETCHED BY MR. THEODORE R. DAVIS.

[SEE PAGE 764.]

TO MEN.

MEN, the time draws on to action—
Draws, with sternest-voiced demand;
Who would bear its strain and traction
Must be strong in heart and hand:
Who shall grapple double-handed
With it shall have manhood's name;
Who shall falter shall be branded
With unchanging mark of shame.

Toil, oh! Forgemen, damp and sooty,
At the shapes that, one by one,
Grow, wherewith the iron duty
Of the season shall be done:
Toil; the time is hard with clamor,
And it striketh palm with thee,
Is the ringing of thy hammer,
For the god that is to be.

Speed, oh! Plowman; let not thistles
Profit out from the loosed wain:
On fall many a field there bristles
Crop of steel instead of grain:
Speed; the soldier's orphan children,
Who in mercy shall not see
Where their father's grave is filled in,
Turn their hungry eyes to thee.

Strike, oh! Soldier, once and ever
For the right that crowns the earth
Of the cypress, grown diviner
Now upon the brow of death:
And thy nation's revelation—
Let it upward rise and roll
To the heights of aspiration
Of a nation's lifted soul.

Pray, oh! Christian: God is nearer
In the strong hour in the storm;
And His will is growing clearer:
Pray His waiting will be done—
Done triumphant, as when Moses
Wielded through night and death to see
Fair in Sharon's vale the roses
Waiting ages for the free.

Toil, fight, sing, pray, men unshrinking,
With a high, heroic will;
And the glorious time is thinking
To the perfect orb shall fill—
Orb of life for feet uplifted,
While earth-pangs are yet above
In new sunlight round them drifted
By the winds of broader love.

THE TEXAS EXPEDITION.

WE publish on page 753 an illustration of the LANDING OF GENERAL BANKS'S EXPEDITION ON BRAZOS SANTIAGO, TEXAS, on 2d November, from a sketch by a staff officer. The expedition is destined to restore Texas to the Union, and put an end to the continued traffic which has been carried on at Matamoros. The Herald correspondent, writing on 30 November, says:

At an early hour this morning the bar was examined and casks laid down as buoys. Nine feet of water was found upon the bar, and this was over, when we came in easy.

We accordingly commenced preparing to enter the harbor, and the steam-propeller-steamer GENERAL BANKS, with the Nineteenth Iowa on board, got under way, and was soon aground. She then sealed the fleet of large boats ever lost so she steamed gallantly on and crossed the bar in the calm, deep water. Next came three heavy steamers, which were lashed on the flag-ship and answered by the waving of hats and handkerchiefs.

She crossed the bar at precisely twelve o'clock noon, and from that moment the colors were seen floating over the yacht-boat—the little steamer Texas—followed, and also were a dozen other boats in a frisky young regatta of sailing, bounding over the bar like a cork.

The Eighth, with the Thirteenth and Fifteenth Maine regiments on board, was the third to cross, and it was her good fortune to be the first to debouch her troops, the soldiers of the Fifteenth Maine first touching Texas soil. The next steamer had the flag of this regiment, followed by that of the Nineteenth Iowa, was raised.

Thus has been made the extreme southern point of the Union were the first to raise the flag of America over the soil of the detested secession rebels, and this was the work so gallantly begun, of planting the banner of freedom in the land of Texas, which, ere long, will be within the State and Union but a word for some time to come.

On landing on Brazos Island, the Fifteenth Maine, Colonel Dwight, commanding, the Eighth Iowa, Colonel Bissell's staff, started for Boca Chica, took possession of the fort, and hoisted the stars, stripes and victories.

No resistance whatever was offered, and no human being here to oppose us. Here on the island of Brazos, all to accept the repulse of two companies of cavalry by the guns of the E. A. Ford, Colonel Wilkins, which anchored off the mouth of Boca Chica this morning, and opened upon the rebels who had attempted to cross.

The same transport the night previous anchored off the mouth of the Rio Grande, and succeeded by keeping up an almost constant fire upon the Mexican vessels crossing the river, preventing

The old salt was a few miles wrong in his reckoning; for he all the more pleased that he "dropped in" on a passing song at the demanded regale in Boca Chica instead of the harbor Mexicana of the Rio Grande, and that he had still probably have to make an apology for the slight variation of fifteen miles. Their vessels navigated up the Rio Brabond trade with the rebels on the Texas shore.

Those of the Ford readers who have ever visited Ship Island can have a good idea of this barren, inhospitable place.

BRAZOS, as well as all the islands along the Texan coast, is a sandy desert. One house (formerly) stands to our right, and a mile or so further toward the interior are two high-houses, one on each side.

Cleared ruins show that three buildings were destroyed by rebel torch-fire. Nothing but the chimneys remain standing.

The foundations of the buildings used by General Taylor for stores are pointed out to us; but no other vestige remains. Sand and sand-hills meet the eye in every direction; and for miles there is no covering than the tops of the burning sun by day, nor the heavy chilly dews by night.

Four wells were discovered by our soldiers; but the water is brackish and unpalatable. Around these were collected from thirty to forty head of poor cattle. They were suffering terribly from thirst, and drank with avidity the miserable water that our men gave out to them from the wells.

The few inhabitants who lived on this desert probably fled as soon as our fleet anchored off the shore; for, as I have before stated, not a human being was to be seen.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 28, 1863.

PROCLAMATION:

BY HORATIO SEYMOUR,

GOVERNOR OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK.

In accordance with the Customs and Laws of this State, I, HORATIO SEYMOUR, Governor of the State of New York, do hereby designate Thursday, the 26th instant, to be a day of Thanksgiving and Prayer, and I hereby declare the same to be a Legal Holiday.

In the midst of calamities, brought upon our country by the wickedness, folly, and crimes of men, we have reasons to be thankful to Almighty God for abundant Harvests, for exemption from Pestilence, and for the preservation of our State from the devastations of War which afflict other sections of our land. Let us offer fervent prayers that Rebellion may be put down, our Union saved, our Liberties preserved, and our Government established on distant and durable fields of glory, by showing sympathy and kindness toward their families who are left in want and sorrow.

In Witness Whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the Privy Seal of the State, at the City of Albany, this tenth day of November, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-three. HORATIO SEYMOUR.

By the Governor,

DANIEL F. TYLER, Private Secretary.

THE SITUATION.

OUR armies seem once more at a stand-still. The November mud appears to have driven both Meade and Lee into winter-quarters; and cavalry raids and guerrilla and outpost skirmishes are likely to be the only movements of consequence on the Potomac for some weeks to come. At Chattanooga all is quiet, and our correspondents write that no active operations are expected in that army for some time. Grant will have enough to do to hold and secure his communications, and feed his army at Chattanooga; while, on the other hand, Bragg will have his hands full in preparing for the blockade movement on Atlanta and Rome. Gilmore continues to thunder away at Fort Sumter and the other outer defenses of Charleston. But these far he seems to be making but little impression, and the belief gains ground that Charleston can only be reduced by a land attack, and regular approaches against Moultrie. General Burnside, late of Fredericksburg, and there may be more promise of an invasion of Texas than can now and here be discerned.

But altogether the prospect is that our armies will not see much fighting, at all events, on this side of Christmas. With the early spring Meade and Rosecrans, and Grant and Gilmore may pursue his victorious career; but till then we may not have much exciting news to chronicle.

Meanwhile it devolves upon the country to devote its whole energies to the work of recruiting the army. Three hundred thousand more men are wanted by January 1st, and are not obtained by volunteering, they will be procured by the draft. Congress, when it reassembles, will pass the Conscription Act by striking out the $300 clause, so as to leave substitutes free to command their own price. Every man who volunteers, and does so especially in view of the active demand for labor which exists every where, it is quite probable will be exempt from the draft to a figure which may render it impossible for the government, or the individuals drafted to escape service. People who do not want to run the risk of the draft had better, therefore, lose no time in volunteering a volunteer movement. In this, and one or two other localities, the injudicious haste with which fifteen months' men were discharged, and from the draft, last summer, has naturally chilled patriotic ardor, and lulled cowards into a false security. Hence, the call for 300,000—peremptory and without escape—is seemingly inevitable. But there are many parts of the country where, with proper energy on the part of influential men, and suitable provisions for the families of volunteers, the quota may be filled without a draft.

There are two other important movements which are going on day by day. One is the recruiting of negro troops: the other, the colonization and culture by free labor of abandoned plantations. Both are essential to the final completion of the work we have in hand. The promise we have made to the negroes, which, in the President's words, "must be kept," can only be secured by giving men of color the power to protect themselves. They must be made the armed guardians both of their own liberty and of the dominion of the United States. All the Southern fleet and military lines which, throughout the lifetime of the present generation, it will be necessary to garrison must be garrisoned by negro troops. And all the plantations which the Southern chivalry have abandoned or forfeited must be worked by free labor. It devolves upon us to show the world that the negro will work as well for the hope of reward as from the dread of punishment, and that sugar and cotton can be raised as profitably at the South without the lash as with it. Both of these were with them. The reports of the commission which has in charge the letting of Government plantations are very encouraging. This year, the profits realized by parties who hired from Government abandoned estates, and worked them with free labor, have been in many instances enormous. We must line the Mississippi Valley with a new race of settlers, nurtured in the wholesome air of freedom; and then, but not till then, will that glorious country be secured to the Union, and in a condition to yield the fruits which it was God's ordinance it should produce.

BRITISH JOURNALISM.

ONE leading cause of the bitter feeling against England which has pervaded all classes in this country during the past year, and which has been the ceaseless stream of abuse and misrepresentation which has been poured upon us and our cause by the British journals. Not only has the Times steadily traduced us and falsified our aims and prospects, but almost every minor journal, whether published in London or in the rural districts of England, has done the same in a handful of mud, till it appeared to an American observer that the British public were almost universally our enemies.

This impression may have been erroneous. The small papers may have spoken merely for themselves, but for the public. We remember a letter which was published a year or more since in the Mobile Register, condemning the Confederate Government for the selection it had made of advocates and agents in Europe, and stating that it was far simpler and surer to hire Englishmen to write up the rebels than to employ Southerners for the work. The writer tended to create the impression that the articles abusive of this country with which the Mobile British press was filled were "a paid puffs" of the rebel cause—reclames, as the French call them, expressing no man's opinion. This impression is confirmed by the publication of the intercepted letters of Mr. Slidell, rebel agent in Paris, to Jeff Davis and his Secretary Benjamin. He alludes more than once to his successful efforts to create public opinion in England by the aid of the press. After drawing attention to Earl Russell's speech at Blairgowrie, he observes, in a letter to his chief employer:

"The sympathy of the British people for us is growing stronger every day, and in the same ratio as their antipathy for the Yankees. To favor and increase them favorable dispositions I have caused various publications to be made in England on the topics of cotton, slavery, the acts of blockades, &c., &c., pamphlets, and keep up a running fire through the English press. Some of these publications shall be sent you at the first opportunity which presents for sending packages."

So it seems it is to Monsieur de Leon, of South Carolina, that we may thank Palmerston, that we are indebted for the vituperation we find in so many British papers. The discovery will not please the editor of British Journalism in American opinion. But it will render us much less sensitive to what these upright journalists may say of us hereafter.

THE LUNGER.

AMERICA AND ENGLAND.

A LATE London Spectator denounces the conduct of Mr. Lirel in building the ships which are preying upon American commerce so that the Government is obliged to station war ships for that purpose, as a most unprecedented resolution upon the part of a Government. The Spectator declares that no one was merely to gratify his own cupidity. In the same vein "Historicus," Mr. Vernon Harcourt, shows in the London Times that no rebels are privileged to make England the base of their hostile operations against a friendly power, and have therefore rendered themselves amenable to the British Statutes. "Historicus" suggests that Mason left England because Lirel refused to let the rams escape, and that he would be in a very doubtful position toward the Government. Add to this that the Governor-General of Canada and Lord Lyons have taken the proper authorities of the Lake plot, and it is pretty clear that Great Britain means to avoid all occasion of trouble with this country.

We need not be in haste to ascribe this conduct to any profounder admiration of our system, nor to suppose that she has any romantic friendship for us, as we certainly have not for her. But at least it is another indication which the general tone of the British press and the sneers of the officers of the Government during the first years of the war naturally produced; nor ought any fair Englishman who read the stuff that Mackay wrote from New York for the Times, and who was familiar with the leaders and speeches of men and papers in England, to be surprised that we were indignant. We can each rejoice that the air is clearer, and each resolve to keep it so.

MISSOURI.

GOVERNOR GAMBLE, of Missouri, has lately expelled from the State two officers of the United States army, holding commissions from Lincoln. General Thomas to recruit colored soldiers. They were expelled for that reason, and not for misconduct. This may be very conservative, but it is radically wrong. It is part of that remarkable policy which in Missouri has withstood the policy of the National Government, and which the President has not rebuked. The difficulty in Missouri is very simple. It is that the influence of the National Government is thrown upon the side upreasle to the rebels. Here, in New York, it was reason enough for voting against the "Order" of Governor Seymour, that the rebels wished them to be elected. Ought it not to be enough in Missouri that to favor the Gamble policy is to please the enemy?

Certainly many of the loyal Missourians feel so strongly that they are betrayed into saying what they certainly do not mean. When the speaker at the Cooper Institute declared that he could not submit to the constitutional election of Vallandigham, for instance, as President, there is no doubt that the vehemence of expression led him on. But there is equally no doubt that such a remark harmed his cause more than he imagined. So when one of the Governor's radical papers advises Congress to protect the Government against the Administration, it seems the silliest verberbeat on him. The true anti-slavery men of Missouri ought to remember that at a time like this, when we are fighting a labored battle which may decide the principles of the orator, and a reaction which takes the ground of the paper—the cause of the orator and paper, so defended and stated, repels the very sympathy they invoke.

On the other hand, no sensible man will forget that the faithful men of Missouri have been tried by fire and blood. A few expletives and superlatives may be pardoned them. In utter, implacable determination that slavery, the monster that has spawned civil war, shall be ended and forever, is only natural to them. They feel it during every moment, and they can not choose fine phrases. And they are not unjust. The Missouri Democrat, the radical organ, says that President Lincoln has made a tragical mistake, but it does not accuse him of the least ill intent. That, we are sure, will presently appear. President Lincoln, by his declared policy, belongs with the radical loyal Missourians. A few months more of war will bring him to their side. A few months more will show him that Mr. Postmaster-General Blair is not a wise counselor, and does not represent the true Lincoln policy, which, at this point of the war, is practicable.

A CONTRAST.

THE dainty "kill of fare" at the Russian ball, printed in French upon colored satin, contrasts curiously with another "bill of fare" on which that hauding is boldly printed, and which has a historic interest. It is a strip of stout paper, about seven inches long and two or three broad, with the head, "FORT LAFAYETTE, 1824," printed in full. It is dated Wednesday, September 8, 1824. Bill of Fare." It was the collation given to General Lafayette upon his last visit to this country.

It is in the kitchen, according to some dinner philosophers, that the progress of civilization is most truly indicated. For all such, who may have preserved the bill of the Russian supper, this of the French table of thirty years ago will be a fit companion. The two or three little errors of spelling are preserved:

"Chicken, Turkeys, Hams, Tongues, Pigeons, Ducks, Turkey a la Francaise. Snipe, Woodcock, Plover, Wild Ducks, Partridges, Pheasants, Pies, Blancmange, Langues d'Algneau in Jelly. Anchovies, Crabs, Lobsters. Tartlets, Cheese cakes, Puffs, Jellies, Bistemange, Oranges, Peaches, Pears, Apples, Grapes, Nuts, &c. &c. Port, Claret, White Hermitage, Madeira, Champagne."

The present bill of fare at Fort Lafayette is understood to be different from this.

CIVILIZED NEIGHBORS.

THE Richmond Enquirer says that it prefers to have Yankees rather than English as its "next-door neighbor" beyond the Potomac. There is no reason to doubt this preference upon the part of the Enquirer. The reason it alleges is that the Yankees are "ignorant and semi-barbarous enough to be loyal South." And it is not to be remarkable that a chivalrous people, who build their State upon the maintenance of slavery, should prefer a breed civilized even for sale, should prefer that their "next-door neighbors" should be ignorant and semi-barbarous. The New England Dahomey could be the less conceivable neighbor for them.

But as for having enemies "fit for ogres" upon the Potomac, the Enquirer must be borrowing trouble of the future enormously. We are engaged in a war in which they will conquer if we shall not conquer them. They are owning to the Lakes, or we are going to the Gulf. The victory on one side or the other must be complete and final. It will be a social as well as a military victory. It will be like that of the Normans in England. That lost not left equal enemies, nor will ours. The Enquirer may take heart. If the rebellion succeeds slavery will debauch the North, and make it more than semi-barbarous—it will barbarize it as thoroughly as it has the South itself. If the Government triumphs liberty will radically reform the social system of the South, and fully civilize it. This result is in the very nature of the contest. It is shown by the whole utterances of the Enquirer, as it is every expression, and the whole conduct of the rebellion. Now has barbarism ever obliterated civilization upon a large scale? No. Why do the rebels so nervously denounce us as barbarians and extol themselves as highly civilized? Because they know this truth. Unless, then, they can prove slavery to be the sign of an advanced and advancing civilization, they forecast their own doom.

PAYING COLORED SOLDIERS.

In his late Message to the special session of the Massachusetts Legislature, Governor Andrew recommends that the State pay its colored regiments the difference between their present wages and those of other United States soldiers. His argument is conclusive. There is no law of the United States by which any discrimination in payment of military service can be made by reason of color. In truth, we may say that those who are blinded by the stupid prejudices of slavery would for a moment think it compatible with national honor to invite men to offer themselves to the defence of the country, and then pay some of them lower wages because they were of a different complexion. But in the case of the Massachusetts regiments the men were expressly told that they were to receive the same pay as other soldiers, so that it is a special injustice to them.

Governor Andrew presumes that Congress will correct the unwise and dishonorable discrimination. For nothing is more plainly established than the bravery, fidelity, and docility of the colored troops. Their present employment is the most dangerous policy of the war, and unless it be also part of that policy to prevent all enlistment and destroy the morale of the army, this foolish reluctance to a frank acknowledgment of the services of every good soldier will disappear. When it is remembered how splendidly these men behaved upon the Mississippi and at Morris Island—that, wounded and upon his knees, the color-sergeant of the 54th Massachusetts held up the flag, and brought it still flying out of the fiery storm—and how ardent and profound is the attachment to the cause which they cause it stands for, it is incredible that any man, under a rebel or a Copperhead, should for a moment doubt what ought to be done.

THE VICTORY OF SOUTH CAROLINA IN 1832-3.

The Loyal Publication Society have lately issued a very interesting paper by Judge William Whiting, ex-Chief Justice of the Court of Common Pleas in Massachusetts. It is a full account of the Nullification Controversy of 1832-3, and is intended to show that South Carolina, and not General Jackson, was the aggressor. And the document shows what he intends, as appears from a very simple statement.

On the 1st of November, 1832, the South Carolina Convention passed the Nullification Ordinance, making it the duty of the Legislature to arrest the operation of the tariff of 1832 after the 1st of February, after the 1st of February, 1833. The Convention also issued an address to the other sovereign States, stating that, in its desire to remain in the Union, South Carolina would make certain concessions—which were, in substance, not to ask or allow Congress to pass a revenue but not a protective tariff. This address was sent to the President and to the Governors. Judge Whiting quotes the replies of seventeen of the twenty-three States, which, with the exception of that of Virginia, vehemently denounced South Carolina's conduct. The other six are Rhode Island, Vermont, Missouri, Tennessee, Kentucky, and Louisiana. Of their action he has no record at hand.

The Act of Nullification reached President Jackson early in December. He submitted it, with a reply on the 10th, in the famous proclamation written by Edward Livingston. But in his annual Message of the 4th, after the Legislature of South Carolina had been openly made, he recommended that the tariff be reduced to the revenue standard. On the 12th of February, 1833, Mr. Clay's compromise bill was introduced, which was intended to raise no more revenue than was "necessary for the economical administration of the Government." This bill, incarnate nullification, immediately approved by Mr. Calhoun, "absolutely repealed" nullification, and, "We offer her [South Carolina] this bill, not to renounce this power [of nullification], but to refrain from its exercise in reference to this precedent is to govern, where is the security for the stability of the Union I can not see." Mr. Olowin, of Tennessee, said, "I consider your nullification . . . by just promptly granting . . . all it demands."

Meanwhile troops were raising in South Carolina; and Congress passed the "Force Bill," while it was hastening to yield the point at issue. After that was yielded, on the 11th of March, the South Carolina Convention met again. It contemplated both its attitude of nullification and the Government, by which it had procured a modification of the tariff of 1832, even before it took effect. The Convention therefore repealed its Nullification Act, which had achieved its purpose. It declared the "Force Bill" null and void within the State; and that act of nullification also never repealed, revoked, or modified.

Thus, according to Judge Whiting, who supports his point by ample historical citations, the tariff of 1832 was modified by Congress under a threat from South Carolina. That the Government was authorized to compel the execution of the laws is of no importance, in view of the fact that the attitude of nullification had been assumed and maintained for revolt to legion. Under such circumstances to change a law is to surrender the dignity, the honor, and the power of the Government. If the present Administration had abandoned Sumter before the 12th of April, 1861, it would have done exactly what the Admini-tration of 1832 did. Both said to South Carolina, "You will fire at your peril." But the one hastened to do what Carolina wanted before she had a chance to fire; the other calmly did its own duty, and thus turned the traitorous fire of South Carolina against her own head. There has been a great deal of sighing for General Jackson since the war began. General Jackson was a resolute soldier, but the war demanded a wise man.

NEW PICTURES.

No American picture is better known than "Mercy's Dream," by Daniel Huntington, the President of the National Academy. It was first exhibited in 1841, and the impression it then made of grace, tenderness, refinement, and beauty has been deepened most widely extended by a print which suggested, if it did not reproduce, the painting. Seventeen years afterward Mr. Huntington, naturally anxious that a work, the fruit of his earlier powers, which had been so successful should be made as perfect as possible, painted another copy in a more masterly manner, which he intrusted to the care of the same engraver, Mr. Alexander Hay-Barlow, whose work is familiar to all of us in his exquisite "Huguenot Lovers." The artist does not, mature work which he exhibited with the consent under the auspices of Mr. M'Clure at Goupil's Gallery.

It is a picture of great brilliancy and beauty. The angel, lightly poised, is just placing the radiant crown upon the heart of Mercy, which is raised toward it with trembling tenderness. The scene is a wood, and at the right of the spectator a deep, rich vista of landscape nobly completes the work. It is remarkable for its grandeur, freedom, and simplicity, and the face of Mercy has a touching loveliness which haunts the memory. The picture has also an interest of curiosity in its remodelling of the topics of the time, and from the "sensational" effect, which is as popular yet as in literature, has drawn largely upon the intrinsic beauty of the theme and the treatment, and they are of the kind which last forever.

In another gallery at Goupil's is Mr. James Hart's Memory of Berkshire Scenery—a large landscape, belonging to Mr. Augustus Schell. It is a fine characteristic portrait of the Berkshire landscape, although there is a sameness in the long ranges of hills covered with the same luxuriant growth as scarcely enough felt in the open, sunny rurality of this scene. But the brawling brook, the interwoods, the noble hill-side, the deep valley, the delicious reach of summer perspective, with the white church, and the tranquil, cultivated, rolling hills, are very beautiful. "Think of sitting at your winter breakfast," said a friend, "and seeing among your steaks and chops a picture like this!" describes its magic. It is the painter's memory of a summer made real and permanent.

IN EXTREMIS.

THERE can be little doubt that the rebellion is sorely pinched. Simultaneously with the confessions of want which appear in the Southern papers comes the appeal of two of the rebel Governors for succors. It remains only that Wilmington should be seized up, and the privateers and blockade-runners of the Confederacy feared. Last April will be felt by every ill-starred rebel in the South. As was said in the editorial comment upon the first brief news of victory which we do not know how to use; that appeals to magnanimity will be forcibly made to those who have no idea of mercy.

The one thing that every man who really understands the war will bear in mind is that the end through the rebel armies may be defeated, the rebel mind will remain the same. The war is only the beginning and not the end of a social controversy which will generate upon war just so long as it continues. If an early New England settler, living in the edge of the forest, should see his wife captured peace and safety because he held driven the wolf that threatened his farm into the woods, he was mistaken. The wolf lived the settler still was the danger. While the wolf lived the settler could not lay his gun aside; but when he had killed the wolf he could.

We may drive the rebel armies before us, but if we leave their spirit and purpose unbroken, they retire only to recuperate. If the men who have led the rebellion return to the Union under the oath of allegiance, the institutions of Slavery and Liberty will stimulate them to new plotting and treason. Some may abandon hope, but the chief men will never. And we do not know that it would begin the education of a new generation.

GENERAL GANTT'S LETTER.

It is a natural question whether the letter of General Gantt addressed to the loyal people of the South may be considered to be the expression of any very general feeling. Is it likely that the leaders of forces in the rebellion will be induced by its supporters to acquiesce in the profound social change and destruction of sectional traditions which the victory of the Government involves? Will suffering and loss and discomfiture, inflicted by men and a part of the country they have been taught to despise, induce them to give up resolute resistance to the Government, and to submit calmly and unconvinced, although subdued?

That there will be very many like General Gantt can not be doubted. Whatever the long social and political convictions of a section like the South be is uprooted by the fortune of a brief war? Is it at all safe to count upon the final submission of sectarians, that so noble, sincere, and unreserved a patriot as Andrew Johnson has come to see that colored soldiers ought to be employed, and that slaves should be emancipated? And how many authoritative and imposing manifestations have we had from Union men in Louisiana, for instance, which we have so long held in part, and in which the slavery system has been demoralized, that they are willing to let it go, and combine heartily to try the Northern experiment of free labor? Why in Missouri, which was so wedded by the war and scourged with fire, even the loyal vote is almost equally divided between a policy of liberty and slavery.

Such facts should be pondered, that we may not expect hearty sympathy with the emancipation policy even among Union men at the South, nor suppose that when the win the final battle we have reached the end of the struggle. As we say elsewhere in these columns, let us be ready to use our victory when it comes by previously understanding exactly what it demands of us. Let us reflect that the foundation of peace is not the capture of rebel arms, but the destruction of rebel principles and systems.

LITERARY.

As the holidays approach the publishers are busy with their new books. The latest is a volume by Mr. Mitchell's (Ik Marvel's) new book, "My Farm of Edgewood," which is a delightful record of the farming experience of a scholar who sees and enjoys all the poetry of his rural life, while he perfectly understands that to make his story valuable to farmers he must study and farming is profitable as well as pleasant. It is very interesting to remark the shrewd Yankee faculty under the dainty elegance of the book's surface, whose "Reverie" by the fire have given place to these clear, open air, open-eyed, and open-hearted sketches of the experience of a practical farmer. There is the same twinkling humor, tenderness, grace, and pathos, with the happy combination of polish of the man of the world, in this book that are so well known in Mr. Mitchell's earlier works, "The Reveries of a Bachelor" and "Dream Life," while Mr. Mitchell has now leased in beautiful form. Few prettier gift books will be found, and few more warmly prized by readers and minds. Yet we can not part with "My Farm" without regretting the tone of self-denial in which the times are sometimes mentioned, as when the author says: "The American eagle is (or was) a noble bird." Is he any less noble because he is wounded? Is he not dearer to us on him? Does the mere fact of civil war, irrespective of its cause or probable consequence, seem to our friend, the author of Edgewood, as to the gentler friend, Monsieur Aubepine, of Concord, merely a bore? If the war had been avoided by surrender to the South, or compromise of principle, would the American eagle still be a noble bird?

The utmost resources of the typographical art are to be lavished upon the "Life of Prescott," by Professor Ticknor, now preparing for Ticknor & Fields. It is to be a quarto, and as superb a book as can be made in the country.

ARMY AND NAVY ITEMS.

GENERAL DIX arrived at Buffalo on 18th, and is engaged in conferring with the authorities concerning proper means for defense, and in ferreting out the parties, if any, that have been engaged in the late riots in that locality.

MAJOR-GENERAL BUTTERFIELD, who has been temporarily in charge with the Army of the Cumberland, during General Hooker, is to be recalled and assigned to a new command elsewhere.

There are good grounds for the belief that General M'DOWELL will soon be assigned to an important command.

GENERAL BUTLER has arrived at Fortress Monroe and assumed the command of the new department. General FOSTER, upon leaving, issued a farewell order to his troops.

GENERAL REMELS, of the Sixth Army Corps, arrived in Washington last week, and proceeded to the War Department the rebel flags recently captured by his brigade on the Rappahannock.

CAPTAIN SHAW, aid to Major-General AUGUR, has been relieved from New Orleans to the bend-quarters at Washington.

Lieutenant-Colonel GREEN has been relieved from duty at the headquarters of the Twelfth Corps, under Hooker, and will be assigned to another field.

Brigadier-General CHARLES GRAHAM has been relieved, by order of the Secretary of War, from his command in the Army of the Potomac, and ordered to report to General BUTLER.

Command of LEVENSON has been detached from the command of the Minnesota, and is awaiting orders.

Lieutenant-Colonel LAWTON, Inspector-General of Gen. Hooker's command, has been relieved and ordered West.

GENERAL ORDERS—No. 326.

WAR DEPARTMENT, ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE, WASHINGTON, November 5, 1863.

By direction of the President of the United States, Major-General JOHN A. DIX, Colonel United States Army, is hereby dishonorably dismissed the service for disloyalty, and for conduct unbecoming an officer and a gentleman, by the President of the United States.

By order of the SECRETARY OF WAR.

E. D. TOWNSEND, Assistant Adjutant-General.

Rev. H. M. TURNER, pastor of the Israel Bethel church, in Washington, has been appointed chaplain of the First regiment of United States colored troops, now in South Carolina. He is the first colored minister who has been commissioned in the army.

Brigadier-General GEORGE J. STANNARD, who has resigned his commission as Brigadier-General of Volunteers, in response, should the situation of affairs at the front permit, to the call for the Governors of the loyal States to meet at Gettysburg on the 19th inst., and that the Army of the Potomac may be consulted on their action concerning the settlement of the difficulties of the army engaged in that region.

Recent advices from Pensacola state that Lieutenant FLUSH, of the United States Marines, died on the 13th ult. He was from Wisconsin. The fever, which was unusually fatal, has abated. Of three hundred cases more than seventy failed to recover. The Marine Guard lost one lieutenant and thirteen privates.

Commodore WILLIAM D. PORTER has been ordered before the Naval Retiring Board, which, after a recess, begin convened. Commodore PORTER is a brother of DAVID PORTER, the most important actor in the capture of the Mississippi. He some time since designed a plan of a new ironclad vessel of war, which, however, was not adopted by the Government.

Captain G. H. SCOTT has been ordered to the command of the De Soto; Commander STANLEY to the North Atlantic Blockading Squadron; Commander LEWIS to the Ft. Henry; and Lieutenant-Commander QUIRK to the Wyalusing.

General CURTIS has been assigned to the command of the Conscript Camp at Cleveland, Ohio—his wound, received at Gettysburg, still preventing him from entering the field.

Surgeon-General HAMMOND has returned from his extended Southern tour of inspection.

The rebel General FITZHUGH LEE is on his way to Fort Lafayette.

Lieutenant-Colonel FREDERICK has been placed in command of the Twenty-second brigade, vice Colonel WARNER, appointed chief of that bureau.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CHATTANOOGA.

A DISPATCH from Athens, Georgia, on the 13th, says that a fight between the rebel Wheeler and Burnside's cavalry from Chattanooga continued briskly up to that time, and that the Federals had made a decided advance. The fight, with a view probably to attack Lookout Mountain, or, it may be, to send troops to reinforce General BURNSIDE.

SHERMAN'S COLUMN.

Major-General SHERMAN was at General Thomas's headquarters on the 16th, and may make a junction, with his entire corps, with the right of General Grant's army at Chattanooga.

CHARLESTON.

The latest news from Charleston is by way of Richmond to the 14th instant. On the 13th the firing from our batteries was heavier than for two days or more previous. At night, and continued with greater rapidity next day. The casualties were very few. Not a man was wounded.

ON THE RAPPAHANNOCK.

Every thing is quiet on the Rappahannock and Rapidan. General Meade has not changed his camping-ground, although considerable was heard on 16th in the vicinity of Stevensburg, and a reconnoissance in force, and continued for some an hour. It was renewed between eleven and twelve next day, when the rebels, in full force, began to advance, and so the train passed that point. It was supposed that Kilpatrick, who had been at Stevensburg, had engaged in reconnoitering force of the enemy.

A PLOT IN CANADA.

Buffalo, Detroit, and other localities were much frightened last week by rumors of an intended attack from Canada. The Montreal correspondent of the Herald says:

"An expedition was fitted out, consisting of thirty-six men, under the command of Captone, who had already distinguished in similar daring enterprises, and these hundred men. They crossed over to Vermont, Williamsburg, at the residents steamer Robert E. Lee, and landed at Halifax. Their movements, however, were closely watched, and they were sold to furnish the funds required, amounting to $25,000. They were to seize the Federal steamer on the States in small parties to the general rendezvous. The intention was to capture the Federal steamer, run down to Long Island, liberate the prisoners, convey them to Canada in vessels provided for that purpose, and forward them to Halifax to Nassau or Bermuda; the greater part of the funds being generously devoted by the Southern people to one of these points."

Unlikely for them the Governor-General of Canada communicated the plot to our Government, and measures were taken to frustrate it. The whole affair is a bubble. All is quiet at Sandusky and Johnson's Island.

DISEASE AT FORTRESS MONROE.

The recent attack on General Burnside's outposts, in which six hundred of his men and four cannon were captured by the rebels, was at Blain's Cross-Roads, Grainger County, Tennessee, fifteen miles from Knoxville, and situated on the northern route of the branch of the Virginia and Virginia Railroad. This fact is communicated in a despatch from Washington, and from which it will be seen that his main army is in an impregnable position and in a good condition to take care of itself for the winter.

SUFFERINGS OF OUR PRISONERS AT RICHMOND.

A returned prisoner from Richmond, Rev. H. C. Trumbull, of the Connecticut regiment, writes that on the day he left the Libby prison at Richmond on Wednesday, the 11th inst. there were in the prison 1,200 prisoners, with but of a pound of bread and some water for two days previous, and that the rations were no more than half that size. The Quarter-master explained to the prisoners that he had no provisions to give them, and that himself for starving and living fabulously on his part. He stated that on the same day he had received a supply for a month, but that he had to do with any thing whatever, and that it was with the greatest difficulty that he could get fuel to cook the hospitals. It is evident from these facts that the only way to relieve the Union prisoners is to take possession of Richmond and release them from misery, which it would appear the very existence of the rebellion depends upon their holding.

FOOD SENT THEM FROM FORTRESS MONROE.

The following articles were received from Fort Monroe: sugar, rice, potatoes, coffee, and bread were shipped from Fortress Monroe on the 14th by the transport Atlantic, addressed to the authorities starving Union prisoners at Richmond. Provisions were also sent to Annapolis, but were forwarded, and it remains to be seen whether the prisoners will receive them.

COST OF BLOCKADE-RUNNING.

The attempt at blockade-running into Wilmington, which was frustrated by the destruction of the Hebe on a few days past five large steamers have been captured, as we have stated, by which we have obtained valuable cargoes and considerable quantities of arms and munitions of war. The steamers were also successful ones from the rebel agents in Europe, which has been published in the papers.

MARRIAGE OF MISS CHASE.

The nuptials of Governor Sprague and Miss Kate Chase took place on the 14th at the private residence of Governor Mrs. Lincoln, the several heads of departments, and a brilliant array of the Union Generals were present. Among the guests at the reception were a number of the most distinguished men and women of the country.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

THE ANGLO-CHINESE AFFRAYS.

The case of the suspected rebel gun-boat Alexandra has been again up in the Court of Exchequer, London, and it seems probable that the Attorney-General's motion for a new trial on the ground of raising of a point of law will be granted, and that the ruling now had will decide the case of the Alexandra.

THE "PRINCE CONSORT."

The British iron-clad frigate Prince Consort was very badly damaged in a collision during Plymouth Ferryboat to look after the Laird rams. She put into Kingsbury harbor half full of water and is making leaky.

FRANCE.

OPENING OF THE LEGISLATURE.

The session of the French Legislature was opened by Napoleon in person. His speech was of a pacific character. He made only a passing allusion to American affairs, expressed the hope that Maximilian's arrival in Mexico would prove advantageous to the country, and recommended the appointment of a French prince regent to the Polish question. The Emperor acknowledged that the financial estimates did not meet the expectations. Reforms are promised in favor of the French people.

THE ARMY OF THE CUMBERLAND—GENERAL HAZEN'S BRIGADE DESCENDING THE TENNESSEE TO OCCUPY LOOKOUT VALLEY.—SKETCHED BY T. R. DAVIS.—[SEE PAGE 764.]

THE ARMY OF THE CUMBERLAND—HAZEN'S BRIGADE LANDING BELOW LOOKOUT MOUNTAIN ON THE MORNING OF OCT. 28.—SKETCHED BY T. R. DAVIS.—[SEE PAGE 764.]

THE ARMY OF THE CUMBERLAND—CAPTURE OF REBEL RIFLE-PITS IN LOOKOUT VALLEY BY THE THIRTY-THIRD MASSACHUSETTS AND SEVENTY-THIRD OHIO VOLUNTEERS, ON OCT. 28, 1863.—SKETCHED BY MR. THEODORE R. DAVIS.—[SEE PAGE 756.]

MEAVE, SCHOOLMISTRESS.

PERCHED on a crooked pine trunk, striking out a thousand feet above the plain, sat Meave Gilchrist, weaving a laurel wreath with her fingers and pleasant speculations with her brain. Opposite, a mountain threw its mighty shadow into the valley beneath. Miles away a bright gleam told of the river, and still beyond showed the shadowy hills of Vermont. The air was not here a thin grey vapor, but a quivering golden atmosphere of delight, on which lived sweet wild-wood odors, and little fragments of shining cloud floated about at will. The girl and mountain, warmed to its very core with the summer heat, seemed to hold her on its breast with a human kindliness, and to lift her into the purer air, up to the very gates of heaven; and being a lonely thing, Meave rejoiced even in this grim companionship. Her foot rested on from its ascetic self-communing look, and bloomed out into the sparkle and gayety proper to twenty-one, when glee, fluffy and morally healthy. The light in her eyes and the flush on her cheeks deepened, and half unawares she chanted as if to herself:

"La suit soutre,
De son ombre,
Couvre le manide."

A pleasant tenor voice, a little way down the hill, took up the refrain, "Oh, Leonore!" and a young man, wearing a port-folio slung across his shoulder, and apparently a knapsack, came up the steep ascent, bearing a little carefully balanced cup.

"Here it is at last. The spring was further than I thought."

"You have not been long away."

"I found it out of sight, but perhaps you enchanted the ground. How can I tell what spells you are weaving this very moment?"

"I don't understand you."

"Don't you know that your quaint name was that of the Erse fairy queen? And I have observed that you have the peculiar face-off the rich brown bonny been of eyes, as if you spied things beyond the ken of common mortals."

"If I know any, it is because I give me some of that water for which I am so thirsty."

"Drink, then."

"Give me the cup."

"No; I have earned the privilege of holding it."

Meave with a glance at the twenty-pound rock bending over her, colored swiftly, and dropping her long lashes drank without more ado, and with a cool laughing air, and without asking leave of him, went on with her wreath. Paul threw away the cup and stretched himself at her feet with a little, panther-like sort of movement special to him, crushing the thick shining laurel leaves between his restless fingers, and watching her as he listened, out of a pair of keen eyes varying perpetually from a cold grayish-blue to intensest black, and shaded by shadows almost womanish in length.

"What ever sent you here?" he asked, on a sudden.

"Dr. Foolish," answered Meave, promptly.

It was not the answer he wished, so he looked unenlightened.

"No long ago," explained Meave, "I entertained a general impression that the world got up at six, wearied out with sleeping; that it was divided into tasteless, labor-some hours, meant to, dare, dari, dabimus, and the inspiriting exercise of lifting bodily such sentences as, 'Meave you the honor to request the intellectick of the brother of my uncle?' from one language to the other; that the afternoon signified history and a bugaw teacher; and the evening an involuntary disbelief in the possibility of any nobility or heroism, any clear cut or original thinking, any telling but of the endurance of negative distresses. Dr. Foolick is my Mentor, also my physician; and went to him with my sensations, and he called them agitations, and others I made me a dose of nature. Fortunately it was close on my vacation, or I could not have left my school, as we style it."

Paul winced at that word school, which she brought out with such pitiless clearness. It disturbed certain theories that he found pleasant; reminded him that somewhere beyond this rustling, shining, singing, golden mountain, and the sleeping country that stretched away from it, rested, into billows of grain and meadow-land, for miles and miles toward the glittering river, certain practical trail bills, was throned, amidst war and tumult, the thing he called Society; a thing that took no note of feet (those, at least, he had and adapted for dancing from under the short bright skirt near him), that walked in the ways of toil, and with whom soft tones and the nuances of delicate manners had were as dust in the balance, and altogether lighter than vanity in the scales with pedigrees and rent-rolls. The remembrance of which he would not even guess sounded nevertheless in his tone, and jarred on her in her mood.

"I wonder if it goes on still" (with an outward motion of the hand)—" all that buying and selling, lying, cheating, sinning, marrying, and giving in marriage! I had almost forgotten it."

"Why not do so quite?" answered Meave. "Why must we always be thinking of those money-changers into the very temple itself? trail your worldly, everyday thinking through these holy retreats, where Nature herself puts away the worldly colors, her bursts of flowers, and light waving of trees, to come hushed and reverent into this solemn mountain presence."

"That is for you," retorted Paul, lightly, "who are privileged to see the mystery and poetry of existence' all in one, when you bend your brows at me as you do just now; but for everyday, worthless mortals like myself, mountains are simply fortifiers, climate tempers, charming alternatives for cool-liver oil, admirable excuses for love and book making, nothing more. For us your violet-colored talk is so much lovely nonsense. We lack your spiritual vision, though, for that matter, it is well enough in a woman; keeps her from being so sharp on her neighbor's bonnet."

"You talk sacrilege," exclaimed Meave, springing up and commencing to descend the path. "I will not listen to you."

"But you will wait for me, won't you? Have a care there! It is more than steep."

The girl made no answer, but striking her long alpenstock on the loose stones lying thick on the path, went steadily down till she had passed the great rock jutting half across the road, and was hidden from sight. Half vexed, half surprised, Paul followed.

"Who could have dreamed of her taking fire at that?" quoth he, coming after her on the double-quick. "What an incomprehensible creature!"

Over the incomprehensible creature specially referred to, from the moment that she found herself safely behind the rock, had commenced to loiter, for, notwithstanding her haste, she had the small-est intention of making the descent alone; and when she heard him coming registered the fact by a sudden increase of rush of her feet down the path and back to her heart, and a little joyful tingle to her very finger-ends; for she was a woman, and afraid less to be afraid made him ruly indignant. And then, to cheat herself doubtless, I don't know but she, unmeasured to herself, her going calmly walking fast and carelessly, stepped on a loose stone that turned even under her light weight, and twisted her ankle she said to the ground with a little cry of pain. Paul saw, and made but a bound of it to where she lay; but she put him on one side with a wave of the hand and an angry flush.

"It is nothing. I can get on very well by myself," and rising to her feet she took a few steps forward, turned pale, staggered, and would have fallen but for his quick grip.

"Now," he exclaimed, "I shall not listen to you, but make you hear reason. You poor little thing, see how you have hurt yourself by your perversity!"

"It is only my ankle," she answered, faintly trying to free herself from him. "I am a mere sprain; and I used it too carelessly. I can walk alone."

"Witness the notable example you have just afforded us," said Paul, coolly. "Really I am very sorry, since you so choose to misunderstand me; but I have no remedy. You can not get down the hill alone."

Meave looked hopelessly along the rugged path.

"Pleasant, this! I wonder if ever any one was so intolerably careless and absurd before?"

"Is it really so dreadful, then?" asked Paul, softly.

"What?"

"The thought that I shall be of some small service to you."

"I was not speaking of you, but of my own awkwardness."

"Pardon me, but isn't that an evasion? Don't the rights of the matter lie in the fact that you must now lean on me?"

Meave colored to the very temples.

"You don't understand."

"I think I do. I could, at least, under ordinary circumstances; but I can hardly tell why you should find these weights with me. Why not accept my help lovingly, as it is given—now and always?"

Meave was silent, perhaps from pain; but there is a silence more eloquent than words; and the blush that followed it, and was assuredly not a tone of anger as they commenced their wearisome journey homeward. Wearisome, for though Paul half hung the girl entirely on her arm, grace and tenderness as he could, over the rough way, the pain of motion was intense, forcing her at short intervals to rest and sit down, and filled the veins of a necessity unavoidable, causing her keenest distress, though she heroically kept back its expression. So the afternoon sun fell cold upon the distant hills, with their velvety mass of trees, changed first to purple and then to burning amethystine splendor as the sun went down; the shadows grew longer, and wove themselves together, and covered all the valley, and the mountain remained; the cows came lazily along the cool roads, bowing and tinkling their little bells; and the people staying at the hotel, who were lounging about the grounds in that expectant state that marks the close bordering on the supper hour, as Paul and Meave passed by. He glanced mischievously at his pale companion.

"Why should I? Are you assured you are not one of anger as they commenced their wearisome journey homeward. Wearisome, for though Paul half hung the girl entirely on her arm, grace and tenderness as he could, over the rough way, the pain of motion was intense, forcing her at short intervals to rest and sit down, and filled the veins of a necessity unavoidable, causing her keenest distress, though she heroically kept back its expression. So the afternoon sun fell cold upon the distant hills, with their velvety mass of trees, changed first to purple and then to burning amethystine splendor as the sun went down; the shadows grew longer, and wove themselves together, and covered all the valley, and the mountain remained; the cows came lazily along the cool roads, bowing and tinkling their little bells; and the people staying at the hotel, who were lounging about the grounds in that expectant state that marks the close bordering on the supper hour, as Paul and Meave passed by. He glanced mischievously at his pale companion.

"Are you ready to run the gauntlet?"

"Laugh if you like, but you must confess that this is hardly pleasant."

"Nay, if you think I can were not suffering. I should call this one of the most delightful moments of my life."

As he spoke he swung back the gate, and lifting Meave up the steps, brought himself and her face to face with a slender fair-haired girl leaning against one of the trees, and looking at them with an ironical smile. Involuntarily he half withdrew his arm from about Meave's slight waist.

"Lute! Miss Lute!"

"Good-evening, Mr. Aymar. Quite a surprise for us both."

The lady's cold blue eyes were bright with a not too pleasant meaning; the curves about her compressed mouth were unmistakably cruel. Her clear tone was sharp-edged with scorn. Meave looked and knew an antipathy and a foe. Instinctively she tightened her grasp on Paul's arm, and that timid pressure roused in him a novel emotion—a generous indignation. Meeting the cold blue eyes, with a steady composure, and without in their scornful look, he bent over Meave, saying, in a low, distinct, clearest tone, every word honey-sweet, but barbed:

"Poor little child! you are fainting with pain, and I have been unpardonable to listen to you so long. I shall carry you."

And lifting her in his arms he bore her into the house.

Quintus Curtius or Horatius did nothing more heroic, only such according to his nature and capacity. Miss Miller pronounced him a Social Sa-

SAYS Emile Souvestre: "It is astonishing what a small habitation contents Happiness, and how little she requires for furniture!" The following morning found Meave radiant, though her ankle was not a little painful; and for the present mountain-paths and wild-wood odors must be exchanged for a sofa and a quiet room; but then Paul loved her, and he was so good, so noble, so fearless, so deft, so graceful, for there is no such alchemist as a woman in love! In short, here was matter for a week's thinking in the conclescension of this demigod who was pleased to love her; not to mention the remembrance of various little matters, very foolish telling, but pleasant thinking, as when she struck her little foot and cried out spite of herself with the pain, and he held her closer and whispered—it doesn't matter what, but it made her blush and smile even to recall it as she lay there alone; and then the demi-god came early to see her and made his voice morning bright! In truth he was charmed by the sweet face looking out at him from the pillows, and the soft hand resting so trustingly in his own, and would there basin where he had intended one: and even at that Meave saw him go with a little sigh, but instantly checked herself for selfishness, and then thought of him all the afternoon, and dreamed of him all night.

Five enchanted days slipped away after this fashion, and helped Meave comfortably half-way down the ladder from her Eden without her guessing at it.

A note and a bouquet commenced the other half.

"Paul sends you these, but he could not altogether neglect Miss Mellen, who was so anxious for a scramble to High Rocks."

The next day Meave regularly forced to go with a party to High Peak," and so on till one morning came no Paul, no note, no flowers, and Meave was not conscious of the fact that among the facts with the door of her Paradise shut fast behind her—slammed at that! Paul had small notion of softening the blow by an intuition in fact as to all that it needed softening. The thing was getting to be a bore, and he was off. Voilà tout.

Meave waited. Fancied twenty times a day that she heard him coming, and pulled out the folds of her dress and straightened her little pet Mrs. Hutton or Derby: sneered at herself, coined excuses for him, did every thing but guess at the reason of his absence; for she was so reasoned, if there was to be a parting, for very shame's sake, for honor's sake, Paul must at least say farewell. Oh, wise Meave!

At last she got leave from her ankle to come down stairs, and one day made her appearance at Mrs. Hutton's sitting-room, just about twilight, and sank down wearily in a fauteuil by the window. It had been a terribly hot day, and the evening, as prophesied rain, even where the heavy masses of cloud broke away, showing only gleams of watery brightness. The air was glanced coldly, creeping low over its stony bed; the mountains looked blackish purple; the cleared hills dull and ghastly, with their stumps among the meadows, looked lonesome and unlively; the wind sounded eerie and hollow. Altogether, this fire-and-a-fire was needed on such a day—had smouldered almost into blackness, and the room was quite deserted, save of that gaze, which, even about whom the shadows gathered and lowered, as if they had been her thoughts taking form.

Into this solitude she meanted, came Paul and Miss Mellen from some mountain wanderings. She swung her hat by its elastic band and pouted; he carried her Alpenstock. A quarrel was in progress between them.

"It is enough that I like it, Sir," exclaimed Miss Mellen, with a stamp by the hearth.

"Oh, pardon me! I never suspected you of any such weakness as caring for my opinion."

"Why should I? Hat is for your protégée."

Paul flushed redly.

"May I ask what that is?"

"She—the young person with whom I saw you the first night of my arrival. I don't know her name. She is the object or something of the sort."

"I can not see the connection."

"Only that she is one of your adorers."

"The question is of your adorers, not mine."

"Explain."

"I think you were talking of me."

Miss Mellen tossed her shoulders.

"That is an evasion. You can not deny that it was a question."

"What would you have? One must pass the time. You can't be always doing nature. You take those things as you do your summer clothes, and slip them as you would an old shooting-jacket at the end of the season."

"I shall remember that."

"As you like. But is it not absurd in us to quarrel?"

Meave could see that he had taken her hand and was bending over it; but Lute snatched it from him hastily.

"Some one is coming."

"I hear no one."

"It is Miss Hutton. I know her step. I shall not stay to be bored;" and, catching up her hat, she fled by way of the dining-room as Mrs. Hutton came in at the usual entrance. Paul had time for escape; but he sat so quietly that the worthy soul might not have spied him in the dusk; and he had the satisfaction over him as we gloried about the hearth. At that she recoiled with a scream.

"Mr. Aymar! Bless me!"

"Are you serious, Mrs. Hutton?" asked Paul, gravely. "I should hardly think my benediction worth very much."

"Sakes! how you frightened me! I didn't know as you was back."

"Miss Mellen was fatigued, and the day was so dreary, that we went no further than that last cleared rock."

"A few years ago, and there wasn't such a thing as a cleared place any where," observed Mrs. Hutton, smugly, sitting down before the fire; "and it seems half a pity now to think of all those noble trees laid low: oaks and pines, older than I be by years enough! Still, there's always a pleasant thought for me in a field like that, ugly as it looks; for I say to myself, There, that's the way God deals with my heart, and with the heart of all them he loves. He burns away in the fires of his afflictions all the hopes and loves that stunt Him out from us, and lays in ashes the shabby weeds we have pride, and the strength on which we leaned; and then our lives look hateful to us, with nothing left but the thinking and the wishing that had been, just like them stumps; and when they take deep root, and seem unwilling like to quit the soil, why, then He comes and lays the axe to them, and burns, till He has burned them fairly out; and then the plants his precious seed, and we bring forth fruit to His glory, and the sun shines just as the grain and grass cover the blackened ground and the charred stumps."

"Quite likely. I dare say you are right," said Paul, indifferently, sauntering to the window by way of closing the argument. It was the window in which Meave sat; and as he stood there looking out at the dark, his fingers chancing to rest on the fauteuil, encountered a little hand lying on its arm. He started, and looked down.

"Meave! it isn't possible! I didn't think that you were here."

"You need hardly tell me that."

"You mean you were here—when—"

"Miss Mellen came in with you? Yes."

She spoke calmly, only with a strained clearness, in which the tone likewise might have detected a tremble, sooner or later to break down in sobs.

Paul stood an instant stunned. He could just see the pale face against the dark cushion, the listless figure lying wearily back. She stirred, and he caught the violet odor of which she was so fond. The fire burned up, and Meave's quiet little figure perched on the old pine trunk, of the white hand that clung to him, of the dark deep eyes looking up into his as he helped her down the mountain road. The old love and tenderness came back on him like a flood. He bent over her, murmuring,

"Meave, listen: don't condemn me yet."

But she would be on his knees against her breath, but every word clear and unmistakable.

"Paul, don't you see that, even were you the same, I could never think of you as I did once? I never knew you till now."

Mrs. Hutton caught the last words and recognized the voice.

"Miss Gilchrist! you there! Why, when did you come back? I never was so glad in all my life!"

"If you will be so good, Mrs. Hutton. It is so stupid when you can neither see nor slir about."

Still Meave protested, seeing on Mrs. Hutton's temporary absence.

"You have not heard me. Is it justice to condemn me unheard?"

She pushed him from her with something like abhorrence.

"Is not bad enough as it is. Don't make me quite hate you!"

Mrs. Hutton came back with candles.

"Mrs. Hutton," asked Meave, faintly, "isn't there something in the Bible like this—" Woe unto it for the world because of; for the shadows of the evening are stretched out?"

"Jeremiah, sixth, fourth," answered the old lady, promptly.

"I should like to have that on my tombstone, then," continued the young girl, turning her head wearily on the pillows.

"The Lord preserve us!" and Mrs. Hutton stood staring.

The door from the hall opened, not too gently, and a wave of joking, laughing, flowing skirts and talk, with one or two shawl-capped heads appearing hopelessly in their midst, rolled in upon them—half a dozen people, in fact, talking all together; and foremost of the party was Miss Mellen, holding in her hand a pretty girl in traveling-dress, Vivia Barclay, one of the new-comers.

"But I want to see Meave, Meave Gilchrist," cries this last, in a pretty despair. "I came here because she—Why there she is now! Meave, you darling, why didn't you speak?" and flying across the room she kissed her vigorously on cheeks and lips, a proceeding which Miss Mellen inspected through her glass.

"Lute, come here," called Vivia; "you must know Meave. How have you come to make a certain stranger? Oh, that ankle has kept you prisoner. How did you sprain it, dear? Is it very painful now?"

Here a gentleman disentangled himself from the group at the door, and came up to the fauteuil, smiling.

Meave looked at him doubtfully.

"Is it your brother, Vivia?"

"Yes—and Paul. I do know you already through my report. Do you find us alike? Gérard, you can sit here, but remember I am not special grace. I am to do the talking; you may look, however."

Gérard smiled slightly, holding out his hand, but the languid fingers on the arm of the fauteuil made no move to meet them. At that he darted a keen, inquiring look at the face, fair, and round, and baby-like, with all the bright hair drawn away from it under the little lace cap, but now, with gravity sweetness and indifference—nothing more.

All this time Miss Mellen was sitting with them, had not at once partially turned away toward a little table on which she had scattered her furs, and keeping haughty silence as she sorted them. Some one stepped through the long open window and joined her thus sitting there—some one in whose dark bright face was neither weariness nor sadness, but bearing himself with an elastic grace, and after a half-sauntered, half-appealing fashion, whose charm was well and listlessly remembered by her. Paul silent, and Meave, in the spite of herself. Their talk was inaudible, but sound was not needed for its translation, for from under his long lashes his eyes shone at their interment, fall into Lute's cold face that drooped before him, blushing, disturbed, and unable to tear his look; and his fingers had found and taken possession of her hand, not in the shadow but in clear open light; and Meave must endure it as the worshipers of Dagon the night of their prostrate god, the votaries of Greek jackets, Alexandra curls, and a thousand stolider fooleries, making a horrible meaningless noise in Meave's tortured ears. She looked wildly about for way of escape, and glancing at Gérard met his steady, intelligent look. Now there are some extremities of the soul, when hard bested and pressed down out of measure, electric intuition seizes the veins and forces the blood, nerves quicken to sense and muscles into sudden action, leaving swift thought far behind; and as it thundered out to this stranger, this acquaintance of a day, he gave her, she turned, and bundling out her hands, formed with her lips the words, "Help me!" words and gesture alike scarcely noticeable, but Gérard comprehended. He turned to his sister:

"Miss Gilchrist is tired with all this talking, and you are yet in your travelling dress. I will take her in my charge. Miss Gilchrist, I am sure this light is distressing you;" and without more ado he wheeled her chair, so as to face the window, made of the curtains a tolerably effective screen, and sat down beside her as sentinel.

"Is that better?" he asked, softly.

Meave looked up at him with grateful eyes. She was wondering at the quickness with which he had understood and answered her appeal, at her own daring in making it, and looking at him for the clew. He was not ugly, for in repose his features her specially handsome; simply a well-bred gentleman, with a quiet of manner, full of rest and strength, that unconsciously enough seemed to surround her with an atmosphere of peace, in the fair, cool asleep. Gérard looked gravely into the fair clearing face.

"Poor little thing!" he murmured, "some day she shall tell me all about it;" and left her nonsensically.

The windows of the Pagoda looked directly on the shore, hard white beach and gray sea stretching away under the low sky, all in full view; and gazing out on it a few days later and in close, moulding in her thought Mrs. Hutton's words—"He burns away in the fires of his affections the lives and hopes that are dear to us," Lucy in ashes the shade in which we took pride, the strength in which we trusted. Pain had come to Meave, and though finding no bud. The old dreariness and loneliness were back upon her, and doubled. Was there a God who cared to be in all this? She could not tell; she stretched out her hands into an abyss of dark and cold when she thought of him. Of one thing she was certain, that nothing human should again win her to trust and belief. The smart of betrayal was too bitter she thought, listening to the soothing sea and roll of the water.

At the window opposite sat Vivia, traces of deep care on her fresh face.

"If you can only not such an impracticable love," she said, presently.

Meave roused herself.

"What?"

"I was saying, dear, that your tulle specter was quite fresh (you have never even worn it, have you?), and it needs only a little Valenciennes with a velvet rim through the beading; and I have scenes of tulle for the skirt, and we two can make it up in a day and a half. We couldn't trust any of these sewing women here, you know, and I always did so long to see you in a tulle dress! It seems your specialty; pure, and floating, and mistlike—you would look like a lily and a cloud."

"If you would only tell me what this is all about?" put in Meave, resignedly.

"The dress that you are to wear to-morrow evening."

"This, my dear; no other, I assure you. I am not going to wear absurd suits."

"And why not?"

"I am not in the humor."

But Gérard thinks it will benefit you."

Vivia was an unwise general there. She emptied her arsenal of her last and strongest argument, and in vain.

Meave smiled in sweet scorn.

"Gérard is very kind, but I could not imagine myself in such a place."

Vivia commenced to pout.

"That is too bad, when I had planned all your dress so nicely. You could not bring up your dreadful consistency and talk wise and proper about duty and service, for it would absolutely not-you nothing—but to be obliging; I am truly disappointed. I did so long to go."

"You will go."

Vivia saw her advantage and seized it.

"Not a step without you."

"Vivia, that wave could go as well as I."

Vivia pouted and went to look for her brother.

"Gérard, she won't go."

"How do you know?"

"She says so."

"Oh! is that all?"

"Isn't it enough?"

"All things earthly are subject to change, even a lady's whim."

"But don't you see (with an impatient shrug of the shoulders), even if she should recollect—and then that is the extent of hope as to that, for she is perfect rock, quite as bad as you are—it would be too late?"

Gérard patted the velvet cheek, and smiled into the tragic eyes.

"Why, Pussy?"

"The dress, you dear old stupid—her dress! It is all a thing of the future as yet. It has to be made."

"Set a woman at work on it."

"My dear Gérard, there isn't a soul here who can do such a thing."

"Well, commence it then yourself, and say nothing to her about it. She will go."

"Gérard, you don't know her. I never saw such obstinacy in my life."

"If she don't go, I will give you—"

"An India shawl?" interrupted Vivia, breathless.

"If you prefer that."

"And remember, I am to select it. Oh! I am quite sure of it! I know she won't go."

"We shall see. You go and commence your mauve-making."

At that Vivia flew back to her room, and commenced a furious rummaging in drawers and boxes, and Gérard's knock sounded on Meave's door.

"Will you ride this afternoon?"

Meave assented cordially enough, for with Gérard she found neither loneliness nor weariness. He possessed a rare gift—that of timely silence, directly intuitively when words were best, and still, by a subtle power of active sympathy, so keeping pace with her thought, and even answering it by look and smile, that she had always a pleasant sense of companionship, of feeling, keenest of all delights.

So now with a sense of perfect rest she gave herself to the pleasure of their swift bowling over the beach, breeze blowing, clouds flying, dragging blood bounding faster and faster, sad lips parting in smiles, eyes beginning to brighten. On a sudden Gérard pulled up, and, leaving the Pagoda far behind, out of sight, so also the few straggling houses neighboring it. The sea stretched away on their right, pale and shining, the flat country on their left, desolate but for the golden glamour of that soft afternoon, still as if forgotten of life.

She sighed softly.

"That is a sad habit," said Gérard.

"Sighing! I can not help it."

"How unfortunate! You must be deplorably low, and yet you look at the very vigor of health."

Meave laughed in spite of herself.

"I am not always happy."

"I have known certain atheroic people who took a lazy delight in their misery," pursued Gérard, without seeming to notice that interjection. "Some, indeed, They had not courage for the probing and dressing of their wounds, and went about refusing proper remedies and assistance, and half had grown positively wedded to their wretchedness."

"Are not some wounds incurable?" asked Meave, softly.

"If thou faint in the day of adversity thy strength is small."

Meave was silent, and Gérard, turning the horses' heads toward home, was silent also till within sight of the Pagoda, and then—

"I have to ask a favor, and you will go with Vivia to-morrow evening?" he said.

"I should like a quiet evening vastly better."

"Doubtless; but instead I ask a peasant, but this is a favor to me."

"That makes going a necessity."

Gérard smiled his triumph and his thanks as he sprang out to help her from the wagon. Meave was half pleased, half vexed, and went up to Vivia with a very old face indeed.

"Vivia, I have decided to go if that unfortunate shirt can be finished in time."

Vivia looked out, wonder-stricken, from the floating mass in which she was half buried.

"After the ball?"

"What?"

"Nothing, dear; only this is your skirt, and it is more than half done. I have been busy over it all the afternoon, and Guy Peyntz is in despair. You know I promised to ride with him?"

"Why, this morning I said that I should not go."

"Oh! but Gérard said that you would."

That was her revenge for the shawl and Guy Peyntz. Meave grew scarlet.

"Really—"

"He always brings about events to his liking," pursued Vivia, carelessly. "It is my belief that he wears a fairy ring, or carries Aladdin's lamp in his pocket."

"And he told you that I would go?"

"Certainly, or I should hardly have spent my afternoon with this instead of Guy Peyntz."

At that Meave tossed aside her hat, and seizing a thimble, began to sew. That afternoon's work, and the sacrificed Guy Peyntz, weighed down the scales. Spite of indignant pride she must go. To bring all that labor to naught and make of Guy a useless victim was manifestly impossible; but the tulle over which she had sighed so long and the things she looked at as she sat there, revolving how best to be adamant where she had been wax. Being a woman for all that, she looked at them occasionally thought how all this mist might become her, though, when it was quite finished, and, for the first time, she made open confession. Rolls, puffs, rats, mice, cataracts, braids, she would have none of; vowed that she would be Diaphanie and beauties of that order. The pyramids, or skulls of stone, might safely bear about those mighty masses of frizzing, but not mere mortal heads. Feathers she scoffed at, and cut of the flowers sent her by Gérard those but one; but when the wedding was done, and Vivia reduced to dumb despair, she brushed away the hair from her forehead, and called it in bright and simple knots and braids over her cloud-like dress, pinned a broad white lily on her breast, and floated in on Vivia like a fair morning.

That young lady, still at her frizzing, uttered a scream of delight, and was running to embrace her, when she was checked by Meave. "Take care, dear! you will rumple it."

Then Gérard came, and looked shyly, for he already knew the drooping, sorrowful girl through all this white splendor. Something of the kind he said, and she smiled at him in answer—a smile in which lurked a subtle dame of wrath.

"What have I done now?" thought Gérard, perplexed, and standing aside he watched her a while—a calm, clear-eyed Aurora, a snow-glean among the flushed dancers. When the Lava Strome began to sound he went to her. She showed him her tablets, in a gay despair, full to the end.

"I shall not dance them, you know," she said, kindly; "I but give your name in not them. The common look, the proud smile, were clear enough; she was asserting her freedom; punishing him for having prevented her flight away with Guy Peyntz, that, to dance with people whom he had not displeased, but still watching her as she glanced in an occasional look of wrath among the dancers, to serve as a pretext for much promenading in corridors and talking in recesses and moonlit windows.

Fortune is a fickle woman; beholding Gérard's bold front she tossed him the chance for which other men might have labored in vain. He had hardly finished with Guy Peyntz, and looking across the room saw the gentleman in question standing with Meave beside one of the long windows. He went over to them at once.

"Mr. Peyntz, there is a lady in despair about her shawl and skirt. You have been seen with them. If you will aid her in the search I will take Miss Gilchrist in charge."

Meave shook her head, and wrapped her fleecy shawl more closely about her and rested on the piazza; and the moonlight was every where about them, flinging the leaves and pinching the vines and clustering through the thickly-leaved branches, making every thing look like fairyland, filling all the air with a quivering golden enchantment; and the music came in long, delirious bursts through the open windows. Gérard's very handsome face as Meave's slender wrists vainly clashed reproach, as they gazed endlessly up and down, till Vivia came to look for them, and she shawled and hooded. Every one was going, or gone.

Having a better guess at the workings of her little heart than Meave had, Gérard in the course looked for war; but Meave met him sweetly smiling, and he was at a loss, till he reflected that all this making over had not the dazzle and glint of the armor under which she held herself cool and invulnerable. Then he began to see that every thing they had been very much in the habit of using as a sort of boudoir, the girls idling over lovely embroidered and thing-nacks they picked from each Gérard reading; Vivia, who was as restless as a humming-bird, fidgeting secretly, and sharply wishing each other somewhere, interrupting, and found it. It was the bathing hour; every one was going to the beach. Meave bent a little closer over her work: "I am busy, Gérard, I am very busy," and argued. Gérard kept careful silence. Meave did not fail to note this silence, and hastened herself and her retreat, and was rewarded in no such verdict of company! When they had all gone the morning-room resigned silence to Meave.

To get rid of herself Meave wandered into the drawing-room, where she seldom showed herself, and was immediately driven from the door. There were two sorts of bores, one a shade less exceptionable to a woman than the other. In the midst of your torment you could see upon the face of the bore some useful hint respecting the cut of a waist or somebody's character; but the male bore talks slavery or dabbles in love but when he addresses, and when he had gone away came Julia Creighton, and quite filled the room with her smile. Meave, from behind her shoulders high and her elbows stiffly, was pinched in at the waist, and angled all over with little sharp points of crystal and steel, was sweet on Gérard—ergo, was held in abomination of Vivia and Meave. Alas for the softness of human nature! Meave—Miss Creighton was of the gushing order. When Gérard came into the drawing-room she received him as if from the jaws of death.

"And you really are not afraid? But then you gentlemen have so much courage! Now I should die with fear. I wonder at Vivia's courage; she is a daring creature; but there is danger—you will not deny that! There is danger."

Gérard did deny it utterly—then the Creighton again;

"But you see it requires faith and trust. Now I can not believe that it is actually perfectly safe. I have such a skeptical nature!"

"Mr. Barcuele will remodel your nature," put in Meave, curling her handsome lips. "He is an adept."

Miss Creighton opened her languid eyes.

"Oh! ah! how droll you are!"

"I assure you I am serious."

"You speak of Mr. Barcuele as a person?"

"Certainly," answered Meave, coolly, but flushing in spite of herself.

"But I should have seen her before," said Gérard, with perfect gravity, "you would be surprised at the improvement."

"There is no improving," pursued Meave, irritated by his composure; "perfect submission. Mr. Barcuele is a veritable tyrant—a perfect despot."

The Creighton uttered a little giggle.

"You are too severe, Miss Gilchrist. How can you say such shocking things?"

"Shocking! it is quite natural. He prefers a small list of accomplishments and capabilities such as have been given him on things weak enough to own such influence."

Not even Gérard, jesting this, but sharp current—spoken with eye and cheek aflame and bitter tone! Miss Creighton looked from one to another, and when all Gérard's face lightened with some emotion that was gone on the instant; while Meave sat in that savage hush that comes at such times, her own words ringing mercilessly in her ears. At last way of escape came. Gérard found even that for her, and she stole away as miserable a thing as ever went down a garden-path. She was ashamed to look at Vivia, she had so very much the better of having stabbed in the good little thing, who quite adored her brother; and to think that since she came into this house of all malicious, spiteful things could choose no other witness than Miss Creighton! His must hate her, and despise her, too, and that thought was intolerable, because she deserved it. She would at least have tried to atone herself above his contempt by making such reparation as was possible; but if he chose that she should feel a quenching of distance and division between them that she could by no means pass, what remained but to sink down quietly with this tangled skein of her own spinning? Nothing, for a weaker kind and courage; but she, choosing to find him one day on the beach, went to him, and sat sweeping on one side, and coming up to him said, resolutely,

"Mr. Barcuele, I have something to say to you."

He looked down at her curiously. There was such an odd mixture of shamefacedness and daring about her.

"I am sorry that I spoke to you as I did before Miss Creighton," went on Meave, hurriedly, for she felt her courage going.

"And I, also, should have troubled yourself with an apology. It needed none."

Meave put that aside with a peremptory wave of the hand.

"That is conventional. Please don't. I am going to be sincere. I am thoroughly ashamed of myself. That was a lie at the outset. I don't think that you are a tyrant, and I don't believe my—that other, that Vivia knows about your capabilities. Don't laugh. I am in earnest. It was unpardonable and unladylike, and cowardly and mean to speak of you, because I knew that a gentleman you could not defend yourself, and if I could strike one down, my own self-love and acquaintances I would do so with pleasure; and I don't blame you for being displeased as you were."

"How little you know me," he said, and looked, but pained. You spoke with such earnestness that I fancied that, after all, you hated me."

Meave's downcast eyes filled with tears—tears that the waves had brought in almost to their feet.

"When I look at this," she said, "I shall remember that I am a fool, and a flying spray, and pleasant salt-odors."

"You are going to-morrow?"

"I need at least five days before the opening of my school."

Then they sauntered lazily home with talk as idle as the free wind blowing about them, and the next morning she went away.

Meave possessed considerable administrative talent. She took a certain pleasure in the ordering of her school, in the nice working of its systems, in the strange power it gave her with which to hold its power; and now she threw herself with double zeal into its details, working as if she were really afraid of leisure, and of thought, and of pain. The bitterness of her pain was gone; and when she recalled Mr. Barcuele's words, it was only with a sense of consciousness that she charred and blackened field of her life was unspringing with a new and tender growth, and that it was stronger, braver, better for her fiery trial. She grew a little thin, however, perhaps from the unrest sparring her sometimes at night, and the fact that she reached to see her on her return, deplored the change feelingly.

"You were getting so well! If you could but have staid with us! It was lovely, though Gérard was so disconcerted. I really never thought him unreasonable before."

Meave smiled faintly.

"Did he come with you?"

"Only to the city. He has gone West."

Then the conversation branched off, and the downfall of poor Vivia's skirt. Could it have been for that Meave cried an hour when Vivia had gone?

The days went on, until Meave, coming one evening into her library with a sigh of relief, found some one sitting there quietly in the dim light—Gérard.

"I have been home three hours," was his salutation, "and my first visit is here."

"That is kind—rather than I expected."

"You put small faith in any child of man."

"Why should I?"

"It is so much more comfortable."

"Yes, if there were no future."

"A discussion of it would be out of place? I think we should stop to quarrel."

"If you choose, I will agree with all you say."

"Promise me that."

Meave looked up, surprised.

"You would not like me?"

"For the next half hour."

She made an impatient gesture.

"I never did like you."

"Shall I speak plainly?"

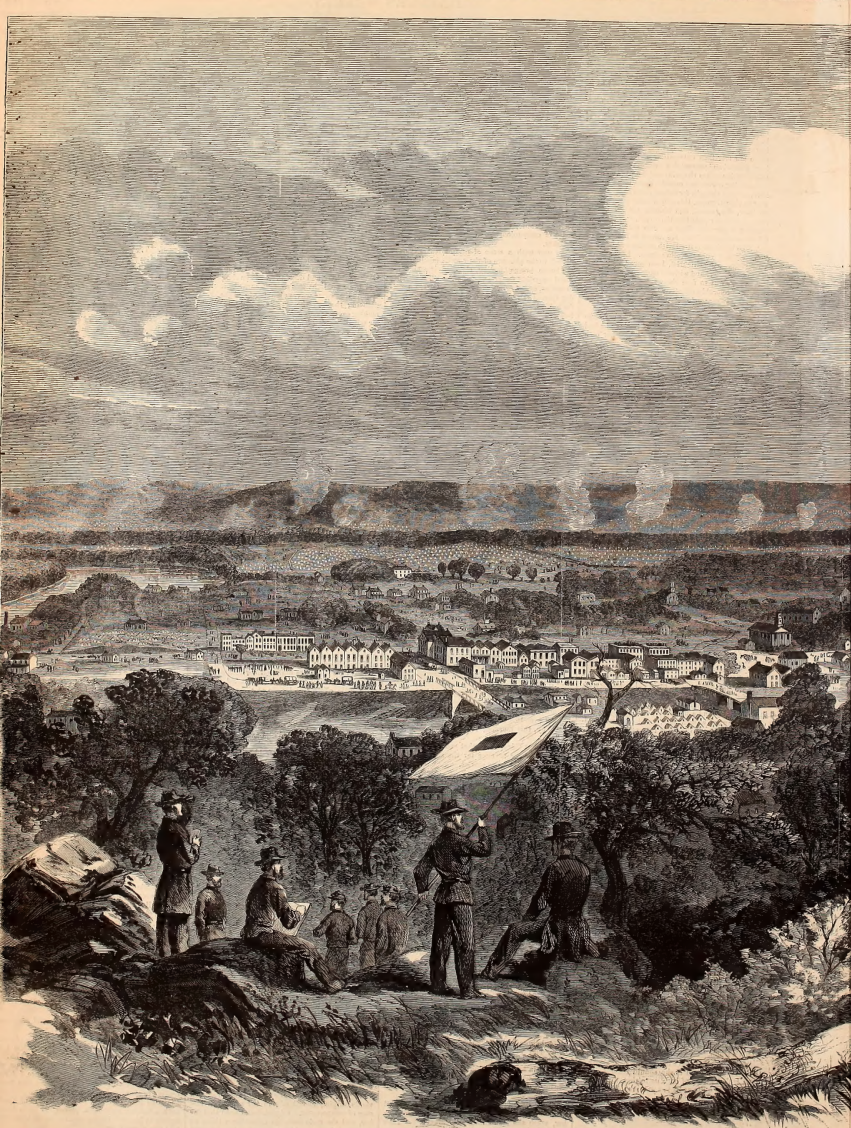
And he had, for of all her assumed indifference, she was getting half afraid of the meaning in his eyes, of the deepening and thrilling in his voice.

"Remember you are to play echo. So then—I have missed you intolerably, and I trust you have done so: words which, from the first time I heard them, I watched your sleeping, suffering face in the deep window of Mrs. Hutton's room till that day on the sands, when you turned it toward me, smiling, saucy, and defiant, I have loved you. Dear echo, say, I have loved you."

Blushing scarlet, between anger and surprise, Meave sprang to her feet, exclaiming,

"This is unpardonable—it is just, and unworthy of you, Sir;" but Gérard seized her hand and drew her back beside him, and gathered her close to him.

"Oh, Meave! there is no jesting. Are you so blind, or are you willful? Child, since I have known you every purpose of my heart has been centred in that one intent to win you."



Meave glanced round at him shyly, and then, with a sudden movement, placed her little hand lightly in his, and, hiding her face on his shoulder, told him about Paul.

"I know all that," he answered, softly, "and I feared lest you would find it hard to trust me."

"But I do trust you."

"Wholly?"

"Entirely."

GENERAL VIEW OF CHATTANOOGA AND UNION ENCAMPMENTS—REBEL ARMY BEYOND BR

LT OF TIMBER—FROM OUR SIGNAL STATION.—Sketched by Theodore R. Davis.

VERY HARD CASH

By CHARLES READE, Esq.

AUTHOR OF "IT IS NEVER TOO LATE TO MEND," ETC.

CHAPTER XLVII.

A REPORT came round that the asylum was open in the rear. A rush was made thither from the front; and this limited the crowd considerably: so then Mrs. Dodd was got out by the help of some humane persons, and carried into the nearest house, more dead than alive. There she found Mrs. Archbold in a pitiable state. That lady had been looking on the fire, with the key in her pocket, by taking which she was like to be a murderess: her terror and remorse were distracted, and the room had thrown her into violent hysterics. Mrs. Dodd plucked up a little strength, and characteristically enough tottered to her assistance, and called for the best remedies, and then took her hand and pressed it, and whispered soothingly that both were safe, meaning David and Edward. Mrs. Archbold thought she meant Alfred and David: this new shock was as good for her as cold water: she became quiet, and presently gulped out, "You saw them? you knew them (jump) all that way off?"

"Yes!" (Jump.) Mrs. Dodd, "why one was my husband, and the other my son." Mrs. Archbold gave a sigh of relief. "Oh, madam," continued Mrs. Dodd, "the young fireman, who went and saved my husband, was my own son, my Edward, my darling, oh, I am a happy wife, a proud mother:" she could say no more for tears of joy, and while she wept deliciously, Mrs. Archbold cried also, and so invigorated and refreshed her cunning, and presently she perked up and told Mrs. Dodd boldly that Edward had been seduced, but that he was gone home to his better fellow him, or he would be anxious. "But my poor husband!" objected Mrs. Dodd.

"He is safe," said the other; "I saw him (jump) with an attendant."

"Ah," said Mrs. Dodd, with meaning, "that other my son rescued was an attendant, was he?"

"Yes." (Jump.)

She then promised to take David under her especial care, and Mrs. Dodd consented, though reluctantly, to go home.

To her surprise Edward had not yet arrived, and Julia was sitting up, very anxious; and flew at her with a shriek, and kissed her copiously; and then, drawing back her head, searched the matronly eyes for news. "Oh, Mrs. Dodd, you may well look," said Mrs. Dodd. "Oh my child! what a night this has been;" and she took into a chair, and sobbed up her story. Julia settled down in them directly, and in that position Mrs. Dodd told all the night's work, told it under a most unfavorable summary of pale, embellished and interrupted, the strange tale was hardly ended when a manly step came up the stairs, and both ladies pressed each other and were still as mice, and in walked a fireman with a wet lover, and a blackened head with sandals. She flew at him with a gurgle of the first degree, and threw her arms round his neck, and kissed both his blackened cheeks and his head again, crying, "Oh, my own, my precious, my sweet, brave darling; kiss me, kiss me, kiss me, you are a hero, a Christian hero, like Paul's, like Paul's!" Mrs. Dodd checked her impetuous career by asking pitcously if his mother was not to have him. To his shame, Edward had to drop his head, and soak with him at Mrs. Dodd's knees, and she held him at arm's length and looked at him, and then drew him close and enfolded him, and thanked God for him; and then they both embraced him at once, and interwoven hair leaves knows how, and poured the wealth of their wowmly hearts out on him in a torrent and nearly made him sea-sick. But presently something in his face struck Mrs. Dodd, accustomed to read her children. "Is there any thing the matter, love?" she inquired, anxiously. He looked down and said, "I am dead sleepy, mamma, for one."

"Of course he is, poor child," said Julia, doing the sub-maternal; "wait till I see every thing is comfortable." And she left and turned suddenly at the door with "Oh, you darling! and up to his bedroom, and put more coals on his fire, and turned everybody out of it.

Mrs. Dodd seized the opportunity. "Edward, there is something amiss."

"Alfred is safe," said he, dryly. "But I thought if I told you before her you might scold me."

"Scold you, love? Never. Hush! I'll come to you soon by-and-by."

Soon after they all bade each other good-night; and pres. Mrs. Dodd came and tapped softly at her son's door, and found him with his vest and coat off and a helmet standing on the table reflecting a red coal; he was seated by the fire in a brown study, smoking. She apologized not effectually for her intrusion, and was going away. "No, no," said she, suppressing a cough, "not if it does you good."

"Well, mother, when you are in a fix smoke is a soother, you know; and I'm in a regular fix."

"A fix!" sighed Mrs. Dodd, resignedly: and waited patiently, all ears.

"Mamma," said the fire-warrior, becoming speculative under the dreamy influence of the weed, "I wonder whether such a muddle ever was before. When a man is grappling with fire, what with the heat, and what with the excitement, his wits are all in a hundred and one, and his brain all in a whirl, and he scarce knows what he is doing till after it is done. But I've been thinking of it all since. (Puff.) There was my poor little mamma in the mob; I double myself up for my spring, and I go at the window, and through it; now on this side of it I hear my mother cry, 'Edward! come down;' on the other side I fall on two men perishing in an oven: one is my own father, and the other is, how do you think? Why, Mr. Wreech."

Mrs. Dodd held up her hands in mute amazement.

"I had promised to break every bone in his skin at our first meeting; and I kept my promise by saving his skin and bones, and life and all." (Puff.)

Mrs. Dodd groaned aloud. "I half suspected it," she said, feebly. "That will screw, that bangs the grate? But no; you are mistaken, Mrs. Archbold told me positively he was an attendant."

"Then she told you a cracker. It was not an attendant, but a madman, and that madman was Alfred Hardie, upon my soul! Our Julia's amusing bridegroom."

He smoked on in profound silence, waiting for his mother to ask him the key in her chirrupiest mute and all relaxed, as if the news had knocked her down.

"Come, now," said Edward, at last; "what is to be done? May I tell Julia? that is the question."

"Not for the world," said Mrs. Dodd, shocked into energy. "Would you blight her young life forever in such a way? why? You must please him that, if Alfred's sad state came to Julia's ears, all her love for him would revive, and she would break with Mr. Hardie, and never more marry all her life. I see no end to her misery," continued Mrs. Dodd, with a deep sigh; "and I had set my heart on her marrying a man from a mad-house (why this exact lunatic-house every day); she would be always going to see him, and trying to nurse her duty and her unhappy love. No, no; let me be a widow with a living husband, if it is God's will, but keep her my happy days. But my child she shall not be so withered in the flower of her days for any man than ever breathed. Oh, if I can, I can." The mother could utter no more for emotion.

"Well," said Edward, "you know best, generally speaking; but a widow! I disobey you. But concealments are bad things too. We used to go with our hearts open. Ah!" (Puff.)

"Edward," said Mrs. Dodd, after due consideration, "the best thing is to marry her to Mr. Hurd at once. He has spoken to me for me, and I consulted her."

"Has he? Well, and what did she say?"

"She said she would not marry at all, but live and die with me. Then I pressed her a little, you know. Then she did say she could never marry but a man who knew and had lost her poor Alfred. And then I told her I thought Mr. Hurd could make her happy, and she would make him happy if she could esteem him, and marry him."

"Well, mamma, and so she could."

"Why then your child gave me a look that haunts me still—a look of unutterable love, and reproach, and resignation, and despair, and burst into tears so piteously I could say no more. Oh! oh! oh! oh!"

"Don't you cry, mammy dear," said Edward. "Ah, I remember when a tear was a wonder in our house." And the fire-warrior sucked at his cigar to stop a sigh.

"And n-now n-not a d--day without them," sighed Mrs. Dodd. "But you have cost me more, my precious boy."

"I'm waiting my time. (Puff.) Mamma, take my advice; don't you fidget so. Just things will go very hurry here, and very sorry, Mr. Hurd, or any body? Look here; I'll keep dark to please you, if you'll keep quiet to please me."

At breakfast-time came a messenger with a line from Mrs. Archbold. Mrs. Archbold had escaped from Drayton House, in company with another dangerous maniac.

Mrs. Dodd received the blow with a kind of desperate resignation. She rose quietly from the table without a word, and went to put on her bonnet, leaving her daughter in the house; for she did not at once see all that was implied in the communication, and that was a flight on foot to Drayton House. The firemen have saved one half of that building: the rest was a black shell. Mrs. Archbold came to Mrs. Dodd's lodgings, and told them two keepers were already scouring the country, and an advertisement sent to all the journals.

"Oh, madam!" said Mrs. Dodd, "if the other should hurt him, or lead him somewhere to his death!"

Mrs. Archbold said she might dismiss this fear. Patient in question was a gentle lunatic, and though horribly dangerous when thwarted in that, was most intelligent in a general way, and much attached to Mr. Dodd; they were always together.

A strange expression shot into Mrs. Dodd's eye, she pinched Edward's arm to keep him quiet, and said with feigned indifference:

"Then it was the one who was in such danger with my husband, was it?"

"Yes," said Mrs. Archbold, off her guard. It had cost her a great deal to get this handsome, fashionably-dressed young gentleman to be a fireman of last night. She saw her mistake, though, the moment she said, blandly, "Why you told my mother it was an attendant."

"Did I, madam?" asked Mrs. Archbold, mighty innocently: "I suppose I thought so. Well, I was mistaken, unfortunately."

Mrs. Dodd was silent a moment, then, somewhat faintly, Mrs. Archbold thought. She told the captain to drive to an old acquaintance of ours, Dr. Outerey. Once with that detective on his own account. He was not at his office, but in. They put their heads together, and Green closed down the asylum with a myrmidon, while Mrs. Dodd went into the City to obtain leave of absence from Cross and Co. This was politely declined at first, but on Mrs. Dodd showing symptoms of leaving them altogether, it was conceded. She returned home with Edward, and there was Mr. Green; he had actually traced the fugitives by broken fences, and occasional footsteps in the side-clay of ditches, so far as to have no doubt they had got upon the great south-eastern road. Then Mrs. Dodd had a female inspiration. "The Dover road! ah! my husband will make for the sea!"

"I shouldn't wonder, being a sailor," said Green: "it is a pleasure to work with a lady like you, that puts in a good hint. Know any thing about the other one, ma'am?"

Mrs. Dodd looked puzzled at this off-hand question. But it was a natural one for Green to ask.

She said, gravely, "I do. To my cost."

Green's eye sparkled, and he took out his note-book. "Now where is he like to make for?"

Mrs. Dodd seemed to wince at the question, and then turned her eyes inward to divine. The result was given a downright shudder, and she said, evasively, "Being with David, I hope and pray he will be in safe custody."

"No, no," said Green, "it won't do to count on that altogether. How do we know which of the two will lead the way? You must please to put Mr. Dodd out of the question, ma'am, for a moment. Now we'll say No. 2 is escaped alone: where is he likely to ruffle?"

Mrs. Dodd thus pressed, turned her eyes more and more inward, and said at last in a very low tone, and full of concentrated horror,

"He will come to my house."

Mr. Green said, quite eagerly. The lady's emotion was nothing to him; the hint was invaluable, the combination interesting. "Well, ma'am, that's right. I'll post a good man in sight of your door: and I'll take the Dover road directly with my drag. My teeth weren't strong enough for the nut you gave me to crack: let us try this one. Tom Green isn't often beat twice running."

"I will go with you, Mr. Green."

"Honored and proud, ma'am. But a lady like you in my dog-cart along o' me and my mate!"

Mrs. Dodd waived this objection almost contemptuously, and was ready to go now.

It was agreed that Green should drive round for her in an hour. He departed for the present, and Edward went off to lie in the dog-cart too, but she told him no; she wanted him at home to guard his sister.

"Guard her! Against what?"

"Can you ask me that? Why, against 'the Wretch.'" Then seeing him look puzzled, "Consider, love," she said, "he is not like poor poor father: he has not forgotten. That advertisement, Aileen Aroon, it was from him, you know. Now they dote he attach himself so to poor papa? Don't you see it is because he is Julia's father. The wretch loves her still."

Edward from puzzled looked very grave. "What a hand you have for reasons! He said" I should never have seen all this, yet it's plain enough now, as you put it."

"Yes it is plain. Julia darling is betrothed to a maniac; that maniac loves her; and much I fear she loves him. Some new calamity is impending. Oh, my son, I feel it already heavy on my heart. What is it to be? Is your father to be the destruction, or will that furious wretch burst in upon your sister, and kill her, or perhaps kill Mr. Hurd, if he catches them together. Edward, you must happen now! I'll very air seems to me swarming with calamities."

"Oh I'll take care of all that," said Edward. And he comforted her a little by promising faithfully not to let Julia go out of his sight till her return.

She put on a plain traveling-dress. The dogcart came. She slipped fifty sovereigns into the principal of her purses, and off they went at a slapping pace. The horse was a great help to them in point of endurance, and his long stride and powerful action raised poor Mrs. Dodd's hopes, and the rushing air did her good. Green kept on him. Sometimes he put inquiries for some miles on the Dover road; but he explained to her that the parties they were after had probably kept off night. "They don't tire, that sort," said Mr. Green.

At Dartford they got a doubtful intimation, on the strength of which he pushed on to Rochester. There he pulled up, deposited Mrs. Dodd at the principal inn, still morning, and scoured the town for intelligence.

He inquired of all the policemen; described the two fugitives, and added out of his intelligence, "Both splashed and dirty."

No, the Bobbies had not seen them.

Then he walked out to the side of the town nearest London, and examined all the dealers in food. At last he found a baker who, early that morning, had two customers, and the one he told mention that hats, "and splashed fearful;" he added, "I thought they had been broken pious; but the other one was quieter: they paid for the bread right enough."

On learning that he entered Rochester hastes, the shrewd Mr. Green made direct to the very nearest stop-shop, and his sagacity was rewarded; the shop-keeper was a chatter-box, and told him yes, two cents out on a frolic had bought a couple of hats of him, and a whole set of shirts, and a lot of other little very respectables, too; but nothing else would satisfy him, but the young one he honored him, and bought them. He took the old ones in exchange.

At that Green offered a sovereign for the old clothes blindfold. The trader instantly asked two pounds, and took thirty shillings.

Green now set the police to scour the town for a gentleman and a common sailor in company, offered a handsome reward, and went to bed in a small inn, with David's clothes by the kitchen fire. Early in the morning he went to Mrs. Dodd's hotel with David's clothes parcelled, and told her his tale. She knew the clothes directly, kissed them, and cried over them: then gave him her hand with a world of gratitude and grace: "What an able man! Sir, you inspire me with great confidence."

"And you me with zeal, ma'am," said the delighted Green. "Why I'd go through fire and water for a lady like you, that pays well, and doesn't grudge a fellow a bit of praise. Now you must eat a bit, ma'am, if it's ever so little, and then we'll take the road; and I'm quite think the parties have left the town, and by their night's work they must be good travelers."

The dog-cart took the road, and the ex-lunatic stepped out thirteen miles an hour.

Now at this moment Alfred and David were bowling along ahead with a perfect sense of security. All that first night, the grandest of his life, Alfred walked on air, and drank the glorious exhilirating breath of Freedom. But when the sun dawned on them, his intoxicating joy began to be dashed with apprehension; baffles and bemired, might they not be suspected and detained by some officious authority?

But the sun broke set that all night. He took a double-bedded room in The Bear, locked the door, put the key under his pillow, and slept till eleven. At noon they were on the road again, and as they swung lustily along in the frosty but kindly air, Alfred's chest expanded, his spirits rose, and he felt a man all over. Unfettered by freedom, youth, and motion, and a little inflated by nervous vanity, his heart, buoyant at his foot, now began to taste aspiring projects: he would indict his own father, and the doctors, and inundate them on the other side of justice, and publicly wipe off the stigma they had cast on him, and meantime he would cure David and restore him to his family.

He loved this harmless companion of his cell, his danger, and his flight; loved him for Julia's sake, loved him for his self. Youth and vanity whispered, "I know more about madness than the doctors; I have seen it closer." It struck him David's raging for him would be one of those unerring instincts that sometimes guide the sick to their cure. And then as the law permits the lunatic to choose his own legist—without a fresh order or certificates—within fourteen days of his escape or detection, he did not think it prudent to show himself in London till that time should have elapsed; so, all things considered, why not hide a few days with David in some insignificant sea-port, and revel in liberty and blue water with him all day long, and in the evening teach him to read and write, and pasted so for his natural element. Alfred hummed him, and an hour after sunset they reached the town of Canterbury. Here Alfred took the same precautions as before, and slept till nine o'clock.

When he awoke, he found David walking to and fro impatiently. "All right, mesmate," said Alfred, "we shall soon be in blue water." He made all haste, and they were on the road again by ten, walking at a gallant pace.

But the night was already falling along about thirty miles behind them. Green inquired at all the turnpikes and vehicles; the scent was cold at last, and he came by chance at Alfred at Canterbury. Green just bolted his gallant horse, and started on foot with just as little delay: entered the town of Folkestone, their pursuers came up to the cross-roads, not five miles behind them.

Alfred went to a good inn in Folkestone, and ordered a steak, then strolled with David by the beach, and gloried in the water with him. Afterdinner dinner was a long time coming, as well," said he. "See there's a nice boat, riding at anchor there."

David snuffed the breeze and his eye sparkled, and he said, "Wind dine east, mesmates." And this remark, slight as it was, was metrical and gave Alfred great delight: strengthened his growing conviction that not for nothing had this change been forced upon him. Was he not the one to cure his own father: for Julia's father was his: he had no other now. "All right," said he, gayly. "we'll soon be on blue water: but first we'll have our dinner, old boy, for I am starving." David said nothing, and went rather doggedly to the inn with him.

The steak was on the table. Alfred told the waiter to open another and David to help as he just ran up stairs to wash his hands. He came down in less than two minutes; but David was gone, and the waiter standing there erect and apathetic like a wooden sentinel.

"Why where is he?" said Alfred.

"Gent's gone out," was the reply.

"And you stood there and let him? you born idiot. Which way is he gone?"

"Don't know," said the waiter, angrily, "I ain't a plicuman. Nose but respectable gents comes here, as does gen's wash something." Alfred darted out and scoured the town; he asked every body if they had seen a tall gentleman dressed like a common sailor: nobody could tell him: there were so many sailors about the port; that which in an inland town would have betrayed the truant concealed him here. A cold perspiration began to gather on Alfred's brow, as he ran wildly all over the place.

He could not find him, nor any trace of him. At last it struck him that he had originally proposed to go to Dover, and spoken of that town to David, though he had now glanced aside, making for the smaller ports on the south coast: he hired a horse directly, and galloped furiously to Dover. He rode down to the pier, gave his horse to a boy to hold, and ran about inquiring for David. He could not find him: but at last he found a policeman, who told him he thought there was another party on the same lay as himself: "No," said Bobby, correcting himself, "it was two they were after, a gentleman and a sailor. Perhaps you are his mate."

Alfred's blood ran cold. "Pursued! and so hotly!"

"No, no," he stammered; "I suspect I am on the same business." Then he said cunningly (for asylums teach the frankest natures cunning), "Come and have a glass of grog and tell me all about it." Bobby consented, and under its influence described Mrs. Dodd and her companions to him.

But not every body can describe minutely. In the bare outlines, which were all this artist could furnish him, Alfred recognized at once whom do you think? Mrs. Archbold, Dr. Wolf, and his arch-enemy Rooke, the keeper. Doubtless his own mind, seizing on so vague a description, adapted it rather hastily to what seemed probable. Mrs. Dodd never occurred to him, nor that David was the sole, or even the main, object of the pursuit. He was thoroughly puzzled what to do. However, as his pursuers had clearly scoured Dover, and would have found David if there, he made use of their labors and galloped back toward Folkestone. But he took the precaution to inquire at the first turnpike, and there he learned a lady and two men had passed through about an hour before in a dog-cart; it was a wonder he had missed them. Alfred gnashed his teeth. "Curse you," he muttered. "Well, do my work in Folkestone, I'll find him yet, and baffle you." He turned his horse's head westward and rode after David. Convinced that his lost friend would not go inland, he took care to keep near the cliffs, and had ever an eye on the beach when the road came near enough.

About eight miles west of Folkestone he saw a dog-cart going down a hill before him: but there was only a single person in it. However, he increased his pace and got close behind it as it mounted the succeeding hill, which was a high one. Walking leisurely behind it his quick eye caught sight of a lady's veil wrapped round the iron of the seat.

That made him instantly suspect this might be the dog-cart after all. But, if so, how came a stranger in it? He despised a single foe, and resolved to pump this one and learn where the others were.

While he was thinking how he should begin the dog-cart stopped at the top of the hill, and the driver looked seaward at some object that appeared to interest him.

It was a glorious scene. Viewed from so great a height the sea expanded like ocean, and its light-blue waters sparkled and laughed innumerable in the breeze. "A beautiful sight, Sir," said the escaped prisoner; "you may well stop to look at it." The man touched his hat and chuckled. "I don't think you know what I am looking at, Sir," he said politely.

"I thought it was the lovely sea view; so bright, so broad, so free."

"No, Sir; not but what I can enjoy that a bit, too: but what I'm looking at is an 'unt. Do you see that little boat? Sailing right down the coast about eight miles off? Well, Sir, what do you think there is in that boat? But you'll never guess. A madman."

"Ah!"

"Curious, Sir, isn't it? a respectable gentleman too he is, and sails well; only stark, staring mad. There was two of 'em in company: but it seems they can't keep together long. Our one steals a fisherman's boat, and there he goes, down channel. And now look here, Sir; see this steam-tug smoking along right in front of us, she's after him, and see there's my governor aboard standing by the wheel with a Bobby, and a lady: and if ever there was a lady she's one;" here he lowered his voice. "She's that mad gentleman's wife, Sir, as I am a living sinner."

They both looked down on the strange chase in silence. "Will they catch her?" asked Alfred, at last, under his breath.

"How can we be off it? steam against sails. And if he runs ashore, I shall be there to nab him." Alfred looked, and looked: the water came into his eyes. "It's the best thing that can befall him now," he murmured. He gave the man half-a-crown, and then turned his horse's head and walked him down the hill toward Folkestone. On his arrival there he paid for his horse and his untasted dinner, and took the first train to London, a little dispirited, and a good deal mortified, for he hated to be beat: but David was in good hands, that was one comfort: and he had glorious work on hand, love and justice. He went to an out-of-the-way inn in the suburbs, and, when he had bought a carpet-bag and some linen and other necessaries, he had but one sovereign left.

His heart urged him vehemently to go at once and find his Julia: but alas! he did not even know where she lived; and he dared not at present make public inquiries: that would draw attention to himself, and be his destruction; for Wolf stood well with the police, and nearly always recaptured his truant patients by their aid before the fourteen days had elapsed. He determined to go first to a solicitor, and launch him against his enemies, while compelled to shirk them in his own person. Curious position! Now among his father's creditors was Mr. Compton a solicitor, known for an eccentric, but honorable man, and for success in litigation. Mr. Compton used to do his own business in Barkington, and employ an agent in London: but Alfred remembered to have heard just before his incarceration that he had reversed the parts, and now lived in London. Alfred found him out by the Directory, and called at his chambers in Lincoln's Inn-fields. He had to wait some time in the outer office listening to a fluent earnest client preaching within: but presently a sharp voice broke in upon the drone, and, after a few sentences, Mr. Compton ushered out a client with these remarkable words: "And as for your invention, it has been invented four times before you invented it, and never was worth inventing at all. And you have borrowed two hundred pounds of me in ninety loans, each of which cost me an hour's invaluable time: I hold ninety acknowledgments in your handwriting; and I'll put them all in force for my protection:" with this he turned to his head clerk; "Mr. Colls, take out a writ against this client; what is your Christian name, Sir? I forget."

"Simon," said the gaping client, off his guard.

"Thank you, Sir," said Mr. Compton with sudden politeness: then resuming hostilities. "A writ in the Common Pleas against Simon Macfarlane: keep it in your drawer, Colls, and if ever the said Macfarlane does me the honor to call on me again, serve him with it on the spot; and if not, not. Good-morning, Sir." And with this he bolted into his own room and slammed its door. The clerks opened the outer door to Mr. Macfarlane with significant grins, and he went out bewildered sorely, yea even like one that walketh abroad in his sleep. "Now, Sir," said Mr. Colls cheerfully to Alfred. But the new client naturally hesitated now: he put on his most fascinating smile, and said: "Well, Mr. Colls, what do you advise? Is this a moment to beard the lion in his den?"

At Alfred's smile and address Colls fell in love with him directly, and assured him, sotto voce, and with friendly familiarity, that now was his time. "Why, he'll be as sweet as honey now he has got rid of a client." With this he took Alfred's name, and ushered him into a room piled with japanned tin boxes, where Mr. Compton sat, looking all complacency, at a large desk table, on which briefs, and drafts, and letters lay in profusion and seeming confusion. He rose, and with a benignant courtesy invited Alfred to sit down and explain his business.

The reader is aware our Oxonian could make a close and luminous statement. He began at the beginning, but soon disposed of preliminaries and came to his capture at Silverton. Then Mr. Compton quietly rang the bell, and with a slight apology to Alfred requested Colls to search for the draft of Mrs. Holloway's will. Alfred continued. Mr. Compton listened keenly, noted the salient points on a sheet of brief-paper, and demanded the exact dates of every important event related.

The story finished, the attorney turned to Colls, and said, mighty coolly, "You may go. The will is in my pocket: but I made sure he was a madman. They generally are, these ill-used clients." (Exit Colls.) "Got a copy of the settlement, Sir, under which you take this ten thousand pounds?"

"No, Sir."

"Any lawyer seen it?"

"Oh yes; Mr. Crauford down at Barkington."

"Good! Friend of mine. I'll write to him. Names and addresses of your trustees?"

Alfred gave them.

"You have brought the order on which you were confined, and the two certificates?"

"Not I," said Alfred. "I have begged and prayed for a sight of them, and never could get one. That is one of the galling iniquities of the system—I call it 'THE DOUBLE SHUFFLE.' Just bring your mind to bear on this, Sir: The prisoner whose wits and liberty have been signed away behind his back is not allowed to see the order and certificate on which he is confined—until after his release: that release he is to obtain by combating the statements in the order and certificates. So to get out he must first see and contradict the lies that put him in; but to see the lies that put him in, he must first get out. So runs the circle of iniquity. Now, is that the injustice of Earth, or the injustice of Hell?"

Mr. Compton asked a moment to consider: "Well, I think it is of the earth, earthy. There's a mixture of Idiocy in it the Devil might fairly repudiate. Young gentleman, the English Statutes of Lunacy are famous monuments of legislatorial incapacity: and indeed, as a general rule, if you want justice and wisdom, don't you go to Acts of Parliament, but to the Common Law of England."

Alfred did not appreciate this observation: he made no reply to it, but inquired, with some heat, "what he could do to punish the whole gang—his father, the certifying doctors, and the mad-house keepers?"

"Humph! You might indict them all for a conspiracy," said Mr. Compton; "but you would be defeated. As a rule, avoid criminal proceedings where you have a civil remedy. A jury will give a verdict and damages where they would not convict on the same evidence. Yours is just one of those cases where Temper says, 'indict!' but Prudence says, 'sue!' and Law, through John Compton, its oracle in this square, says, sue the defendant and no other. Now, who is the true defendant here, or party liable in law?"

"The keeper of the asylum, for one."

"No. If I remember right, all proceedings against him are expressly barred by a provision in the last statute. Let us see."

He took down the statutes of the realm, and showed Alfred the clause, which raises the proprietor of a mad-house above the civic level of a Prince Royal. "Curse the law," said Alfred, bitterly.

"No, don't curse the Law. Curse the Act if you like; but we can't get on without the Law, neither of us. Try again."

"The certifying doctor, Sir?"

"Humph!" said Mr. Compton, knitting his brows: "a jury might give you a verdict. But it would probably be set aside by the full court, or else by a court of error. For, unless you could prove informality, barefaced negligence, or mala fides, what does it come to? A professional man, bound to give medical opinion to all comers, is consulted about you, and says he thinks you are insane; you turn out sane. Well then he was mistaken: but not more than he is in most of his professional opinions. We lawyers know what guess-work Medicine is, we see it in the witness-box. I hate suing opinions: it is like firing cannon at snipes in a wind. Try again."

Alfred groaned. "Why there is nobody left but the rogue who signed the order."

"And if you were a lawyer that alone would tell you he is the defendant. Where a legal wrong has been committed by A. B. and C., and there is no remedy against A. or B., there must either be one against C., or none at all: but this Law abhors as Nature does a vacuum. Besides this defendant has done the wrong complained of. In his person you sue an act, not an opinion. But of course you are not cool enough to see all this just at first."

"Cool, Sir," said Alfred, despairingly; "I am frozen with your remorseless law. What, of all these villains, may I only attack one, and can't I imprison even him, as he has me? Such narrow law encourages men to violence who burn under wrongs like mine."

Mr. Compton looked keenly at his agitated, mortified client, but made no concession. He gave him a minute to digest the law's first bitter pill: and then said, "If I am to act for you, you had better write a line to the Commissioners of Lunacy requesting them to hand me copies of the order and certificates." Alfred wrote it.

"And now," said Mr. Compton, thoughtfully, "I don't think they will venture to recapture you during the fourteen days. But still they might: and we attorneys are wary animals. So please give me at once a full authority to act under advice of counsel for your protection."

Alfred wrote as requested, and Mr. Compton put the paper in his drawer, remarking, "With this I can proceed by law or equity, even should you get into the asylum again." He then dismissed Alfred somewhat abruptly, but with an invitation to call again after three clear days. Like most ardent suitors after their first interview with passionless law, he went away sadly chilled, and so home to his cheerless lodging, to count the hours till he could see Julia, and learn his fate from her lips.

This very morning a hasty note came to Edward from Folkestone, worded thus:

"Oh, Edward: my worst misgivings! The two have parted. Poor papa has taken a man's boat and is in sight. We shall follow directly in a steamboat. But the other! You know my fears; you must be father and mother to that poor child till I come home.

"Your sad mother,

"Lucy Dodd."

Julia held out her hand for the note. Edward put it in his pocket.

"What is that for?" said the young lady.

"Why surely I may put my own property in my pocket."

"Oh, certainly. I only want to look at it."

"Excuse me."

"Are you in earnest, Edward? Not let me see dear mamma's letter!" and the eloquent face looked piteously surprised.

"Oh, I'll tell you the contents. Papa had got to Folkestone and taken a boat, and gone to sea: then mamma took a steamboat and after him: so she will soon catch him, and is not that a comfort?"

"Oh yes," cried Julia, and was for some time too interested and excited to think of any thing else. But presently she returned to the charge. "Any thing else, dear?"

"Humph! Well, not of equal importance."

"Oh, if it is of no importance, there can be no reason for not telling me. What was it?"

Edward colored but said nothing. He thought, however: and thus ran his thoughts: "She's my intellectual superior; and I've got to deceive her; and a nice mess I shall make of it."

"It is of importance," said Julia, eying him. "You have told a story: and you don't love your sister." This fulminated, she drew herself up proudly and was silent. A minute afterward stealing a look at her he saw her eyes suddenly fill with tears, apropos of nothing tangible.

"Now this is nice," said he to himself.

At noon she put on her bonnet to visit her district. He put on his hat directly, and accompanied her. Great was her innocent pleasure at that; it was the first time he had done her the honor. She took him to her poor people, and showed him off with innocent pride.

"Hannah, this is my brother." Then in a whisper, "Isn't he beautiful?" Presently she saw him looking pale; unheard of phenomenon! "There now, you are ill," said she. "Come home directly, and be nursed."

"No, no," said he. "I only want a little fresh air. What horrid places! what horrid sights and smells! I say you must have no end of pluck to face them."

"No, no, no. Dearest, I pray for strength: that is how I manage. And oh, Edward, you used to think the poor were not to be pitied. But now you see."

"Yes, I see, and smell, and all. You are a brave, good girl. Got any salts about you?"

"Yes, of course. There. But fancy a young lion smelling salts!"

"A young duffer, you mean; that has passed for game through the thing not being looked into close."

"Oh, you can be close enough, where I want you to be open."

No answer.

The next day he accompanied her again, but remained at the stair-foot while she went in to her patients; and, when she came down, asked her, Could no good Christian be found to knock that poor woman on the head who live in a plate?

"No good Heathen, you mean," said Julia.

"Why yes," said he; "the savages manage these things better."

He also accompanied her shopping, and smoked phlegmatically outside the shops; nor could she exhaust his patience. Then the quick girl put this and that together. When they were at home again and her bonnet off, she looked him in the face and said, sweetly, "I have got a watch-dog." He smiled, and said nothing. "Why don't you answer?" said Julia, impetuously.

"Because least said is soonest mended. Besides, I'm down upon you: you decoy me into a friendly conversation, and then you say biting things directly."

"If I bite you, you sting me. Such want of confidence! Oh how cruel! how cruel! Why can you not trust me? Am I a child? No one is young who has suffered what I have suffered. Secrets disunite a family: and we were so united. And then you are so stupid. You keep a secret? Yes, like a dog in a chain. You can't hide it one bit. You have undertaken a task you are not fit for, Sir; to hide a secret you must be able to tell fibs: and you can't: not for want of badness, but cleverness to tell them smoothly; you know it, you know it; and so out of your abominable slyness you won't say a word. There, it is no use my trying to provoke him. I wish you were not so good-tempered; so apathetic I mean, of course." Then, with one of her old rapid transitions, she began to caress him and fawn on him: she seated him in an arm-chair and herself on a foot-stool, and suddenly curling round his neck, murmured, "Dear, dear brother, have pity on a poor girl, and tell her is there any news that I have a right to hear, only mamma has given you your orders not to tell me: tell me, love!" This last in an exquisite whisper.

"Let me alone, you little fascinating demon," said he, angrily. "Ask mamma. I won't tell you a word."

"Thank you!" she cried, bounding to her feet; "you have told me. He is alive. He loves me still. He was bewitched, seduced, deluded. He has come to himself. Mamma has seen him. He wants to come and beg my pardon. But you are all afraid I shall forgive him. But I will not, for at the first word I'll stop his mouth, and say, 'If you were happy away from me, I suppose you would not have come back.'" And instantly she burst out singing, with inspired eloquence and defiance,

"Castles are sacked in war,
Chieftains are scattered far,
Truth is a fixed star.
Aileen aroon."

But, unable to sustain it, the poor Impetuosity drooped as quickly as she had mounted, and out went her arm on the table and her forehead sank on her arm, and the tears began to run silently down the sweet face, so brave for a moment.

"W-will y-you allow me to light a cigar?" faltered Edward. "I'm wretched and miserable; you Tempest in petticoats, you!"

She made him a sign of assent with the hand that was dangling languidly, but she did not speak; nor did she appeal to him any more. Alienation was commencing. But, what was worse than speaking her mind, she was forever at the window now, looking up and down the street; and walking with her he felt her arm often tremble, and sometimes jerk. The secret was agitating her nerves, and destroying her tranquillity as much, or perhaps more than if she had known all.

Mrs. Dodd wrote from Portsmouth, whereof anon.

Mr. Peterson called, and soon after him Mr. Hurd. Edward was glad to see them, especially the latter, whose visits seemed always to do Julia good.

Moreover, as Peterson and Hurd were rivals, it afforded Edward an innocent amusement to see their ill-concealed aversion to one another, and the admirable address and delicacy with which his sister conducted herself between them.

However, this pastime was cut short by Sarah coming in and saying, "There's a young man wants to see you, Sir."

Julia looked up and changed color.

"I think he is a fireman," said Sarah. She knew very well he was a fireman, and also one of her followers. Edward went out and found one of his late brethren, who told him a young gentleman had just been inquiring for him at the station.

"What was he like?"

"Why I was a good ways off, but I saw he was a tall one."

"Six feet?"

"Full that."

"Give you his name?"

"No. I didn't speak to him: it was Andrew. Andrew says he asked if there was a fireman called Dodd, so Andrew said you had left; then the swell asked where you lived, and Andrew couldn't tell him any more than it was in Pembroke Street. So I told him, says I, 'Why couldn't you call me? It is number sixty-six,' says I. 'Oh, he is coming back,' says Andrew. However, I thought I'd come and tell you.' (And so get a word with Sarah, you sly dog.)

Edward thanked him, and put on his hat directly, for he could not disguise from himself that this visitor might be Alfred Hardie. Indeed, what more likely?

Messrs. Hurd and Peterson always tried to stay one another out whenever they met at 69 Pembroke Street. However, to make sure of not leaving Julia alone, Edward went in and asked them both to luncheon, at which time he said he should be back.

As he walked rapidly to the station he grew more and more convinced that it was Alfred Hardie. And his reflections ran like this: "What a hood-piece mamma has! But it did not strike her he would come to me first. Yet how plain that looks now: for of course I'm the duffer's only clew to Julia. These muddlers are no fools though. And how quiet he was that night! And he made papa go down the ladder first: that was the old Alfred Hardie. He was always generous: vain, overbearing, savvy, but noble with it all. I liked him: he was a man that shoved you his worst, and let you find his best out by degrees. He hated to be beat: but that's no crime. He was a beautiful oar: and handled his mawkeys uncommon: he quarrel with all the prize-fighters that came to Oxford, and took punishment better than you would think; and a wonderful quick hitter; Alec Reid owned that. Poor Taff Hardie! And when I think that God has overthrown his powerful mind, and left me mine, such as it is! But the worst is my having gone on calling him 'the Wretch' all this time: and nothing too bad for him. I ought to be ashamed of myself. It grieves me very much. 'When found make a note on;' never judge a fellow behind his back again."

Arrived at the station, he inquired whether his friend had called again, and was answered in the negative. He waited a few minutes, and then, with the superintendent's permission, wrote a note to Alfred, inviting him to dine at Simpson's at six, and left it with the firemen. This done, he was about to return home, when another thought struck him. He got a messenger, and sent off a single line to Dr. Wolf, to tell him Alfred Hardie would be at Simpson's at seven o'clock.

But when the messenger was gone, he regretted what he had done. He had done it for Alfred's good; but still it was treason. He felt unhappy, and wended his way homeward disconsolately, ruminating more and more that he had not brains for the difficulties imposed upon him.

On entering Pembroke Street he heard a buzz.

He looked up, and saw a considerable crowd collected in a semicircle. "Why that is near our house," he said, and quickened his steps.

When he got near to his house he saw that all the people's eyes were bent on No. 66.

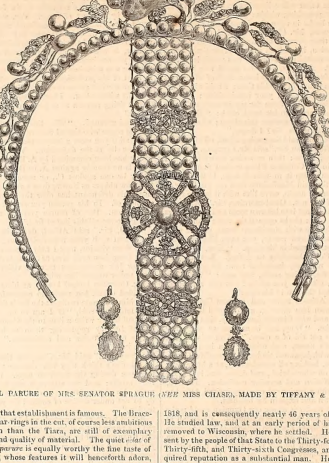
He dashed into the crowd. "What on earth is the matter?" he cried.

"The matter? Plenty's the matter, young man," cried one.

"Murder's the matter," said another.

At that he turned pale as death. An intelligent man saw his violent agitation, and asked him hurriedly if he belonged to the house.

"Yes. For God's sake what is it?"



"Make way there!" shouted the man. "He belongs. Sir, a madman has broke loose and got into your house. And I'm sorry to say he has just killed two men."

"With a pistol," cried two, speaking together.

MISS CHASE'S WEDDING JEWELS.

SINCE the famous Diamond Wedding of the Cuban Oviedo in this city, some three years since, no similar event has created so lively a sensation in the fashionable world as that upon which the beautiful ornaments illustrated in the accompanying cut were worn—the marriage of Senator and ex-Governor Sprague, of Rhode Island, to Miss Kate, eldest daughter of the Secretary of the Treasury. The articles engraved are the Tiara, Bracelet, and Ear-rings of the bridal parure. The material of which they were composed is pearls and diamonds, and the gold work is so delicately wrought that the eye catches little else, at a cursory view, than these precious jewels. The Tiara, it will be observed, is especially rich and artistic—a combination of intrinsic and æsthetic features not invariably attained. In addition to such desirable qualities it has likewise a curiously-achieved adaptedness which is not obvious from the sketch. The reader will note the base line of rare pearls; but he does not know, until advised of the fact, that this Orient stream can be diverted from its golden strand and made to encircle the fair neck of its possessor. The exquisite spray of orange leaves and blossoms on each frontal has likewise a ticket of leave, whenever occasion requires its service as a distinct head ornament; and, finally, the zenith itself—the true lover's knot of brilliants supporting the mammoth, arrow-riven, heart-shaped pearl—only retains its place at the will of the wearer; the cunning mechanism of the goldsmith having so established its relations to the hidden frame-work, that at the word presto it is detached, and, by the addition of a pin and catch, changed into an unique Brooch. Thus this beautiful Tiara is either available upon especially grand occasions as an entirety almost unequaled for gracefulness and value—or in each and all of its minor offices as necklace, hair-pins, and brooch.

The subjects of the illustration (as, in fact, the entire detail of jeweled ornaments for Miss Chase) were furnished by Tiffany & Co., of New York. The splendid pearl that constitutes the very front of the Tiara, larger perhaps than any in the country, and in symmetry and rare brilliancy quite warranting the old Latin term Unio, has been for some time one of those treasures for the garnering of which that establishment is famous. The bracelet and Ear-rings in the cut, of course less ambitious in design than the Tiara, are still of exemplary beauty and quality of material. The quiet color of this fine parure is equally worthy the fine taste of the lady, whose features it will henceforth adorn, and of the appreciating artist to whom its production has been with such good result intrusted.

BRIDAL PARURE OF MRS. SENATOR SPRAGUE (NEE MISS CHASE), MADE BY TIFFANY & CO.

MAJOR-GENERAL WASHBURNE.

WE publish herewith a portrait of MAJOR-GENERAL C. C. WASHBURNE, who commands a division in General Banks's army of the Gulf, and is distinguishing himself in the work of restoring Western Louisiana and Texas to the Union.

General Washburne is one of that great family of Washburnes which has furnished so many good and great men to the country in the present age. He was born at Livermore, Maine, on April 22, 1818, and is consequently nearly 46 years of age. He studied law, and at an early period of his life removed to Wisconsin, where he settled. He was sent by the people of that State to the Thirty-fourth, Thirty-fifth, and Thirty-sixth Congresses, and acquired reputation as a substantial man. He was less prominent than his brother from Illinois, but was not less esteemed by his fellow-members and his constituents.

Shortly after the outbreak of the war, Mr. Washburne offered his services to the Government, and was appointed to a command on 16th July, 1862. He served with distinction under Grant, and was present at many of the battles of the Western campaign. On 29th November, 1862, he was appointed a Major-General of Volunteers, and soon afterward assumed the command he at present holds in Louisiana.

General Washburne is a fine soldier, and we shall doubtless hear more of him as the campaign in the far South progresses.

MAJOR-GENERAL C. C. WASHBURNE.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.

ON page 765 we publish an illustration of the CAPTURE OF THE FORTIFICATIONS ON THE RAPPAHANNOCK NEAR THE RAILWAY BRIDGE, by 37th Jon-General Sedgwick. Our picture is from a sketch by Mr. A. R. Waud. The affair was very neat and brilliant. The rebels were surprised, and a large number of prisoners taken, as well as the forts, from under General Lee's nose. General Meade's operations of late have been remarkably successful, and entitle him to high praise as a commander. When the President heard of the operations on the Rappahannock he sent a telegraphic dispatch to General Meade to these terms:

"I have heard of your operations on the Rappahannock, and wish to say, Well done! A. LINCOLN."

This characteristic dispatch was communicated to the troops in an order of the day, and created the greatest enthusiasm among our brave boys.

At Richmond, on the contrary, the defeats of the rebel forces on the Rappahannock have created much annoyance. The papers which were full of eulogies of Lee a few weeks since are now sneer at or abuse him. The Enquirer publishes a long list of Confederate surrenders, ending with the recent affairs on the Rappahannock, and draws therefrom inferences any thing but complimentary to the valor and endurance of the chivalry.

CHATTANOOGA.

WE devote considerable space this week to republishing sketches sent us from Chattanooga by our special artist, Mr. Theo. R. Davis. They will be found to convey a pretty complete view of the situation in that part of the country, as well as of the recent events which have taken place. We subjoin Mr. Davis's letters:

"THE SITUATION AT CHATTANOOGA.—SKETCHED FROM THE SIGNAL-STATION ON CAMERON'S HILL.

"CHATTANOOGA, Oct. 28, 1863.

"The difficulty of showing you about surrounded position in a sketch for a time puzzled me. And when I was one day told by my friends of the Signal Corps 'that from Cameron's Hill Station I could see the whole,' I started for that place, under guidance of Lieutenants Ayres and Bachtell, and obtained the sketch now presented—which shows the river above and below us, and the distant ranges of the hills all around, as well as a complete view of the town.

"THE CHARGE OF THE THIRTY-THIRD MASSACHUSETTS AND SEVENTY-THIRD OHIO REGIMENTS.

"HEAD-QUARTERS COLONEL WILLIAM G. JONES, LOOKOUT VALLEY, Oct. 30, 1863.

"On the night of the 28th of October the troops of General Hooker occupied a position at Lookout Valley. Shortly after midnight it was discovered that the rebels had occupied a strong point which placed our troops in a very uncomfortable, if not untenable, position. General Hooker at once ordered the Thirty-third Massachusetts and Seventy-third Ohio to storm and carry the place with the bayonet. This they did in the most gallant manner. In many cases the brave fellows had to drag themselves up by grasping shrubs and roots.

"When they reached the top of the ridge the explosions of musketry burned the contending troops. The captured rebels say that it was a disgrace to them that the place was taken, but they could not help it; for, said they, 'you kept coming, and the next we knew you were right among us.'

"THE OPENING OF THE TENNESSEE RIVER.

"HEAD-QUARTERS MAJOR-GENERAL GORDON GRANGER, CHATTANOOGA, Oct. 30.

"The evacuation of Lookout Mountain, some weeks since, by order of General Rosecrans, gave to the rebels complete command of the river between this place and Bridgeport.

"General Grant, in taking command, found that the river could be opened to within a short distance of this place; safe to accomplish this was his first work. A portion of our forces crossed at Bridgeport, and came up the south bank of the river. Other troops were sent at night to a point on the north bank of the river below the intended crossing-place.

"The brigade of General Hazen was placed in pontoons and floated at night to a point below, and out of the range of the rebel batteries upon Lookout Mountain, where they arrived just after dawn. A number of the boats landed at a point just below the place where the bridge now is, and at a rebel picket-station. The pickets ran off, shouting, 'Yanks! Yanks!! Yanks!!' their guns being accelerated by a number of musket-balls from the before-mentioned Yanks.

"The building of the bridge was accomplished most successfully, though for some time our men worked under a severe fire from the rebel batteries.

"The bridge is the best work of the kind that has been constructed by the army at this point, and was built by Brigadier-General Granger, under the supervision of Captains Fox and Drasser. Captain D. is a West Point officer, and while at the Academy was Captain of Cadets, the present General Kilpatrick being one of the other captains. He is now upon the staff of General Smith, Chief Engineer of this Department.

"THE STEAMER 'POINT ROCK' RUNNING DOWN THE TENNESSEE RIVER TO BRIDGEPORT.

"HEAD-QUARTERS MAJOR-GENERAL GORDON GRANGER, CHATTANOOGA, Oct. 31, 1863.

"The entire impracticability of supplying the army at this point by means of wagons, rendered it an absolute necessity to open the river from Bridgeport to a point as near this place as practicable.

"This has now been accomplished, and the boats are bringing us each day a supply to which we have hitherto been strangers.

"The Point Rock, on her trip down the river, was made a target for hundreds of rebel rifles, the balls from which did no damage. Other steamboats are to be placed upon the river at the earliest moment."

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC—CAPTURE BY SEDGWICK'S CORPS OF THE REBEL WORKS ON THE RAPPAHANNOCK, NEAR THE RAILWAY BRIDGE—SKETCHED BY A. R. WAUD.—[SEE PAGE 764.]

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

CIGARETTES

Ir the story told is true,
It is very wrong of you,
Young Cuquettes,
Smoking, when Mamma's away,
Cr the lawn or by the spray,
Cigarettes.

'Twon't improve a ruddy mouth,
Odor, leaving as the South,
Heretofore:
And the grooves which encircle—
Chewing vilainous pastilles—
Is a bore.

Ladies fair, with due respect,
For one reason I object,
Which is this:
Sure young breath is sweet to me,
And a maiden's lips should be
Fit to kiss.

At Ballston, New York, on Sunday afternoon, fatigued with his long journey, a wagoner, while he was on Jacob, drew his team into a barn, and determined to pass the Sabbath in enjoying a season of worship with the good people of the village. When the time for worship arrived John was sent to watch the team while the wagoner went in with the crowd. The preacher had hardly announced his subject before the old man fell sound asleep. He sat against the partition in the corner of the body slip; just over against him, separated by a very low partition, sat a fleshy lady who seemed all absorbed in the sermon. She struggled hard with her feelings, but unable to control them any longer, she burst out with a loud scream, and shouted at the top of her voice, assuming the old man, who, but half awake, threw his arm around her waist, and cried, pathetically, "Whoa, Henry! Whoa, Henry! Here, John," calling on his son, "cut the belly-band and loosen the breechen wiolck, or she'll tear every thing to pieces!"

A JOKE BEFORE DINNER.

A. "Have some of these American bitters; they'll give you an appetite as sharp as a saw."

B. "Good thing, indeed, since I've my beard found me."

EPIGRAM ON SOCIETY AND INDIVIDUALS.
BY A CYNIC.

'The many go absurdly wrong
In common with their kind;
Not for in self-esteem are strong
As they are weak of mind.
Thus, for example, to produce
A case of either class,
There's Tomkins, a gregarious goose—
Brown, an egregious ass.

How many common figurative expressions in our language are borrowed from the art of carpentry may be seen by the following sentence: "The lawyer set up a bench, shaved a note, cut an acquaintance, split a hair, made an entry, got up a dispute, framed an indictment, empannelled a jury, put them into a box, bailed a witness, hammered a large, and hired a work-shop, all in one day, has since laid down law and turned carpenter."

THE SUICIDE.

A man was seen, in meditative mood,
Walk by a river, which murmur'd through a wood;
His face was pale, his eyebrows dark and low,
His head was bald, and on the shore was strewn
His clothes, in shape as he had ceased to find
Within the body any further mind.
Then slowly, by the edge of the stream he went,
Then, stood a moment at his side,
Where there was much more of soil than sand;
Off went a hat as if on eagle's wings;
For out of sight the hatter still view'd it,
They now return—they with a watchman come;
A shade was seen, which sure disturbed the deep;
They came and found—that he had unpaid his fare!

On one occasion the senior Stephenson accidentally met a gentleman and his wife at an inn in Doncaster, whom he entertained for some time with his shrewd observations and playful satire. At length the lady requested to know the name of the remarkable stranger. "Why, madam," said he, "they used once to call me Geordie Stephenson; now I am called Georgius Stephinson, Esquire, of Tapton House, near Chesterfield. And further, let me say, that I have dined with princes, and peers, and commoners, with persons of all classes, from the highest to the humblest. I have made my dinner off a red herring at a hedge bottom, and good jollification, too, amount ordinary; I have sometimes walked in all his glories, and the conclusion I have arrived at is, that, if wits are all stripped, there's not much difference."

FAMILY JARS.

Jars of jelly, jars of jam,
Jars of grated beef and ham,
Jars of early gooseberry nice,
Jars of mince-meat, jars of spice,
Jars of orange marmalade,
Jars of pickles, all homemade,
Jars of cordial, home-made wine,
Jars of cherry, superfine:
Would the only jars were these
That occur in families!

An ingenious person has discovered that the three most forcible letters in our alphabet are N R G; that the two which contain neither are M T; that the most universal vocal corpulence, O B C T; that two are in a decline, D K; that four indicate a considerable motion, S X Z W; and that neither our teeth, yet, when pronounced together, are necessary to a good smart conversation, are J Q.

The following is a literal copy, as near as type can make it, of a notice posted on a tree in front of a barn on Sandisk Avenue. A neighbor had badly cured hay for sale, and he here copied it, so that the "is Trick" would be exposed: "Ef i do ef enny one who ask the "is Trick" does not spectly "I Love it Back," he must be a hard ones indeed."

A man in the Rue des Deux Ponts Orlot had a most shrivelin little 6 inch ft away if he dost. Bring it Ink I Will send a officers of to him twee person

now. him I think it is. A low Trik if he do not Love. If Bolk i tell him take ink an up and take it away

Patience has at last been defined as a stammering lawyer examining a stuttering witness before a deaf judge.

A Boston correspondent of the Cincinnati Gazette is responsible for the following: I heard the other day a boy test mode by Longfellow the poet. Young Mr. Longworth, from your city, being introduced to him, some one present remarked upon the similarity of the first syllable of the two names. "Yes," said the poet, "but in this case I fear Fogo's line will apply:

"Words mean more than one, and want of it the fellow."

The following hit at Southern army contractors appears in the Chattanooga Rebel. It will answer for more northern latitudes:

"To rob the country two contractors come,
One cheats in corn, the other cheats in rum!
Which is the greater, if you can, explain,
A rogue in spirit, or a thief in grain?"

AN UNPOETICAL SIMILE.—Adolphus Scatterbrain remarks that "the parting glory of a summer's eve" would be all very fine as a simile, only that it always unpleasantly reminds us fellers of expiring bills, by being so closely allied to falling due.

An old bachelor says a woman may be married, astonished, taken all aback, but never dumbfounded.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

BURNETT'S

Standard Flavoring Extracts

For Cooking Purposes.

Lemon,	Peach,	Rose,	Cloves,
Celery,	Orange,	Vanilla,	Ginger,
Nutmeg,	Cinnamon,	Nectarine,	Almond.

THE SUPERIORITY OF THESE EXTRACTS CONSISTS IN THEIR

Perfect Purity and Great Strength.

We orient the following Testimonials:

"Pre-eminently superior to all others for culinary use."
FARMER HOUSE, Boston.

"Superior to any we have ever used."
REVERE HOUSE, Boston.

"Have used your Extracts for several years, and regard them the best in the world."
FIFTH AVENUE HOTEL, New York.

"Our test has proved them very excellent."
ST. NICHOLAS HOTEL, New York.

"Have been found very superior for economy and excellence use in our Establishment for years."
CONTINENTAL HOTEL, Phila., Pa.

"Possess all the rare qualities claimed for them."
BARNUM'S HOTEL, Baltimore, Md.

"Par superior to any in the market."
WILLARD'S HOTEL, Washington, D. C.

MANUFACTURERS AND PROPRIETORS,
JOSEPH BURNETT & CO.,
BOSTON.

BUY the POPULAR WORK entitled
HUMBUG.
Being an Exposition of all the Humbugs of the Day. E. MCWOOD, Publisher, No. 77 Nassau-street, Room Leam, N. Y. City. Price 25 cents, postage free. 12mo Send for a circular.

SALISBURY, BRO., & CO.,
AGENTS FOR THE UNITED STATES FOR THE CELEBRATED
ALBERTINE
Extension Holders and Gold Pens,
Of the most handsome and durable construction, put up in new fancy cases of one dozen each, and not sold in any less quantities. They will retail for $3 each.

Extra Size	$10 25
"	8 50
Sent by mail or express, prepaid. Address

SALISBURY, BRO., & CO., Syracuse, N. Y.

THE "RIDGEWOOD" PATENT
SMOKING CASE.

Most ingenious in its combination of the Metallic Case, containing Pipe and Stem, Matches and Screw Cases and with a handsome Tobacco Pouch attached, filling the Pipe by a valve, without any loose ends of tobacco to drop out, the whole securing freedom from all odor, and portable as a Cigar Case. It is made for pipes of various styles, at $1 50, $1 80, $2 25, $2 50, and $2 75 to $3 75 and $5 00; the two latter plated with Gold. Every Smoker can discard its comfort, utility, and economy for all smokers. As a Present to friends nothing could be more acceptable. For the Soldier it is invaluable. Also

The Ridgewood Smoking Tobacco,

Of superior quality and flavor, in packages of various sizes. A liberal discount to Dealers. Sample Cases sent by mail, prid. on receipt of price and 25 cts.

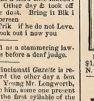
RIDGEWOOD MANUFACTURING CO.,
Office 429 Broadway, cor. Howard Street, New York.

A Rare Chance to make a Fortune.—Town rights under a valuable patent for 3 of 6 dollars. Sale of one machine more than pay cost of right. Take your choice of getting New York or a smaller town. Send stamp for a circular. Address



S. T. McDOUGALL, 474 Broadway, N. Y.

DR R. GOODALE'S
CATARRH REMEDY.

Extirminates Catarrh, Sore and Bleeding Throat, Fever Sores, &c. Send stamp for pamphlet. Depot 613 Broadway, N. Y. NORTON & CO., Sole Agents.

Sportsmen, Tourists, and Army and Navy Officers.

Powerful and Brilliant Double Glasses.

Portability combined with great power for Military Drill, Tourists', Opera, and general outdoor day and night use; perspective glasses, will show distinctly a mile and a half. Sent to any part of the country on receipt of price. Specimens of the greatest transparent powers accepted in lieu of improved the sight, without the depressing needs of frequent changes. Catalogue sent by enclosing stamp.

SEMMONS, Opticist—Optician,
620 Broadway, New York.

ALL ARTICLES FOR SOLDIERS
At Baltimore, Washington, and all places occupied by Union troops should be sent by HARNDEN'S EXPRESS, No. 74 Broadway. Sutlers charged low rates.

MORTON'S GOLD PENS are now sold at the same prices as before the commencement of the war; this is entirely owing to the Manufacturer's improvements in machinery, his present large Retail Business and Cash-in-Advance System; for, until he commenced advertising, his business was done on Credit and strictly with the Trade.

The Morton Gold Pens are the only ones sold at old prices, as the makers of all other gold pens charge the Premium on the Gold, Government Tax, &c.; but Morton has in no instance had his prices, Wholesale or Retail.

Of the great numbers sent by mail to all parts of the world during the past few years, not one in a thousand has failed to reach its destination in safety; showing that the Morton Gold Pen can be obtained by any one, in every part of the world, at the same price, postage only excepted.

Reader, you can have an enduring, always ready, and reliable Gold Pen, exactly adapted to your hand and style of writing, which will do your writing vastly cheaper than Steel Pens; and at the present almost universal High Pressure Price of everything, you can have a Morton Gold Pen cheaper, in proportion to the labor spent upon it and material used, than any other Gold Pen in the World. If you want one call on A. MORTON, No. 25 Maiden Lane, or inclose stamp for circular.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS.

Brandreth's Pills produce great purity of the blood, and the system generally; all the humors are removed, securing, in the reconstruction of diseased parts, only sound materials.

They are warranted the best purgative in the world.

Principal Office, BRANDRETH HOUSE, Wholesale and Retail.

Sold at No. 4 UNION SQUARE and by all dealers.

Observe B. BRANDRETH, in White, on the Government Stamp.

Cloaks and Mantillas.
BRODIE,
The Leader of Fashions!
Opened his Fall Stock on Thursday,
9th inst.,
And as usual stands unrivaled for Style, Quality, AND VARIETY.
300 Canal Street, New York.

SOLDIERS' COMPANY PINS.
Constantly on hand and Engraved to Order, and sent by mail on receipt of Price.

Every Co. from A to M Sold Silver, $1 ea.
Sold Silver, with Letters in GOLD Relief, $1 50.
Sold in 18 K GOLD, $2 50.

Corps Badges
Sent free by Mail or Express on receipt of Price.
Sold Silver, $1 50. Sold Silver, $1 50.
Enamelled.

Solid Gold, $4. Solid Gold, $4.
Badges for the 1st, 2d, 3d, 5th, 6th, 11th, 12th, Army Corps.
1st Division Enameled Red, 2d Division White, 3d Division Blue.
None but genuine Pins sent.
Terms Cash in advance. Send for a Catalogue.
Address C. L. BLACK & CO.,
598 Broadway, New York.
Successors to J. G. PACKARD & CO.

H. A. HARVEY, 84 Maiden Lane, N. Y., TWINES, Rope, CORDAGE, and Yarn, Steam Packing, Wick, CARPET WARP, Fish Lines, Hemp Cord, Lead Cord and Sorgeuse Tow, Writing and Wrapping PAPER, Envelopes, and Paper Bags.

Books by return Post to any Post-Office in the U. S.
GOOD BOOKS BY MAIL.—We send all Books prepaid by return of FIRST MAIL, at publishers' prices. Address
FOWLER & WELLS, No. 389 Broadway, N. Y.

Elliot's New Repeaters
Are now ready. The most safe, compact, durable, effective, and cheap Repeaters ever made. Carry your load (No. 28 cartridges), are rapidly loaded and fired—consequently carried in the vest—whole length five inches—four barrels—each rifled grain twist. The Trade supplied.
ELLIOT ARMS CO., 494 Broadway, N. Y.

HARPER & BROTHERS

Have also Published:

HISTORY OF THE SIOUX WAR AND MASSACRES OF 1862 AND 1863. By Isaac V. D. HEARD. With Portraits and Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $1 00.

ROUNDABOUT PAPERS. By W. M. THACKERAY, Author of "The Four Georges," "The English Humorists," "Vanity Fair," "Pendennis," "The Newcomes," "Adventures of Philip," &c. With Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $1 00.

MARY LYNDSAY. A Novel. By the Lady Fatty Fossoway, Author of "The Discipline of Life." 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

☞ Any of the above Works sent by mail, post-paid, on receipt of price.

A Splendid Holiday or Bridal Present.

HARPER'S
ILLUMINATED AND ILLUSTRATED
BIBLE.

Including the Apocrypha. Superbly embellished by over Sixteen Hundred Illustrations, exquisitely engraved by Adams after Designs by Chapman, exclusive of a Series of Rich Illuminations in Colors, comprising Frontispieces, Presentation Plate, Family Record, Title-pages, &c. The whole forming a sumptuous Folio Volume.

PRICES.—Morocco, gilt edges, bevelled and panelled sides, $25 00; Morocco extra, gilt edges, $32 50; Full calf, marbled edges, bands raised, $35 00; Full calf, antique, marbled edges, $18 00.

Harper's Pictorial Bible is printed from the standard copy of the American Bible Society, and contains Marginal References, the Apocrypha, Concordance, Chronology of the Holy Bible, Tables of Weights and Measures, Tables of Weights, Coins, and Measures of Scripture, Explanatory Titles to the Old and New Testaments, Family Record, Presentation Plate, and Historical Illustrations, and a Letter to the chapters, Ornamental Borders, &c., are from original designs, and executed for this edition by F. O. C. Chapman, Esq., of New York. In addition to which, there are numerous Engravings from designs by the most distinguished modern artists in France and England; to which a full Index is given.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers, New York.

For sale by A. WILLIAMS & CO., Boston; SMITH, ENGLISH & CO., Philadelphia; CUSHINGS & BAILEY, Baltimore; HENRY T. COATES & CO., Pittsburgh; ALFRED MARTIEN & CO., Cincinnati; GEO. S. WOODS, St. Louis; S. C. GRIGGS & CO., Chicago; DARNELL & HARRISON, Richmond.

Commencement of the Twenty-Eighth Volume.

HARPER'S
NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE
For December, 1863.

CONTENTS:

SAINT CHRISTOPHER.
With an Illustration.
TWILIGHT AND LATER.
With an Illustration.
SCENES IN THE WAR OF 1812.—VI. THE WAR ON THE COAST.
Lundy's Lane.—New London in 1813.—Fort Norfolk.—Landing-Place at Havre de Grace.—John O'Neil's Brevet.—The Frog Mountain.—Sack and Capture of Havre de Grace.—Craney Island.—James Faulkner.—Plan of Operations at Craney Island.—Attack upon Craney.—Magazine on Craney Island.—Cockburn's Quarters.—Hocking Hogs.—Craney Island Reinforced.—Sham New London.
PICTURES OF THE JAPANESE.—II. RURAL LIFE.
Illustrations.—Japan Scenery.—Japan Rice-Fields.—Japanese Child-Scene.—Village Aqueduct.—Peasants on Passing Bridge.—Japanese Farmer's House.—Digging and Shaping Manuring a Field.—Rolling in Seed.—Keeping off Birds.—Ripening Rice Grain.—Separating the Grain.—Threshing.—Preparing Cotton.—Reeling Cotton.—The Peasant's Cot.—Interior of a Peasant's House.—Tea Plantations.—Village Life in Japan.—The Castle of Osaca.—Carrying the Mail.
CAF-AND-BELLS.—A NOVEL, IN TEN CHAPTERS.
WILLIAM H. PRESCOTT.
THE FELLING TREASURE.
LIGHT THROUGH DARKNESS.
AN EARLY FRIEND.
OVERLAND FROM ST. PAUL TO LAKE SUPERIOR.
With Illustrations.
THE SMALL HOUSE AT ALLINGTON.
CHAPTER XLI. Prospects for the Wedding.
CHAPTER XLII. Domestic Troubles.
CHAPTER XLIII. Life's Battles.
Illustrations.—The Garden.—"That might do."
THE GULF.
WHAT'S IN A NAME?
MY FRIEND CHARLEMORPE AGAIN.
THE ETHICS OF LOVE.
THE REV. MR. ALLONBY.
OUR WORST CHRISTMAS.
A WOMAN'S COMPLAINT.
EDITOR'S LITERARY RECORD OF CURRENT EVENTS.
EDITOR'S EASY CHAIR.
EDITOR'S DRAWER.
Illustrations.—Filial Affection.—Artillery Practice.—A Rude Gentleman.—Fashions for December.
FASHIONS FOR DECEMBER.
Illustrations.—Opera Cloak.—Morning Reception Toilet.

With the present Number is commenced the Twenty-Eighth Volume of HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE. It has been the aim of the Publishers from the outset to furnish a periodical combining the highest degree of literature in every department of literature, presented in a form so attractive, and at a price so reasonable, as to render it indispensable to every cultivated American reader. The result of the enterprise has exceeded their warmest anticipations. The Magazine gained at once the foremost place among American periodicals in point of circulation has exceeded, as it now exceeds, that of all other periodicals of the class issued in the United States. No effort or cost will be spared by the Publishers to insure that the Magazine shall maintain the position which it has won.

TERMS.

One Copy for one Year $3 00
Two Copies for One Year 5 00
An Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of Two Subscribers, at $2 50 each, or 11 Copies for $25 00.
HARPER'S MAGAZINE and HARPER'S WEEKLY, together, one year, $5 00.
HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers.

Circulation over 100,000.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

Single Copies Six Cents.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year $3 00
One Copy for Two Years 5 00
And an Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of TEN SUBSCRIBERS, at $2 50 each, or 11 Copies for $25.
HARPER'S MAGAZINE and HARPER'S WEEKLY, together, one year, $5 00.
Postage is to be prepaid by the quarter at the office for Harper's Weekly, and Postage on Harper's Magazine is 24 cents per year, payable at the office where the Magazine is received.
Back Numbers can be supplied at any time.
The Volumes of the Weekly commence with the first Number for January and July of each year. When no time is specified, the Subscription will commence with the Number next after the receipt of the order.
Specimen Numbers will be sent gratis to any part of the United States.
Remittances should be made by Post-Office Money Order or Draft, to avoid the risk of losses by counterfeit or miscarriage.
Address HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers,
Franklin Square, New York.

J. H. Winslow & Co., 100,000

WATCHES, CHAINS, &c., &c. Worth $500,000.

To be sold for One Dollar each, without regard to value, and not to be paid for till you know what you are to get.

"LEGEND LIST"!!

OF ARTICLES TO BE SOLD FOR ONE DOLLAR EACH.

100 Gold Hunting Cased Watches	$100 00 each.
500 Ladies' Gold Watches	50 00 each.
500 Ladies' Gold Watches	35 00 each.
500 Ladies' and Gents' Silver Watches	15 00 each.
2000 Vest and Neck Chains	5 00 to 10 00 each.
2000 Gold Band Bracelets	5 00 to 10 00 each.
2000	5 00 to 7 00 each.
2000 Cameo Brooches	4 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Mosaic and Jet Brooches	4 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Lava and Florentine Brooches	4 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Coral, Opal, and Em. Brooches	4 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Gold Lockets	5 00 to 10 00 each.
2000 Mosaic and Jet Ear Drops	4 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Lava and Florentine Ear Drops	4 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Coral, Em., and Opal Ear Drops	4 00 to 6 00 each.
5,000 Gent's Breast Pins	2 00 to 3 00 each.
2000 Watch Keys	2 00 to 3 00 each.
2000 Fob and Ribbon Slides	2 00 to 3 00 each.
5000 Sets of Boom Studs	2 00 to 3 00 each.
5000 Sets of Buttons	2 00 to 3 00 each.
5000 Plain Rings	2 00 to 3 00 each.
5000 Stone Rings	2 00 to 3 00 each.
5000 Jack-Knives	2 00 to 3 00 each.
5000 Sets Ladies' Jewelry	5 00 to 10 00 each.
10000 Gold Pens, Silver Pencil Holders	4 00 to 6 00 each.
10000 Gold Pens, with Silver Extension Pencils	4 00 to 6 00 each.

All of the above list of Goods will be sold for one dollar each. Certificates of all the various letters will be well shaken out, one box, are first put into envelopes, sealed up, and when they are ordered, are taken out without regard to choice, and sent by mail, thus giving all a fair chance. On receipt of the Certificate, you will see what you can have, and then it is at your option to send one dollar and have the article sent.

In all transactions by mail, we shall charge for forward. ing the Certificates, packing and mailing the Goods, 25 cents each, which must be inclosed when the Certificate is sent for. Five Certificates will be sent for $1; eleven for $2; thirty for $5; sixty-five for $10; and a hundred for $20.

AGENTS.—Those acting as Agents will be allowed ten cents on any Certificates ordered by them, provided their remittance amounts to one dollar. Agents will collect 25 cents for every Certificate, and remit 15 cents to us, either in cash or postage stamps. Great caution should be used by correspondents in regard to giving their correct address, Town, County, and State. Address

J. H. WINSLOW & CO.,
208 Broadway, New York.

$200! $150! $100! $50!

PREMIUMS.

To Editors and Others!

I will pay the above-named amounts for the best four articles on either my Soap, Saleratus, or Concentrated Fruit.

The article must state the writer's experience in using the goods, and must be not less than ten lines, and be published in the editorial columns of any good family newspaper.

Any party wishing to compete for the above, and desiring further information, may address the undersigned. Each person writing and publishing a notice as above, will mail a marked copy of the paper containing the notice to me, and also write my mail address in full plain.

The Premiums will be awarded on the fourth day of July, 1864.

R. T. BABBITT,
64 to 74 Washington Street, New York.

ENAMELLED CHAMBER FURNITURE.—The best assortment of Enamelled Furniture, in all colors and styles, Wholesale and Chamberset, Plain and Decorated Suites. Wholesale and Retail. Also, Mattresses and Feathers. WARREN WARD, No. 372 Canal Street.

Union Playing Cards.

Colonel for King, Goddess of Liberty for Queen, and Major for Jack. 52 enamelled cards to the pack. Eagles, Shields, Stars, and Stripes on the backs, and true spots for all the usual games. Two packs, in case, mailed free on receipt of $1. The trade supplied on liberal terms. Circular. Address AMERICAN CARD COMPANY, 655 Broadway, N. Y., or 105 Williams Street, N. Y.

Portable Printing Offices,

For the use of the Army and Navy, Merchants, Druggists, and Business Men generally. Circular sent free. Specimen of Small Type, Office, &c., &c. Address ADAMS PRESS CO., 31 Park Row, New York, or CHASE & LEAVY, 15 Lombard Street, Baltimore, Md.

A Double Number at Single Price.

The Dec. No. PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL contains "Lots of Good Things," including Archbishop Whately's MAN and WOMAN, differences; Mr. STARR, Portrait and Biography; Location and the U. S. A.; Railways, Mountains, Old Age and Decay. The Human Hair Trade. Crazy Hermits. Wonders of Arithmetic. Physiognomy, Ethnology, Psychology, Phrenology, &c. By first post, only 15 cents, or $1 50 a year. Address

FOWLER & WELLS, 308 Broadway, N. Y.

Great National Work.

EIGHTY YEARS PROGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES. From the Revolution to the Great Rebellion.

Twelve parts of the first literary talent have been employed on this great work. Time accepted in its execution, merely four years. Among the list of persons who have recommended it, are nineteen Presidents of Colleges. Agents wanted. Address, to canvass all large Towns. Only Hermetic Sealed Steel Engravings. Supplies will be kept at central points in most of the States. Address L. STEBBINS, Worcester, Mass.

Just what every Family wants. Savage & Co.'s No Chimney Burner for Hand Lamps and Gas Fixtures. Kerosene Oil with a brilliant light without chimney, smoke, or odor. Saves 25 per cent. Office 262 Fulton St., N.Y. Agents wanted. Send for circular. Sample sent free for 50 cts. American Institute awarded 1st Premium and Medal, 1863.

DO YOU WANT LUXURIANT WHISKERS OR MUSTACHES?—My Organent will force them to grow heavily in six weeks (upon the smoothest face) without stain or injury to the skin. Price $1—sent by mail, post free, to any address, on receipt of an order. B. G. GRAHAM, No. 169 Nassau Street, N. Y.

J. H. HAYWARD'S

Meeks' Cabinet and Furniture Warehouse,

No. 699 BROADWAY, and 333 and 335 Fourth Street.

New and elegant Designs, of superior Workmanship, at reasonable prices, manufactured of the very best well-seasoned and selected material, under the supervision of the firm, whose reputation has been established seventy years. Furniture of Fashionable Patterns manufactured to order and carefully packed.

Goods packed and shipped to all parts of the world.

Immense Sale of Jewelry for Presents for the NEXT 60 DAYS.

Extra Inducements to Agents.

The cheapest wholesale Cash Jewelry House in the U. S. J. T. HAYWARD, Manufacturing Jeweler, 208 Broadway, N. Y. The Emporium for Army Corps, Masonic, Union, and Emblem Pins of every description. Any one wishing to become an Agent, or wishing to purchase any thing in the Jewelry or Gold Pen and Pencil lines, I will send as sample, on the receipt of $1, together with my wholesale circular with full instructions and Premiums to Agents either a fine Gold Pen, with Extension Case and Pencil, or fine enamel Locket or Bracelet, or Cadenas Diamond Seal Stone Ring, or a new style Vest Chain or Neck Chain, or a beautiful set of Jewelry. Also a Solid Silver Shield, or either Army Corps, Division, or Co. Pin, or the Kearney Cross Pin, with your Name, Regiment, and Co. handsomely engraved upon it.

American Watches

For Soldiers

AT REDUCED PRICES.

American Watches for Americans!

THE AMERICAN WATCH COMPANY give notice that they have lately leased a new style of Watch, expressly designed for Soldiers and others who desire a good watch at a moderate price. These watches are intended to displace the worthless, cheap watches of British and Swiss manufacture with which the country is flooded, and which were never expected to keep time when they were made, being refuse manufactured cast to this country because unsalable at home, and used here only for jockeying and swindling purposes.

We offer to sell our Watch, which is of the most substantial manufacture, an accurate and durable time-keeper, and in having Silver Cases, Hunting pattern, at nearly as low a price as is asked for the fraudulent Ameres and Lepines of foreign make, already referred to.

We have named the new series of Watches, Wm. Elder, Boston, Mass., which name will be found on the plate of every watch of this manufacture, and is one of our trade-marks.

Sold by all respectable watch dealers in the loyal states. Wholesale orders should be addressed to

ROBBINS & APPLETON,

Agents of the American Watch Company,

182 BROADWAY, N. Y.

HOSTETTER'S

CELEBRATED

STOMACH BITTERS

HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS—MUSHROOM IMITATIONS.—Success is the "prevalent credo" of industrious humbugs. No sooner had HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS made their mark in the world, than an opaque, villainous compound, in the form of the great restorative grew and spread, the pestiferous crop of poisonous mushrooms blossomed. But the true medicine has lived them down. One by one they have disappeared, like the fabulous puffery, which kept them alive. The genuine article, with its reputation, reared to bloom, they ceased to live, and their fragrance to come and go. Meanwhile, HOSTETTER'S BITTERS, the great protective and remedial tonic of the age, has increased in popularity with each succeeding year. Their success as a means of preventing and curing the diseases resulting from malaria, unwholesome water, and all unhealthy climatic influences, has been boundless; and as a remedy for dyspepsia, liver complaint, fever and ague, general weakness and debility, and all complaints originating in indigestion, they are now admitted to be superior to any other preparation ever advertised or prescribed. From the home market, to which a few years ago they were confined, their sale has been extended into every State in this Union, over the whole of South and Central America, Mexico, the West Indies, the Sandwich Islands, Australia, China and Japan. Home and foreign testimony is abundant to show that HOSTETTER'S BITTERS are the most remarkable tonic and invigorant ever before the world.

Sold by all Druggists and Family Grocers.

Hostetter's Stomach Bitters,

PREPARED AND SOLD BY
HOSTETTER & SMITH, PITTSBURGH, PA.
DEPOT FOR NEW YORK, 60 Wall Street.

AGENTS WANTED.—Call and examine, or 10 samples sent by mail for 25 cents. Circulars free. Address SHAW & CLARK, Biddeford, Maine.

Salesmen Wanted.

$75 a month, or commission allowed on sales. Apply to HALE & CO., Newburyport, Mass.

TO NEWSPAPER PUBLISHERS, BOOK and Job Printers.
The subscribers offer for sale
1 DOUBLE-CYLINDER PRINTING MACHINE, with sheet-fyer. Size of bed, 34x54.
1 DOUBLE-CYLINDER PRINTING MACHINE, with sheet-fyer. Size of bed, 32x54.
1 DOUBLE-CYLINDER PRINTING MACHINE, with sheet-fyer. Size of bed, 31x46.
1 SECOND-HAND TWO-REVOLUTION Flyer, 38x46.
The above are all SECOND-HAND MACHINES, are warranted in first-rate order, having been thoroughly repaired. Will be sold on application to
R. HOE & CO.,
Nos. 29 and 31 Gold St., N. Y.

Cristadoro's Hair Dye.

THE DEAD IS THE WORLD.
Cristadoro's Hair Preservative.
Unequaled as a dressing. Both for sale everywhere, and applied at No. 9 Astor House, N. Y.

HUBBARD BRO'S

IMPORTERS OF WATCHES

NEW YORK.

Are offering the cheapest, most accurate, durable, and reliable Watches in the American market. They are the sole consignees in this country for the celebrated

Magic Time Observers,

The Perfection of Mechanism!

Being a Hunting, or Open Face, or Lady's or Gentleman's Watch combined, with Patent Self-winding Improvement.

A most pleasing novelty. One of the greatest, most convenient, and decidedly the best and cheapest timepiece for general and reliable use ever offered. The Watch in it and connected with its machinery its own winding attachment, producing an entirely novel movement. The cases of this Watch are composed of two metals, the outer one being like 18 carat gold. It has the finest and truly action lever movement, and is warranted an accurate timepiece. Open, simple and strong, and sent by U. S. Express, $30. Sample watches in a neat morocco box, $35. If sent by mail, the postage is 30 cents; registering, 25 cents.

Silver Watches!

First-Class Hunting Time-Pieces.

FOR ACCURACY OF MOVEMENT, QUALITY OF CASES, AND, ABOVE ALL, CHEAPNESS IN PRICE, THESE WATCHES ARE UNRIVALED.

UNIVERSAL APPROBATION!

An imitation so faultless that it can hardly be detected by the most experienced judges. It is composed of five metals, the outer one best quality silver and the inner one German silver, it can not be surpassed by existing or heavy engraving, making it so only in appearance, but in durability, for it is composed entirely of Solid Sterling Silver in existence.

The case is of the same size as the army is a source of enormous profit, retailing, as they very easily do at $25 and upward. Being now insisted upon as a single-pay-day by any one of ordinary business tact.

"One of the most useful."—"Is being received favorably universally, where every other humbug has failed, in most instances per-fect, by the half dozens."—Spirit, p. 38; registering, 70 cts. Sold only by the case. Can be safely sent by mail.

Our inspections are novelties produced by no other house, combining greater accuracy as to time-keeping, being more elaborately and artistically finished, and offered at much lower rates than any other in the market.

The press in all parts of the country voluntarily attest the superiority of our watches. Unsolicited testimonials emphatic, speaking directly to the point, in a manner not to be misunderstood.

"Particularly valuable for officers in the army, and engineers."—French Lecturer, Feb. 21.

"Prettiest, best, and cheapest time-pieces ever offered."—N. Y. Illustrated News, Aug. 29.

"Exceed other manufactures in point of accuracy and elegance."—Tribune, Army and Navy Journal, Aug. 29.

"An improvement on ordinary timepieces, and lived under for railroad men."—N. Y. Times, Evening Mail, Aug. 29.

"Elaborately and artistically finished."—N. Y. Sentinel American, July 30.

"Combine great accuracy as timekeepers."—Pittsburg, Pa., Chronicle, July 17.

"We very justly call double watches for the army."—N. Y. Army and Navy Journ. (Government organ), Aug. 29

"One of the most useful inventions of the times."—Louisville, Ky., Journal, July 31.

EF Mark, Boston, Mass., which name will be found on the plate of every watch of this manufacture, and is one of our trade-marks.

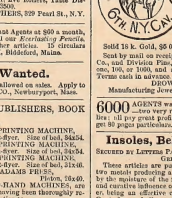
Sold by all respectable watch dealers in the loyal states. Wholesale orders should be addressed to

ROBBINS & APPLETON,

Agents of the American Watch Company,

182 BROADWAY, N. Y.

History of West Point,



WITH THE ORIGIN AND PROGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES

Military Academy.

By Capt. EDWARD C. BOYNTON, U.S.A., Adjutant of the Academy. In one large octavo volume, beautifully illustrated with Steel and Line Engravings, chiefly from Photographs taken on the spot by the author. Bound in blue cloth, beveled boards, Price, $5. Copies sent free by mail on receipt of price. This day published by D. VAN NOSTRAND, No. 192 Broadway, N. Y.

Cavalry and Artillery.

Solid Silver, $1 75. Solid Silver, $1 75.

Solid 18 k. Gold, $6 00. Solid 18 k. Gold, $5 00.

Sent by mail on receipt of Price. Also all Kinds Corps, Co., and Division Plate, engraved to order, by the single letter, 100, or 1000, and Name in any part of the country. Terms cash in advance. Send for a circular. Address

EDWIN C. MOORE,
Manufacturing Jeweler, 208 Broadway, New York.

$60 A MONTH: We want Agents at $60 a month, expenses paid, to sell our Everlasting Pencils. Sample sent free. Address FOWLER & CO., Cleveland, O. Circulars sent free. SHAW & CLARK, Biddeford, Maine.

Printing-Press for Sale.

One Taylor Double Cylinder, five Rollers, Table Distribution, Bed 38x51. Price $2500.

Apply to TAYLOR & BURDICK, 329 Pearl St., N.Y.

$60 A MONTH: We want Agents at $60 a month, expenses paid, to sell our Everlasting Pencils. Sample sent free. Address FOWLER & CO., Cleveland, O. Circulars sent free. SHAW & CLARK, Biddeford, Maine.

Insoles, Belts, and Armlets.

SECURED BY LETTERS PATENT OF THE UNITED STATES AND GREAT BRITAIN.

These articles are purely Voltaic, and by the union of the most powerful curative agents curreys, which are used by the moisture of the feet and body, diffusing a healthy action of the entire interior of the system, and the wearer being an effective cure for Rheumatism, Cold Feet, Gout, &c., and all nervous and chronic diseases.

METTAM & CO., PROPRIETORS.

Insoles, $1 00; Belts, $1 87; Armlets, $1 50; per mail, 20 c. additional. Office 429 Broadway. Send for circular.

EMPLOYMENT

At your own home. It is the greatest discovery of the age. Profits 100 per cent. Demand staple as flour. Full particulars sent free, on receipt of two stamps.

Address C. MURRO BROWN, 74 Bleecker St., N. Y.

Magic Time Observers,

The Perfection of Mechanism!

Being a Hunting, or Open Face, or Lady's or Gentleman's Watch combined, with Patent Self-winding Improvement.

A most pleasing novelty. One of the greatest, most convenient, and decidedly the best and cheapest timepiece for general and reliable use ever offered. The Watch in it and connected with its machinery its own winding attachment, producing an entirely novel movement. The cases of this Watch are composed of two metals, the outer one being like 18 carat gold. It has the finest and truly action lever movement, and is warranted an accurate timepiece. Open, simple and strong, and sent by U. S. Express, $30. Sample watches in a neat morocco box, $35. If sent by mail, the postage is 30 cents; registering, 25 cents.

Silver Watches!

First-Class Hunting Time-Pieces.

FOR ACCURACY OF MOVEMENT, QUALITY OF CASES, AND, ABOVE ALL, CHEAPNESS IN PRICE, THESE WATCHES ARE UNRIVALED.

UNIVERSAL APPROBATION!

An imitation so faultless that it can hardly be detected by the most experienced judges. It is composed of five metals, the outer one best quality silver and the inner one German silver, it can not be surpassed by existing or heavy engraving, making it so only in appearance, but in durability, for it is composed entirely of Solid Sterling Silver in existence.

The case is of the same size as the army is a source of enormous profit, retailing, as they very easily do at $25 and upward. Being now insisted upon as a single-pay-day by any one of ordinary business tact.

"One of the most useful."—"Is being received favorably universally, where every other humbug has failed, in most instances per-fect, by the half dozens."—Spirit, p. 38; registering, 70 cts. Sold only by the case. Can be safely sent by mail.

Our inspections are novelties produced by no other house, combining greater accuracy as to time-keeping, being more elaborately and artistically finished, and offered at much lower rates than any other in the market.

The press in all parts of the country voluntarily attest the superiority of our watches. Unsolicited testimonials emphatic, speaking directly to the point, in a manner not to be misunderstood.

"Particularly valuable for officers in the army, and engineers."—French Lecturer, Feb. 21.

"Prettiest, best, and cheapest time-pieces ever offered."—N. Y. Illustrated News, Aug. 29.

"Exceed other manufactures in point of accuracy and elegance."—Tribune, Army and Navy Journal, Aug. 29.

"An improvement on ordinary timepieces, and lived under for railroad men."—N. Y. Times, Evening Mail, Aug. 29.

"Elaborately and artistically finished."—N. Y. Sentinel American, July 30.

"Combine great accuracy as timekeepers."—Pittsburg, Pa., Chronicle, July 17.

"We very justly call double watches for the army."—N. Y. Army and Navy Journ. (Government organ), Aug. 29

"One of the most useful inventions of the times."—Louisville, Ky., Journal, July 31.

EF Mark, Boston, Mass., which name will be found on the plate of every watch of this manufacture, and is one of our trade-marks.

Sold by all respectable watch dealers in the loyal states. Wholesale orders should be addressed to

ROBBINS & APPLETON,

Agents of the American Watch Company,

182 BROADWAY, N. Y.

On the Field of Battle Mother. Babyhood | Fallen; | sweet to Mingles | memory, each O. Mud | ster's Omnibus, 700 tunes, for Flute or Violin, $1. "Dining Collations," 30 duets for Violin and Piano. The Indian and Silk Violin Strings, 75 c., mailed. Musical Instrumente repaired. FREDERICK BLUME, 208 Bowery, N. Y.

STERLING'S AMBROSIA

DR. STERLING'S AMBROSIA is a refreshing and dressing of root, barks, and herbs. It will cure all diseases of the scalp and falling of the hair, entirely eradicates dandruff, prevents the hair from falling out or from turning prematurely gray, causing it to grow upon bald heads. It is entirely different from all other preparations, and can be relied on. PRICE: $1 00 PER BOOK, containing directions. DR. H. H. STERLING, Sole Proprietor, Post Office Box 493 Brooklyn. For sale by all druggists.

The Greatest Little Books

Of Modern Times.

Now Ready the

First and Second Books

OF THE

New Gospel of Peace

According to St. Benjamin.

These little books have created a sensation and created a greater sensation than anything of the kind ever printed. Northern Peace Advocates are shown up in the most peculiar style. Price of each book 15 cents. Sent, postpaid, on receipt of 18 cents. Liberal terms to dealers.

SINCLAIR TOUSEY, 121 Nassau St., New York.

$75 A MONTH! I want to hire Agents in every county at $75 a month, expenses paid, to sell my new chop Family Sewing Machines. Address

S. MADISON, Alfred, Maine.

DRAWING THINGS TO A HEAD.

Dr. Lincoln (to Smart Boy of the Shop). "Mild applications of Russian Salve for our friends over the way, and heavy doses—and plenty of it—for our Southern patient!!"

FISK & HATCH.
Bankers and Dealers in Government Securities,
AND
AGENTS FOR THE UNITED STATES
FIVE-TWENTY LOAN,
No. 38 Wall Street, New York.

PREPARE FOR THE HOLIDAYS.
There is no Gift or Present, which compares with the Craig Microscope and Mounted Objects. As a source of amusement and instruction they are unsurpassed. This Microscope will be mailed, postage paid, for $2 25; or with 6 beautiful mounted objects, for $3; or with 24 objects, for $5.
Address, HENRY CRAIG,
335 Broadway, New York.
A liberal discount to the trade.

FINE DRESS SHIRTS TO ORDER.
UNRIVALED
In Manufacture, Fitting, and Material.
At UNION ADAMS, No. 637 Broadway.

VINELAND.
LANDS.—TO ALL WANTING FARMS.—Large and thriving settlement, mild and healthful climate, 30 miles south of Philadelphia by railroad. Rich soil, produces large crops, which can now be seen growing. Twenty and fifty acre tracts, at from $15 to $20 per acre, payable within four years. Good business opening for Manufacturers and others, churches, schools, and good society. It is now the most improving place East or West. Hundreds are settling and building. The beauty with which the place is laid out is unsurpassed. Letters answered. Papers containing reports and giving full information will be sent free. Address CHAS. K. LANDIS, Vineland Post Office, Cumberland County, New Jersey.
From Report of Solon Robinson, Agricultural Editor of the Tribune:—It is one of the most extensive fertile tracts, in an almost level position and suitable condition for pleasant farming that we know of this side of the Western prairies.

STAMMERING
Cured by Bates' Patent Appliance. For Pamphlets, &c., describing the same, address
H. C. L. MEARS, 277 W. 23d Street, N. Y.

BILLIARD BALLS.
Patent compressed Ivory Billiard Balls, 2½ and 2⅝ in., $10 per set. 2 in. Bagatelle, $8 per set. 1¾ in. Bagatelle, $6 per set, will be sent on receipt of the price. Manufactured and for sale by WM. M. WELLING, 207 Centre St., New York, sign of the Golden Elephant.

Shults' Onguent, warranted to produce a full set of Whiskers in six weeks, or money refunded. Sent post-paid, for 30 cents. Address C. F. SHULTS, Troy, N. Y.

The Soldier's Gift
To the Loved One at Home.
We will deliver free of freight charge, at any Express Office East of St. Joseph, Mo., any of our beautiful Albums of the value of $5 or more, that may be ordered by members of the Army or Navy of the United States as Presents to friends at home. We manufacture elegant styles at all prices to $25, and higher.
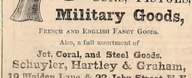
E. & H. T. ANTHONY,
Manufacturers and Importers,
501 Broadway, N. Y.

A Beautiful Complexion, free from Tan, Pimples and Freckles, may easily be procured by using the "BALM OF THOUSAND FLOWERS." For shaving it is unsurpassed. It is composed of palm oil, honey, and other valuable articles, highly perfumed by its own ingredients, and when used for washing, night and morning, renders the skin soft and white, and free from blemish. Price 50 cents.
The Trade supplied by HOWARD, SANGER & CO., 105 and 107 Chambers Street, N. Y., and for sale by all Druggists.

IMMENSE PROFITS
To be made selling our
STATIONERY PRIZE PACKETS.
Send for our New Circular.
G. S. HASKINS & CO., 36 Beekman Street, N. Y.

$7. WATCHES. $7.
A Beautiful Engraved Gold-Plated Watch, Lever Cap, small size, English Movements, perfect time-keeper. Sent free by mail, in neat case, for only $7. A Solid Silver, same as above, $7. Specially adapted to the ARMY. CHAS. P. NORTON & CO., 38 & 40 Ann Street, N. Y.
Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper, of Aug. 22, says: "Messrs. NORTON & CO. have combined two very desirable things in a watch—cheapness and reliability. When it is known that for $7 a person can have an excellent timekeeper, there will be greater punctuality in all the affairs of life."



A Household Word.—Buy your Housekeeping Articles at BASSFORD'S, Cooper Institute, New York.

NATIONAL BATTLE PIN.

McClellan, Grant, Rosecrans, Banks, Meade, Gilmore, Burnside, Hooker, Foster, and Sigel. All are the same pattern as the cut, only differing in battle-grounds and date. Perfect photograph likeness in each pin. Plated back and front in fine gold. By enclosing $1, a sample will be sent by mail. Agents wanted in and out the army. The undersigned has the exclusive right of manufacture, and the inventor of this beautiful keepsake and record of gallant acts.
LOUIS PHILIP, 609 Broadway, N. Y.

MUNN & CO.,
Solicitors of American and Foreign Patents,
And Publishers of the Illustrated Scientific American, 37 Park Row, N. Y. Pamphlets of information concerning Patents, free. Specimens of the Paper, free.

GUNS, PISTOLS, Military Goods,
French and English Fancy Goods.
Also, a full assortment of
Jet, Coral, and Steel Goods.
Schuyler, Hartley & Graham,
19 Maiden Lane & 22 John Street, N. Y.,
15 Rue d'Enghein, Paris,
47 Hampton St., Birmingham, Eng.

Amalgam Bells.

Cheapest and best for Churches, Schools, Farms, Factories, &c. Equal in tone and durability to any other metal, and two-thirds less in price, or 15 cts. per lb. Send for a circular to the manufacturer, John B. Robinson, late Peatt, Robinson & Co., 190 William St., N.Y.

$35 WATCHES. $35
Genuine Full-Jeweled American Lever Watches, in 4 Ounce Coin Silver Hunting Cases, Gold Joints, for $35.
Also every variety of good Watches at equally low rates. All orders from the Army must be pre-paid, as the Express Companies will not take bills for collection on soldiers.
J. L. FERGUSON, Importer of Watches,
208 Broadway New York.

The only enameled "Turn-over" Collar made in metals. Send $1 for a "Turn-over" or 75 cents for a "Choker," to Box 5173, and receive it by return mail. American enameled Metallic Collar Co., 94 Pine St., N. Y.

E. & H. T. ANTHONY,
Manufacturers of Photographic Materials,
501 Broadway, New York.

Card Photographs.
Our Catalogue now embraces considerably over
FOUR THOUSAND
different subjects (to which additions are continually being made) of Portraits of Eminent Americans, etc., viz.:

72 Major-Generals,	525 Statesmen,
190 Brigadier-Generals,	127 Divines,
259 Colonels,	116 Authors,
84 Lieut.-Colonels,	30 Artists,
207 Other Officers,	112 Stage,
60 Officers of the Navy,	46 Prominent Women,

147 Prominent Foreign Portraits.
2,500 COPIES OF WORKS OF ART.
Including reproductions of the most celebrated Engravings, Paintings, Statues, &c.
Catalogues sent on receipt of Stamp.
An order for One Dozen PICTURES from our Catalogue will be filled on receipt of $1 80, and sent by mail, free.

Photographic Albums.
Of these we manufacture a great variety, ranging in price from 50 cents to $50 each.
Our ALBUMS have the reputation of being superior in beauty and durability to any others.
The smaller kinds can be sent safely by mail at a postage of six cents per oz.
The more expensive can be sent by express.

We also keep a large assortment of
Stereoscopes & Stereoscopic Views.
Our Catalogue of these will be sent to any address on receipt of Stamp.
E. & H. T. ANTHONY,
Manufacturers of Photographic Materials,
501 Broadway, New York.
Friends or relatives of prominent military men will confer a favor by sending us their likenesses to copy. They will be kept carefully, and returned uninjured.
☞ FINE ALBUMS MADE TO ORDER for Congregations to present to their Pastor, or for other purposes, with suitable inscriptions, &c.

Musical Boxes, playing 1, 2, 3, 4, 6, 8, 10, 12, 16, 24, and 36 tunes, and costing from $2 75 to $450 00. A beautiful article for holiday presents. My stock of Musical Boxes is the only complete one to be found in this country. M. J. PAILLARD, Importer, No. 21 Maiden Lane (up stairs), New York.

A BEAUTIFUL MICROSCOPE
For 30 cts. (coin preferred), magnifying small objects 500 times. Five of different powers for $1 00. Mailed free. Address F. C. BOWEN, Box 220, Boston, Mass.

Fogg's Double-Action Patent Lever
SKATE BUCKLE,
Manufactured and for sale on Straps, at wholesale, by F. STEVENS, Manufacturer of Skates, Straps, and Leather Goods, 215 Pearl St., New York, 68 Kilby St., Boston.

$15 Per Day Easy $15
And a Watch Free.
Employment for everybody, male and female. 100,000 men, women, and children wanted to act as our Agents in every Town and Village throughout the U. S. to sell our immensely popular, unexcelled, and valuable extra large size Prize Stationery, Recipes, and Yankee Notion Packages, containing fine Writing Materials, such as Paper, Pens, Pencils, Envelopes, Blotters, Beautiful Emblems, Ladies' Fashion Plates, Designs for Needlework, Cottage Keepsakes, Household Companions, Camp Companions (for Soldiers), Parlor Amusements, Letter Writer's Guide, Medical Preparations, Many Ways to Get Rich, Likenesses of Military Heroes, Union Designs, Gents' Pocket Calendars for 1863, Yankee Notions of all kinds, rich and costly Presents of Fashionable Jewelry, Rare Recipes, Games, Army Advice, &c., &c., &c, the whole worth, if bought separately, many dollars. Price each Package only 25 cents retail. Wholesale rates to Agents very low, from 100 to 200 per cent. profit allowed. Our Packages stand same as ever, alone, and above all competitors, and have long been acknowledged as the leading and only real valuable and standard Articles of the kind now manufactured. Packages of all descriptions put up by the 1000 for Sutlers, Peddlers, Wholesale Dealers, &c. Goods sent by Express safe to all parts of the army South or Southwest. A Splendid Solid Silver Watch, English Movements, and correct timepiece, presented free to each person who acts as our agent. Send for our new Circulars, containing Extra Premium Inducements, sent free. S. C. RICKARDS & CO., 102 Nassau St., N. Y. The Great Original, Largest, and Oldest Prize Package House in the World.

DR. B. C. PERRY,
DERMATOLOGIST,
49 Bond Street, New York,.
Formerly of 29 Winter Street, Boston, treats successfully all Diseases of the Scalp, Loss of Hair, and Premature Blanching. Also, removes Moth Freckles, and other Discolorations from the face, without injury to the texture or color of the skin. Consultations free:
For particulars enclose stamp for Circular.

AGENTS WANTED.—$2 positively made from 20 cts.; urgently needed by every person. Call and examine, or ten samples sent free by mail for 20 cts.; retails for $2, by R. L. WOLCOTT, 170 Chatham Square, N. Y.

ROMAN SCARFS SENT BY MAIL EVERYWHERE
3,000 dozen pure Roman Scarfs,
Made from the Purest and Softest Silk.
These are the most fashionable, elegant, and economical Scarfs ever imported, as they are reversible; one Scarf is as good as two.
They are much worn in Europe by both ladies and gentlemen. Can be worn with either pin or ring.
The whole lot will be retailed at
WHOLESALE PRICES!
$1 50 AND $2 EACH.
A single Scarf sent by mail on receipt of the cash, and six cents for postage.
Very fine Gold Plated Scarf Pins or Rings
At $1 50 each.
S. W. H. WARD,
No. 387 Broadway, New York.

STEEL COLLARS
ENAMELED WHITE,
Having the appearance and comfort of linen, have been worn in England for the last two years in preference to any other collar, as they are readily cleaned in one minute with a sponge.
To Military Men and Travelers they are invaluable.
Price $1 each, sent by Post to any part of the Union on receipt of $1 15.
WHOLESALE AND RETAIL
AGENTS WANTED in every Town in the Union.
S. W. H. WARD, Sole Agent for U. S., 387 B'way, N. Y.
FRENCH FLANNEL
OVERSHIRTS.
OVERSHIRTS.
OVERSHIRTS.
the largest assortment in New York, $2 75, $3, $3 75 each; all cut one yard long.
A single Shirt sent by mail on receipt of the cost. The cost of postage must be enclosed—63 cents for each Shirt.
Send the size of your neck.
ENGLISH MERINO UNDERSHIRTS AND DRAWERS, $2, $2 25, and $2 50.
SCOTCH LAMB'S WOOL UNDERSHIRTS AND DRAWERS.
ALSO,
FINE WHITE SHIRTS
MADE TO MEASURE AT $24, $30, $36, AND $42 PER DOZEN.
Self-Measurement for Shirts.
Printed directions for self-measurement, list of prices, and drawings of different styles of shirts and collars sent free everywhere.
The Cash can be paid to Express company on receipt of goods.
S. W. H. WARD, from London.
No. 387 Broadway, New York.

GOLD PENS AND CASES.
Retailed at wholesale prices. 14 kt. Gold Pen, Solid Silver Case, $1 50, warranted for one year, guarantee accompanying each Pen. Send for a circular. Pens repointed on receipt of 35 cents.
E. S. JOHNSON, 15 Maiden Lane, N. Y.

Remington's

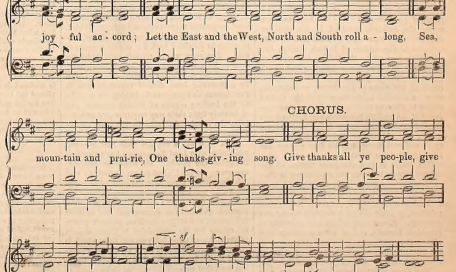
ARMY AND NAVY REVOLVER.
Approved by the Government.
Warranted superior to any other Pistol of the kind. Also Pocket and Belt Revolvers. Sold by the Trade generally.
E. REMINGTON & SONS,
Ilion, N. Y.

BLOOD'S HELIX NEEDLES
BLOOD & CO., Manufacturers and Importers, Office ... Broadway, N. Y. Manufacturers of superior Needles for all Sewing Machines. Send for circular.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. VII.—No. 362.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 5, 1863. [SINGLE COPIES SIX CENTS. $3.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.



Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1863, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

THE President's Hymn.

GIVE THANKS, ALL YE PEOPLE.

With Spirit.

THE PRESIDENT'S HYMN, COMPOSED BY REV. DR. MUHLENBERG.—[PUBLISHED BY PERMISSION OF MR. A. D. RANDOLPH, 683 BROADWAY.]

Give Thanks, all ye People.

1. Give thanks, all ye people, give thanks to the Lord,
Alleluias of freedom, with joyful accord:
Let the East and the West, North and South roll along,
Sea, mountain, and prairie, one thanksgiving song.

Chorus after each verse.

Give thanks, all ye people, give thanks to the Lord,
Alleluias of freedom, with joyful accord.

2. For the sunshine and rainfall, enriching again
Our acres in myriads, with treasures of grain;
For the Earth still unloading her manifold wealth,
For the Skies beaming vigor, the Winds breathing health:
Give thanks—

3. For the Nation's wide table, o'erflowingly spread,
Where the many have feasted, and all have been fed,
With no bondage their God-given rights to enthrall,
But Liberty guarded by Justice for all:
Give thanks—

4. In the realms of the Anvil, the Loom, and the Plow,
Whose the mines and the fields, to Him gratefully bow:
His the flocks and the herds, sing ye hill-sides and vales;
On His Ocean domains chant His Name with the gales.
Give thanks—

5. Of commerce and traffic, ye princes, behold
Your riches from Him Whose the silver and gold.
Happier children of Labor, true lords of the soil,
Bless the Great Master-Workman, who blesseth your toil.
Give thanks—

6. Brave men of our forces, Life-guard of our coasts,
To your Leader be loyal, Jehovah of Hosts:
Glow the Stripes and the Stars in your weft victory bright,
Reflecting His glory—He crowneth the Right.
Give thanks—

7. Nor shall ye through our borders, ye stricken of heart,
Only wailing your dead in the joy have no part:
God's solace be yours, and for you there shall flow
All that honor and sympathy's gifts can bestow.
Give thanks—

8. In the Domes of Messiah, ye worshiping throngs,
Solemn litanies mingle with jubilant songs;
The Ruler of Nations beseeching to spare,
And our Empire still keep the Elect of His care.
Give thanks—

9. Our guilt and transgressions remember no more;
Peace, Lord! righteous Peace, of Thy gift we implore.
And the Banner of Union, restored by Thy Hand,
Be the Banner of Freedom o'er All in the Land,
And the Banner of Union, etc.
Give thanks—

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 5, 1863.

WHY ENGLAND KEEPS STILL.

THE most reliable exposition we have of British feeling toward this country is to be found in the speech which Mr. Beecher made to his friends on his return home. That speech, which was in marked contrast—in point of manner, method, and tone—to any of Mr. Beecher's previous performances, may be said to have solved the problem involved in the singular divergence between the written and spoken opinions of the leaders of British society, and the policy pursued by the British Government. There is hardly a public man in England—with a few bright exceptions—who has not either espoused the cause of the South, or expressed an utter disbelief in the capacity of the United States to preserve their nationality; a vast majority of the leading newspapers of England are arrayed against us; and yet the Government arrests the Alexandra and the Laird pirate rams, and steadfastly sets its face against the recognition of the South.

The secret is that the great masses of the British people, who are not represented in Parliament, in the Press, or in the Clubs, are on our side. They believe that ours is the cause of freedom against slavery, of democracy against privilege, of labor against hereditary capital and property. Hence their unions vote addresses to President Lincoln, and at mass meetings they almost invariably overpower the champions of the Slave Confederacy, and pass resolutions of sympathy with the United States.

Now these great unrepresented masses, who have no newspaper to express their views, and who elect no man in Parliament to speak for them, constitute nevertheless a most important section of the British people. They are Great Britain's dangerous class. They can not vote, or help make the laws which govern them. But they can make revolutions, and, if goaded too far, the presumption is that they would do so. If they ever did, the throne and aristocracy of England would crumble in an afternoon. Hence the politic caution of the Government of England in dealing with questions on which this dangerous class formed an opinion.

It has long been believed by sound thinkers, both in Europe and in this country, that the Constitution of Great Britain was obsolete, and that a new and sweeping reform—which should recognize the rights of mere manhood as contradistinguished from the rights of mere property —would not be delayed for many years. Accidents have postponed the fulfillment of these expectations. The Chartist follies, the potato rebellion in Ireland, and the disasters end of the Continental movements of 1848, gave Privilege an extension of its lease, and threw Democracy in England back for nearly a generation. But great truths, though kept under for ever so long, will eventually assert themselves. The working population of England, kept poor by aristocratic laws, denied representation in Parliament, and persistently hidden out of sight by the leading organs of British opinion, will ultimately push their way to power just as surely as the people of France fought their way in 1789.

It is to avoid a rupture with this working population that Lord Palmerston has refused to recognize the rebels. He doubtless honestly expects to see the United States destroyed; and he calculates that this fearful catastrophe will occure, he will crush out democracy in England. We think differently; believing that we shall succeed, and that our success will lead to more systematic, and at the same time, we trust, peaceful efforts for the recognition in Great Britain of the rights of labor. Time will show which is right. Meanwhile it is right we should understand that it is to the dread of the British working-men that we owe the present forbearance of the British Government.

KENTUCKY LOYALTY.

TWENTY months have elapsed since we had occasion in this journal to comment pretty severely on the article which was then known as "Kentucky loyalty," which was a composite mixture of sympathy with rebellion, lukewarm regard for the United States, chronic aversion to being plundered, and vague hopes of maintaining neutrality when every other State in the Union was plunged into war.

On that occasion Kentucky scoffed at the counsels of those who, like ourselves, urged her to take sides manfully. A Kentucky loyalist, in May, 1861, was of the same stripe as a New York Copperhead in December, 1863. The loyalty of the best of the Kentuckians was so slim that it couldn't be trusted in the open air on a windy day.

Twenty months have passed, and Kentucky has been pretty thoroughly ravaged. Three-fourths of the State have been overrun by hostile armies. Whole counties have been depopulated. Fences, houses, barns, and whole villages have disappeared. Opulent families have been reduced to poverty. The State has been a battle-ground, and has suffered as much as Tennessee or Virginia.

But the suffering has proved wholesome, and has borne good fruit. We know of no public address which has a truer ring than the recently-published letter of Governor Bramlette, of Kentucky, to a malcontent slaveholder, who complained that the war was prosecuted not for the restoration of the Union, but for the abolition of slavery. No one has more effectually squelched the Copperhead slang about the violation of the Constitution by Mr. Lincoln; no one has more clearly set forth the true duty of an American citizen at the present crisis in the nation's fate.

First save the nation, says Governor Bramlette: we'll talk about slavery afterward. If the slave-owners had not rebelled the institution would have been safe. They have taken up the sword: they and their institution must now abide the issue; and if slavery perishes in the conflict, it is easy to see that the Governor of Kentucky will not be the last man to say Amen. Under the leadership of such men Kentuckians will resume their old place among the statesmen of the nation.

THE LOUNGER.

GETTYSBURG.

THE solemn ceremony at Gettysburg is one of the most striking events of the war. There are grave-yards enough in the land—what is Virginia but a cemetery?—and the brave who have died for us in this farce war consecrate the soil from the ocean to the Mississippi. But there is peculiar significance in the field of Gettysburg, for there "thus far" was thundered to the rebellion. This it is which separates it from all the other battle-fields of the war. There the men in the main line have fought as nobly, and their officers have directed as bravely; but here their valor stayed the flood of barbarism, and like the precious shield that the highest storm-tides strew upon the beach, showing how far the waters came, so the dead heroes of Gettysburg mark the highest tide of the war. Therefore shall their graves be peculiarly honored, and their memory especially sacred; and all that living men can bring of pomp and solemnity and significance to hallow their resting-place shall not be wanting.

The President and the Cabinet were there, with famous soldiers and civilians. The oration by Mr. Everett was splendid in its cold. Delivered, doubtless, with his accustomed graces, it yet wanted one stirring thought, one vivid picture, one thrilling line.

The few words of the President were from the heart of the heart, and no one can read, even without kindling emotion. "The world will little note nor long remember what we say here, but it can never forget what they did here." It was as simple and felicitous and earnest a word as was ever spoken.

Perhaps the Governors present was Horatio Seymour. He came to honor the dead of Gettysburg. Did he come to honor by lying he stood in Albany? Did he sneeringly asking where was the victory promised for the Fourth of July? These men were winning that victory, and they, for us all, and now he mourns, ex officio, over their graves.

When the war is over and the verdict of history is rendered, the Governor who has most grossly perplexed the Government in every way—those who first incited and then palliated massacre and riot—will be found to be the friends of the soldiers, but those whose faith was firmest in the darkest hours, and who did not falter though the fox were at the door.

A BISHOP BASTED.

SOMEBODY has written a brief and capital satire upon Bishop Hopkins's Letter defending slavery and the rebellion. After the substitution of the word Polygamy for Slavery, the exact value of the Bishop's argument is exposed. For if slavery be a good thing because Jewish patriarchs had slaves, polygamy is equally lovely because they had harems. And if slavery be tolerable because Christ and the Apostles found it, polygamy must be desirable because he did not even allude to it at all.

In fact, what is left of the Bible arguments reserves only such treatment as the ridicule, the contempt, and the sarcasm which are so delicately dealt it by this little squib. If we are to excuse our sins by those of the Jewish patriarchs, and if the whole spirit and tendency of Christ's teaching are to go for naught because he did not chance to specify some offense, there is no absurdity that may not be defended, and no crime that may not be justified.

The slave party treats the Bible exactly as it does the Constitution. The whole meaning and scope are ignored, in order to make a fight upon a doubtful word or phrase. Does Bishop Hopkins seriously wish to see the United States the polity and civilization of the ancient tribes in Judea? Does he propose, since he gives his right hand to Calhoun, to insist upon Brigham Young's taking his left? Solomon was called the wisest of men. Does the Bishop think it logically follows that a man grows in wisdom as he increases his harems, and that perfect wisdom requires a man to have, like Solomon, seven hundred wives and three hundred concubines?

It is just as logical to say that as to say that a man may rightfully buy and sell human beings, and tear children from parents, and wives from husbands, and scourge them to work without wages, and deny them all mental light, and doom them to abject submission to a despotic will, because the Jewish patriarchs had slaves. Nor can we see the force of the argument which commends slavery to a Christian because Abraham had slaves, when Christ had none. To say that he did not forbid it is to quibble, because verbally he condemned very few sins. Did he condemn burning a neighbor's barn? No. Is arson therefore condemned enslaving him. But he bade us love our neighbor as ourselves; and he told us that all men were our neighbors.

The Bishop of Vermont announces a book in which he proposes to establish the right of slavery from the Bible. Let him be entreated. He is judged in advance. The Eastern criminal did not know until he moved that his head had been sliced off, so smoothly had the sharp sword cut it. Does the good Bishop not know that he has been taken for a tunning-fork and scorched at the fire of common-sense?

FREEDMEN ON THE MISSISSIPPI.

ONE of the chief works to which the country will henceforth have to devote itself is the care of the colored race. General Grant and Chaplain Fiske, of the Fourth Minnesota Volunteers, to lay before the public the condition and wants of the black refugees in the Department, and from Mr. Fiske's account it appears that there are forty or fifty thousand between Helena and Natchez, upon the Mississippi, who need immediate aid. As our armies advance, and the blacks are able to reach our lines, the capable men enter the service as soldiers, teamsters, or otherwise. But the women, the children, and the infirm are sorely pinched. They come from deserted plantations, and bring only their children and the clothes upon their backs. The Government gives them scanty rations, as it does to all loyal refugees, but these people need shelter and clothing. They must have them, or they will perish by hundreds during the winter.

Nobody need fear that this is a great mass of worthless paupers. In Genesee County, Department, in South Carolina, the colored people, not yet two years free, are nearly self-supporting, and only ask aid for their schools and churches. The colony on Roanoke Island, under charge of Rev. Horace James, is rapidly advancing toward self-support; while General Thomas shows that the leased plantations have been worked to a profit under very disadvantageous circumstances.

Nobody supposed that a system of slavery, which has plunged the country into so terrible a war, absorbed the whole energies of the struggle, could disappear without imposing enormous suffering upon the slaves and vast responsibility upon the country. Upon the innocent and debasedness people, to perpetuate whose slavery the war is waged by the rebels, falls the sharp pang inseparable from their liberation. It is the call in these days of the more stirring to every loyal soul in the land to do what he can to lighten the burden. It is not the nature and character of the colored man, but of the white man, that has made the negro so fruitful a source of woe to the country. We all pay the penalty of the wrong to which we all consented. And having resolved that the national flag shall not float over the system of slavery and not of slavery; that no brave hand shall be repelled because of its color; that all faithful human hearts shall be welcomed for the weapons of the Union, which is the sole hope of peace and liberty—we shall not refuse to succor the woman, and child in which something may be at once and effectively done.

The area of land which they can cultivate can be provided for the freed people along the Mississippi, and secured from rebel raids, the contraband camps will vanish, and their self-supporting will take care of themselves. But until then, during this bitter winter, they need help. Send it to Messrs. Arnold, Constable & Co., No. 1 Mercer Street, and money to Joseph B. Collins, 40 Wall Street; or, if preferred, to Chaplain Fiske, care of F. G. Shaw, 86 Trinity Building, New York.

STARVATION.

THE Government is anxiously considering what shall be done to relieve the suffering of our men in the hands of the rebels. That they are pinched for food is proving there can be no doubt. It is the duty of the Government to succor them in equally clear. How shall it be done?

Starvation in kind is impossible. We can not torture prisoners to death. If we were fighting Indians, we could not scalp nor roast the captives whom we took, although our captured friends would be tormented; nor, fighting with other barbarians, could we refuse to exchange because they starve theirs. They do not do it intentionally, perhaps, but that does not help the matter. It would be no excuse for murdering our men that the rebels had not jails enough to contain them. If they can not keep prisoners decently, they have no right to hold them.

It seems possible and practicable for the Government to ascertain exactly the condition of the mass of our captured men. Should it prove to be what is to universally represented, that the rebel authorities are not damned of the rebel authorities fair treatment for the prisoners upon pain of retaliation, and announces that a certain number of rebel prisoners in our hands were held as hostages for that good treatment, failing which they were to be shot? We are surely not obliged to tolerate the torture of Union prisoners because we wage the war so strictly that the rebel supplies fail. Every soldier liable to be captured must be assured by the action of the Government that he shall not be starved, or hung, or roasted, without instant vengeance upon the tormentors. If, as I say very likely, the case of Texas comes even more savage as it becomes desperate, but it understand that it will be held to the strictest account for every wanton crime.

"ONE GRAVE."

We marched across the stormy isle of strife strong and fearless then tread,
Though worn with toil and slumber supplied with warfare furnished blood that burned our sufferings nere to the dead.

Following with joy our youthful child to Freedom or the grave,
The poet of honor he had claimed—that poet for us had won.
To lead the van at Death's right hand, where bloodiest deeds are done;
Foremost to pay Oppression's debt—ages of lash and chains,
With the fierce cross of bayonet, the musket's deadly rain.

Six hundred yards from Wagner's fort the storming party—
Rich courage kindling every eye and arming every breast.
"Now, men, strike!" our Colonel cried, "and show your manhood's worth; Follow my path through life or death! Forward the Fifty-fourth!"

Then poured from the dauntless heads of our advanced band
A fire more dread than rained of yore on Sodom's fated land—
From Sumter's sorrier-making throat, from Wagner's death-fraught hold,
From batteries near and points remote the iron deluge rolled!

Sulphurous flames from countless guns illumed the grim night sky,
So fitful flash, but blazing on with one continuous glare!
We staggered—some halted but for moment—wounded fitted dead—
Through storming shell and blazing shot fast toward the foe we sped.

"Onward, my boys!" our leader's voice rings stately over all—
"We'll gain the parapet, and there your shattered ranks reform!"
Onward, my friends, my banner, come, for every human life
Is lifted, surely, here!
For kindred, country, hearth and home, honor and fame's dear light!"

Rushing, as lions spring through fire, we gain the parapet,
In view of all, we reel over the sharp fatal sword.
"Now, hand to hand!" our leader cries, "what though some bleed?
Above their grave that flag shall wave which frees and guards us!"

"Onward!" Ah me! I saw him lie beside me where I fell,
While hollowing o'er us shrieked and roared the thunderbolts of hell!
From Sumter's wasson-isolated walls, from Wagner's sandbuilt hold,
Through that red tide of living, piles of dead, the fiery tempest rolled!

Ill strive to grasp his pallant hand—to raise it but once more—
"Onward!" That word had cleared his way to the eternal shore.
What hopes must down with him! But yet no step we backward gave;
Our blood was pledged to him—with him—for freedom or the grave!

Around him drew the rebel crew with curse and gibe and jeer—
That Yankee dog!—we'll bury him beneath his negroes choir!
Well dig a pit for twenty-one, and him the bravest lay,
A score of blacks above his head to keep him down for aye.

O! glorious grave! what monument of marble rich and rare
Can with that wealth of loyal blood and faithful hearts compare?
Ære perennius!—sacrum sit! No tomb beneath the soil
Shall true men honor more than that which holds the "Twenty-one!"

Ære perennius!" They shall live in many a deathless song;
Renown shall lift their names from out the unnamed heroic throng;
Embalmed with their devoted chief in everlasting fame,
What rebel retiling place then Ass could taint or here claim?

Ære perennius!" Monuments rock-sculptured fade away;
But there are deeds whose praise shall live through heaven-sung poet's lay;
Martyrs for Truth and Right Divine! to God your souls we give,
And pledged your blood—and hold the pledge—for freedom or the grave.

A. S.

THE MONROE DOCTRINE.

A FRENCHMAN of distinction wrote some time since that the best thing the United States Government would give Louis Napoleon time to reflect, and decide calmly what to do in Mexico. It was an unnecessary wish, for the Government of the Emperor has given the whole world the opportunity of seeing that it means to maintain our case, and that we shall not be swift to fight with any other nation.

Louis Napoleon has stopped the rams, and he alludes only casually to our affairs in his speech. He hopes that the rule of Maximilian may be beneficial to Mexico. But what Louis Napoleon means to do he does not state. Probably he does not know. He is a very cautious man, and a very clever, by events. Very possibly, also, he wishes that he had not gone to Mexico. Can he seat Maximilian and then withdraw his army? Will Maximilian, if the French army remains, be more than a satrap of Louis Napoleon's? Will the United States consent to the permanent establishment of France upon its least secure frontier? These are questions that every man asks and no man answers.

The Westminster Review sees in the Mexican expedition a conspiracy against Protestantism and the peace of the world. The United States Government can see in it nothing but a movement which assumed its own destruction. None of us can see in the permanent French occupation any thing but a constant menace. True, Mexico is not our country. True, it is desirable that a strong, steady Government should be established there. But if it were wise for us forty years ago to declare that Europe could not interfere in the private affairs of Mexico without endangering our peace, is it any less true or wise now? Where is the difference between the principle which forbids the French to give Mexico a proper government and the interference of Louis Napoleon to do the same thing, especially at a time when his influence neighbored within our borders are now alienated from their Government, and openly declare that they will seek the protection of France rather than submit?

If what is known as the Monroe Doctrine be still fundamental upon this point, the position of this continent of the great modern principle that nations must be allowed to settle their own internal quarrels—is certainly by no less true now and here than it has always been. It is a principle which seems to pour out its blessings upon the advantage of foreign aid only at their own request and by peaceful negotiation. It is a principle which we have the right to demand and to insist upon. It is a principle which combines the great civilized powers to guard all against the excesses of any. So the ultimate interests of the world and the French conquest of Mexico threatens the world.

GENERAL DIX.

GENERAL BURNSIDE is still in the field, although the Providence Journal announces that he is coming home, and it is stated, with continuance, that he had asked to be relieved. If it be true, all loyal hearts will hear it with sorrow, and follow him from the retirement which he has earned with the warmest prayers and good wishes. From the moment that the country first saw him upon the battle-field at Bull Run, through the long and weary the glorious campaign in North Carolina, in the fiery storm at Fredericksburg, at the head of the column which relieved Knoxville, to the field which hearts among the Tennessee mountains, and in all scenes and events, wherever he has appeared, he has served, it has seen the same single-hearted devotion, the same bravery, the same soldierly skill, the same purity, fervor, and honesty which are the benediction, which history will delight to repeat and prolong—"Well done, good and faithful servant!"

What thwarting jealousies and official hostility he has had to encounter none of us can say. The fact is that Burnside has been in the field all the time. Yet when the story of that day shall be faithfully written, we do not believe that the name of Burnside will be found guilty. Like all leaders, however, he know that he was to be judged by success, and when his personal sense of honor urged him to fall in the weather he did not hesitate to ask to be relieved. He has had no party to portray him as a martyr, but his character and conduct are sufficient witness to his firm we owe the historic proof that a popular Government, in the stress of actual war, may stop the mouth of an enemy of free speech itself without dangering the great principles of free speech itself. We have the highest confidence that the country intended to resent a blow at a fundamental right, was merely the cry of a faction disappointed in their hope of destroying very fundamental right whatever.

The tried and true soldier goes home. Home to his family, to his friends, to the little State in which he lives, and which loves and honors him. The little State has the proud effort of claiming some of our greatest names as hers. But no name calls the roll on which those of Greene and Perry and Dix will not forget the later burns of that of Burnside.

LITERARY.

A VERY beautiful, legible, and complete family Bible is the Pictorial Bible issued by the Harpers. It is most copiously and judiciously edited, and richly and illustrated. It has the concordance, chronologies, tables, lists, and records which belong to such a work. It is the best family Bible we know, and the publishers put forth their prettiest works, this in the edition of the Book of Books will not be forgotten.

One of the most extraordinary episodes of the war which has excited comparatively little attention, as the earthquake "rested unheedfully away," during the battle at Lake Pontchartrain, is "The Sioux War and Massacres of 1862 and 1863. The History of this outbreak has just been published by the Harpers. It is by Isaac V. D. Heard, who was engaged in General Sibley's expedition, and acted as Recorder of the Military Commission which tried some four hundred of the offenders. The work is a brief but complete and startling history. It gives the causes and progress of this fearful outbreak, finding the real cause mainly in our bad faith and eternal fraud toward the Indian. It is very grim tale, and instructive, we and well told.

ARMY AND NAVY ITEMS

THE appointment by the authorities at Washington of Major-General JOHN A. LOGAN to the command of the Fifteenth Army Corps gives great satisfaction to the Army of the Mississippi and all Union-loving citizens. He is a brave and gallant officer, and Washington, in placing him at the head of so many has been solid we.

Colonel WILLIAM MYERS, Aid-de-Camp and Assistant-Quarter-master of the United States Army, is announced as the chief Quartermaster at Washington, in place of General ALLEN. It is supposed the entire quarter-master-ship of the Army of the Potomac will be given to Colonel Myers. Large quantities of stores are being shipped to the frontier for the equipment of Kansas men now entering the army.

The citizens of Troy on 18th November presented Colonel WILLIAM R. TRINGALI, commanding the Twenty-first Regiment New York Volunteer (Griswold) Cavalry, with a magnificent sword. The presentation took place at the residence of Hon. JOHN G. GRISWOLD, member of Congress elect from the Rensselaer and Washington district, and was witnessed by Major-General JOHN E. WOOL, United States Army, and a large number of the influential citizens of Troy and vicinity. In the presentation speech complimentary allusion was made to the gallantry of Colonel TRAINO, who, as Captain and Major in the old Second New York Cavalry, behaved most brilliantly throughout the two years' service as New Market Bridge, Fredericksburg, Chancellorsville, and Gettysburg.

Commander HARRIS has been detached from the command of the Iroquois, and ordered to the command of the Chickopee.

Lieutenant-Commander MILTON HOTTON has been ordered to the command of the Marblehead.

Lieutenant-Commander HENRY ERBEN, JR., has been detached from special duty at New York city, and ordered on board the Niagara.

Lieutenant-Commander JOHN G. BARNES has been detached from the Niagara, and ordered as fleet captain of the North Atlantic Blockading Squadron.

The Sixth Army Corps, Major-General SEDGWICK commanding, has been reviewed by General Reynolds and his staff.

Admiral SAMUEL FAIL suddenly ill on 30th November, and before any, excepting his most intimate friends, were aware of it, he was announced as a serious sport. Under the treatment of his physicians he has rallied, and is now progressing favorably. Admiral DUPONT is in good care. He entered the navy in 1800, and, though on the retired list by any majority of the law of 1861, he has been constantly in active service, and is now President of the Light-house Board.

By a recent order from the Quarter-master-General of the United States Army, Brigadier-General MONTGOMERY C. MEIGS, late military chief of the Quarter-master Department at Washington, has been removed to Louisville to establish an office there.

Major PETER CARMEIN, Paymaster United States Army, and one of the oldest officers in the Army, Captain CHARLES NELSON HOE, First United States Artillery; Captain J. H. CARLETON, Mounted Rifles, and Captain JOHN C. ROBERTS, lately Assistant-Quarter-master, Volunteer Service, have been retired from active service, and are now on the list of officers subject to be physically disabled for duty, have been retired from active service, and his resignation has approved by the President.

General MARCELLUS, having recovered from his injuries received at the battle of Lookout Mountain, has joined his division of the First corps on 16th ult., and General CUTLER returns to his brigade.

The rebel Brigadier-General H. R. BURGY was tried before a court-martial at Shreveport, Louisiana, during September last, for disobedience of orders and unofficer-like conduct. The charges against him were sustained, and although he was acquitted of the charges of actual cowardice, still he was severely censured by the Court for want of diligence in the cause he represented.

Brigadier-General JAMES B. STEEDMAN, commanding Reserve Corps, has been assigned to duty at Cincinnati, Ohio, relieving Brigadier-General JOSEPH DARR, JR., who is relieved from duty in that city, and will report to Major-General THOMAS, in Kentucky, for ordering him to the command of a district in the Department of the Ohio will probably be tendered him shortly for active operations.

The Secretary of the Navy has made the following appointments:

Acting Master JOHN A. JOHNSON, of the Octorara, to be Acting Volunteer Lieutenant, to date from 6th October, and ordering the English blockade-runner John Wilkinson.

Acting Master's Mate JOHN L. SMITH, of the Octorara, to the same position, for skill and vigilance in capturing the blockade-runner Mac.

Acting Ensign GUSTAVUS P. WILLIAMS to Acting Master, for gallantry in the late action.

The court-martial of which Colonel TRACY has lately acted as President, and Major Andrew Judge Advocate, which was dissolved a day or two since, has been reconvened, and is now in session again. Its officers are unchanged. The case of Colonel MCPHERSON will be the first one to come before it.

Doubts having been expressed in regard to the truth of the statement that General BURNSIDE was to be relieved from command, and return, it may be well to state that the order for the change was issued on the 16th inst., and that General BURNSIDE ordered to report to the Adjutant General in Washington.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE WAR IN EAST TENNESSEE.

GENERAL LONGSTREET crossed the Tennessee River on 14th inst. with seven brigades of his late Virginia forces, who, being inferior in numbers, fell back to Lenoir. The enemy appear to have pressed their attack during 15th and 16th. Burnside fell back to Campbell's Station, where, being outflanked, he made a stand, and repulsed under cover of his batteries, and by their well-directed fire drove the enemy back. The Confederates, however, were reinforced and harassed by the enemy, General Burnside fell back on Knoxville on the night of 16th inst.

The Washington papers of 20th inst. say for the relief of General Burnside, and the ability to hold the city until the arrival of General SHERMAN, who, since the junction of Sherman's with Thomas's force, has ample means at his disposal for so doing. Burnside has notified the people of Knoxville that he intends to hold the place.

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.

There is no change in the Army of the Potomac. The different corps occupy the same positions which they did ten days ago. They are working like beavers on their defenses at the Rapidan. Meade's troops are in splendid health and spirits. On 26th inst. Sedgwick made a dash on a party of our cavalry near Bealton Station on Flin, and carried off three commissary wagons. They were rescued as far as Thoroughfare Gap, and five of these wagons were brought into the lines of the Army of the Potomac which are not yet confirmed.

ON THE RIO GRANDE.

The occupation of Brownsville, Texas, which is now held by General BANKS, appears to have been dictated by some very urgent reasons. An attempt to revolutionize the district of Tamaulipas, which includes Matamoras and the mouth of the Rio Grande, by the Mexican chief Cortinas, was handing it over to the French, was frustrated by the prompt movement of General BANKS. The expedition of Union troops drove General Cobos, the ally of Miramon, from Matamoras. The latter, however, he fell into the hands of Cortinas, who defeated him, and shot him as a traitor. These revolutionary events took week on the Mexican frontier of the Rio Grande in the regular Mexican fashion; but the position which General Banks now occupies secures to the United States the port of Matamoras without bloodshed. The fall of Brownsville and the capture of the Tamaulipas country had been handed over to Banks.

CHARLESTON.

The sea-wall of Fort Sumter is entirely destroyed, and the rebels are constructing bomb-proofs within and on the parapet. The fire on the fort was steady for several dates. During the night of 23d the Monitor Lehigh, while on picket duty off Sumter, got aground. Daylight discovered her position to the enemy, who at once began a furious fire upon her, which was returned by Sumter and Island. Three other Monitors—the Montauk, Patapsco, and Nahant—came to her assistance, and got her off without Dahlgren. The Admiral boarded the Nahant, and called Commodore Rodgers to a harvest by the side of Du. Of the number who offered themselves, the surgeon and two soldiers were selected. Rodgers dressed on their approach, also under a tremendous fire. After three attempts they succeeded in getting a line to the Lehigh, and by the assistance of this the Nahant towed her off. Admiral DUPONT speaks in the highest terms of the coolness and gallantry of petty officers. Commander Bryson, of the Lehigh, and the petty officer, Johnson, of the Nahant, were both wounded.

CARE FOR THE PRISONERS AT RICHMOND.

Large quantities of provisions and medical stores have been sent to Richmond for the use of our prisoners, and no anxiety need be entertained as regards their condition so far as the rebel Government can relieve the necessities of the supplies among them. There has been some delay in the delivery of the stores, owing to the unwillingness from City Point to the rebel capital; but this difficulty we are assured has been overcome.

HOW MANY PRISONERS HAVE WE?

It is stated semi-officially from Washington that we have thirty-four thousand rebel prisoners in our possession.

A KNAVE PUNISHED.

John K. Stettler, in violation of honesty and his sworn obligations as a clerk in the Post-office Department at his office, undertook to make a fortune at the cost of private letters. Instead of forfeiting a large amount of the compound, which would neither stand the test of human conscience nor the scrutiny of the clearest analysis. The Government, upon the discovery of the shameful knavery, ordered the latter to be arrested, and the case being been submitted to the summary arbitrament of a court-martial, he was sentenced to be sent to the prisoner to five years' imprisonment at Albany, New York.

ELECTION IN DELAWARE.

Nathaniel B. Smithers, Democrat, of Dover, has been elected to Congress by the State of Delaware. All passed off quietly. The Democratic majority is reported at 1,200. That little Delaware takes her place in the line of Loyal States.

NEGROES IN SERVICE.

There have been, up to the present time, forty thousand negroes armed and entered into the service of the Government.

SOUTHERN PRICES.

Southern papers say that 1863 is not considered too high a price for a barrel of flour which sold for $16 in 1861 and $150: while coal beats our famine prices, two tons selling for $1,000.

MR. BUCHER AT HOME.

On Sunday evening, 22d inst., Rev. Ward Beecher preached his first sermon since his return from Europe in his church. The occasion was filled to overflow, and even further than the speaker's voice could be heard, were crowded with people who could not obtain seats. An hour for services to begin were obliged to go away, unable to obtain admission.

DESERTERS FROM BRAGG'S ARMY.

We learn from Chattanoogs that deserters from the rebel army are now more numerous than at any time since the expulsion of Bragg from Middle Tennessee. The demoralization in the rebel ranks appears to be the ultimate, General Grant's troops are in splendid spirits. Reinforcements from the Potomac army are in readiness that was expected, and it is said on good authority that not less than 30,000 men of the entire force will re-enter the army for the new term.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

A SPEECH BY LORD PALMERSTON.

LORD LYONS and Admiral Dundas made a speech at Mayor's banquet, in the course of which he asserted that England had maintained her neutrality in the war, and felt the belief that it would have been in vain. Enclosed insults will be suffered, but strictly neutral. Mr. Phillips, a leading supporter of the Cabinet, made a speech in behalf of the Federal Government.

THE PIRATE "ALEXANDRA."

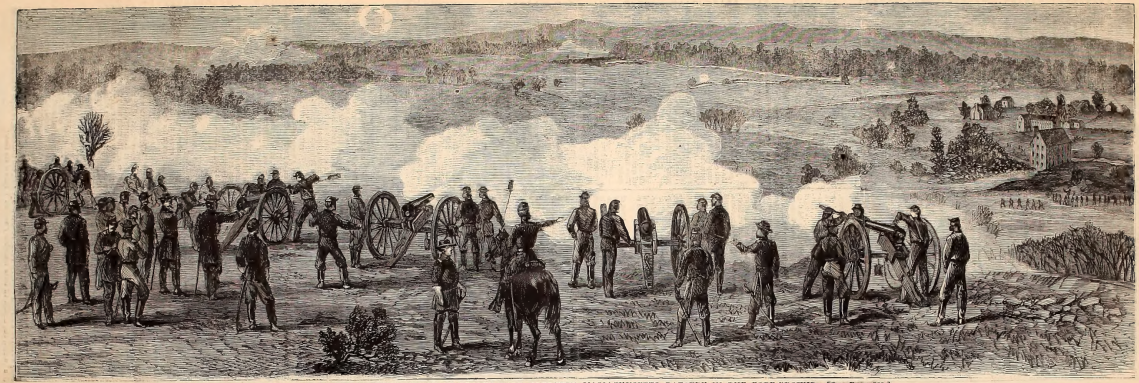
The Attorney-General, on November 5, applied to the Court of Exchequer for a new trial in the case of the Alexandra case. He asked for it on the ground of misdirection, or, at least, misconception of the evidence of the Judge, and that the verdict was against the weight of the evidence. It was ordered that the case should before the argument that the bill of exceptions should be abandoned, that the judge's remarks to the jury in the direction be received, and that no appeal should be made from the decision of the court except on the bill of exceptions. The Attorney-General accepted these conditions, and the case stood for a rule being granted. The court has needed to the application.

FRANCE.

THE PROPOSED CONGRESS.

Napoleon's proposed European Congress absorbed universal attention, and it was supposed that it would be generally held in Paris. Fifteen Powers have been invited to participate in the deliberations.

AUSTRIA.

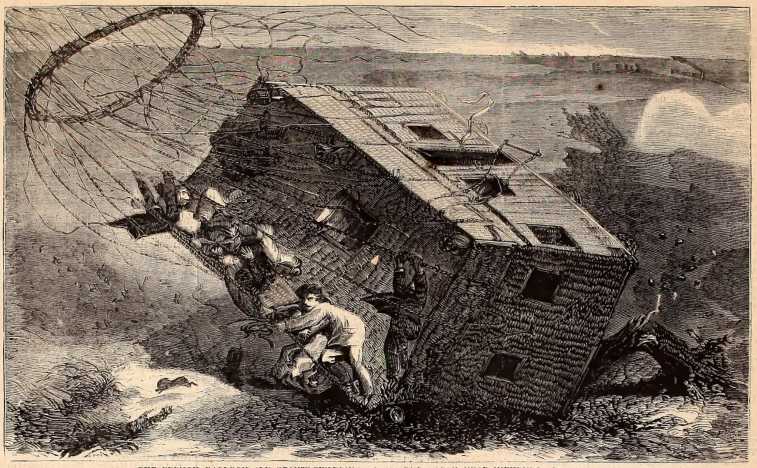


MAXIMILIAN ON HIS TRAVELS.

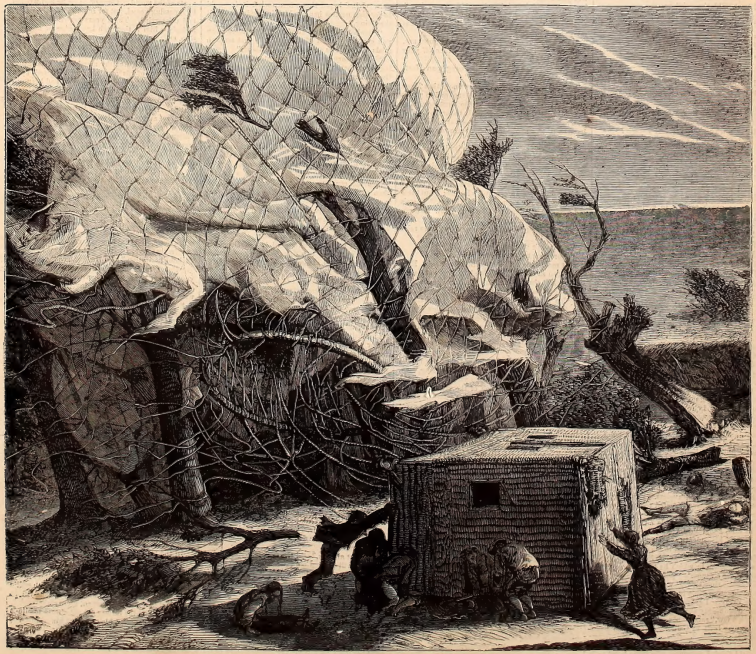
The Emperor-elect of Mexico will set out for Mexico City about February, 1864. Two Austrian war vessels have been ordered to Trieste, to be in readiness, and it was supposed they were to convey Maximilian, the Archduchess Charlotte, and their suite to their future dominions. The Archduke is to retain his former command of the Austrian navy by way of a farewell.

GREECE.

THE NEW KING.



The young King of the Greeks immediately on arriving in his new capital issued a proclamation. He declares that he brings no special ability and no trained intelligence to the task of governing the country, but that he has a conscience, and that he will endeavor to surround himself with the best advisers entirely irrespective of parties, and that he will strictly observe the Constitution. He then seated, and thus setting, he hope to make Greece "the model State of the East."



THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC—FIGHT AT KELLY'S FORD, SLEEPER'S MASSACHUSETTS BATTERY IN THE FORE-GROUND.—[See Page 780.]

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC—CHARGE OF GENERAL WARD'S TROOPS THROUGH KELLY'S FORD UPON THE REBEL RIFLE-PITS.—Sketched by A. R. Waud.—[See Page 780.]

THE FRENCH BALLOON "LE GEANT" SWEEPING ALONG THE EARTH NEAR NIENBURG.—[SEE PAGE 774.]

THE BALLOON CAUGHT IN A FOREST—ATTEMPTS OF THE AERONAUTS TO ESCAPE.—[SEE PAGE 774.]

THE FRENCH BALLOON "LE GEANT."

We devote page 773 to illustrations of the recent perilous balloon adventure of M. Nadar, the French aeronaut, who has made himself famous by his ascents in his balloon Le Géant. He had already made a voyage of several hundred miles in his balloon, and landed his party, consisting of twelve men and one lady—the Princess de la Tour d'Auvergne—safely in Germany. On this latter occasion he was accompanied by several gentlemen, and his wife, Madame Nadar. While crossing the line into Germany, at an altitude of 1000 yards, a storm struck the balloon and drove it forward at the rate of 200 miles an hour. The aeronauts tried to descend, but the balloon's course could not be checked. It knocked down chimneys, trees, what ever it encountered in its headlong course, and it seemed certain that death would be the fate of the intrepid voyagers. Sometimes it struck the ground, then, springing upward, it would rise into the clouds, with the utmost velocity of a rocket, dashing its occupants from side to side with fearful force. At length, near Newburg in Hanover, the gas had escaped sufficiently to enable the travelers to grapple some trees in a forest against which their vehicle had been driven. Every one, with the exception of some violent flapping from side to side, it remained stationary long enough to let the travelers descend by means of the cordage. During the process the car upset, and caught Madame Nadar under one of its edges. She was with difficulty rescued from this perilous situation, and the wounded, almost crippled travelers, were at length enabled to go home—wiser and sorer people.

We all remember the balloon mania in this country—the ascents of Wise, Lamountain, and others; and just now are not inclined to further experiments in that line.

I'D LIKE TO AID THE SOLDIERS.

I'd like to aid the soldiers,
Yes, I'd like to knit and sew—
But in the army's rank and file
There's nobody I know,
There's nobody I know;
For Willie Warner got exempt,
And Peter wouldn't go.

I'd like to aid the soldiers,
But I have no time at all;
For what is left of other things
Is to economize small—
'Tis too exceeding small
To do the soldiers any good,
And then—I want it all.

I'd like to aid the soldiers,
But there's nothing I can spare;
I've things that might make dressing-gowns.
But nothing I can't wear,
So—nothing I can't wear;
And pray what could I fret myself?
I have nobody there.

I'd like to aid the soldiers,
But my purse is very lean;
And with all my furbelows to buy—
You'd know what I mean,
You'd know just what I mean;
It costs so much to live in style,
And dress can be seen.

I'd like to aid the soldiers,
If I could as well as not;
And I'm willing every body else
Should give them all they've got—
Yes, give them all they've got;
And I'd send them my good wishes—
'Tis really all I ought.

FARMER HAYDEN'S THANKS-GIVING-DAY.

THE cars stopped at a little station on the Vermont Central Railroad. Twenty or more persons stepped out upon the platform, and proceeded to fill the single omnibus drawn up just behind the depôt. As the latter was the only building in sight, the road to it winding among forest trees that stretched their great limbs, despoiled of summer foliage, so as in some instances to form an arch over the narrow avenue, it was only natural to wonder how the depôt came to be located in such an out-of-the-way place. On this point it on only to say that railroad corporations are occasionally guilty of little eccentricities, and like to accommodate the public in their own way.

Among the twenty odd passengers there was one who stood apart from the rest—a stout, sun-burnt young man—who appeared to have no acquaintance among the fellow-travelers. Occasionally a glance of curiosity was directed toward him, but no one seemed to know him.

"I think I'll get up and ride on the seat with you," he said, addressing Abner, the driver.

"All right, Sir—plenty of room," was the reply. The young man mounted to his elevated seat.

"Ever been this way before?" asked Abner, with a side-glance at which he took a mental inventory of the stranger's "points."

"Yes, some time since," was the brief reply.

"Know many people in Carleton?"

"Not many. I suppose there have been some changes within—say the last half-dozen years."

"Well, a few," said Abner, reflectively. "Sam Hastings has been to California and come home with a pile of money."

"Indeed!" commented the young man, indifferently. "I think I remember him. He lived near Farmer Hayden's, didn't he?"

"Yes; and speaking of changes, there's been changes in that family."

"Eh?" said the young man, sharply. Then, in a more moderate tone, "What changes do you refer to?

"Well, he's lost his property, for one thing."

"Doesn't he still live on the farm?" demanded the passenger, hastily.

"Yes; but he don't like to live on it long."

"How is that?"

"Oh, it's a long story, but the upshot of it is that he signed for his brother-in-law and had to pay. So he was obliged to mortgage the farm. Sam Hastings came home from California with plenty of cash, and came forward very generously, as every body thought, and offered to lend the money on mortgage, provided he let it stand as long as Farmer Hayden liked. His offer was very thankfully accepted. A little while after Sam began to pay attentions to Mary Hayden—the sweetest girl in all Carleton, as every body knows."

"How did Mary—I mean Miss Hayden—receive his attentions?" asked the young man.

"She would not receive them at all. She never liked Sam, and though she didn't say so outright, she gave him to understand it in plenty of other ways."

"How did he take it?"

"Badly enough. If you ever knew Sam, you know he's got plenty of 'grit:' and he no sooner found that Mary wouldn't have any thing to say to him than he made up his mind that she should not had an advantage over her in the hold he had upon her father."

"I see there any particular reason for Miss Hayden's not liking young Hastings?"

"I surmise there was, though I'm not sure. You see there used to be a young man in Carleton that she took a notion to."

"Indeed!"

"His name was John Patten. I remember him as a bright boy, but full of mischief. He used to help Farmer Hayden on the farm. I guess he never liked farming; and one day he packed up his things and left the village, saying that he was going to sea. I don't think he's been heard of since. Most likely he got shipwrecked on some foreign coast and lost his life."

"And that reason have you for thinking that Miss Hayden liked him?"

"She was about sixteen when he went off; he about two years older. Let me see—it must be five years ago. After he left she seemed sort of lonely, and I took it for granted that was the reason."

"She hasn't heard from him during that time," repeated the young man, in a low tone—"that is strange?"

"She may have heard from him, but I guess not. Look out for that limb, Sir, or it'll take off your hat!"

"You were speaking of this young man Hastings—how he took her coldness."

"Oh ave. Well, he no sooner found that Mary would not marry him than he determined to persecute her father by foreclosing the mortgage. To make it worse, he means to do it to-morrow—that is, Thanksgiving-day. So unless Farmer Hayden has the money ready for him to-morrow he must leave the farm."

"Isn't there any one willing to lend the amount to an old man," exclaimed the passenger, indignantly, "and thus aid in frustrating this scoundrel's knavery?"

"Well, there's many that would like to do it," I said the driver, whipping up his horses; "but there isn't much money to spare in our village. There's old Slack is able enough, but you know he's nothing but a miser."

"Then Farmer Hayden has been unable to raise this money?"

"He hadn't this morning."

"How does he bear it?"

"It makes the old man sorrowful enough. He's even been so far as to implore Hastings to be merciful. But the man stood out like a flint. Says it will be a sad day for the whole village when the Hayden farm falls into his hands. Then, you see, Sir! That's the spire of the orthodox church rising above the trees. Where will you stop?"

I shall stop at the tavern. I feel quite interested in your story. So the mortgage is to be foreclosed to-morrow?"

"Yes, Sir."

With a flourish of his whip Abner drew up the team in front of the tavern. It was a long, two-story building, with a piazza extending along the front. Half the population of the village seemed to be standing in the street, among the latter those whose regular arrival with the mail was the great event of the day. The near approach of Thanksgiving, with its accompanying sports, made the assemblage to-night larger than usual.

Abner took the mail-bag from a nest of trunks and bandboxes on the top of the stage, and dropped it into the hands of a small boy who was waiting to receive it. The passengers, cramped by their ride, got out and stretched their limbs. Hearty greetings were exchanged with friends who were present to meet them. Trunks and bandboxes were transferred to waiting carriages; and one party after another disappeared to find a hospitable welcome in some another of the neat but unpretending dwellings of Carleton.

But for the young man in whom we feel the greatest interest there was no welcome. He had his luggage conveyed to a quiet chamber in the tavern, and after a short interval came down to supper. He said little, and dropped out of the business which called him to Carleton at a season when most persons like to spend among friends and relatives.

Three quarters of a mile from the tavern was the Hayden farm. It comprised about fifty acres, a part only being arable land. The wants of the occupants being few and simple, Farmer Hayden had been able to make a comfortable living from it till compelled to raise money on mortgage. Though fifteen hundred dollars may seem a small sum to many the interest was felt as a heavy burden by the farmer, and compelled him to the closest economy. As for laying up money to pay it off that was out of the question. But he had hoped that something might turn up to enable him to retain possession of the homestead in which he and his father before him had first opened their eyes to the light.

It was a sorrowful group that gathered about the fireside on the family room on Thanksgiving-eve. Farmer Hayden sat in a straight-backed chair deep in thought, his eyes fixed mournfully upon the logs that crackled in the wide fire-place. He was a tall man of sixty, but so bowed with a life of labor that he looked older. His hair had whitened rapidly since his troubles commenced, and this too added to his apparent age. At the opposite side of the hearth sat his wife, gentle Martha Hayden, with her mild benevolent face. To-night, indeed, a shadow reflected from her husband's face dimmed the light that beamed from her serious eyes. She was "toeing off" a stocking for her husband, but it was easy to see that her knitting was mechanical, and her heart was not in her work.

Mary Hayden sat at the white deal table that stood in the centre of the room, with her head resting upon her hand. She too was occupied with sorrowful thoughts. She was a trim comely maiden with a clear complexion and cheeks like a peach. There was not a rustic bean within ten miles that did not admire her fresh beauty, and would not have accounted himself a fortunate man had her choice fallen upon him.

None of the trio seemed inclined to speak. At length Farmer Hayden lifted up his head wearily, and said, "This will be a sad Thanksgiving-day for us, Martha."

"Sad indeed, Benjamin," returned the wife; "I can hardly realize that this is the last day we are to spend in the old house."

"I've lived in it more and boy sixty-one years come next August," said the farmer, meditatively. "We were very happy here till—till the trouble came."

"It's the Lord's will, Benjamin; we must try to receive it with submissive hearts."

"Yes, Martha, I know it will be a hard trial. Thirty-two years ago I brought you here. Here all our children have been born. Here, too, they have all died—all but Mary."

The girl at the table sobbed convulsively.

"No other place will seem like home to us. In our old age we must undergo the many ties that bind us to the dear old homestead, and go forth as strangers. But it is well for us when we left it, it won't be for that narrow house which is appointed for all the living."

"Don't think of it, Benjamin, any more than you can help," said Martha. "He that sendeth trials will send us strength to bear them."

Slowly Mary rose from her seat, and approaching her father, said, with an uncertain voice, "Father, till to-night I did not know how hard it would be to leave you. Perhaps I have no right to exact such a sacrifice from you. All the memories of a lifetime cluster for you beneath this roof. Ought I to pluck them up, and send forth homeless into the cold world those who from my infancy have sheltered and cherished me?"

"What do you mean, Mary?" asked Farmer Hayden, lifting his head quickly and bending a questioning look upon his daughter.

Mary paused a moment to recover resolution. "I mean this, father, that if Mr. Hastings will not forego his claim—will not, on any other condition than that I become his wife, I am ready to consent."

The temptation was a strong one. For a moment reviving hope lighted up the old man's eye, and for a moment only.

"No, Mary, not with my consent. Better that we wander homeless but united in affection than that you sac rifice your self to us. The thought that you had sacrificed yourself to him would embitter my existence. No, much as I value the old homestead, let it go. I can't keep my child."

He was not a demonstrative man. It is the New England fashion to keep the impulses of family affection under strict control. Time it is only when a great joy or a great sorrow throws down the barriers of custom that we have revealed all in its intensity the deep affection which lies concealed under a reserved exterior. Farmer Hayden had never offered to kiss his daughter since she was on an age to sit on his knee, but to-night a great affection unsealed the fountains of his love, and he opened his arms, with a low cry Mary sprang into his embrace, and leaning her head against his shoulder, gave vent to her tears. But not for long. They were interrupted by a loud summons struck by the old-fashioned knocker, which for many a year had hung, a formidable appendage, upon the outer door.

The farmer gently put Mary away, and, rising, took the lamp from the mantel-shelf, and with one hand lest a current of air should extinguish it, walked to the front door. When it was opened he was somewhat surprised at seeing a stranger. In obedience to the dictates of politeness he invited him in. As the room was a fire only in the family room, he at once led him into the presence of his wife and daughter. These he introduced simply. The visitor said—

"I am afraid, Mr. Hayden," he said, turning toward the farmer, "I you must look upon my visit as an intrusion."

"Not at all, Sir," said the farmer, politely.

"You will pardon me for asking—I have only reached the village this evening—whether it is true, as I have heard, that you are about to be ejected from the farm which you have so long occupied?"

"I have lived here always, Sir. Yes, it is unhappily true. This is the last night we shall pass in the old house."

"And where shall you go?"

"I—to be sure not made our arrangements. A neighbor has kindly offered to accommodate us for a few days till we have time to look around a little. It was come upon us all very suddenly, so that we are hardly determined upon our plans for the future."

"It must be a great grief to you all. Is there no way of averting this calamity?"

"None. None, at least, that is practicable."

"It is the foreclosure of a mortgage, is it not? May I ask for what amount?"

"For fifteen hundred dollars. Besides this there is accrued interest to the amount of forty-five dollars."

"And for the lack of this you are to be ejected? Have you no friend who will lend you the money?"

"There are many who have the will, but not the power. We country farmers do not often have much money, Sir."

"I think I have come to your rescue. Mr. Hayden, you need be under no further concern about this matter. I will lend you the money to cancel the mortgage, and you will remain, for many years I trust, in possession of the old Hayden farm."

Mrs. Hayden and Mary fixed their eyes in grateful surprise on the visitor. The farmer hardly credit his ears.

"Do I understand you?" he said, slowly. "Do you mean that you will lend me the money to redeem my farm?"

"I will, Mr. Hayden," said the young man, quietly. "I have the money with me; and if you will be good enough to write a note for the amount, I will place it in your hands at once."

Farmer Hayden rose and grasped the stranger's hand. "How can I thank you sufficiently?" he said, in a tone tremulous with deep emotion. "You have given me new life and hope. How could I expect such kindness from an utter stranger?"

"Am I an utter stranger?" asked the young man, fixing his eyes upon the farmer's face. "Have you wholly forgotten the boy who for three years worked at your side and ate at your table?"

Mary started, half rising, looked eagerly at the visitor's face. The old man drew him hastily into the full light. "Yes, yes, it is John Patten!" he exclaimed. "Welcome home, John! I always liked you, and now I like you better than ever."

There were but few more words spoken. Farmer Hayden, heartily. Mary turned red and white by turns, and shyly drew her hand away from his fervent pressure.

"But why haven't you written to us, John?" asked Mrs. Hayden.

He briefly his story. He had embarked on board a merchant-ship, in which he visited various parts of the world. Once or twice he had written by a passing vessel, but for some reason the letters had miscarried. Three years passed in this way had given him a thorough knowledge of seamanship, but put little money into his purse. To remedy this, however, on a voyage to China he had the good fortune to be the life of an only child, the daughter of a wealthy merchant. The father, in testimony of his gratitude, had pressed upon him a large sum in money, which he had been able to refuse. He landed at New York, determined to come at once to Carleton to visit his old friends. But the rebellion had already broken out. The great and rapid enlargement of the navy created a demand for competent officers. To John Patten the path of duty was clear. He offered his services to the Government, and was at once appointed midshipman of a new gun-boat just ready for sea. Since then he had been on constant service in the blockading squadron, during which he had become entitled to a large amount of prize-money. At present injuries to the vessel to which he was attached had brought it to the Charlestown Navy-yard for repairs; and, for the first time since he entered the service, he was allowed a furlough. Here he had intended to stay only one week. As to the money which he had offered, he had twice as much more, and could spare it easily.

In that case, I will accept your generous offer without hesitation," said the farmer.

"But I must make one condition," said the young man. "You must have a good old-fashioned Thanksgiving dinner, and invite me to sit down with you."

"You shall be heartily welcome," returned the farmer. "Have you made any preparations for Thanksgiving, Martha?"

"No, Benjamin; you know we didn't expect to stay here."

"Then there is no time to be lost. Early in the morning I will ride over to the village, and get a turkey and every thing you will need."

"And the apples for the pies shall be pared to-night," said Mary, briskly.

"Right, daughter!" said the farmer, approvingly. "The time is short; but we'll have a merry Thanksgiving dinner yet. You'll stay with us to-night, John?"

"No, Mr. Hayden. I have engaged a bed at the tavern. By-the-way, when will Mr. Hastings come for his money?"

"At eleven o'clock."

"Then I should like to be within hearing. I will walk up quietly just before."

The next day was a busy one at Hayden Farm. Mrs. Hayden and Mary were up before light, engaged in those multifarious culinary preparations which Thanksgiving-day brings in its train. By noon a row of pies, crisp and tempting, stood on the dresser. A delightful odor from the turkey roasting before the fire filled the room, and the pudding in the oven was baking beautifully.

In the midst of these culinary preparations Mr. Hastings knocked at the door, and entered into the parlor, where Farmer Hayden awaited his coming. In the next room, with the door ajar, sat John Patten.

Farmer Hayden greeted his visitor with polite composure. The latter, however, seemed ill at ease, and became each moment more embarrassed, perceiving that the farmer did not choose to allude first to the business which brought him thither.

"I suppose, Mr. Hayden," he said, at last, awkwardly enough, "you know my errand."

"You come to foreclose the mortgage, and eject me from the farm."

"You are aware that this is your resolution, and not mine."

"What do you mean, Mr. Hastings?"

"You understand well enough," said the other, biting his lip. "Give me your daughter in marriage, and the mortgage shall never trouble you."

"I have no desire, even if I had the right, to force my daughter's inclinations," said the farmer, coldly.

"You mean that she do, 'like me. That is only a girl's fancy. Hasn't she considerations enough for her family to consent to the only course which will save her from ruin?"

"It is a sacrifice which I shall neither require nor accept at her hands. To be plain with you, Mr. Hastings, I do not think you would make a suitable husband for my daughter. Even if she were willing to marry you, knowing—as at present I do, I should use whatever influence I may possess with her to dissuade her from a step which I am convinced she will but rarely contemplate."

The young man turned pale to the lips with anger.

"By Heavens, Sir," he exclaimed, impetuously, "you shall rue this; you and your daughter too! I foreclose the mortgage, Mr. Hayden; and if give you warning, Sir, that if you do not leave the premises before sundown I shall call in the assistance of the law to eject you."

"So be it, Mr. Hastings," said Farmer Hayden, calmly. "I will trouble you to adhere to the law. The mortgage can not be foreclosed unless I fail to extend it."

"But that you can not do," was the quick reply.

"You are mistaken. I have the money here, and shall lose no time in severing all business relations with you."

He produced a roll of bills, and counted out the amount of the mortgage.

Samuel Hastings was speechless with surprise, anger, and mortification. "Where did you raise this money?" he asked.

"That does not concern you," said the farmer. "Is the amount correct?"

There was a curt reply, and putting the bank notes in his pocket, the fair-faced farmer withdrew. With him the shadow passed from Farmer Hayden's household. At one stroke the happy group gathered around the table laden with the substantial delicacies which no one better than a New England farmer knows how to provide. In fact, nothing words Farmer Hayden craved a blessing, and in the hearts of all there was a deep sense of gratitude to God, who had made this indeed a day worthy of thanksgiving.

Later in the day John Pattes and Mary Hayden sat before the fire alone. Her eyes were downcast, her hand, a willing captive, pressed in his. He was telling her how, during his long absence, the thought of her had been always with him, stimulating him to exertion, giving him courage in the midst of danger, that he had never given up all the hope that she would some day consent to be his, and walk hand in hand with him the journey of life, whether short or shorter in God willed; would be the happier for their joint companionship. That hope he asked her now to ratify. I can not give Mary's answer. I only know that a fortnight later, just before John Patten's furlough expired, they stood before the altar and were united, in presence of the whole village, every man, woman, and child turning out to witness the ceremony.

THE BROKEN SWORD

HER soul caught up Hope's shining shield
Against the dark assaults of Doubt;
She bade him bravely to the field
Where Death holds Glory's standard out.

She girt the good steel on his thigh,
And, "Rumor's random shafts," she said,
"Fall oft and poisoned with a lie
That strikes the unwitting heart dead.

"If you—God give me strength!—should bleed,
Yet stanch life's current ere it fall:
Send me this scabbard! I will heed
No thing, tongue, nor tale!

"If captive, in the rebel host
Some youth, heart-mated, there must be,
Who for her sake, or loved, or lost,
Will count your ransomed blade to me.

"If—if—I can not speak the word—
Pray some true comrade—at the worst—
In pity hither bear the sword;
But bid, oh! bid him break it first!"

Time sped. And Rumor still forbore
To vex her with its venomed dart;
Hope's buckler, still undimmed, she wore,
A constant Ægis, on her heart!

Till—surely 'twas a love divine
That answered her soul with daily prayer—
A soldier found her at the shrine,
And laid a broken falchion there!

"You broke the blade at his command?"
She flashed on him. "Nay, true love, not so!
'Twas shivered, in his good right hand,
Full on the forehead of his foe!"

"To the just cause I freely gave
My better life," she said, and pressed
To her pale lips the shattered glaive:
"To God I dedicate the rest!

"Yet is my mission here to do;
I hear his stricken brethren groan;
Many their pangs, their sorrows few;
Be they my bounds to the Throne?"

Soft-sowed, to wounds and death, she bears
Her Master's healing and His word;
But ever at her side she wears
For rosary, the broken sword!

A STORY OF THANKSGIVING-DAY.

THE chill November sunshine lay with mocking brightness on the velvet violets of the carpet; the wind howled sharply past the windows, as if furious that its keen touch could not blast the cream-white roses and fire-hearted geraniums whose delicate fragrance filled the room with an atmosphere of June. Without, people hurried shuddering by, with blue noses and frost-nipped fingers; within, there was summer warmth and tropic bloom.

Cecile Gore was sitting at her little papier-maché desk, writing delicate scented notes of invitation, with an apparently interminable list of names. On one side and a bronze card-receiver on the other. And Maurice Kennett was lazily scoring the cardboard with the stump of cork with which he had, during innumerable comments—that is, he was busied in this manner when he was not watching the graceful upturning of curls on the white neck and the blue, down-dropping eyes, and the pretty hand with the diamond betrothal-ring upon its forefinger. Don't blame Major Maurice Kennett for being a little careless about the cards, and knocking over the alabaster inkstand with a real old-fashioned festival of it; just such as his grandfather used to have!

"Dear, before pleasure, ears mia!" responds the Major, lifting his black eyebrows. "My Thanksgiving is usually invisible to the naked eye, a mere Spencer Dyatt—aren't you going to ask him?"

"Nonsense!—no."

"Why not? I'm sure he'd like to come."

"Very possibly," said Cecile, biting a little yawn behind the diamond ring. "But he always stays an hour after he has waltzes, and on their dresses when he don't waltz."

"Poor fellow! And so he is to be excluded from everything that annoys him?"

"From my parties—yes!" laughed Cecile. "Don't look disconsolate, Maurice, I'll give it to me."

"You are not going to invite Spencer Dyatt?"

"Certainly. Why not?"

Maurice Kennett rose with a disturbed countenance, and looked gravely down at Cecile's bright face.

"I had rather you wouldn't, Cecile!"

"How ridiculous, Maurice, when Mr. Verde goes in the best society!"

"Mr. Verde is the best society then. But if you remember, Cecile, this is not the first time I have spoken to you on the subject."

"I shall invite and dance with Spencer Dyatt," said Cecile, coldly and emphatically.

"I do remember, Major Kennett, that you have attempted to control my every action, and soon not, receive at my house. It is useless. Mr. Verde is a general favorite, and I shall ask him to this party. Give me the pen, if you please."

But Kennett still withheld it.

"Cecile, he is not a man with whom I would wish either wife or sister to be brought into social contact."

"I am not your sister, Sir, nor am I sure that I shall ever be your wife if this is a foretaste of the authority you intend to exercise over me."

The fiery crimson mounted to Kennett's brow; he bit his lip, and strove to control himself.

"Cecile, my dearest, do not let us quarrel over such a mere trifle as this."

"It is no trifle to find myself subject to such galling control as this. You have no right, Major Kennett, to act thus."

"I do not wish to be and myself subject to such galling control as this. You have no right, Major Kennett, to act thus."

He held out his hand to her—a hand cold as ice.

"Good-by, Cecile; it has been a pleasant dream, but it is ended now."

"Good-by, Major Kennett."

And so they parted. The two young lovers, standing in the stormy gold of the November sunbeams with the wind whistling a voiceless reproach, and the draught of unshut doors growing at their hearts.

Major Maurice Kennett's regiment marched that night, and when Cecile, tossing on her restless couch, heard the steam-shriek of the "midnight express," and knew it was bearing him away, she wept the bitterest tears that perhaps had ever dimmed the eyes Maurice had likened to blue forget-me-nots. Poor little forget-me-nots! it was a chill rain and a sad; poor little blue blooms!

Sleep! she could not sleep, and when the morning of Thanksgiving penciled the east with gold she rose up, heavy-eyed and silent. She had heard of broken hearts—could it be that she was wayward, willful, yet loving heart was breaking?

"I say, Cecy, there's such a turkey down stairs! splendid fat! Master Alexander Gore confidentially called.

"Alec" Gore, rushing into the room like a small whirlwind, as Cecile sat by the register with an unopened letter in her hand. "It's all a follow can do to lift him! Ain't he stuffed nicely, though? and ain't Hannah crosser than two sticks? There's some tall currant jelly, too, and I just took a pop into the oven when cook's back was turned. Such pies! and a pudding, big enough to get into, like Sir Sonckody What'shimass in English history, you know. What a jolly old cove papa's grandfather must have been if he kept Thanksgiving this way every year!"

"Alexander!" reproved Mrs. Gore, trying not to smile.

"Well, it's a fact, mother. Who's coming to dinner? Aunt Hannah and the two old sixty? If that ain't a shame! Oh! look here!" exclaimed Alec, rushing precipitately from one subject to another, "I've just come from down town, and every body's talking about the great accident!"

"What accident?—Alexander, I wish you would learn not to crack nuts with your teeth."

"Women never hear any thing," said Alec, patronizingly, aiming a nut-shell at the canary bird's cage. "Why the railroad accident, to be sure. Express train knocked into smash, locomotive, tender, baggage, and nobody to blame. And there was a regiment of soldiers on board, too, all killed. 'Frightful loss of life!' the bulletin says, four—"

Alec checked himself suddenly, for a low cry had burst from his mother's white lips; she sprung to her feet with wild, fixed eyes, and a cheek paler than the carved marble of the mantle against which it leaned.

"Killed!" she repeated, in strangely syllabled tones—"killed! O God! and I live on!"

Alexander whispered, in awe-stricken accents, as Mrs. Gore leaned over her daughter—prostrate there, pallid with soft womanly offices—was that Maurice's regiment? Is Cecy dead?"

She has only fainted, my son—she will be better soon. Run for your father, Alec, and ask him to hasten down to the telegraph office, and learn what particulars have transpired. Perhaps there is some mistake. Run, my poor, poor child!"

"Leave me alone a little while, mother," said Cecile, sadly, an hour or two later in the day. "Perhaps I can pray for dear mamma, only—"

Her head sank on her hands. Mrs. Gore knew that solitude is sometimes the best medicine for a sick heart, and left her with her hand lovingly on Cecile's fair curls, and quietly stole out of the room.

Alone—alone with the dim twilight and her own sorrowful fancies! Was it strange that Cecile Gore felt as if life were a burden too great for endurance?

"Dead!" she murmured, gazing into the dusk with dilated, expressionless eyes. "And I shall never see him again to ask for his victim! How many years must I live through before I meet him in that other world whose shores we know not of? How many sad seasons must I count before I can tell him how dearly I loved him, even when I was most willful and cruel? O, memory! if I could shadow your keen pangs! I should go mad if I thought over that parting again!"

So Cecile mused on. She had yet to learn how heavy a burden the heart will bear ere Reason quits its throne, and mercifully shuts out the past.

Like a blessing from the starry darkness of the Thanksgiving-night came down over the freezing world.

"Where is she? where is Cecile?"

She clasped her hands over her heart with a low, wailing sob as the words fell on her ear.

"I shall die, mother, I shall die!" was the voice—as it used to sound. I shall dream he is with me once more. Give me time—his voice—he is dead. 'Tis not his footstep on the stairs; it is only the once phantasy of my over-tired brain. He is dead. He has found his reward in Heaven. I am left to—to—"

The door opened. Instinctively she raised her heavy eyes.

Twilight—darkness—what were they to her? Would she not have known him if the shadows of Styx rolled between? Would she not have recognized the flash of his eyes through the blackness of eternal midnight? She could not speak; she could not stir nor put her aside from arms and sob out strange inarticulate sounds, like a babe washed from some frightful dream.

"So—so—you are not dead, Cecile? Poor little Cecile!" murmured Maurice, folding her to his breast as if she had indeed been a babe. "Oh, my love, God is kinder than we deserve. Let us never set His mercy at defiance again. Yes," he said, answering the mute question of her eyes, "there was a mistake, and some of our men were hurt, and as we can not go on until to-night I came back for the kiss I was too proud to take yesterday. Are we true lovers now, darling?"

Yes—once more and forever!

"It's a mercy the dinner isn't spoiled, waiting for you lazy people!" quoth Master Alec, with one eye directed reproachfully at Major Kennett and Cecile, and the other riveted upon the turkey, whose brown sides rose, a mountain of unctuous delight, from the centre of the festive board. "I say, father, I'll take a big slice of the breast, if you please, and a bit of the drumstick!"

"I think it is, Alec," replied Kennett.

Cecile, shyly radiant at her lover's side, looked down on the dark wonder of his eyes and thought that her Thanksgiving would last forever.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

SARCASTIC.—Young ——, son of Her Majesty's printer, who has the patent for printing Bibles in England, went to Russia lately in Edinburgh, her accredited agent, turned up with gold lace. This gay attire attracted universal attention. At one court ball Lady Westmorland said to him: "It's only young Bible," replied her Ladyship, "bound in red and gilt, but not lettered."

QUESTION IN CHORNETT.—Given, a riverse as a base, what figure does a fisherman's rod and line form in conjunction with the Man-of-Straw? Indefinitely.

THE BEST PROOF FOR FURNISHING LOVE.—Kate was talking glowingly about "love-apples." "That's strange!" exclaimed Uncle Jack, her accepted lover. "Why should I love be associated with apples? On the contrary, I always thought that love was to pare." Kate smiled approvingly.

"In short, ladies and gentlemen," said a speaker, in a hoarse voice, and perceptible fruity, "I can only say that I wish I had a window in my breast, that you might see the emotions of my heart." "The newspaper printed the speech leaving the "n" out of "window."

What is the principal difference between the smaller and the larger oyster? The fact that two small oysters does not make a summer," but one can can make a spring.

An old lady looking at the curiosities in a museum, was shown a couple of large skulls, and after gazing at them with wonder, inquired of a wag, who stood near, if they were human. "No, Madam," replied he, "not now; their bark is on the sea."

A WELL-READ SOLDIER.—Private information.

When is a widow like a star?—When it's a skylight.

What is the difference between a mischievous monkey and a beautiful young lady?—One harms the cheese, the other charms the lo'es.

"WON'T you cut open a penny for me, papa?" said a little girl, when she came home from school one day. "Cut open a penny, child! What do you mean by that?" "Why, ma'am," said the little girl, "our teacher says that the penny tests are for failings, and I want to see them."

FOND.—Said one day to Richmond. When the landlord produced the bill, Richmond thought it very moderate, and asked his house. "Pretty fair, ain't please you," replied the landlord. "Pretty fair, indeed," said Richmond, "it should be Woodcock, by the length of your bill!"

MRS. Robson, where's your husband?" "Why, he's dead, sir, and I don't wish any body to disturb him." A very considerate woman that.

"They don't me be as good mirrors as they used to," remarked an old nut, as the chestnut a woman's eye, wrinkled face, and livid complexion in a glass that she usually looked in.

A pedestrian travelling in Ireland met a man, and asked him rather gruffly why the miles were so long, when Sir Hibernian replied, "Because your Honor's legs are not in very good condition, so we give very good measure."

A famous musician, who had made his fortune by marriage, being requested to sing in company, "Permit me," said he, "to imitate the nightingale, who never sings after he has made his nest."

"Are you fond of tongue, Sir?" asked a lady. "I was always fond of tongue, Madam," was the reply, "and like it still."

What were the last words the trumpeter said when he was going to the wild bull?—"How he roars!"

MRS. Partington wants to know why captains don't have their ships properly nailed in port, instead of waiting to get them out.

It is better to be ready and not go than go and not be ready.

"Sally," said a fellow to a girl who had red hair, "keep away from me, for I am afraid I shall be in danger of this," replied Sally, "you are too green to burn!"

Two country farmers lately parading the Stock Exchange stopped to look at a specimen of the wonders of coin's wing. The gentlemen to whom these men addressed themselves asked them if they were Dollars for real estate, who, having lost their reason, imagined they were transformed into bills and notes, and acted accordingly. "Pay me," said one of the countrymen, "must we see 'em?" "No," answered the gentlemen, and, after persuading the farmers to the door, he desired them to walk in. Now, directly the door was put in their faces the first one said to the other, "Zeeus, Dicky, let us get off—those must be the sort of folks we shall have to deal with, for fear as their legs could carry them, and went home full of the notion of the mad menhouse and their Bedlam near the Change.

THE Russians in a smart engagement were gallantly assisted by Turkish fire. Firing in platoons, with one, two, numbering the guns, noticed that it was very hot. "A Turk, Sir!" said one of the men, "I'll be hanged if he don't, we'd letter stop fire' a little." "Divil a bit," replied the Turk, "I'll get the cartridges in the river where you took an' rape it cool."

A man in the habit of traveling, complaining to a friend that he had often been robbed, and was afraid of getting abroad, was advised to carry pistols with him on his journeys. "Why, I have pistols," replied the farce: "the thieves would rob me of them also!"

A new method of shop-lifting has been discovered in Paris. An elegant lady enters a store, accompanied by a nurse, carrying a baby dressed in rich embroidery. On leaving they are supposed to have taken linen, jewelry, &c., as the case may be, and are detected. An examination proves that the baby has a wax face, and a hollow body packed with, silver ware as a hiding-place for stolen articles.

A physician's horse being out of order, he sent him to the farrier to be cured, which being done, the farrier sent to pay him.—"No," said the farrier; "we doctors never take the money out of a dead horse."

WE are repeatedly told that "Love laughs at locksmiths." It is true to a limit; for there are instances on the legal record where Cupid has been taken by the locksmith, but actually taking his pick of all the wards in the trade.

SIR George Grey spoke with extraordinary volubility. On one occasion, as others his argument, he made use of a simile. "If," he said, "a portion of the fire in a kettle of gunpowder we all know there will be a dreadful explosion; but we may there a touching torch upon a turnpike-road, and the probability is that it will expire harmlessly." The incongruous simile was received with cheers, as the blazing torch on the turnpike-road; but he could not make out why the explosion of the kettle of gunpowder should be the result, but as it was all in the dark.

THE ARMY OF THE CUMBERLAND.

On page 780 we reproduce a sketch, by Mr. Davis, representing one of the most famous and popular of the army transports on the Tennessee, the Chesterman. Mr. Davis writes:

"THE STEAMER 'CHATTANOOGA' ON HER WAY UP THE TENNESSEE WITH ARMY STORES.

"HEAD-QUARTER GENERAL W. S. SMITH, BRIDGEPORT, ALABAMA.

"This little steamer was built at Bridgeport by my troops. The Michigan Engineers. I say I think, did the principal part of the work, have more like her under way, so that we all have a pet name quite a fleet on the line—under line the reba call it. The party rejoicing in the dignity of commanding the craft is Captain Arthur Edwards. This is, I think, the first boat that has been built by the soldiers for their own use, though it seems as if they had done every thing else in the Southwest.

THANKSGIVING-DAY, NOVEMBER 26. 1863.

THANKSGIVING-DAY.

THE ARMY

THE NAVY

LINCOLN

PRESIDENT-ELECT

VERY HARD CASH.

By CHARLES READE, Esq.,

AUTHOR OF "IT IS NEVER TOO LATE TO MEND," ETC.

CHAPTER XLVIII.

ALFRED HARDIE spent three days writhing in his little lodging. His stratum had been sudden, but never more irritating. By night possessor of thousands, yet in fact reduced to one suit, two shirts, and a purse a rich in intellect, yet hunted as a madman: affianced to the loveliest girl in England, yet afraid to go near her for fear of being torn from her again, and forever. All this could last but one week more; but a week, three centuries was not too little to contemplate, with a rival at his Julia's ear all the time. Suppose she should have been faithful all those months, for in this last week should be worn out and give herself to another: such things had been known. He went to Lincoln's Inn with this irritating fear tearing him like a vulture. Mr. Compton received him cheerfully, and told him he had been operations before his versus Hardie: had written to Thomas Hardie two days ago, and inquired his Lordon solicitor, and whether that gentleman would accept service of the writ in Hardie versus Hardie.

"To Thomas Hardie? Why what has he to do with it?" asked Alfred.

"He is the defendant in the suit." Then seeing amazement and incredulity on Alfred's face, he explained that the Commissioners of Lunacy had treated him with great courtesy; had at once furnished him with copies, not only of their order and certificate, but of other valuable documents. "And there," said he, "lies the order; signed by Thomas Hardie, of Clare Court, Yorkshire."

"Curse his impudence," cried Alfred, in a fury: "why, Sir, he is next door to an idiot himself."

"What does that matter? Ah, now, if I had gone in a sane and indicted him, there would be a defense directly; no malice, defendant being non compos. Whereas, by your own showing, using him, even if he was a lunatic we would make him or his estate pay a round sum for falsely imprisoning a fellow-fiction. By-the-by, here is counsel's opinion on your case," and he handed him a short opinion of a distinguished Queen's Counsel, the concluding words of which were these:

3. If the certificates and order are in legal form, you have made out a primâ facie case: no action lies for the capture or detention of Mr. Hardie.

"Why is he dead against me," said Alfred. "There goes the one rotten reed you had left me."

"Singularly dead," said the attorney, coolly: "he does not even say 'I am of opinion.' He is in great practice, and hard-worked: has no time; no, thank you; our rights are sometimes older, and more respectable, by good bulk, the statutes of the realm are silent; now they are all silent about incarcerating sane men. Besides, he gives no reason. What is an opinion without a precedent? a lawyer's guess. I thought so little of his opinion that I sent the case to a clever junior who has got time to think before he writes." Colls entered soon after with the said junior's opinion. Mr. Compton opened it, and saying, "I hope he was wide awake," read it to Alfred. It ran thus:

"There can be no right of action under the common law: and it has been exercised. Anderdon v. Brothers; Futernoster v. Futernoster, &c. Such a right can only be annulled by the express terms of a statute: now the 8 and 9 Victoria, cap. 100, sect. 99, so annuls it, as against the madhouse keeper only. That, therefore, is the statutory exception, and tends to confirm the common right. If the facts are as represented (and, of course, I can form no opinion), Mr. Hardie can safely sue the person who signed the order for his alleged false imprisonment.

"I agree with you that the usual course by proving the fact of Chancery for a Commission de Lunatico Inquirendo is timorous, and resting on prejudice. Pit, if successful, is saddled with his costs, and is sometimes with Bill to set aside obtains no compensation. It seems clear that a jury sitting at Nisi Prius can deal as well with the main fact as can a jury sitting by the order of the Chancellor: and I need not say the costs will go with the verdict. So any question of the damages, which may be heavy. On the other hand, an indictment is hazardous; and I think you can see that by beginning at the end. By having a short-hand writer at the trial, you may collect materials for an indictment, and also feel the pulse of the court; you can then confer upon the evidence with some counsel better versed in criminal law than myself. My advice is to sue Thomas Hardie: and declare in Tort.

(Signed) "BARROW.

"N.B.—I have been thus particular, because Hardie v. Hardie (if carried to a verdict) will probably be a leading case."

"Who shall decide when counsel disagree?" inquired Alfred, satirically.

"That depends on where they do it. If in court, the judge. If here, the attorney."

"You appear sanguine, Mr. Compton," said Alfred: "perhaps you would not mind advancing me a little money. I've only a half a crown."

"It is all ready for you in this drawer," said Compton, cheerfully. "See, thirty sovereigns. Then you must not go to a bank."

"What, you thought I should borrow?"

"Don't all my clients begin by begging me? It is the rule of this office."

"Then why don't you give up business?"

"Because I don't: the opposite system's clint a little more than my own bleeds me."

He then made Alfred sign a promissory note for the thirty pounds: advised him to keep away for one week more, and promised to write to him in two days, and send Thomas Hardie's answer. Alfred left his address, and went from Mr. Compton a lighter man. Convinced of his courage and patience, he almost began to share his own shoulders: and thought of love alone.

But, strange as it may appear, two cares are sometimes better for a man than one. Alfred, having now no worry to divert him from his deeper anxiety, was all love and jealousy; and quite overrated the power he had left Julia: that was so strong it overpowered alike his patience and his prudence. He jumped into a cab, and drove to all the fireworks shops on the north side of the river, inquiring for Edward. At last he hit upon the right one, and found Edward in full play in Pembroke Street: number unknown. He drove home to his lodgings: sought some ready-made clothes: and dressed himself: then proceeded the cabman to drive to Pembroke Street. He knew he was acting imprudently; but he could not help it. Mr. Mr. Compton had now written to his uncle, and begun the attack: that would surely intimidate his enemies, and turn their thoughts to the defense, not to fresh offense. However, catching sight of a gunsmith's shop on the way, he suddenly resolved to arm himself. Edward on the back of an attack. He stopped the cab: went in and bought a double-barreled gun, with powder-flask, bullets, wads, and caps, complete. This he loaded in the cab, and felt quite prudent after it. The prudence of youth.

He paid off the cab in Pembroke Street, and set about the task of discovering Julia. He inquired at several houses. No answer successful. Then he walked slowly all down the street, looking up at all the windows. And I think, had not Julia been there before, he might have seen her, or she him; she was so often at the window to and fro. Yet then she had company to keep her in order.

He was unlucky in another respect. Edward came out of the house at the other end, where he himself was going down it not so very many yards off. If Alfred's face had only been turned the other way he would have seen Edward, and all would have gone differently.

The stoutest hearts have their moments of weakness and fear. Few things are more certain, and less realized by ordinary men, than this: from Falsey Fighting which Roomed to Layard disinheriting a city, not a thing is so.

Unable to find Julia in the very street she inhabited, Alfred began to fear. He said to himself, "If I find her, I shall perhaps wish I had never sought her."

In his hour of gloom this stern reason would be heard, and asked him whether all Mrs. Archbold had said could be pure invention. It was not inconsistent with that was too unlikely. Then he felt so sick at heart he was half minded to turn and fly from it. There was now a large yard close by him, entered by a broad and lofty gateway cut through one of the houses. The yard belonged to a wine-vault. There were empty wagons were there, but no men visible, being their dinner-time. Alfred slipped in here, and sat down on the shaft of a cart to recruit his courage once. He sighed, and sighed, and feared to know his fate. And so he sat with his head in his hands.

Presently a strain of music broke on his ear. It seemed to come from the sky. He raised his head to listen. He colored, his eyes sparkled, he stole out on tip-toe with wondering, inquiring face into the street. There, on the broad spell-bound, thrilling from his heart, that seemed now on fire, to his fingers' ends. For a heavenly voice was singing to the piano just above his head; singing in earnest, making the very street ring. Already listeners were gathering, and a woman of the people, with a child, was singing without a body." Amazing good things are said in the streets. The voice was a contralto, rich. The song was Aileen Aroon; the hymn of constancy. So sudden and full was the bliss which poured into Alfred's heart that the danger at this sudden answer to his fears that tears of joy trembled in his eyes. "Wretch that I was to doubt her!" he said, and stood there with his longing, unable to wait and listen even to that which had changed his grief and doubts into happiness. So was the door in a moment. A servant opened it; "Miss Dodd?" he said, or else guessed: "you need not announce me. I am an old acquaintance." He could not hear any one should see the meeting between him and his love. He ran up the wide and narrow stair, guided by the hymn of constancy.

He stopped at the door, his heart was beating so violently.

Then he turned the handle softly, and stepped into the drawing-room: it was a double room. He took two steps forward, and looked, and almost at Julia's back.

Two young strangers were bending decently over each of her; it was to them she was singing the hymn of constancy.

Alfred started back as if he had been stung, and the music stopped dead short.

For she had heard his step, and, woman-like, was looking into her companions' eyes first, to see if her ear had deceived her. What she saw there brought her slowly round with a wild look. Her hands rose toward her face, and she shrank away sideways from him as if he was a serpent, and her dilated eyes looked over her cringing shoulder at him, and she was pale and red, and pale and red a dozen times in as many seconds.

He eyed her sorrowfully and sternly, taking for shame that strange mixture of emotions which possessed her. And so they met.

Strange meeting for two true lovers, who had parted last upon their wedding-eve.

No doubt, if they had been alone, one or other would have spoken directly: but the situation was complicated by the presence of two rivals, and this tied their tongues, I think. They stationed themselves with their eyes in silence. Only Julia rose slowly to her feet, and began to tremble from head to foot, as she looked.

"Is this intrusion agreeable to you, Miss Dodd?" said Mr. Hurd, respectfully, by way of counting his fire. "You made no reply: but only looked wildly at him still, and quivered visibly.

"Pray, Sir," said Alfred, turning on Mr. Hurd, "have you any right to interfere between us two?"

"None whatever," said Julia, hastily. "Mr. Hurd, I need no one: I will permit no one to say a word to him. Mr. Hardie knows he can not enter a house where I am—without an explanation."

"What, before a couple of curates?"

"Do not be insolent to my friends, Sir," said Julia, panting.

This wounded Alfred deeply. "Oh, as you please," said he. "Only if you put me on my defense before strangers, I shall, perhaps, put you to the blush before them."

"Why do you call me Miss, Sir?" said Julia, not deigning to notice his threat.

"To see you change it."

"Oh, indeed! Then why have you postponed your visit so long?"

"I was in prison, Julia."

"In prison, Alfred?"

"In the worst of all prisons: where I was put because I had been true to you. Julia, I suspected because I persisted in loving you, you faithless, inconstant girl."

He checked at these words; she smiled; a faint, uncertain smile. It died away, and she shook her head sadly, and said, sadly:

"Defend yourself, and then call me as many names as you like. Where was this prison?"

"It was a asylum: a mad-house."

The girl stared at him bewildered. He put his hand into his pocket, and took Peggy's letter. "Read this, Julia," said he. She held it in her hand, and looked him in the face to divine the contents. "Read it," said he, almost fiercely.

"But why?" said she. She held it shaking in her hands, and stared at it. I don't know whether she read it or not.

He went on: "My own villain who defrauded your father of his money, robbed me of my wife and child, and me of my Blisworth House was a lunatic asylum, and ever since then (oh, Julia, the agony of that day!) I have been confined in one of those dens of horror, among the mad; till Drayton House took fire, and I escaped, for what, to be put on my defense by you! Well, I am not to be driven from my position, compared with the manifold anguish I have endured, there is nothing you can say to me, jured and constant of mankind like this, you, who have had your liberty all this time, and have wasted yourself for my absence with a couple of curates!"

"For shame!" said Julia, blushin hand, ashamed for a way her own, not understand.

"Miss Dodd, will you put up with these insults?" said Mr. Hurd.

"Ay, and a thousand more," cried Julia, radiant, "and thank Heaven for them: they prove his sincerity. You, who have thought proper to stay and hear us insult my betrothed, and put me on my defense, you know how I receive his just rebuke: dear, cruelly used, Alfred, I never doubted you in my heart, no not for a moment: but you were wrong you to clear yourself; you who were always the soul of truth and honor. Forgive me. I too have suffered; for I thought my Alfred was dead. Forgive me."

And with this she was sinking slowly to her knees with the most touching grace, all blushes, tears, penitence, happiness, and love: but he caught her in time. "Oh! God forbid," he cried; and in a moment her head was on his shoulder, and they mingled their tears together.

It was Julia who recovered herself first, and shrank from him a little, and murmured, "We are not alone."

The weeping came rather late: and they were alone.

The other gentlemen had comprehended at last that it was indelicate to remain: they had melted quietly away; and Peterson rushed down the street; but the two abscondees about in the very entry where Alfred had just desponded before him.

"Sit by me, my poor darling, and tell me all," said Julia.

He began: but ere he had told her about his first day at his first asylum, she moaned and turned faint at the recital, and her lovely head sank on his shoulder. He kissed her, and tried to comfort her, and said he would not tell her more. But she said somewhat clamorously, indicatively. "I insist on your telling me all: all. It will kill me." Which did not seem to Alfred a cogent reason for continuing his narrative. He varied it by telling her that through all his misery the thought of her had sustained him.

A rough voice was heard in the passage inquiring for Mr. Hardie. Alfred started up in dismay: for it was Rooke's voice. "I am undone," he cried. "They are coming to take me again; and, if they do, they will drug me; I am a dead man."

"Fly!" cried Julia, "fly! up stairs! the leads."

He darted to the door, and out on the landing.

It was too late. Rooke had just turned the corner of the stairs, and saw him. He whistled and rushed after Alfred. Alfred bounded up the next flight of stairs; but, even as he went, his fighting blood got up: he remembered his pistol: he drew it, turned on the upper landing, and leveled the weapon full at Rooke's forehead. The man recoiled with a yell, and got to a respectful distance on the second landing. There he began to parley. "Put down that gun, Sir," said he, "that is past a joke: would you murder a party?"

"It's no murder to kill an assassin in defense of life or liberty: and I'll kill you, Rooke, as I would kill a wasp, if you lay a finger on me."

"Do you hear that?" shouted Rooke to some one below.

"Ay, I hear," replied the voice of Hayes.

"Then loose him. And run in after him."

There was a terrible silence; then a scratching was heard below: and, almost, the deadly click of the pistol-hammers brought to full cock.

And then there was a heavy pattering rush, and Vulcan came charging up the stairs like a lion. He was half-muzzled; but that Alfred did not know: he stepped forward and fired at the tremendous brute somewhat unsteadily, and missed him by an inch: the bullet glanced off the stairs and entered the wall within a yard of Rooke's head: ere Alfred could fire again, the huge brute leaped on him, and knocked him down like a child. And made a grab at his throat: Alfred, with admirable presence of mind, seized a bolster, and, drawing himself up, put the pistol to Vulcan's ear, and fired the other barrel just as Rooke rushed up the stairs to secure the prisoner: the pistol-barrel shot the air and fell over dead with shattered skull, leaving Alfred bespattered with blood and brains, and half deafened: but he struggled up, and tore the bolster out in doing so, just as a heavy body fell forward at his feet: it was Rooke tumbling upon Vulcan's carcass unexpectedly thrown in his path: Alfred cleared his eyes with his hand, and as Rooke struggled up, lifted the bolster high over his head, and, with his long sinewy arm and elastic body, discharged it with tremendous force at the youth, strength, skill, and hate all swelled, and rose, and struck together in that one furious gesture. If the weak fell, he said, the task was not done. As it was, the bolster broke over the man's head (and one half went spinning up to the ceiling), the other head crashed under the bolster like a glass bottle; and Rooke lay flat and mute, with the blood running from his nose and ears. Alfred hurled the remnant of the bolster down at Hayes and the others, and darted into a room (it was Julia's bedroom), and was heard to open the window and fetch drag furniture to the door and barricade it. This done, he went to look at Rooke, which he thought he had slipped into his pocket after felling Rooke. He found to his dismay it was not there. Then he was at his wit's end. Pistol in pocket and fallen down.

During all this a shrill shriek spun inward from the drawing-room. But now all was still. On the stairs by Vulcan dead, Rooke senseless below, John Hayes dead faint. And all in little more than a minute.

Dr. Wolf arrived with the police and two more keepers, and was at the door of Walker and Gorrett discharged; and urged them to break into the bedroom and capture the maniac: but first he was compelled to send to set two of the men to watch the back of the house. "There," he said, "where that load of hay is going in; that is the way to go. Mind the hand you see there, and watch."

This last mandate was readily complied with; for there was not much to be feared on the stones below from a maniac self-imprisoned on the second story. But the London cops thought Rooke-ism was quite another thing. The stairs were like a shambles already, a chilling sight to the eyes of unpractised police.

Rooke was but just sensible: the others hung back. But presently the pistol was found sticking in the pocket of Rooke's coat. Two men ran for the matter; and Dr. Wolf himself showed the qualities of a commander. He sent every sword to his seminels in the yard to be prepared for any attempt on Alfred's part, however desperate: and he sent a constable, and a well-known gentleman who was sitting anxious in lodgings over the way, after bribing high and low, giving out money like water, to secure the services of a man who was first called his unnatural son's vengeance: for he knew him to be by no means bold and vindictive like himself. After these preliminaries, Doctor Wolf headed his remaining forces, to wit, two keepers, and two policemen, and thundered at the bedroom-door, and summoned Alfred to surrender.

Now among the spectators who watched and listened with bated breath, was one to whom this scene had an interest of its own. Mr. Hurd, determined by Alfred's sudden reappearance, and the lovers' reconciliation, had hung about the entry very miserable: for he was sincerely attached to Julia. But while he was in this stupor came the posse to recapture Alfred, and he heard them say so. Then the shots were fired within, then Wolf and his men got in, and Mr. Hurd, who was now at the door, got in with them, to protect Julia, as he thought dangerous and inconvenient character disposed of. He was looking decurately on at a safish distance, when his late triumphant rival was summoned to surrender.

No reply.

Dr. Wolf coaxed.

No reply.

Dr. Wolf told him he had police as well as keepers, and resistance would be idle.

No reply.

Dr. Wolf ordered his men to break in the door. After some little delay, one of the keepers applied a chisel, while a policeman held his truncheon ready to defend the operator. The lock gave way. But the door could not open for furniture.

After some further delay they took it off its hinges, and the room stood revealed.

To their surprise no rush was made at them.

The maniac was not even in sight.

"He is down upon his back," whispered one of the new keepers; "we shall find him crouched somewhere." They looked under the bed. He was not there. They opened a cupboard: three or four dresses hung from wooden pegs; they searched the gowns most minutely: but found no maniac hid in their ample folds. Presently some one—it was Dr. Wood lying on the floor; and it was in the bed he had gone up the chimney.

On inspection the opening appeared almost too narrow. Then Dr. Wood questioned his sentinels in the yard. "Have you been there all the time?"

"Yes, Sir."

"Seen nothing?"

"No, Sir. And our eyes have never been off the window and the leads."

Here was a mystery: and not a clew to its solution. The window was open: but five-and-twenty feet above the paved yard: had he leaped down he must have been dashed to pieces.

Many tongues began to go at once: in the midst of which Edward burst in, and found the two dead forms of contemporary history consisted of a dead dog and a stunned man, who, having a head like a bullet, was now come to himself and vowing vengeance. He found only very pale, supported and consoled by Mr. Hurd. He was congratulating her on her escape from a dangerous lunatic.

She rose and tottered away from him to her brother and kissed him. But, as Edward still could to encourage her, then deposited her in an arm-chair and went up stairs; he soon satisfied himself Alfred was not in the house. On this he requested Dr. Wolf and his men to leave the premises. The doctor demurred. Edward insisted, and challenged him to show a magistrate's warrant for entering a private house. The doctor was obliged to own he had none. Edward then told the policemen they were engaged in an illegal act; the police were forbidden by Act of Parliament to enter private houses unless. Now the police knew that very well: but, being handsomely bribed, they had presumed, and not for the first time, upon that ignorance of law of which is deemed an essential part of a private citizen's accomplishments in modern days. In a word, by temper and by law, and a number of law gathered from the omniscient Times, Edward cleared his castle of the lawless crew. He then paroled the street, and watched the yard till dusk, when its proprietor ran rusty and turned them out.

Julia sat between Edward and Mr. Hurd, with her head thrown back and her eyes closed: and received in silence their congratulations on her escape. She was thinking of his. When they had quite done, she opened her eyes and said, "Send Dr. Johnson. Nobody else knows any thing. Oh pray, pray, pray send for Dr. Sampson."

Mr. Hurd said he would go for Dr. Sampson.

She thanked him warmly.

Then she crept closer to her bedroom, and locked herself in, and sat on the hearth-rug, and thought, and thought, and recalled every word and tone of her dear's conquering tongue old and new.

Dr. Sampson was a few miles out of town, visiting a patient. It was nine o'clock in the evening when he got Julia's note; but he came on to Russell Square at once. Mr. Hurd and his men had retired, leaving a sentinel in the street, on the bare chance of Alfred returning. Dr. Sampson found his brother and sister sitting sadly, but lovingly, together. Julia rose upon his entrance. "Oh, Doctor Sampson! Now is he—what? Not dead, I hope, sir?"

"How can I tell, till I see 'm?" objected the doctor.

"But you know they call people mad who are nothing of the kind: for you said so."

Sampson looked perverted. He said, "Why it was but last year a surgin came to me with one Jackson, a tailor, and said, 'Just sign a certificate for this man's wife's wife's sake.' 'Let me see her,' said I. 'What for,' sis he, 'when her own husband applies.' 'Excuse me,' sai I, 'I'm not a bat, I'm a Sampson.' I would not see her: she was nuivous and excited; 'Oh I know what you come about,' said she. 'But you are mistaken.' I questioned her kindly, and found in me her husband was a great trile t' her nuives. I refused to sign: on this diasi he sulked and hanged himself in the canal nixt day He was the madman; and she knew it all the time; but wouldn't tell me: that's woman all over."

"Well then," said Julia, hopefully.

"Ay but," said Sampson, "these cases are exceptions, sure, and the common rule runs to one he's mad. Dawn't you remember that was one of the questions I offered you when he lavanted on his wedding-day?"

He added, satirically, "And couldn't all that logic keep in a little cousin?"

This cynical speech struck Julia to the heart: she could not bear it: and retired to her own room.

Then Dr. Sampson saw his mistake, and said to Edward, with some concern, "Mairey on us, she is not in love with him still, is she? I thought that young parson was the man now."

Edward shook his head: but declined to go much into a topic so delicate as his sister's affections: and just then an alarming letter was delivered from Mrs. Dodd. She wrote to the effect that David, favored by the wind, had run into Portsmouth Harbor before their eyes, and had disappeared, hidden, it was thought, by one of those low publicans, who provide bad ships with sailors, receiving a commission. On this an earnest conversation between Sampson and Edward.

It was interrupted in its turn.

Julia burst suddenly into the room, pale and violently excited, clasping her hands and crying, "He is there. His voice is like a child's. Oh, help me! He is hurt. He is dying."

ZENAS CAREY'S REWARD.

RUN and sullen, like the eye of some baleful demon, the low sun glowed between the tangled depths of the November woods, casting bloody lines of light across the fallen trees, whose mossy trunks were half hidden in drifts of dead yellow leaves, and evoking faint, sweet scents, like Orient sandal-wood and teak, from a thousand forest ones, hidden away, who knows how or where. And above that line of dull flaming fire the sky deepened—a brighter, more delicate purple as the weather-wise could tell you, with snow-flakes sufficient to turn that broken forest into a fairy grove of pearl and silver. On the left the daylight was ebbing away from this Thanksgiving-eve.

"Now I wonder where I am!" said John Sidd-dons, pausing abruptly in the scarcely visible footpath that wound among the trees. "As complete-ly 'turned round' as though I stood in the deserts of Egypt! I wish I had been sensible enough to keep to the high-road: those short cuts generally turn out very long ones. Well, never say I keep straight ahead, I must inevitably emerge from these woods somewhere."

He sat down on a mossy stump, leaning his head carelessly on one hand, while the other played unconsciously with the worn brim of his blue soldier's cap—a slender, graceful hand, sun-burnt, with gray-blue eyes, and dark hair thrown back from a forehead freckled, like his cheeks, through the fiery arrows of many a Southern sun in lonely swamps, and along the fever-reeking shores of Salkin river.

"Houseless—homeless!" he murmured to himself. "I don't know how many others are saying the same thing this Thanksgiving-eve. I know that I should fight through the campaign unhurt, and return with an honorable discharge in my pocket to a place where I could earn my own living; and I'm alive or dead, while so many brave fellows were shot down at my side, or left behind me to die through a score of hearts at home, carrying sharper pangs than death has to give! It's a queer thing to have a conscience, I'm afraid, and be a total stranger. If I find this second-cousin of my father he'll probably kick me out of doors on a thanksgiving-day, considering I'm a beggar, it a man can't live alone like a tortoise in its shell. I remember wondering, when I was a boy, why the Maiden Lady's cabbage-rose bushes reached out their green tendrils, and seemed to grope through the darkness for something to cling to. I think I understand it now."

He rose up and walked on through the russet leaves that rustled beneath his tread, with a low, still musing—musing; trying to study out the unknown quantities in life's great equation, while the sun went down, and the twilight fell around, and the child night wind began to sigh sorrowfully in the tree-tops. And among the sturdy woods tapered off into a silver-stemmed thicket of white birches, and the white birches fringed a lonely country road, with a little log-house beyond, whose windows were aglow with fire-light, and whose door-yard was full of the peculiar perfume of white and maroon-flowered autumn chrysanthemums.

Zenas Carey was leaning over the gate, surveying the stormy sunset with critical eyes.

"It will Malter so!" remarked the man, apparently addressing himself to the crooked apple-tree by the gate-post. "It will Malter before hours—a good old-fashioned fall of snow to keep Thanksgivin' with. I smelt it in the air this mornin', but women don't know nothin' much until it comes to pass right under their noses, for—"

This rather obscure sentences was nipped in the bud by a footfall on the path. The woman turned abruptly to reconnoitre the new arrival.

"Will you be kind enough to give me a glass of water, Sir?" said John Siddons, politely.

"Sartin, Sir!" said Zenas. "So you're a soldier, hey?"

"A returned soldier," said Siddons, draining the cool element from the cocoa-nut shell that always lay close to the well-curb in front of the house.

"Goin' home to keep Thanksgivin'?" questioned Zenas.

"Home! Sir, I have no home."

Siddons had spoken sharply, as if the thought were bitter to him. Zenas put out his brown booted hand, and touched the soldier gently on the arm.

"My boy!" he said, with kindly abruptness, "you're a soldier, and to tell by your looks I should guess you were about the age of him that's buried at Gettysburg—my son! I love that blue uniform for Davie's sake, and if there's a soldier in the world that hasn't a home to go to on Thanksgivin' he's welcome to mine, for Zenas Carey's freside. Come in, Sir! come in! You're as welcome as flowers in May!"

John looked into the man's eyes and working face of the old farmer an instant, and accepted his invitation without speaking.

What a cheerful change it was, from the frosty air and chill twilight of the lonely road to that bright kitchen with its ruddy fire and dark and fire of resinous pine logs! And when Melinda Carey drew a bump-backed rocking-chair to the hearth for him, and spoke a word or two of welcome, John Siddons wondered if the eyes of the mother, who died when he was a babe, had not beamed upon him just so!

"I told mother so this very mornin'," said Zenas, with a triumphant flourish of his hand, as he stirred up the logs to a waving, glorious sheet of flame. "Says I, 'Melindy, we'll kill the biggest turkey, we'll pile all the pumpkin-pies we possess in the barn floor.' And says she, 'What for, Zenas, when there's only us two to eat 'em?' and, says I, 'Mother,' says I, 'Davie was here with us last Thanksgivin' with his new uniform, as brave and handsome as you'll often see.'—Now, mother, don't cry."

Zenas interrupted himself to stroke his wife's gray hair with a strangely tender touch, and went on:

"Says I, 'He's gone where it's Thanksgivin' all the year round now, my poor boy—my brave boy!' 'but,' says I, 'we'll make somebody welcome for Davie's sake; won't we, mother?' And now, Sir, you'll spend to-morrow with us, and tell me about the battle of Gettysburg, where Davie died, crying out with his last breath not to let the flag be trampled on."

Zenas's voice died out into a choking, gasping sob. John Siddons laid his hand softly on the rough, kindly-hearted hand of the farmer, with a pang of envy shot through his heart. Ah! it was almost worth while being shot down in battle to be missed and lamented like dead David Carey!

"Oh, wife!" wailed Zenas, when John Siddons had fallen asleep in the little corner room that had been the lost boy's, "it is almost like having Davie back again! Wife, I fight my great sorrow down every night, but every morning it rises up again more strong than ever! God help us—God help every parent whose home is made desolate by the field of battle!"

Thanksgiving dawned through a white whirlwind of driving snow that eddied among the grizzled locks of the apple-trees in mad frolics, and edged the old stone-wall with dazzling ermine. And the Mary spirits murmuring swiftly as Zenas Carey's wife chimney met the steadily falling snow half-way and gave battle, while the hearth glowed with ruddy brightness as if it knew all about the Governor's Proclamation and approved of it.

"You have a cozy little farm here, Mr. Carey," said John, as he looked through the snow window to the church, whose spire nestled among the everlasting hills beyond.

"If I was the owner of it, Sir," said Zenas, with a sigh. "But I've been hard put to it to get along these hard times. Taxes and such like are heavy on poor men, and I've had a run o' ill luck, so that the place is mortgaged to its full value, and to a hard man, Sir, who was glad to get the home you've been born and brought up in as soon as eat his breakfast, so he can make money by it. It will be a black day for me when I have to turn out and leave the Rock Farm; but it must come soon, and I don't much care what becomes of me arterward. I'm old, Sir, and even a man has lived to my age under one roof-tree he don't take very kindly to new roofs. Men are like forest trees, Sir, you can take a young 'un and do as you please with it, but if you transplant an old 'un it dies. Let's talk o' something else, Sir. Siddons. I ought'n't complain Thanksgivin'-day."

John looked with a feeling of actual reverence at the bowed head, whose gray locs were waving on the round table when John and Zenas returned thanks before dinner. The farmer brought out his best "flowing blue" plates and her choicest old-time silver spoons in honor of their guest. There was no lavish display of wealth. But never have the shores of Java, and a pitcher of cold, sparkling cider; but Champagne could not have been more cordially drunk than that cider; and Mrs. Carey's smiling kindness gave a flavor to the chicken-ee pie that is sometimes lacking in egg-shell china."

The table was cleared away, and there was a ring round the fire, when the door was opened and Deacon Peters appeared, bringing a small snowdrift on the shoulders of his shaggy overcoat.

"Well, I am beat!" quoth Zenas. "Take a cheer, Deacon. Let me hang your coat afore the fire to dry."

"Can't stay," said the Deacon, giving himself a shake, like a black water-dog on its bind-legs. "I thought you'd like to hear the news, so I just dropped in on my way to my darter's Thanksgivin' dinner."

"News! what news?" exclaimed Zenas, while his wife dropped her knitting-work.

"Do tell! then you hain't heerd?"

"I hain't heerd nothin' but the wind a-howlin' down the chimbly and Mrs. Smith's sow-critters bein' mornin'," said Zenas, a little impatiently.

"The Squire's dead, up to the gret house?"

"Dead! You don't tell me so! That's the man I was a speakin' of as holds my mortgage!" explained Zenas Carey to John Siddons. "And when did it happen, Deacon?"

"Died last night, Sir, just about nightfall, as quiet as a lamb. Nobody was't nobody with him but the old housekeeper—folks didn't a'pose he was dangerous. And Lawyer Ovid says there's a regular will, and he left all his property to—to—to—his fellow nevy, Sir!" said Peters, with a wink. "Lawyer Ovid says he's fell heir to all Squire Peter Allesford's property, and that's a pretty consid'able windfall!"

"Was the Squire's children?" asked the soldier, who had hitherto listened to the conversation in silence.

"That's it!" said the Deacon, giving his knee a sounding slap.

"Peter Allesford was my father's cousin," said the young man, quietly.

"Land o' Goshen!" ejaculated Deacon Peters with growing excitement. "Be the heir to the old Squire's' money. "Now really! that's kind o' providential, ain't it! To think that you should be right here on the spot!"

"I was in search of Mr. Allesford's house when I met you, Sir," said Siddons. "I knew of Squire—" but as I was unaware what sort of reception I might get, your kind invitation decided me to wait a day or two."

In vain the Deacon tried to "pump" the young soldier. John Siddons was civilly uncommunicative, and the conversation took leave, burning to unfold his budget of news elsewhere.

"I hope, Sir," said Carey, uneasily, when they were once more alone, "you won't be hard about that mortgage. I'm a poor man, and—"

"Mr. Carey," said John, quietly, "you shall burn that mortgage on this hearth the very day I come into possession of my relative's papers. No thanks, Sir, I have not forgotten that I was a stranger, and you took me in. Do you suppose I shall ever cease to remember the welcome of this Thanksgiving hearth? I never knew either father or mother; but to-day I have fancied what their kindness might have been."

"It was for Davie's sake!" sobbed Mrs. Carey, fairly overcome.

"Then for your dead son's sake will you let me fill his place toward you? Last night with tresh from me the only one in the world to whom I was tied by ties of blood; do not turn me from your hearts!"

"The Lord bless thee—the Lord make his face to shine upon thee, my second son!" said the old man, solemnly.

Slowly the dusk gathered athwart the hills, with rolling winds and whirling drifts of snow—slowly the darkness wrapped them round; but in Zenas Carey's sheltered soul the light of an eternal Thanksgiving was burning: and for his own tearful eyes, mused upon her dead soldier boys—one dead at Gettysburg, the other sitting at her side!

UNION PRISONERS AT RICHMOND.

WE illustrate on page 781 the condition of our poor fellows who are so unfortunate as to be prisoners of the rebels at Richmond, Virginia. While the rebel government in our hands supplies with food in such abundance that they can not consume it all, with clothing, and even regular rations of tobacco, our brave soldiers, to the number of fifteen to eighteen thousand, are shivering and starving to death in the Libby Island. The first intimation we had of their suffering was the receipt of a boat-load of sick and wounded at City Point, on 25th September. All their appearance an eye-witness spoke as follows:

The men landed at five A.M. in the chilly dawn, and it seemed a fitting hour for the sad procession. They numbered 180 men, brought from Belle Island, near Richmond. Many of them unable to walk were carried to the hospital. Those that could walk must have presented a ghastly appearance to the fellow-soldiers who met them. Pale not only stripped them of socks, shoes, and blankets, but took from them their shirts and pantaloons, except where the rags could scarce hold together. Men came without hats or caps, and many were without head bands here to the waist, their nakedness and bleeding feet covered only by the remnants of their shirts and left them, not from mercy, but because they were too filthy to keep. Their hair was long, matted, through which seems to be a barren waste, without any protection against the cold except what their own nakedness constructed. They had lain on the sand, which was to be before the Libby prisoners, without food or fuel, with all extremes of heat and cold, without clothes, without and covered with the filth of the most revolting kinds, for weeks and months, many having been taken prisoners on or before the 20th of August last. Their utter shrinking from what are called sand-sores, and the surgeons in some straggling cases perform operations with the knife, the cuticle in many instances seemingly dried on the bone and muscles.

Within a day or two a returned prisoner from Richmond, Rev. R. C. Treveskis, of the Tenth Connecticut regiment, has stated that when he left the Libby prison at Richmond on Wednesday, the Union officers confined there had only received one-third of a pound of bread and some water for two days previous, and for several days no meat had been served out. The rebel authorities had explained to the prisoners that he had no provisions to give them, and excused himself for the seeming inhumanity on that fact. He stated that on the same day he was unable to supply the prisoners in Belle Island there by cheap transportation, and that it was with the greatest difficulty he could procure a little meat for the hospitals.

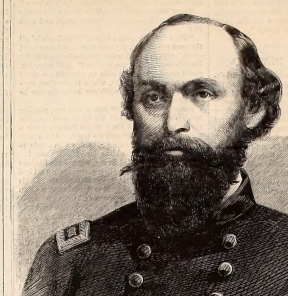
De Witt C. Wilcox, an Indiana scout, equal to Leatherstocking, captured just before Chicamauga, and paroled with three hundred and fifty other Union prisoners, arrived at Washington last week, and stated, among other things of absorbing interest, that the average number of deaths among our men in Richmond hospitals is forty-three a day, and that most of them get their death-warrants on Belle Island. That most desert in despair, pine, swept with winds, and wrapped in fogs. Our men are without blankets, and but one-third of them sheltered under wood-and-cloth tents. Many have taken insanity, and run down with frightful rapidity. Four days, ennized to the Island during the twenty-four hours also confined there, were greedily cooked and joyfully ate. In the hospital to which he was confined, the dead were daily carried, made up without sack. Not a beef animal has come to Richmond in twelve days.

Five thousand Union prisoners are now on their way to Lynchburg and Danville, for easier access to such food as can be reached. Walters's picture of scenes there on a visit to the city is sufficient to entice the more confiding one of four fat pups from a slat market-basket inside a fence, which every man on Belle Island, to trot under it and be ate up, in one of ghastly humor, and a sure measure of sufferers to our friends so speedily succumb in that Golgotha.

The following from the Richmond Examiner of 9th instant, will serve to help explain our picture:

On last Wednesday night a "spy," from Lieutenant Y. Boozier's squad, was caught in the act of communicating the prisoners through the Yankee prisoners, overheard one of the prisoners to say, "Well, we're going to be exchanged on Saturday to-morrow, and all who don't want to stay here can come to death this other man walks a letter to-night."

The "spy" immediately sped to Lieutenant Boozier with the information he had obtained. The latter communicated the alarm to the guard, threw the sentries forward, and sent to the barracks for one hundred additional men.



No attempt to break the lines was made, and it was said that if any was contemplated it was checked by the demonstration of the guard.

Five pieces of artillery now planted in position bearing on the prisoner's camp at short range, and any demonstration on their part, it is said, will result in the obtaining out of their number amazingly.

GENERAL GORDON GRANGER.

On this page we publish a portrait, from a photograph taken at Chattanooga, of GENERAL GORDON GRANGER, who now commands General THOMAS'S late corps in the Army of the Cumberland.

Gordon Granger was born in this State about the year 1820, and is consequently thirty-eight years of age. He entered West Point in 1843, and graduated in 1845, entering the Second Infantry. In July of the following year he was transferred to the Mounted Rifles. When the war with Mexico broke out he accompanied General Scott on his campaign; and distinguished himself so highly at Contreras and Churrubusco that he was brevetted First Lieutenant. Again, at Chapultepec, he won honors, and was brevetted Captain. At the close of the war he was transferred to the cavalry arm of the service; and was in the Third Cavalry when the Southern rebellion again compelled his country to call upon him for assistance. Resignations of traitors made room for his advance to a Captaincy in that regiment. He was one of the first regular army officers who was allowed to accept a commission as Colonel of Volunteers. His services being too valuable to be wasted on a single regiment, he was, on 17th September, 1862, commissioned Brigadier-General of Volunteers, and attached to the Army of the Cumberland. The country heard of him from time to time, as the war progressed in the West—now in a battle, now in a brilliant cavalry raid—and the report always was that he was doing his duty nobly and steadfastly. At last came the battle of Chicamauga. Of his fortunate nearness to the support of Thomas on that occasion the following brief extract from the Herald correspondence may give some idea:

GEN. GORDON GRANGER, OF THE ARMY OF THE CUMBERLAND.—(PHOTOGRAPHED AT CHATTANOOGA.)

General Thomas, near the centre of the army, was engaged, about one o'clock, sitting on his horse in the hollow of a ridge in an open field behind Hacker's Brigade, busy watching a heavy cloud of dust in his rear, in such a direction that it might be General Granger with reinforcements, or it might be the enemy. It rent a cloud over his spirits which was plainly visible to one who observed him, as I confess I did that day, with ever-increasing solicitude. The truth is, that General Thomas at one o'clock was, on the last day of their battle, had no disposition to fight any more, and feared the result of the next rebel attack. And to be watched with natural anxiety the development of the cloud of dust, which was then no more than a mile distant. If it dissolved to reveal friends, then they would be welcome; for at this hour fresh friends were all that was needed. If it disclosed the enemy, then the day was lost, and it became the duty of those who formed the "last square" on this battle-field to throw into the teeth of the victorious enemy a defiance as grandly contemptuous as that of Cambronne, and die. There was no escape if the troops moving were the cavalry of the enemy.

"Take my glass, some one of you whose horse stands steady. Tell me what you see."

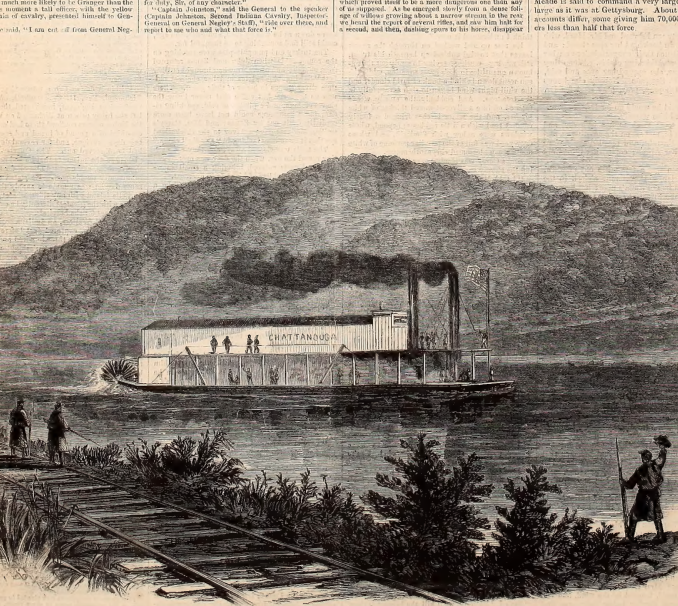
In the dust that emerged, thick as the clouds that precede the storm, nothing could be distinguished but a moving mass of men. But it was soon that they were infantry. This information made Thomas breathe more freely. If infantry, it was much more likely to be Granger than the enemy. At this moment a tall officer, with the yellow stripe of a captain of cavalry, presented himself to General Thomas:

"General," he said, "I am ordered from General Negley, and can not find him. I beg leave to report to you for duty, Sir, of my character."

"Captain Johnston," said the General to the speaker (Captain Johnston, Second Indian Cavalry, Inspector-General on General Negley's Staff), "ride over there, and report to me who and what that force is."

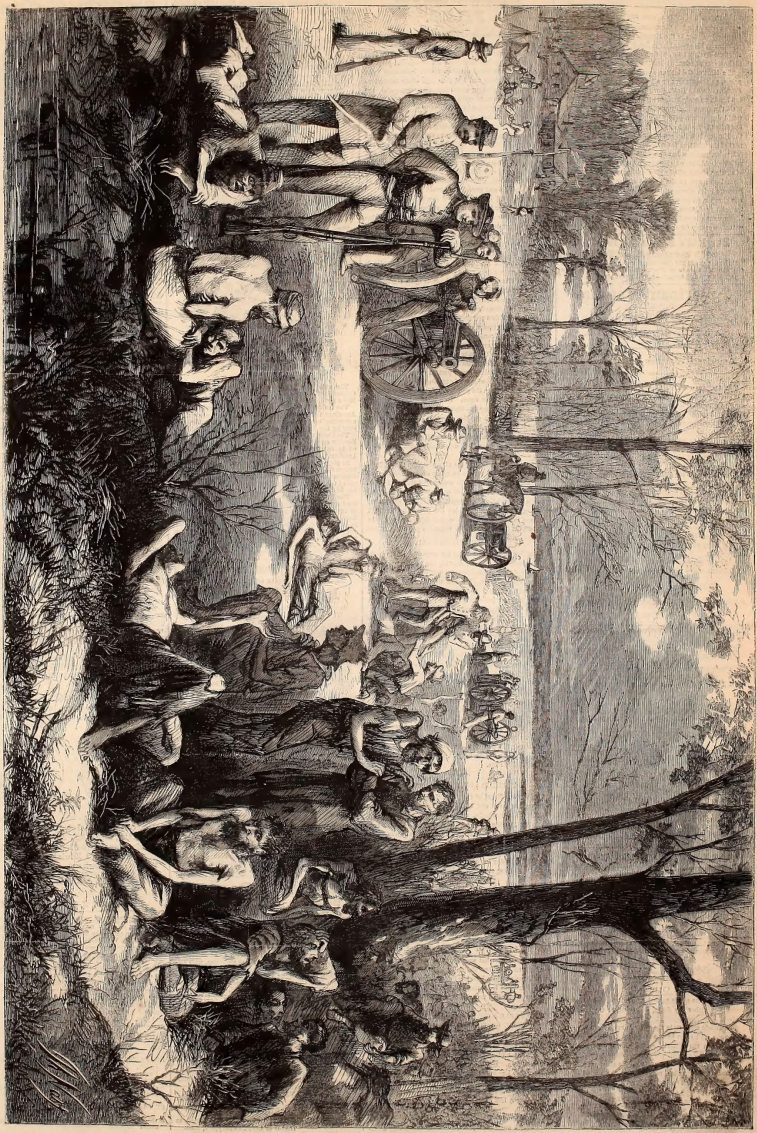
In an instant Johnston was gone—gone upon a mission which proved itself to be a more dangerous one than any of us supposed. As he emerged slowly from a dense foliage of willows growing about a narrow stream to the rear we heard the report of several rifles, and saw him halt for a second, and then, dashing spurs to his horse, disappear in a thick wood in the direction of the coming mass of troops still enveloped in clouds of dust. In a few minutes he again emerged from this timber, and following him came the red, white, and blue crescent-shaped battle-flag of Gordon Granger. We had wished for night, and it was Bluecher who had come to us. At a quarter past one Steadman first, and Gordon Granger afterward, had swung the hand of the statue Thomas, who had gone all through the terrible scenes of the last two days' battle to be matched and moved at this hour. As Granger came up I felt that from the face of the heavens a great cloud had passed, and the sun was shining once more upon us as with the same benignant rays of former victories.

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.



On page 772 we reproduce two pictures by Mr. Waud, illustrating the recent skirmishing in Virginia. Mr. Waud writes:

"THE RECENT FIGHTING AT KELLY'S FORD.



"While General Sedgwick, with the right wing of the army, was advancing upon Rappahannock Station, General French, with a command of three corps, moved for a crossing at Kellysville. Here he found the ford protected by some rifle-pits upon the opposite bank, and beyond by other field-works, for guns as well as men. Upon these our guns opened with telling effect—Randolph's battery giving them shell, canister, and case in front, while Sleeper's battery enfiladed them from a height to the left, near Mount Holly Church—General French's head-quarters. Another 3-inch gun battery, near Randolph's light twelves, also joined in the cannonade, as well as some 44-inch pieces on the hill. After a short action the accuracy of our fire caused the rebels to take to the woods in confusion, leaving a number of men in the rifle-pits. At these, wading middle-deep through the cold river, General Hobart Ward directed one of his regiments to charge. Once on the opposite shore, the advance dashed up the low ridge of earth which formed the defense, and the garrison was captured. The sketch presents a view from the island, after the deepest portion of the river was crossed.

"The more extended picture shows the same thing from another point—the houses, mill, etc., called Kellysville, beyond the ford; still further, the rifle-pits and pine woods, where the enemy found refuge. The houses in Kellysville, also Brown's, on the left, were riddled. Sleeper's battery, on the authority of some prisoners, is said to have taken off the legs of some of the rebel staff officers. Their horses were killed, and left upon the ground, to show the severity of the fire. A whole brigade ran away, leaving their muskets stacked, and then came out in small squads to get them again."

At latest dates the Army of the Potomac was once more "stuck in the mud"—in which unhappy state it has spent a large portion of its existence. Meade is said to command a very large army—as large as it was at Gettysburg. About Lee's force accounts differ, some giving him 70,000 men, others less than half that force.

THE ARMY OF THE CUMBERLAND—THE "CHATTANOOGA," A STEAMER BUILT BY THE SOLDIERS.—[SEE PAGE 775.]

THE PRISONS AT RICHMOND—UNION TROOPS PRISONERS AT BELLE ISLE.—[See Page 779.]

ADVERTISEMENTS.

MORTON'S GOLD PENS are now sold at the same prices as before the commencement of the war; this is entirely owing to the Manufacturer's improvements in machinery, his present large Retail Business and Cash-in-Advance System; for, until he commenced advertising, his business was done on Credit and strictly with the Trade.

The Morton Gold Pens are the only ones sold at old prices, as the makers of all other gold pens charge the Premium on the Gold, Government Tax, &c.; but Morton has in no case changed his prices, Wholesale or Retail.

Of the great numbers sent by mail to all parts of the world during the past few years, not one in a thousand has failed to reach its destination in safety; showing that the Morton Gold Pen can be obtained by any one, in every part of the world, at the same price, postage only excepted.

Reader, you can have an enduring, always ready, and reliable Gold Pen, tenderly adapted to your hand and habit of writing, which will do your writing vastly cheaper than Steel Pens; and at the present almost universal High-Premium Price of everything, you can have a Morton Gold Pen cheaper, in proportion to the labor spent upon it and material used, than any other Gold Pen in the World.

If you want one call on A. MORTON, No. 25 Maiden Lane, or inclose stamp for circular.

Bartlett's Burnished Needles,
442 Broadway, New York.

"There is no article of domestic use in which improvement ever others for Haste of Machine Sewing. They possess a peculiar eye and form."—MRS. DEGENEF.

American Watches
For Soldiers
AT REDUCED PRICES.
American Watches for American Soldiers.

THE AMERICAN WATCH COMPANY give notice that they have lately issued a new style of Watch, expressly designed for Soldiers and others who desire a good watch at a moderate price. These watches are made of the best of the worthless, cheap watches of British and Swiss manufacture with which the country is flooded, and which were never expected to last more than when they were made, being refuse manufactures sent to this country because unsalable at home, and used here only for bankrupting and swindling purposes.

We offer to sell our Watch, which is of the most essential value, reliable, of accurate and reliable time-keeper, and in Sterling Silver Cases, Hunting patent, at merely a price as is asked for the fancy-named Levers and Lepines of foreign Watches, above referred to.

We have named the new series of Watches, WM. ELLERY, Boston, Mass., which name will be found on the plate of every watch of this manufacture, and is one of our trade-marks.

Sold by all respectable watch dealers in the loyal states. Wholesale orders should be addressed to

ROBBINS & APPLETON
Agents of the American Watch Company,
182 BROADWAY, N. Y.

TO NEWSPAPER PUBLISHERS, BOOK and JOB PRINTERS.
The subscribers offer for sale
1 DOUBLE-CYLINDER PRINTING MACHINE,
Second-hand—Cylinders—Size of Bed, 34x54
1 DOUBLE-CYLINDER PRINTING MACHINE,
Second-hand—Cylinder—Size of bed, 31x46
1 DOUBLE-CYLINDER PRINTING MACHINE,
Second-hand—Cylinder—Size of bed, 31x46
1 SECOND-HAND ADAMS PRESS,
Size of Platen, 26x40.
The above are all SECOND-HAND MACHINES, are warranted in first-rate order, having been thoroughly repaired. Will be sold on application to
R. HOE & CO.,
Nos. 29 and 31 Gold St., N. Y.

Portable Printing Offices!
For the Army and Navy
Hospitals, Merchants,
Druggists, and all who wish to print neatly, cheaply, and expeditiously. Circular sent free. Sheets of Type, Cuts, &c., at sight. ADAMS PRESS CO., 31 PARK ROW, N. Y., and 22 Lincoln Street, Boston, Mass.

SALISBURY, BRO., & CO.,
AGENTS FOR THE UNITED STATES FOR THE CELEBRATED
ALBERINE
Extension Holders and Gold Pens.
Of the most handsome and durable construction, put up in fine fancy cases of one dozen each, and not sold in any less quantities. They will retail for $8 each.
Price, per dozen $10 25
" gross 55 00
" box 60 00
Sent by mail or express, prepaid. Address
SALISBURY, BRO., & CO., Providence, R. I.

$200! $150! $100! $50!
PREMIUMS.
To Editors and Others!
I will pay the above-named amounts for the best four articles on either my Soap, Saleratus, or Concentrated Potash.
The article must state the writer's experience in using the goods, and must not be less than ten lines, and be published in the editorial columns of any good family newspaper.
Any party wishing to compete for the above, and desiring further information, may address the undersigned. Each person writing and publishing a notice as above, will mail a marked copy of the paper containing the notice to me, and also subscribe for mail, giving full address.
The Premiums will be awarded on the fourth day of July, 1864.
R. T. BARRETT.
64 to 74 Washington Street, New York.

BRANDRETH PILLS.
It is scarcely necessary for Dr. Brandreth to assure his friends that he continues his unremitting care in the manufacturing department of the Brandreth Pills; or that they are entirely free from chemical or mineral preparations; these facts being well known and understood to be so. While mercury and bleeding, and other deleterious remedies are becoming more and more unpopular, the Brandreth Pills are extending the sphere of their usefulness by the appreciation of a discerning public.
The numerous cases in which these pills have been used, where they have restored the failing embers of life to their former brilliancy, entitles them to the appellation of the "Universal Medicine of Life" for they cleanse and purify the blood, strengthen and invigorate the nerves, and regulate the digestive organs in the most perfect manner, and prevent the creation of those humors to which we are sycophsies, scurvy, gout, and those "slimy dregs out of which the stone and gravel are formed within us."
It is now well understood how much disorders of the mind depend for their cure upon a due attention to the body. It is now understood how much of the maladies which will remove morbid accumulations without weakening the bodily power. It is now understood that there is a reciprocal influence between the mind and the body. It is now understood that purging with the Brandreth Pills will remove melancholy, and that even insanity is cured by copious purging using them. It is now understood how much domestic happiness depends upon the healthy condition of the digestive organs.
It is now well known that the BRANDRETH PILLS have cured thousands of hopeless and helpless persons, even when the first physicians had pronounced them beyond all human means of relief. It is now not only well known that the Brandreth Pills do cure, but it is also understood how they cure—by their purifying effect on the blood, they restore the body to health.
This principle of cure has no longer to contend with the blind prejudices of the greater portion of the public; it is only with those few who are determined to be "killed according to rule," like the people of old, who "would have to reign over them. Now, however, the more universal circulation of newspapers—thanks to the general diffusion of knowledge, which enables nineteen-twentieths of the PEOPLE" to read and think for themselves—are the high lower nelley in swallowing that deadly mineral, Mercury, professing to cure, but universally leaving us in a worse condition than it finds us.
We no longer believe in the absurd notion that inflammations of any kind can be cured by abstracting our life blood—a thing we do in bleeding—instead of by inflammation is a wise ordinance of nature—a signal that requires the assistance of purgative medicine to ease her of the unnatural load. Then when all cause for the high fever and the strong pulse, is wanted to be removed, in other words, the body calls for vegetable cleansing.

LET THE AILING READ.

A gentleman had been ailing for many weeks; his stools had become light colored, showing the bile was retained in the blood, and rendering an attack of Jaundice or Typhoid Fever probable. He was nervous and irritable; sleep confused; acid stomach; dizzy; absent-minded; memory failing; pains in the limbs; bowels costive. At length a severe diarrhœa set in which lasted for two days. When this stopped severe pains of the bowels came on—"dry gripes" as he called it. Up to this time he had done nothing but eat and then taking a single Brandreth Pill, but now he understood that the case admitted of no delay, and he at once took five Brandreth's Pills, and partook plentifully of oatmeal gruel. The Pills were retained an hour, operated well, and he thought the difficulty removed. He was not so, for in less than two hours the pains in the bowels returned with great violence, accompanied with a shaking feeling, and he thought he was going to die. He immediately swallowed two more pills and some warm broth. The pain was checked, he slept for several hours. The pills brought away pitchy looking stools, and he had no more severe pain in his bowels. For three more days he took five pills at night, and his digestion became natural, and his health fully restored by less than a box of Brandreth's Pills.

TYPHOID FEVER PREVENTED.

One of the officers of the Tyro, the packet which runs between Augusta and Ciudad Bolivar, was taken with violent fever, headache, and diarrhœa. He was about supplying his place with a substitute, when a friend told him to take eight Brandreth Pills, one each morning then night and morning for a few days, and he would have, perhaps, no need of a substitute. This advice he followed, and the third day he was cured. His diet was oatmeal gruel for the first twenty-four hours.

CURE OF DROPSY OF THE PERICARDIA.

A lady in Fourth Avenue, in New York City, was severely afflicted with disease of the heart. For two years she thought every day would be her last, for she had a constant heavy pressure on the heart and great difficulty in breathing. The doctor called it

DROPSY OF THE PERICARDIA.

She was under what was supposed the best treatment the City afforded, but the daily became worse, until, at length, she concluded to try Brandreth's Pills, which affforded her relief the first night, and in three months they cured her, and now she is in perfect health.

REMARKABLE CASE IN WHICH FIFTY-TWO PILLS WERE USED BEFORE THE BOWELS WERE OPENED.

A man, aged 32, of robust constitution, from a severe wreach, was laid up. His back pained him as if the muscles were torn. His bowels, kidneys, and bladder seemed paralyzed. For seven days nothing passed his bowels, spite of all the remedies administered by his three doctors, who told his poor wife they could do no more. She was advised, as a last effort to save him, to try Brandreth's Pills. So she procured a box, and gave him four pills every four hours. She rubbed the pills down to powder under a knife on a plate, and then mixed with a teaspoonful of molasses. She continued this treatment until she had administered fifty-two pills, when they operated, and the man's life was saved.
All cases published will be certified when required.
Principal Office, Brandreth's Building, New York. At Retail, No. 4 Union Square, and of all Druggists.
See my private Stamp upon each box, by permission of the Honorable Commissioner of Stamps. Observe B. Brandreth on stamp, which insures the genuine pills.

American Card Company's
New Union Playing Cards.
National Emblems.

Ace of Eagles
The suits are EAGLES, SHIELDS, STARS, and FLAGS. Colonel in place of Knave. Goddess of Liberty for Queen. Major for Jack.
The Union Playing Cards are the first and only genuine National Cards ever produced, and as they are entered according to Act of Congress, they can be manufactured only by the American Card Company.
The Cards are rapidly taking the place of Cards bearing Foreign emblems. The demand for them is unprecedented in the Card Trade, and they will soon become the Leading Card in the American market.
In playing with these Cards, they are to be called by the names the emblems represent, and so the emblems are as familiar as household words everywhere among the people of the American Republic, they can be used as readily the first occasion as cards bearing Foreign emblems.
The Union Cards are the most pleasing and attractive card ever made. They are produced in the highest style of the art, and each pack is put up in an elegant Card Case, suitable to keep them in when not in use, and then in handsome dozen boxes for the trade.
Two Sample Packs in Card Cases, sent, post-paid, on receipt of $1. Address
AMERICAN CARD COMPANY,
405 Broadway, or 365 William St., N. Y.

H. Dexter, Hamilton & Co.,
WHOLESALE DEALERS IN Books, Magazines,
AND
Newspapers,
No. 113 Nassau Street, New York.
Harper & Brothers' Periodicals and Novels supplied to the trade, and kept always on hand.

ECONOMY, DURABILITY, AND CONVENIENCE.—The "Star" No Chimney Burner, for Kerosene Oil Lamps, patented Aug. 11th, '63, gives a brilliant light free from smoke or smell. It can be carried and handled freely without being extinguished. The lamps and screw-bridged the best invention of the kind. Warranted at all times. Sample sent, postpaid, for 35 cents. Circulars free. Agents wanted.
PETER ESSIG & CO., Manufacturers, No. 3 Platt Street, N. Y.

Holiday Gifts.

Engraved with Initial Letter, Old English, &c. Complete set in box for mail. Trade supplies.
JOHN F. FIELDS & CO., 499 Broadway, N. Y.

Presents! Presents!
Soldier's Head-Quarters.
Rare Chance for AGENTS.
Head-Quarters for Army Corps Pins.
Any one wishing to become my Agent, or wishing to purchase my Army Corps Pins, Gold Pens and Pencils, Gilt Pins, I will send on receipt of 3c. to the receipt of $1, together with my Wholesale circular with full instructions and Premiums to Agents either a fine Gold Pen, with Extension Case and Pencil, a fine engraved Spring Locket or Bracelet, or California Diamond Seal Stone Ring, or a new style Vest Chain of Gilt Links, or a beautiful set of Jewelry. Also a Solid Silver Shield, or either Army Corps, Diamond Cut, Pin, or the Knox or Grant Pin, with your Name, Regiment, and Co. handsomely engraved upon it. I want a Salesman Agents on Corps Pins.
B. T. HAYWARD,
Manufacturing Jeweler, 208 Broadway, N. Y.

Elegant Christmas Presents.
Splendid Gold Composition Watches, small size for Ladies and medium for Gents, beautifully engraved Hunting Cases, full jeweled. Sent free on receipt of $16.
Watches sent for inspection before payment. Agents wanted in every County and every Regiment on unusually liberal terms. Send for circular.
CLENDALE & CO., 213 Broadway.

Salesmen Wanted.
$75 a month, or commission allowed on sales. Apply to HALE & CO., Brewsters, Troy, N. Y.

THE "RIDGEWOOD" PATENT
SMOKING CASK.

Most ingenious in its combination of the Metallic Case, containing Pipe and Stem; Matches and Pipe Cleaner, with a handsome Tobacco Pouch attached, filling the Pipe by a valve, without any of the fingers or waste of Tobacco, the whole securing freedom from all odor, and portability of a Cane Case. It is made for any of the various styles, at $4 50, $6, $7 50, $9 50, and $12 00 to $15 and up to the two latter richly plated and decorated. Nothing can excel its comfort, utility, and economy for all smokers. As a Present to friends nothing could be more acceptable. For the Soldier it is invaluable. Also

For the Ridgewood Smoking Tobacco,
Of superior quality and flavor, in packages of various sizes. A liberal discount to Dealers. Single Cases sent by mail, prepaid, on receipt of price and 15 cts.
RIDGEWOOD MANUFACTURING CO.,
Office 693 Broadway, cor. Howard Street, New York.

H. A. HARVEY, 84 Maiden Lane, N. Y., TWINES, CORDAGE, and Yarn, Stone Packing, Web, CARPET WARP, Fifth Lines, Bleaching Cord, Lead, and Surgeons' Tow, Writing and Wrapping PAPER. Envelopes, and Paper Bags.

Books by return Post to any Post-Office in the U. S.
GOOD BOOKS BY MAIL.—We send all Books prepaid by return of FIRST MAIL at publishers' prices. Address
FOWLER & WELLS, No. 308 Broadway, N. Y.

Cloaks and Mantillas.
BRODIE,
The Leader of Fashions!
Opened his Fall Stock on Thursday, 8th inst.,
And as usual stands unrivaled for Style, Quality, AND VARIETY.
300 Canal Street, New York.

KENDALL'S AMBOLINE.

THE MOST RELIABLE HAIR RESTORER IN THE WORLD.
WARREN WARD, of 377 Canal Street, says, "I never had any thing in my family which suswers so perfectly the purpose of a hair dressing."
MISS FANNY SEPTON, the beautiful and talented actress, says, "I have used Kendall's Amboline for my hair, and find it to be a superior article. I have no hesitation in recommending it to every lady who desires a full and luxuriant head of hair."
KENDALL'S AMBOLINE is put up in boxes containing two bottles, price $1. Sold by all Druggists. Depot 308 Broadway, N. Y.

SOLDIERS' COMPANY PINS.
Constantly on hand and Engraved to Order, and sent free on receipt of Price.
Every Co. from A to W Solid Silver, $1.
Solid Silver, with Letter in GOLD Relief, $1 50.
Solid 18 k. GOLD, $3 50.

Corps Badges
Sent free by Mail or Express on receipt of Price.
Solid Silver, $1 50. Solid Silver, $1 50.
Enamelled. Enamelled.

Solid Gold, $4. Solid Gold, $4.
Badges for the 1st, 2d, 3d, 6th, 6th, 11th, and 12th Army Corps.
1st Division Enamelled Red, 2d Division White, 3d Division Blue.
None but perfect Goods sent.
Terms Cash in advance. Send for a Catalogue.
Address C. L. BALCH & CO.,
Successors to 203 Broadway, New York.
J. G. PACKARD & CO.

AGENTS WANTED.—Call and examine, or 10 samples sent by mail, prepaid, for $1. Liberal and profitable, and well adapted to every person, by N. L. WOLCOTT, 170 Chatham Square, N. Y.

Printing-Press for Sale.
One Taylor Double Cylinder, five Rollers, Table Distribution, Bed 38x51. Price $3500.
Apply to HARPER & BROTHERS, 329 Pearl St., N. Y.

$60 A MONTH! We want Agents at $60 a month, expenses paid, to sell our Excelsior Pencils, Oriental Burners, and 13 other articles. Circulars sent free. SHAW & CLARK, Biddeford, Maine.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK,
Have Just Published:
DRAPER'S INTELLECTUAL DEVELOPMENT OF EUROPE. A History of the Intellectual Development of Europe. By JOHN WILLIAM DRAPER, M.D., LL.D., Professor of Chemistry and Physiology in the University of New York: Author of a "Treatise on Human Physiology," &c. 8vo, Cloth, $3 50.

ST. OLAVE'S. A Novel. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

A FIRST FRIENDSHIP. A Novel. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

Holiday Presents.

J. H. Winslow & Co.,

100,000

WATCHES, CHAINS, &c., &c.

Worth $500,000.

To be sold for One Dollar each, without regard to value, and not to be paid for till you know what you are to get.

SPLENDID LIST!!

OF ARTICLES TO BE SOLD FOR ONE DOLLAR EACH.

100 Gold Hunting Cased Watches	$100 to 200 each.
100 Gold Watches	60 to 100 each.
200 Ladies' Gold Watches	50 to 60 each.
500 Lockets and Gent's Silver Watches	15 to 50 each.
2000 Vest and Neck Chains	4 00 to 10 00 each.
2000 Gold Band Bracelets	5 00 to 10 00 each.
3000 Pins	2 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Cameo Brooches	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Mosaic and Opal Brooches	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Lava and Florentine Brooches	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Coral, Opal, and Ena. Brooches	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Cameo Ear Drops	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Mosaic and Jet Ear Drops	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Lava and Florentine Ear Drops	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Coral, Ena., and Opal Ear Drops	4 00 to 6 00 each.
5000 Gent's Breast Pins	2 50 to 5 00 each.
3000 Watch Keys	2 00 to 4 00 each.
3000 Fob and Ribbon Slides	2 00 to 4 00 each.
5000 Sets of Bosom Studs	2 50 to 4 00 each.
5000 Sleeve Buttons	2 50 to 4 00 each.
6000 Plain Rings	2 50 to 5 00 each.
6000 Stone Set Rings	2 50 to 6 00 each.
6000 Lockets	4 00 to 10 00 each.
3000 Sets Ladies' Jewelry	5 00 to 10 00 each.
10000 Gold Pens, Silver Mounted	4 00 to 8 00 each.
10000 Gold Pens, with Silver Extension Cases and Pencils	4 00 to 6 00 each.

All of the above list of Goods will be sold for one dollar each. Gentlemen and Ladies, in order to realize what each one can have, are first put into envelopes, sealed up, and mixed; and when ordered, are then sent without regard to choice, and sent by mail, thus giving all a fair chance. On receipt of the Certificate, you will see what you can have, and then it is at your option to send one dollar and take the article or not.

In all transactions by mail, we shall charge for forwarding the Certificates, packing, postage, and doing the business, 25 cents each, which must be inclosed when the Certificate is sent for. Five Certificates will be sent for $1; eleven for $2; thirty for $5; sixty-five for $10; and a hundred for $15.

AGENTS.—Those acting as Agents will be allowed ten cents on every Certificate ordered by them, provided the remittance amounts to one dollar. Agents will collect 25 cents for every Certificate, and remit 15 cents to us, either in cash or postage stamps. Great caution should be used by our correspondents in regard to giving their correct address, Town, County, and State. Address

J. H. WINSLOW & CO.,

208 Broadway, New York.

HOSTETTER'S

CELEBRATED

STOMACH BITTERS.

HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS—MUSHROOM IMITATIONS.—Surely as the "primrose by the river" of innumerable humbugs. No sooner had HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS made their astonishing world, than up sprang a host of imitations, and as the fame of the genuine article increased, and spread, the pestiferous crop of poisonous mockeries thickened. But the true medicine has lived them down. One by one they have disappeared. When the hollow of puffery, which kept alive the feeble flame of their brief reputation, exploded, as they all they caused its live, and thus they continue to come and go. Meanwhile, HOSTETTER'S BITTERS, the great protective and remedial tonic of the age, have progressed in popularity with ever increasing rapidity, and have become as a means of preventing and curing the diseases resulting from malaria, unwholesome water, and all unhealthy climatic influence, has been boundless; and as a remedy for dyspepsia, liver complaint, fever and ague, general weakness and debility, and all complaints originating in disfigurements of face, none admitted to be superior to any other preparation ever advertised or prescribed. From the Southern States, where its virtues were more severely tested, their sale has been extended into every State in this Union, over the whole of South and Central America, Mexico, the West Indies, the Sandwich Islands, California, Canada and Japan. Home and foreign testimony similar to that which HOSTETTER'S BITTERS has received is remarkable tonic and invigorant now before the world.

Sold by all Druggists and Family Grocers.

Hostetter's Stomach Bitters,

PREPARED AND SOLD BY

HOSTETTER & SMITH, PITTSBURGH, PA.

DEPOT FOR NEW YORK, 470 BROADWAY.

Eagle Gas Stoves.

Heating and Cooking.

WARRANTED

Free from Smoke or Smell.

CHEAPER THAN COAL OR WOOD.

Send for Descriptive Catalogue.

H. D. BLAKE,

474 Broadway, N. Y.

$75 A MONTH! I want to hire Agents in every county at $75 a month, expenses paid, to sell my new cheap Family Sewing Machines. Address S. MADISON, Alfred, Maine.

AGENTS WANTED

To canvass for VISITOR'S new work, "History of American Conspiracies" from 1760 to 1801; one of the most novel and attractive books yet offered to canvassers. Now is the time. 700 pages, superbly illustrated with steel engravings. Hever pre-catalogue for agents. Sent free. Sole terms by subscription, and liberal terms given. Send for circular of terms, &c. Address

EDWARD P. ROOT, No. 13 Spruce Street, N. Y.

HUBBARD BRO'S

NEW YORK.

Are offering the cheapest, most accurate, durable, and reliable Watches in the American market! They are the sole contingence in this country for the celebrated

Magic Time Observers,

The Perfection of Mechanism!

Being a Hunting, or Open Face, or Lady's or Gentleman's Watch combined, with Patent Self-Winding Improvement.

A most pleasing novelty. One of the prettiest, most convenient, and withal the best and cheapest time-keepers for general and reliable use ever offered. It has within it and connected with its mainspring a self-winding attachment, rendering a key entirely unnecessary. The cases of this Watch are composed of two metals, the outer one being fine 16 carat gold. It has the improved roby action lever movement, and is warranted an accurate time piece. Price, superbly engraved, per case of half dozen, $264. Sample watch, by express, accurate boxed, $55. If sent by mail, the postage is 56 cents; registering, 20 cents.

Silver Watches!

First-Class Hunting Time-Pieces.

FOR ACCURACY OF MOVEMENT, BEAUTY OF MATERIAL, AND ARTISTIC FINISH, UNEXCELLED IN PRICE, THESE WATCHES MUST ENDEAR

UNIVERSAL APPROBATION!

An imitation of watches that is can hardly be detected by the most experienced judges. The material being of the metals, the outer case of fine silver and the inner one German Silver, is cast not be recognized by cutting or heavy engraving, making it but easy to engrave case, but in durability, the best resemblance of Solid Sterling Silver Cases.

The sale of these watches in the army is a source of enormous profit to dealers, since they very readily sell at and upward. Many hundred dollars can be made in a single pay-day of soldiers, with little exertion.

As WHOLESALE ONLY! In heavy hunting cases, beautifully engraved, full jewelled movement dials, and finger case, in good running order, by the half dozen, $60; postage, $2 38; registering, 20 cts. Sold only by the case. Can be safely sent by mail.

Our imputations are novelties produced by no other house, combining greater accuracy as timekeepers, being more elaborately and artistically finished, and selling at prices challenging competition from all other hands.

The press of the whole country commends without the superiority of our watches. Their encomiums are emphatic, rendering further praise in a manner not to be misunderstood.

Particularly valuable for officers in the army, and travelers.—French Lexicle's, Feb. 21.

"Prettiest, best, and cheapest time-pieces ever offered."—N. Y. Illustrated News, Jan. 10.

"Exceed other manufactures in a point of accuracy and elegance."—Phila. Press and Nany Gazette, May 9.

An improvement on many timepieces, and invaluable for railroad men."—N. Y. Am. Railroad Journal, Aug. 1.

"Elaborately and artistically finished."—N. Y. Scientific American, July 25.

"Combine great accuracy as timekeepers."—Pittsburg, Pa., Chronicle, July 27.

"Very pretty and durable watches for the army."—N. Y. Army and Navy Journal, commend themselves to every officer.

"One of the oldest and most reliable houses in business."—Louisville, Ky., Journal, July 31.

Watches will be sent, by express, to any part of the country, with the privilege to the person to whom they are sent, with full permission to examine on delivery. You can not send South of those points, as the Express per. pagnity refuses to handle collections on such packages. Localities, so that it will be necessary for buyers in the disloyal States to send Currency or advance. We shall, in all instances, require an advance remittance of two dollars on every watch ordered. Thus our friends in the army, quartered at or near those cities, can make purchases without any fear of being cheated, receiving their goods before payment is required. Those in the interior of rebeldom, who wish to send payments in advance, will please send by Express, when practicable; if not, send by mail in a registered letter. Even this is impossible, send, as an ordinary letter, not masking in any manner so as to excite suspicion. The collection whatever will be made from our prices, neither will Watches be sold in any less quantities than a half dozen. Each watch carefully employed. Buyers must deal directly with us!

HUBBARD BRO'S, Sole Importers,

Broadway, cor. Courtlandt St., New York.

DO YOU WANT LUXURIANT WHISKERS OR MUSTACHES?—My Omega will cause them to grow in a few weeks. It is perfectly harmless, as it acts without stain or injury to the skin. Price $1—by mail, 25 cents. Address, with stamp, for circular, &c. R. G. GRAHAM, No. 109 NASSAU STREET, N. Y.

"STOP AND READ."

A DOUBLE NUMBER! RIDE IN VARIETY AND INSTRUCTION.—MAN AND WOMAN.—Their Dispositions, Functions, Illustrated. Cure Sick Headache. Phrenological Character of England, Russia, Norway. Divorce.—Criminal.—Tea and Tea Tables. Hereditary Descent. Hair Dye. Gray Hair.—The Races.—Mixture and Amalgamation.—Doom of the Indian. Phrenological Busts.—Self-Culture.—Perfect Character and Customs.—The Two Great Empires of Russia and America. Phrenological Character of Celebrities. Lectures, and Biographies of Archbishop Whately and Mr. Sumner, in the Dominion Phrenological Journal. Sent by first post for 13 cents. Address

FOWLER & WELLS, 308 Broadway, N. Y.

Tro-Bond-ine.

For sealed papers (free) in regard to the Swamp Diluvian, which healed a sabre-cut on the face of a young soldier at Shiloh, April, 1862, and restored a fine head to grow, address JOHN RAWLINS, 701 Broadway, N. Y.

EVERY SOLDIER in the army ought to have Boyle's Life Pills. They cure the worst cases of Diarrhœa in from 30 min. per box. Send by mail on receipt of price. Address BOYD & CO., 134 South 4th St., Philadelphia.

Just what every Family wants. Savage & Co.'s No Chimney Burner for Hard Coal and Lasteline, burns Kerosene Oil with a brilliant light without chimney, smoke, or odor. Saves 25 per cent. Offers 999 Fulton St., N. Y. Agents wanted. Send for circular. Sample sent free for 50 cts. American Institute awarded 1st Premium and Medal, 1863.

EMPLOYMENT

At your own homes. It is the greatest discovery of the age. Profits 100 per cent. Demand single as Flour. Full particulars sent free, on receipt of two stamps. Address at once, DANIEL ADAMS & CO., 18 Bleecker St., N. Y.

6000 AGENTS wanted, to sell SIX NEW INVENTIONS in every family. Sales from one to two dollars each. Profits large: all pay great profits to Agents. Send 4 stamps and get 60 pages particulars. RICHARD BROWN, Lowell, Mass.

Cavalry and Artillery.

Solid Silver, $1 25. Solid Silver, $1 75.

Solid 18 k. Gold, $5 00. Solid 18 k. Gold, $6 00.

Sent by mail on receipt of Price. Also all kinds Corps, Co., and Division Pins, engraved to order, by the single one. All, or any, sent and Agent to any part of the country. Terms cash in advance. Send for a circular. Address DROWNE & MOORE,

Manufacturing Jewelers, 208 Broadway, New York.

A Splendid Holiday or Bridal Present.

HARPER'S

Illuminated and Pictorial

BIBLE.

Including the Apocrypha. Superbly embellished by over Sixteen Hundred Illustrations, exquisitely engraved by Adams after Designs by Chapman, exclusive of a Series of Rich Illuminations in Colors, comprising Frontispiece, Presentation Plate, Family Record, Title-pages, &c. The work forming a complete Folio Volume.

PRICES.—Morocco, gilt edges, beveled and paneled sides, $25 00; Morocco extra, gilt edges, $32 50; Full Calf, marbled edges, Hinds & Sturgis, $35 00; Full Calf, marbled edges, $36 00.

HARPER'S Pictorial Bible is printed from the standard copy of the American Bible Society, and contains Marginal References, the Apocrypha, a Concordance, Chronological Table, List of Proper Names, General Index, Table of Weights, Measures, &c. The large Frontispiece, Titles to the Old and New Testaments, Family Record, Presentation Plate, Historical Illustrations, and Initial Letters to the chapters, Ornamental Borders, &c., are from original designs, made expressly for this edition. By F. O. Chapman, Esq., of New York. In addition to which, there are numerous large Engravings, from designs by distinguished modern artists in France and England; to which a full index is given.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers, New York.

For sale by A. WILLIAMS & CO., BOSTON; SMITH, ENGLISH & CO., Philadelphia; CUSHING & BAILEY, Baltimore; FRANCIS TAYLOR, Washington; ROBERT CLARKE & CO., Cincinnati; KEITH & WOODS, Louisville; S. C. GRIGGS & CO., Chicago; DAWSON & BROTHERS, Montreal.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK,

Have just published:

HARPER'S MAGAZINE FOR DECEMBER, 1863, commencing a new Vol. 25 cents a Number, $3 00 a year.

HARPER'S WEEKLY and HARPER'S WEEKLY, together, $5 00 a year.

HISTORY OF THE SIOUX WAR AND MASSACRES OF 1862 AND 1863. By ISAAC V. D. HEARD. With Portraits and Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

ROUNDABOUT PAPERS. By W. M. THACKERAY, Author of "The Four Georges," "The English Humorists," "Vanity Fair," "Pendennis," "The Newcomes," "Adventures of Philip," &c. With Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $1 00.

MARY LYNDSAY. A Novel. By the Lady FAITH POWERSCOURT, Author of "The Discipline of Life." 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

ALCOCK'S JAPAN. The Capital of the Tycoon: a Narrative of a Three Years' Residence in Japan. By Sir RUTHERFORD ALCOCK, K.C.B., Her Majesty's Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to Japan. With Maps and Engravings. 2 vols. 12mo, Cloth, $2 50.

MARTIN POLE. A Novel. By JOHN SAUNDERS, Author of "Abel Drake's Wife," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

DAILY WALK WITH WISE MEN. Religious Exercises for Every Day in the Year. Selected, Arranged, and specially adapted, by REV. NELSON HEAD. Large 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

THE BIVOUAC AND THE BATTLE-FIELD; or, Campaign Sketches in Virginia and Maryland. By Captain GEORGE F. NORTON. 12mo, Cloth, $1 25.

ELEANOR'S VICTORY. A Novel. By M. E. BRADDON, Author of "Aurora Floyd," "Eleanor's Victory," "Lady Audley's Secret," &c. With Illustrations. 8vo, paper, 50 cents.

THE RING OF AMASIS. From the Papers of a German Physician. By ELIZABETH C. GRUMMAN. Edited by Owen Meredith. 12mo, Cloth, $1 00.

LIVE IT DOWN. A Story of the Light Ladies. By J. C. HARTWOOD, Author of "Abel Drake's Good Work," "Isabel; or, the Young Wife and the Old Love," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

KAY'S CONDITION OF THE ENGLISH PEOPLE. The Social Condition and Education of the Poor in England. By JOSEPH KAY, Esq., M.A., of Trinity College, Cambridge, Barrister at Law and Travelling Bachelor of the University of Cambridge. 12mo, Cloth, $1 00.

ROMOLA. A Novel. By the Author of "Adam Bede," "The Mill on the Floss," "Silas Marner," and "Scenes of Clerical Life." With numerous Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, $1 25; Cloth, $1 50.

MEMOIR OF THE LIFE AND CHARACTER OF THE HON. THEO. FRELINGHUYSEN, LL.D. By Rev. TALBOT W. CHAMBERS, D.D. With Portrait on Steel. 12mo, Cloth, $1 00.

FANNY KEMBLE'S GEORGIA PLANTATION. Journal of a Residence on a Georgian Plantation in 1838–1839. By FRANCES ANNE KEMBLE. 12mo, Cloth, $1 25.

☞ Any of the above Works sent by mail, post-paid, on receipt of price.

Commencement of the Twenty-Eighth Volume.

HARPER'S

NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE

For December, 1863.

TERMS.

One Copy for one Year	$3 00
Two Copies for One Year	5 00

An Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of Ten Subscribers, at $2 50 each, or 11 Copies for $25 00.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE and HARPER'S WEEKLY, together, one year, $5 00.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers.

Circulation over 100,000.

HARPER'S WEEKLY

Single Copies Six Cents

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year	$3 00
One Copy for Two Years	5 00

And an Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of Ten Subscribers at $2 50 each, or 11 Copies for $25.

TERMS TO ADVERTISERS.—Seventy-five Cents per line for inside, and One Dollar per line for outside advertisements.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers.

IN THE COUNTRY.

FISK & HATCH.

Bankers and Dealers in Government Securities, AND

AGENTS FOR THE UNITED STATES FIVE-TWENTY LOAN,
No. 38 Wall Street, New York.

Great National Work.

EIGHTY YEARS PROGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES, from the Revolution to the Great Rebellion

Twelve men of the first literary talent have been employed on this great work. Time occupied in its execution, nearly four years. Among the long list of parties who have recommended it, are nineteen Presidents of Colleges. Agents wanted to canvass all parts of the country. Supplies will be kept at central points in most of the States. Address L. STEBBINS, Worcester, Mass.

FINE DRESS SHIRTS TO ORDER. UNRIVALLED In Manufacture, Fitting, and Material. At UNION ADAMS, No. 637 Broadway.

Shultz' Onguent, warranted to produce a full set of Whiskers in six weeks, or money refunded. Sent postpaid, by 20 cents. Address C. F. SHULTZ, Troy, N. Y.

IVORY SLEEVE BUTTONS

OR STUDS.—Red, White, and Black, engraved with Initials, for 50c. per pair, will be sent free on receipt of the price by mail. Also of Pearl, $1 00 per set each. For sale by WM. M. WELLING, manufacturer of Ivory goods, 169 Centre St., N. Y., sign of the Golden Elephant.

Learn to Skate in One Hour by using The American Parlor Or Floor Skate. Hard Rubber Rollers, Anti-friction Axles. Frederick Stevens, 215 Pearl Street, New York. 63 Milk Street, Boston.

A GOLD OR SILVER WATCH
And a Gold Chain Free.

NEW ILLUSTRATED PRICE PACKAGE for the Holidays, now out. SPECIAL INDUCEMENTS to AGENTS. Send for our New Circular.
G. S. HASKINS & CO., 36 Beekman Street, N. Y.

A Bad Breath.—The Greatest Curse the human family is heir to. Never until now have it been regarded—how many friends forever parted. The subject is so delicate, your nearest friend will not mention it, and you are ignorant of the fact. To effect a radical cure, use the "BALM OF THOUSAND FLOWERS" as a dentrifice, night and morning. It also beautifies the complexion, removing all tan, pimples, and freckles, leaving the skin soft and white. Price 50 cents. For sale by all druggists. The Trade supplied by HOWARD, SANGER & CO., 195 and 197 Chambers Street, N. Y., and for sale by all Druggists.

Metallic Artificial Legs.

Made of Corrugated Brass or other Metals. Patented Jan. 6th, 1863, by the Universal Joint and Artificial Limb Co.

Weight only Four Pounds.

Soldier's price, $50 ; Civilian's, $75. Send for a Circular. J. W. WILSON, Agt., 691 Broadway, N. Y.

A BEAUTIFUL MICROSCOPE

For 30 cts. (coin received), magnifying small objects 500 times; five of different powers for 75 cts. Mailed free. Address P. C. BOWEN, Box 230, Boston, Mass.

Lands. To all Wanting Farms.

LANDS.—TO ALL WANTING FARMS.—Large and increasing settlements, and best lands in the United States, south of Philadelphia by railroad. Rich soil, produces large crops, which now are very growing. Terms easy. Fifty acres, or more, at from $5 to $20 per acre, payable in one, two, three, four, and five years. Churches, Schools, Academies, schools, and good society. It is now the most improving place East or West. Hundreds are settling and building. The honest will find the place to laid out in unsurpassed. Letters answered. Pamphlets containing reports and giving full information will be sent free. Address CHAS. K. LANDIS, Vineland Post Office, Cumberland County, New Jersey.

From Report of Colon Solomon, Agricultural Editor of the Tribune:—"I am of the same opinion as before, that, in its almost level position and suitable condition for intensive farming that we know of this side of the Western prairies."

Opera and Field-Glasses

Of great power, from $2 50 to $25. Spectacles and $10 Gloves of every description.

B. H. HORN,
Manufacturing Optician,
Salesroom, 212 Broadway, up stairs. Send for circular.

The Soldier's Gift
To the Loved One at Home.

We will deliver Free of freight charge, at any Express Office East of St. Joseph, Mo., any of our beautiful Albums of the value of $5 or more, that may be ordered by members of the Army or Navy of the United States or Friends to friends at home. We manufacture elegant styles of all prices to $25, and upwards.
E. & H. T. ANTHONY,
Manufacturers and Importers,
501 Broadway, N. Y.

A Household Word.—Buy your Housekeeping Articles at BA SHFORD'S, Cooper Institute, New York.

ARMS and LEGS.

Selpho's Patent embedded 74 joints. The cheapest and substitutes for lost limbs can be had only of
WM. SELPHO & SON, 916 Broadway, N. Y.

HOLIDAY GOODS.
Schuyler, Hartley & Graham,
19 Maiden Lane AND 22 John Street,
31 Rue du Chateau d'Eau, Paris, Sands St., Birmingham, England.

French and English Fancy Goods.

PORCELAIN VASES. MANTEL ORNAMENTS. MARBLE CLOCKS. BRONZES. CARD RECEIVERS. PHOTOGRAPH ALBUMS. ORDER AND DISPATCH CASES. CARTON PIERRE WORK-BOXES. LIQUOR CASES. OPERA GLASSES. FANS. LEATHER BAGS. AND FINE AND COARSE JEWELRY.
DIAMONDS, WATCHES, &c.
MILITARY GOODS.—SWORDS.—PISTOLS.—CUTLERY, &c.
FINE ENGLISH SKATES.

$7. WATCHES. $7.

A Beautiful Engraved Gold-Plated Watch, Lever Cap, small size, Patent Movement, perfect time-keeper. Sent free by mail, in neat case, for only $7. A Solid Silver, same as above, $7. Specially adapted to the ARMY. CHAS. F. NORTON & CO., 33 & 40 Ann Street, N. Y.

Fresh Vanilla Ice Cream is prepared, of Aug. 28, with "Messrs. NORTON & CO. have combined two very desirable things in a watch—cheapness and reliability. When it is known that for $7 a person can have an excellent timekeeper, there will be greater punctuality in all the affairs of life."

BLOOD'S HELIX NEEDLES

BLOOD & CO., Manufacturers and Importers, Office 338 Broadway, N. Y. Manufacturers of superior Needles for all Sewing Machines. Send for circular.

GOLD PENS AND CASES.

Retailed at wholesale prices. 14 kt. Gold Pen, Solid Silver Case, $1 50, warranted for one year; guarantee accompanying each Pen. Send for a circular. Pens repointed on receipt of 25 cents.
E. S. JOHNSON, 15 Maiden Lane, N. Y.

MUNN & CO.

Solicitors of American and Foreign Patents,

And Publishers of the ILLUSTRATED SCIENTIFIC AMERICAN, 37 Park Row, N. Y. Pamphlets of information concerning Patents, free. Specimens of the Paper, free.

PREPARE FOR THE HOLIDAYS.
There is no Gift, or Present, which compares with the Craig Microscope and Mountet Objects. As a source of amusement and instruction they are unsurpassed. This Microscope will be sent, postpaid, to any part of the U. S., or with 4 beautiful mounted objects, for $2 50. Address HENRY CRAIG,
335 Broadway, New York.
A liberal discount to the trade.

A New Source of Consolation.

HEAVEN OUR HOME. We have no Saviour but Jesus and no Home but Heaven. Second Edition. Price 75 cts.
This new religious work is having a large sale. The author holds to the comforting belief of the Restoration of Friends in Heaven, which to him is a Home, with a good, and happy, and loving family in it. The whole tone of the work is calculated to cheer and support the weary and afflicted Sojourner on Earth. Mailed, post-paid, on receipt of price, by the Publishers. Agents wanted.
ROBERTS BROTHERS, Boston, Mass.

STEINWAY & SONS'

GOLD MEDAL GRAND AND SQUARE PIANOS are now considered the best in Europe, as well as this country, having received the first prize at the late World's Fair Exhibition in London, 1862.
The principal reason why the Steinway Pianos are so much superior to all others is, that the firm is composed of four practical piano-forte makers (father and four sons), who invent all their own improvements, and under whose personal supervision every part of the instrument is manufactured. Warerooms, No. 82 & 84 Walker Street, N. Y.

E. & H. T. ANTHONY,
Manufacturers of Photographic Materials,
501 Broadway, New York.

Card Photographs.

Our Catalogue now embraces considerably over

FOUR THOUSAND

different subjects (to which additions are continually being made) of Portraits of Eminent Americans, etc., viz.:

12 Major-Generals,	153 Statesmen,
109 Brigadier-Generals,	154 Authors,
150 Colonels,	116 Artists,
92 Other officers,	39 Actors,
30 Officers of the Navy,	27 Singers,
46 Prominent Foreign Officers,	46 Prominent Women,
147 Prominent Foreign Portraits.

2,500 COPIES OF WORKS OF ART

INCLUDING REPRODUCTIONS OF THE MOST CELEBRATED ENGRAVINGS, PAINTINGS, STATUARY, &c.

Catalogue sent on receipt of Stamp.

An assortment of PHOTOGRAPHIC ALBUMS of Card size will be filled on receipt of $1 00, and sent by mail, Free.

E. & H. T. ANTHONY,
MANUFACTURERS OF PHOTOGRAPHIC MATERIALS,
501 Broadway, New York.

Friends or relations of prominent military men will confer a favor by sending us their likenesses to copy. They will be returned in uninjured condition.

EF FINE ALBUMS MADE TO ORDER for Contributions to promote local Fairs, or for other purposes, with suitable inscriptions, &c.

The only unmasked "Patent-ee" Collar made in America. Send 3 cts. for Pattern, or 75 cents for a "Quicker," by Box 5173, and receive it by return mail. American enamelled Metallic Collar Co., 94 Pine St., N. Y.

$15 Per Day Easy $15
And a Watch Free.

Employment for everybody, male and female. 100,000 men, women, and children wanted to act as our Agents in every Town and Village throughout the U. S. to sell our immensely popular, unparalleled, and valuable extra Inducian Paint Stationery, Knives, and YANKEE NOTION PACKAGES, containing fine Writing Materials, such as Pens, Pencils, Portfolios, Envelopes, Blotters, Beautiful Initial, Landscape, Indian Plates, Designs for Needlework, Cottage Sketches, Household Companions, Camp Companions (for Soldiers), Pattern of Ornaments, Letter Writer, Guide, Medical Preparations, Receipts, &c., &c., &c., the Likenesses of Military Heroes, Union Designs, Gems, Pocket Calendars for 1863, YANKEE NOTIONS of all kinds, and many Useful and Fashionable articles, Recipes, Games, Army Advice, &c., &c., &c., the whole worth, if bought separately, many dollars. Price each Package only 25 cents retail. Wholesale rates to Agents very low, from $50 to $500 the CASH required ALWAYS. Our Packages stand same as ever, alone, and above all competitors, and have long been acknowledged as the leading and only real valuable and standard Articles of the kind now manufactured. Packages of all descriptions put up by the 1000 for Sutlers, Peddlers, Wholesale Dealers, &c. Goods sent by Express safe to any Army of the Army South or Southwest. A SPLENDID SOLID SILVER WATCH, ENGLISH MOVEMENTS, and correct timepiece, presented FREE to each person who acts as our agent. Send for our new Circulars, containing Extra Premium Inducements, sent free. S. C. RICHARDS & CO., 102 Nassau St., N. Y. The Great Original, Largest, and Oldest Prize Package House in the World.

AGENTS WANTED.—$2 positively made from 30 cts., or urgently needed by every person. Call and examine, or ten samples sent free by mail for 30 cts ; retails for $2, by R. L. WOLCOTT, 170 Chatham Square, N. Y.

$35 WATCHES. $35
Genuine Full-Jeweled American Lever Watches, in 4 Ounce Coin Silver Hunting Cases, Gold Joints, for $35.

Also every variety of good Watches at equally low rates. All orders from the Army must be pre-paid, as the Express Companies will not take bills for collection on odds.
J. L. FERGUSON, Importer of Watches, 208 Broadway New York.

Remington's

Approved by the Government.

Warranted superior to any other Pistol of the kind. Also Pocket and Belt Revolvers. Sold by the Trade generally.
E. REMINGTON & SONS,
Ilion, N. Y.

ROMAN SCARFS SENT BY MAIL EVERYWHERE

3.000 dozen pure Roman Scarfs.

Made from the Purest and Softest Silk.

These are the most elegant, convenient, and economical Scarfs ever imported, as they are reversible; one Scarf is worth two.

They are much worn in Europe by both ladies and gentlemen. Can be worn in the bosom, sash, or ring.

The whole lot to be retailed at

WHOLESALE PRICES!

Only $1 EACH.

A single Scarf sent by mail on receipt of the cash, and six cents for postage.

Very fine Gold Plated Scarf Pins or Rings

At $1 00 each.

S. W. H. WARD, No. 387 Broadway, New York.

STEEL COLLARS

ENAMELLED WHITE,

Having the appearance and comfort of linen, have been worn in England for the last two years in preference to any other collar, as they are readily cleaned in one minute with a sponge.

To Military Men and Travelers they are invaluable.

Price $1 a piece, or $10 each, sent by Post to the Union on receipt of $1 15.

WHOLESALE AND RETAIL.

AGENTS WANTED in every Town in the Union.

S. W. H. WARD, Sole Agent for U. S., 387 Broadway, N. Y.

FRENCH FLANNEL

OVERSHIRTS,

the largest assortment in New York, $2 75, $3, $3 75 each; all sizes kept long.

A single Shirt sent by mail on receipt of the cost. The cut of measure will be required, and the Collar Size.

Send the size of your neck.

ENGLISH MERINO UNDERSHIRTS AND DRAWERS, $2, $2 25, and $2 50. SCOTCH LAMBS' WOOL UNDERSHIRTS AND DRAWERS. ALPACA FINE WHITE SHIRTS MADE TO MEASURE AT $3d, $3d, $3d, AND $4 PER HALF DOZEN.

Self-Measurement for Shirts.

Printed directions for self-measurement, list of prices, and drawings of different styles of shirts and collars sent free everywhere.

The Cash to be paid to Express company on receipt of goods.

S. W. H. WARD,

No. 387 Broadway, New York.

Fogg's Double-Action Patent Lever SKATE BUCKLE,

Manufactured and for sale on Straps, at wholesale, by F. STEVENS, Manufacturer of Skates, Straps, and Leather Goods, 213 Pearl St., New York, 86 Kilby St., Boston.

MUSICAL BOXES. Only 25g 1, 2, 4, 6, 8, 10, 12, 15, 20, 24, and 36 tunes, and costing from $1 75 to $400 00. A beautiful article for mercantile purposes. Sent by Express or Mail on receipt of the money. Catalogues can be found in the country. Mr. J. PALLIARD, Importer, No. 21 Maiden Lane up stairs, New York.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. VII.—No. 363.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 12, 1863. [SINGLE COPIES SIX CENTS. $3.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1863, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

GUERRILLA WARFARE.—RESCUE OF A WOUNDED OFFICER FROM A BAND OF GUERRILLAS.

CHATTANOOGA.

We reproduce on pages 792 and 793 some more of Mr. Davis's sketches, which he describes as follows:

"THE COURIER LINE.

"HEAD-QUARTERS MAJOR-GENERAL GRANGER, November 14, 1863.

"In many places where the signal officer can not work the excellent arrangement known as 'the courier line' is invaluable.

"Lieutenant Kelly, of the Fourth cavalry, is chief of couriers, and is unceasing in his efforts to render his lines as perfect as may be.

"The stations are distant from each other five miles. In many places the line is a mere trace or trail through the forest. At each station a fresh courier is ever ready to mount as the arriving one is seen approaching, and taking his dispatches he dashes off at a gallop to the next station. In this way we have constant communication with Generals Burnside, Hooker, and Sherman.

"TRAIN OF PACK-MULES ON ITS WAY OVER THE MOUNTAINS.

"The mule is par excellence the animal for this country. Up and down the steep mountain-sides he goes with certain step, where to take a horse would be almost impossible.

"The mail comes to us by pack-mules; so also do a large quantity of stores. The rebels call this arrangement of theirs the 'cracker line.' My sketch shows a train at a point on Walcron's Ridge at sunrise. From this point is obtained an extended and pleasant view of mountain and valley. At the high point a number of birds are ever on the wing, and seeing, as one sees them constantly sailing near the mass of rock, to be on guard.

"STEVENSON, ALABAMA.

"At this place the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad is crossed by the Memphis and Charleston Railroad. The town is unlike Bridgeport, as it has houses in it; so that one does not domicile under the railroad platform, but in a hotel; and such a hotel! The room that one sleeps in has crowded into it every mortal that it can by any possibility be made to contain, besides divers other inhabitants of an enlivening nature.

"I think that space could be found for a sketch of the 'Dive for Grub.' Words fail to give any idea of it. Stevenson is an important place for many reasons; it is strongly fortified and held by General Knipe's division."

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 12, 1863.

THE WORK BEFORE CONGRESS.

BEFORE another number of this Journal is in print Congress will have met and been organized. It will be the first session of the Thirty-eighth Congress.

The work this Congress will have to do will take rank in history, and, if it be well done, will elevate the fame of the body to a level with that of the most distinguished legislative assemblies of the past. But upon it will devolve, in all probability, the readjustment of the political system of the United States, which has been thrown out of gear by the rebellion.

This work, however, can not be commenced on any considerable scale until our armies have made further progress yet. The time has not arrived for attempts to reconstitute State Governments even in Tennessee or Louisiana; and the chances are that, if premature experiments of the kind are made, the rebel sympathizers in those States will contrive to turn them to the advantage of the traitors. Possibly before the assignment of the session which begins next week, the progress of our arms may have been such as to justify appeals to Southern voters. But it would be very unsafe to lay any such experiments just now. So long as the planters of Louisiana and Tennessee can reasonably see reason for hope, however remote, of the success of the rebellion, they can not be expected to use the suffrage against the cause in which their property and churches are involved. When every one, South as well as North, sees that the rebellion is crushed, it will be safe to call upon the Southerners to reconstruct the State governments which they destroyed, and to restore their connection with the General Government. And it will probably devolve upon the Thirty-eighth Congress to determine the conditions upon which this reconstruction and this restoration can be effected. But not just now.

For the present, the most important work of Congress will be amending and readjusting the great measures of the last session. As was natural, experience has developed imperfections in all those measures—though, with one exception, perhaps, all of them are in the main approved by the people.

The financial measures of last session have proved emphatically a success. Government has set about $400,000,000 of paper, and sold nearly $400,000,000 of six per cent. bonds at par. It is doubtful whether this system of finance can be improved; and if the war goes on for another year Mr. Chase will probably pay his way half by fresh issues of paper, and half by loans. It would not do to rely exclusively upon loans, as in a very short time the capacity of the people to absorb bonds would be reached, and they would cease to sell. Nor would it be safe to rely exclusively upon paper issues, as unlimited issues would depreciate indefinitely, and would precipitate the nation into bankruptcy. But by judiciously combining the two a very large amount of bonds can be sold at a fair price, and a very large amount of paper floated without leading to excessive depreciation. No one can yet determine with certainty what is to be the effect of the new interest-bearing legal-tender currency—whether it will facilitate the sale of bonds more than the old kind of legal tender or less. We are rather inclined to think that such issues will not be so readily converted into long bonds as the present currency, which bears no interest. If this view be correct it would probably be prudent to give the Secretary authority to issue more of the legal tenders, whenever, in his discretion, he found that the sale of his long bonds—which is the great desideratum—was retarded by a scarcity of money.

Owing to delays at the Treasury Department, the national currency has not yet been set afloat, and nothing has yet been practically ascertained with regard to the working of the new Banking Law. How it will conflict with existing State laws, how it will affect the money-market, whether it will give any, and if any, what assistance to the Government in the present crisis, are still undetermined problems, on which financiers differ widely. The act of last session will need modification in some important particulars.

On the subject of the army, one or two rather important changes are required. If we are to have black soldiers, and to pay white officers for them, they should be paid as much as white ones. It has been suggested that any Northern State should be allowed to fill its quota with escaped Southern slaves, so as to give to the latter the bounties offered in all Northern States. At present, the Confiscation Act for the benefit of the services of black soldiers escaping from slavery without paying them bounties or even soldier's wages. This is unjust and unreasonable, must be remedied, and will soon have a black army. It is probable that the Conscription Act will be altered, and the price of substitutes reduced to something like the $300 clause has not worked well. Cities, counties, and municipalities, under the lead of terrified demagogues, have in their panic-stricken stepped forward and paid the money for their whole quota. Thus the Government has been compelled to order another draft, and a large draft is short of conscripts. If the $300 clause is retained, it seems likely that a draft may be needed every three months.

New legislation is required on the subject of trade with the States in insurrection. This year that trade has been pretty much under the control of army commanders, supposed to have charge of a cotton-bearing district, and gross frauds and mischief have been the consequence. It would seem desirable to completely stop all trade with the South until the war ends. Of the Confiscation Act the general opinion is that it was a gross mistake and should be repealed. It has not accomplished its object, has enriched the Government to the extent of a dollar; and every useful purpose which it was expected to achieve can be attained by a simple act protecting the rights of squatters on abandoned estates.

Many minor matters will require revision. Some change must be made in the law regulating enlistments for the navy. The exchange of prisoners must be placed on a fixed and permanent basis, and power given to the President to retaliate when our soldiers, prisoners in rebel hands, are maltreated. The case of the vessels burned by Semmes fitted out in foreign countries to prey on our commerce might incidentally be the subject of legislation. The Internal Revenue act will need to be, and likewise require a good deal of alteration, and will give the Committee of Ways and Means no little anxiety.

THE WAR IN JAPAN.

IF we except the blowing of Indian prisoners of war from the mouths of cannon by British soldiers in 1858 and 1859, nothing more atrocious has occurred in the history of our time than the recent bombardment of the town of Kagosima, in Japan, by the British fleet under Admiral Kuper.

The excuse for this outrage was the murder of an Englishman who, with the arrogance of his race, had undertaken to violate one of the regulations of the Japanese, and who paid the penalty of his folly with his life. By way of retribution, the British fleet extorted a large sum of money from the Japanese Government, and, having got this, proceeded to bombard a town as large as Boston, without warning to the women or children. The only excuse which even the British vessels on this occasion actually fabricated himself and his Government on his belief that "at least half the town had been set in flames." And these are the Pecksniffs who abuse Gilmore for using Greek fire against a place from which all women and children had been warned a month before!

It seems likely that the English will find they have an elephant on their hands in Japan. Their relations with the Japanese is to sell them British manufactures. They will discover that they can not bombard them into buying British goods as easily as they bombarded the Chinese Government into repealing the prohibition on imports of opium. The Japanese will fight. The English may destroy half a town here and there, and put to death numbers of helpless women and children, but the population of the Japanese islands, led by the Daimios, will not give up the contest. And we are much mistaken if the Japanese sailors, who are brave and enterprising, do not presently carry the war outside of their own waters.

Bombarding a flourishing sea-port without notice is a very grand achievement, no doubt. But the Gulf of Yeddo is open to sea-port atrocities, and they seldom lead to any thing but disaster.

THE LOUNGER.

A QUESTION TO BE PONDERED AT LEISURE.

THE speech lately delivered by Mr. Fernando Wood at Bergen, in New Jersey, is a good illustration of the marvelous strength of our Government. In the midst of a fierce civil war directed against the very existence of the Government, an orator under its protection deliberately defends the cause of those who are trying to overthrow it; justifies the terrible massacre of loyal citizens, the desolation of their homes, the sufferings occasioned by the rebellion; appeals to the basest prejudices and passions of his hearers as before the bloody riots of the last summer in New York; calmly declares that effort of the Government of the people to maintain itself is simply carnage and fanaticism; and then down attacks the impulse of the united people of the Republic and of the loyal States, which has been so powerful as to call forth all citizens, who maintain their own Government even in tolerating his talk.

Mr. Fernando Wood is the Magnus Apollo of the faction which through the mouths of such friends of law and order as Mr. Chauncey Burr and Mr. Andrews of Virginia, now of Fort La Fayette, and through the newspapers which are their organs, incessantly declare that the Government has destroyed every constitutional right, and has become a military despotism. All any honorable man who has the least sensitive pride in his origin can say about no Government whatever, ancient or modern, has ever passed through such mortal peril with such an absolute respect for every right whatever? Even in its darkest hour, at a time when the most arbitrary action is justified by the nature of the course, the conduct of the Government was less panic-stricken, and more reasonable in the exercise of power, than was ever known. There has not been a moment during the war when any honest and intelligent American has really feared for the liberty of the citizen. The assertion of such danger has been confined entirely to political aspirants out of power like Horatio Seymour, to demagogues like Fernando Wood, to rival Pecksniffers like Mr. Andrews of Virginia. These gentlemen and their newspaper organs represent neither the faith nor the feeling of the loyal people. Before yielding to any policy whatever which they favor, let every man ask himself what would have been the conduct of his own party if it were secure would our liberties, our honor, and our Government have been, had they been intrusted to the guardianship of Andrews, Seymour, Wood, Burr, and Barney?

THE CITY.

IF the city of New York could be taken as a test, there is no man who would not frankly own that the popular system of government is a hollow mockery. The liberty in the world which makes the citizens pay so much and get so little. There is certainly no city in the world where intelligent and decent people suffer more under the hand of knaves with such good humor as in New York. It has now gone so far that no man has any hope of prevailing against the corrupt and vicious, but men pray that corruption may become so flagrant that revolted common sense will rise and succor the city.

The popular system fails here because its success presupposes a certain degree of popular intelligence and conscience. But the most miserable and ignorant of other countries are shut into New York like rivers; they become the willing victims of the word Democracy; they are led by the demagogues who depend upon their votes for success; they are driven to the polls to purchase by their own excesses, and hope to purchase safety by the spell of "fellow-Democrats"; and the result is that the mass of honest, intelligent, and substantial citizens are overborne by those who have no political share or responsible interest in the city, who control the police for his own purposes, the liberty and security of the citizens were really in his power.

When the Democracy came to the success this magistrate of course rebelled, and there was a display of military force before he yielded. Since then the peace of the city has been maintained by the State police, who showed their bravery and capacity in the days of July and the reign of riot produced by the machinations of the former Mayor and his accomplices. If by any chance the police should again fall under the tools of a magistrate elected and bound as the Mayor of New York is, the failure of the police system in the city will be seen even more plainly than it is now.

THE ERIE RAILWAY.

WHILE the great battle rages against the present management of the Central Railroad in this State, the chief practical consideration of the traveler is, how safely, rapidly, comfortably, and cheaply he is transported. If those conditions are satisfied he will be an eminently conservative friend of the present management. But the warmest and the most conservative friend can not widen the gauge of the track, and therefore, for the through traveler to the West, the Erie Railway is the most comfortable.

The poor Erie has had a hard time of it since that famous opening when the President and his Secretaries—Daniel Webster was Secretary of State —and the statesmen—Seward was there and Douglas—all filled the cars and went open-handing through the wilds of Southwestern New York. The poor road has been a by-word at certain times when those days until at last it has lost its old distinctive title and reappears as the Erie Railway.

The change of name in this case beckons a change of nature. The trains now run promptly and safely. The long delays and one or two fearful accidents of extremely chilled night journeys, and, once lost, it is with great difficulty regained. But the new, spacious, well-ventilated, comfortable cars are now unsurpassed upon any road in the country. The officers of the train are quiet and polite, nor are the cars too crowded. The route lies through the noblest scenery, opening at last into the great forests toward Lake Erie. It is somewhat solitary but very grand. You may take the word of an old traveler who has much experience of railroad traveling, that you will not take a more comfortable journey than that upon the Erie Railway.

A PUBLIC NUISANCE.

THE daily papers are very justly attacking the nuisance of oversteered street cars. The various companies which make so much money amass a fair share of it by swindling the public. A man who pays three cents buys so much ride. If he does not get it they have defrauded him. He buys not only transport but accommodation—and although the company may fill him out of the cars, it breaks his part of the contract, the company goes unpunished if it breaks its own part. Here Legislature man wishes his name to smell sweet in the streets of New York—where nothing else does—let him introduce a law to punish these companies, or the companies to obey their charters. Of course he will be confronted by another law. But let him quickly try conclusions and depend upon the gratitude of the public.

It is vain to say that no such law can be enforced; that the rebellious cars are sure to be overcrowded. When there is a law the way will appear. We are all inflexibly punitive enough in the matter; and while every man is, or should be, willing to give his place to a woman, the remedy is in his own hands. It is a cause in which the most corrupted conservative will be willing to agitate.

ABOUT THE BACK-ZONE.

THE events of the last few weeks, glorious and inspiring, have brought out upon the merchant mossy remark that the back of the rebellion is broken. That depends not upon the victories in the field, but upon the spirit of the people. If we suppose that the war was a freak or a burst of illtemper, we shall say, "There, be a good boy and lie down!" But if we believe it a fierce conflict of causes long and deep, we shall be wise let the enemy see how he is doing. If he is in the field should outwit us in council. It will be very easy to surrender the victory and call it magnanimity; to betray the cause of the Government and call it conciliation; to plaster over the cancer and call it peace.

Any use of the triumph of our arms which proceeds upon the assumption that the back of treason is the rebellion will be merely a truce. The laws of human nature are as absolute as those of gravity and the Rebellion. When Cæsar crossed Rubicon to his father's throne the bonfires blazed, the streets were wine, but the return was only a few short seven years long. If slavery should return, modest and deferential, we may cry Peace, peace; but the ghost of Freedom Liberty would answer, never!

Happily slavery in all the chief Slave States is abolished; nor is there any power on earth, except military force, that can restore it. But a period beyond the control of the people of those States, for the freedmen are free by the national authority—can not be extended in illegal. If any State should assume to deprive any part of its citizens of their personal liberty the national power would not forget that the Constitution secures a republican form of government to every State. There is an amusing and dangerous delusion about that the Proclamation is a lull against the Comet, because any State can re-enact a slave system. We should like to see them. They would promptly appear that a single vote of the majority is enough to deprive any portion of the citizens of a State of their natural rights? Of their eyes, for instance, or ears, or of their life or liberty, without crime?

The part of wisdom, therefore, is of course, is to understand the change that has taken place, and adjust ourselves to it. The party at the South and North which has no other principle than the inviolability of slavery—Governor Seymour, for instance, who declares that the Union can not be maintained but by abolishing slavery it had better be destroyed—will make a desperate stand for it in some form. Executive clemency is natural. Let these gentlemen understand that it is not an open question. The rebels must submit to the Government. The lives of their young men, the happiness of their homes, the property, and the slaves which they have sacrificed in the vain hope of slavery are restored. If that is our resolution, the back of the rebellion is exceedingly strained. If not, they are as near victory as ever.

THE LONDON SCANDAL.

THE London loungers, and indeed the world of clubmen and gossip, have a fruitful topic in the scandal about Lord Palmerston. He is Prime Minister of Great Britain, and eighty-four years old, and a lady, whose only wrong was to avoid a "chyster," produces a criminal charge against him of the most disreputable kind. Now so far as appears there is not the slightest foundation whatever for the assertion. It could more easily be the result of a very simple, very common and very obvious conspiracy than be true! No thing is so easy for a shameless husband and wife—and several such are to be found in London —as to conspire in defamation of any conspicuous man of fine life and manners in the hope of reaping money as the price of silence. The mere idle charge, under such circumstances, is a damaging blow. It is a blow, also, to which every public man is exposed. And as the world of clubs and drawing-rooms likes to speculate upon human frailty, there is no escape for the victim, however innocent he may be.

It may be safely said that every chance whatever is against the truth of this charge against Lord Palmerston. He has been a gay man, indeed, but he is eighty-four years old; and he has been for nearly fifty years a prominent figure in European history. Should he be proved guilty, his career ends in public ridicule and a burst of genuine British cant. Is a man of great common sense, peculiarly sensitive to public opinion, perfectly versed in the ways of the world and knowing the exact cost of every step, likely, in his extreme age, to make so silly a surrender of his reputation by putting it in any woman's power? Lord Palmerston is not Mark Antony, nor is Mrs. O'Kane Cleopatra. It is one of the cases in which character and probability must tell even against a direct oath. How they tell with the Queen and with all of London we have already seen. For Palmerston has been a guest at Windsor Castle, and warmly greeted at a civic banquet since the charge was published. No one can really wish him ill. The Jaunty Premier is not a great man. We shall be very loth to believe him a silly son.

LITERARY.

As the holiday season approaches books multiply; and they are for the most part the old annuals. The Longmer does not attempt to mention many new books, and acknowledges no edition by name, even when it is sent. Indeed, there are so kind as to send them to him. But every true Longmer keeps pace a little with current literature.

"Excursions by Henry D. Thoreau" (Ticknor & Fields), for instance, is a very remarkable and delightful book. Mr. Thoreau was a scholar and naturalist before the Concord, Massachusetts, he believed in Concord, in the Indians, and in himself. He had doubts whether, upon the whole, the race had not descended by civilization from a far more profound admiration for the red men as for those who knew the primeval resurrection and much more intimately than any savant. His life and his books are an airy protest against science and civilization, which, after all, but made man one of the best results of each. His observation of the phenomena of nature was most thorough, sympathetic, and penetrating, with a description at once the best in literature. Indeed, in what is called real literature, he is unsurpassed by the writer of shrewd insight, quaint, pure, and vigorous thought, and a delightful play of humor over all, shimmering, cool, and sparkling, like the summer sea-wave. He had no love of moral precedents or religious traditions. The world of to-day he thought as good as Paradise, and God as near to Concord as to Sion. A fresh, sweet, sturdy, noble man. He lived known to a few only, but being dead he speaks to all of us. In "Excursions" he is at his best. The book we have lately had, as well as the most valuable record of exact observation of nature.

Bayard Taylor's "Hannah Thurston" (Putnam) has a very large size in print. It sure to be very eagerly sought, for Mr. Taylor has unquestionably written his name upon the popular heart. His novel writing is of the descriptive order of romance-narrative, and is written in a simple, easy style, which leads the reader pleasantly along, and prevents the undue stress of prominence in the author's thought. Is there any thing sensational or sentimental in the story. The character of Hannah Thurston is one of true womanly delicacy and her position is not venerable Quakeress," is a pathetic and lovely picture. The book is, in Wordsworth's phrase, sensible, shrewd American, precisely the man to show Hannah the relation of theory to life. And yet we shall not be sure of our friend Taylor until the point of the personages of his tale being peculiarly or representatively American. That the tendency of our national life is toward the marvelously called "Reform" is true. It would be tragical if it were not so. But if a writer would depict that tendency in its truly representative types must he not seek further than the Sath Watties, the wives, daughters, and sisters who are swept along upon every great movement like drift-wood and dry leaves upon a stream? If an author will be American, to paint a true American picture of English life during the civil war, could he find any one so grossly Anglo-Saxondom and Fifth Monarchy men? Would an English Briton who knew that the development of British liberty was not such as that, be justified in declare that they were excrescences and not fruits; and that they were in no other sense characteristic than eruptions which show the existence of a foul. Such persons do not explain the great mental and moral movements upon which they are borne wards and wens upon a sturdy giant. So if the object be to draw a truly characteristic picture of American reform-er, to use a pleasanter phrase, the tendency of American civilization—must not the personages exploit its phenomena by their own characters? Instead of Seth Watties and a sonavith free-lover the novelist must attempt the portrait of men like Emerson, Parker, Beecher, Phillips, because these men are truly representative of the forces that control American progress. We can but indicate our feeling upon this point, not elaborate it.

Then, again, is the moral of the story quite clear? Allowing that a recluse, thoughtful semi-Quakeress like Hannah Thurston would hold many crude convictions, still is not the substance of her little speech in the earlier part of the tale exactly what she might have said when the curtain falls upon her happy home? Is it any less proper and womanly for Jenny Lind to sing to the world when its unmarried woman, heartily inspired by her gifts and her powers, than it is to sing to her infant when she is in mother's arms? Is it wrong? This is the author seems to evade, and yet this is the point of the matter. That women ought not to try to do what they can not do, will be readily granted on all sides. That their sex and structure have peculiar adaptations is equally clear. That they ought not to insist upon doing what they can do well is also clear, but no clearer than it is of men. But the question asked by Hannah Thurston is whether women ought to refrain from what God has given them capacity to do, and which neither circumstances nor the consciousness of peculiarities of reason and progress, the movements they so often promote, can justify? Is there in any true American villages the canvas is of a Dutch fidelity; but as a picture of American life "Hannah Thurston" seems to us inadequate, with all its excellences of detail.

Thackeray's "Roundabout Papers" (Harpers) is as characteristic a little volume as he has ever written. Its terse, racy, vigorous, and simple English is a worthy setting for the quaint, shrewd, acute thoughts and sympathies of the author. The essays are upon every-day topics and persons. They are full of the sparkling satire upon our daily absurdities and indiscretions, which abound in all Thackeray's books. But the most delightful of the pages is the undercurrent of quick and generous sympathy more evident. They are the windowseat chat of a man who has had his full interest in life, with the freshness of his enthusiasm, but who warms and praises with all his heart whatever is kindly, honest, and lovely. The old subject of his "cynicism" we shall not open here. But does any man interpret believe that Thackeray underestimated for old times and friends, the simple sympathy with boyhood, the genial delight in honorable endeavor which beams through all his writings? Surely these are consonant with the emotions of a literary ogre or gorilla? There is undoubtedly a little mockery in the tone of the "Round-about" at times, some. The texts are not for naught, the sermons flow from his lips. But the author earnestly cries "Forgive us, miserable sinners!"

ARMY AND NAVY ITEMS.

Surgeon-General Hammond has left Washington, with instructions to proceed to Chattanooga and inspect the hospitals and camps generally in that vicinity. He expects to go to Nashville, and there await further orders.

Mrs. Stonewall Jackson, daughter of Gen. Jackson, was married in Baltimore, with her daughter, and both have been held in custody since the charge was preferred by the United States Surgeon of West Building Hospital, to whom they sent a basket of wine during the battle. The mother of General Winder has also been arrested, which, however, was a mistake, and released on Friday, and has been paroled not to correspond with her friends in the South.

General Michael Corcoran was in Washington last week.

The Boston Traveler states that Lieutenant Coleman and twenty privates colonized, captured in Louisiana recently, were taken to the charge of Major-General Ullman's brigade, and were captured on a reconnoissance to Abbeville, on the 3d inst., by Confederate cavalry.

There can be no longer any doubt of the death of General Sam Houston, of Texas. A letter from an army correspondent at Houston confirms the report. The General is certainly dead. He died at Huntsville, Texas: I am told in a similar way to the death of Gen. Pierce. Pierce Butler and another have administered on his estate."

Captain Casey, formerly a secret agent of the War Department, has been ordered to report to Gen. Dix at Boston Capitol.

Colonel Gibbon has been ordered from Cleveland to the command of the conscript depot at Philadelphia.

At a special meeting of the Board of Trustees of Columbia, New York Harbor, September 30, 1863, Lieutenant-General Cornelius Vanderbilt, United States Navy, was unanimously elected to be dismissed the service, upon the charges of inciting to mutiny and treason, and of disobedience of standing orders, and striking his superior officer. The finding and sentence was approved; but, upon the recommendation of a majority of the court, and of the Brigadier and Chief Engineer of the Department of Virginia, it was ordered the sentence to suspension of pay for two months from the 1st of September.

First Lieutenant W. G. Fitch, Second United States Infantry, has been placed on the retired list on account of disabilities resulting from long and faithful service in the field. He has been assigned to duty with Brigadier-General Hoyt, at Sandusky, Sandusky.

Jefferson Davis was at Orange Court House on Tuesday last. He was the guest of Mr. Barbour.

Major-General Thomas has issued general orders discharging Brigadier-General Negley, Colonel Miller, Colonel Parkhurst, and Colonel Stanley, from the service of the United States, for the following reasons, namely, neglecting duty, disobeying orders, repeated drunkenness, eloping with a married woman, permitting men to plunder, misbehavior in face of the enemy, shameful cowardice, grossly disobeying, dishonest practices, and conduct unbecoming officers and gentlemen.

Robert B. Mitchell, commanding the First Cavalry Division, has been ordered to report to Adjutant-General Thomas, at Washington, for duty.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE BATTLE OF CHATTANOOGA.—FIRST REPORT.

Chattanooga, Nov. 25—7.30 P.M.

To Major-General Halleck:

I assume the battle lasted from early dawn till dark this evening. I believe I am not premature in announcing a complete victory over Bragg.

Lookout Mountain top, all the ridge to the Rossville in Chattanooga Valley, and Missionary Ridge, entire, have been carried, and are now held by us.

U. S. Grant, Major-General.

THE ARMY OF THE CUMBERLAND.

Chattanooga, Nov. 25—Midnight.

To Major-General Halleck, General-in-Chief:

The operations of to-day have been more successful than yesterday, having carried Missionary Ridge from near Rossville to the railroad tunnel with a comparatively small loss on our side, capturing about forty pieces of artillery, a large quantity of small-arms, camp and garrison equipage, and about 6,000 prisoners in the hands of guards.

We captured two thousand prisoners, of whom two hundred were officers, on Lookout Mountain.

We will pursue the enemy in the morning.

The country is full of artillery and horses, so every thing that could be expected.

Missionary Ridge was carried simultaneously at six different points.

George H. Thomas, Major-General.

A COMPLETE VICTORY.

Chattanooga, Nov. 25—10 P.M.

Major-General H. W. Halleck, General-in-Chief, Washington:

I am just in from the front. The rout of the enemy is most complete. Abandoned wagons, caissons, and occasional pieces of artillery are to be met with at every turn.

I think Bragg's force will fully reach sixty pieces of artillery. Many pieces of the enemy's batteries have fallen into our hands. The pursuit will continue to Red Clay in the morning, for which point I shall start in a few hours.

U. S. Grant, Major-General.

GENERAL ORDERS REPORTED.

The report of Quarter-master-General Meigs of the late battle near Chattanooga is published. In it a vast army is sprung upon the enemy, our troops moving upon Missionary Ridge in front, while others took the rebels left in reverse, and the whole was regarded the movement as a dress parade. Full details of the battle are given by General Meigs, who declares that as well directed and so well ordered a battle has not been fought during the war.

LATEST REPORTS.

A dispatch dated Chattanooga, November 30, says:

There has been no fighting in Northern Georgia for the last two days. The enemy are beyond Dalton. The campaign is probably ended. The fruits of the battles are six thousand and two prisoners, forty-eight pieces of artillery, and seven thousand stand of arms. Our casualties will not exceed four thousand. General Hooker has executed Bragg's.

AFFAIRS AT KNOXVILLE.

The last accounts from Knoxville report that a portion of the south part of the town has been burned, including the depôt. The portions burned are supposed to have been those in the lower end of it, occupied by rebel shanghookers, which were destroyed by our shells. General Longstreet is said to have left Knoxville, pursued by forces from Bragg. General Burnside has ample provisions, and can well subsist on the country until General Grant, General Longstreet, however, is probably taken in a trap by the movement of a column of troops in cutting the railroad, and may be compelled, as a desperate resort, to attack Knoxville; but it is said more probable that he must leave his way out, or that his army will be scattered or captured.

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.

The Army of the Potomac advanced on 26th, and secured the commanding heights with Washington, around the Rapidan in three columns. On 27th General Kilpatrick's cavalry skirmished with the enemy's cavalry, and on the fire of the rebel batteries, but were driven back after a brief struggle. The army is now in different position since 26th, at which time the enemy had fallen back from and evacuate the line of the Rapidan and Rappahannock. Our line of battle appears to have been formed on the road leading from Culpeper to Orange Court House, Warren, and Rixeys had pretty strumishing with the enemy, but to-day our skirmishers drove them back and maintained their own position. General French, with the Third Corps, moved from Rixeys, and now held the ground, but captured nine hundred of the rebels, the Fifth Corps, under General Sedgwick, supported him. The Fifth Corps' train was attacked in flank by the rebel cavalry on the plank road, who destroyed fifteen or twenty wagons. General Gregg's cavalry, on the left, had a severe fight with the rebel cavalry, and drove them back over their infantry, and then fell back upon the Fifth Corps, who, in turn, drove the rebel infantry back.

WAITING FOR THE BATTLE.

On Monday evening the two armies were separated by Mine Run, a sluggish stream, which crosses the Fredericksburg plank-road two miles from Orange Court House. The rebels had fortified themselves there, and were supposed to make a firm resistance. The dispatches of correspondence indicate that an assault on the enemy's works at Mine Run by our infantry, under cover of artillery, took place on Tuesday, the 1st inst. The rebels were reported the enemy's position were ordered to open, and officers and men to charge. The enemy finally gave way, and no attack was ordered. General Warren pushed on, and found the rebels in possession of the entire stronger than was anticipated, and passed for further instructions. The rebels had fallen back behind their cheeks, and all fight for the day. This is the latest story we have from the Army of the Potomac. The mail arrived on Sunday say that the two armies were then confronting each other, a fearful fight could not be long postponed.

ESCAPE OF JOHN MORGAN.

General John Morgan and six of his officers—viz.: Captains Bennett, Taylor, Sheldon, Haynes, Hockersmith, and Hines—escaped from the Columbus Penitentiary on Friday by digging through the floor of their cell to a sewer leading to the river. The prisoners were originally charged with his brother Dick from the top cell to the lower tier. The floor of the lower cell is two and a half inches thick, in which a hole was cut, under the bed, leading down into a hole and a half feet sewer, running to the river, and to the Penitentiary. This wall was cut under, and the entry escaped into the open country. The night was dark with heavy rain. All efforts are being made by the authorities for his recapture.

The fugitives have arrived safely at Toronto, Canada.

THE CAMPAIGN IN TEXAS.

Corpus Christi was captured on the 16th ult. by General Banks and Dana, who marched upon that place overland from Brownsville. Aransas City was attacked, and taken after a very brief resistance. One hundred prisoners and three guns were taken. The British brig Alexandria Were was captured by the gun-boat New London off the Rio Grande, with a cargo consisting of seventy thousand dollars in gold and a large quantity of clothing and medicines intended for the rebels.

OUR PRISONERS AT RICHMOND.

The surgeons who have just been released from the horrors of the Richmond prisons have been with a delegation from the Sanitary Commission to the Government, of the cruel treatment to which our captives are subjected. It is a shocking chapter of human suffering and unmitigated barbarism.

HOW WE TREAT REBEL PRISONERS.

Commissary-General Hoffman has returned from his tour of inspection in the West. He visited Johnson's Island, Camp Chase, Indiana, Alton, and other rebel prisons in the West where rebel prisoners are confined. He reports that the rebel prisoners are in excellent condition, well clothed, well fed, in good quarters, and enjoying every comfort that they could desire—considering the nature of the condition of our prisoners in Richmond.

Lieut.-Colonel Hoffman, has been also being erected for the accommodation of such of the Southern chivalry as may be captured in the future. The buildingsare designed to accommodate 50,000 men.

STORES FOR OUR POOR FELLOWS AT RICHMOND.

The following appeals has been issued by George H. Stuart, President of the Christian Commission:

To George H. Stuart, Chairman of the Christian Commission:

Dear Sir,—I have every reason to believe that the goods sent by individuals and the Sanitary and Christian Commissions are delivered to our prisoners.

I would suggest that you send as much as possible.

S. A. Meredith, Brigadier-General.

THE PRESS AT MEMPHIS.

General Hurlbut has issued an order (at Memphis) warning the newspapers published there that they "must cease the publication of reports, anonymous or otherwise, of rations or movements of troops within the Department. No discussion of the policy or measures of the Government will be tolerated, and the editors and publishers of newspapers will be held accountable for the character of articles published from Northern papers. Neither officers nor troops without this command will be the subject of either praise or censure through the newspapers, as neither editors nor correspondents have the right or liberty to give praise where deserved, or to withhold it where deserved."

PRICES HERE AND THERE.

The following table compares the Richmond and Cincinnati prices for a few leading articles of food, in greenbacks and the former in Confederate scrip:

	Cincinnati.	Richmond.
Gold, 1% dollar	$1 45	$15 00
Wheat, 1 bushel	1 20	15 00
Corn, 1 bushel	1 10	12 00
Oats, 1 bushel	70	10 00
Potatoes, 1 bushel	1 00	15 00
Coffee, 1 lb	34	10 00
Sugar, 1 lb	15	4 00
Molasses, 1 gal	60	15 00
Whisky, 1 gal	75	25 00
Prunes Brandy, 1 gal	2 00	100 00
Butter, 1 lb	30	8 00
Eggs, 1 dozen	25	5 00
Potatoes, 1 bushel	1 00	15 00
Beef, 1 lb	12	1 50

MAYORALTY ELECTION.

On December 1 election in Cincinnati was elected Mayor of New York by a plurality of 6000 over Rosie and Blunt.

FOREIGN NEWS.

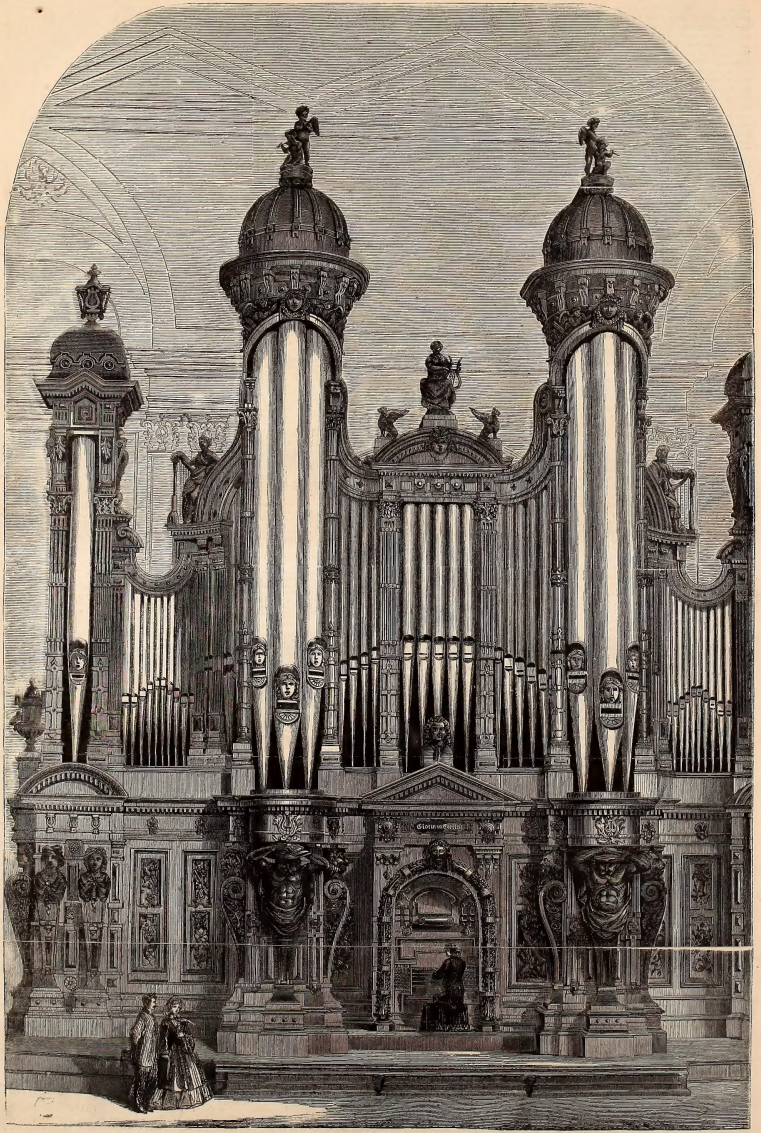
ENGLAND.

THE EUROPEAN CONGRESS.

England has replied to Napoleon's invitation to attend a European congress. The Queen does not give an unqualified acceptance, but asks for further information as to the precise points to be proposed for discussion. A similar correspondence between the two Powers on the subject of Poland.

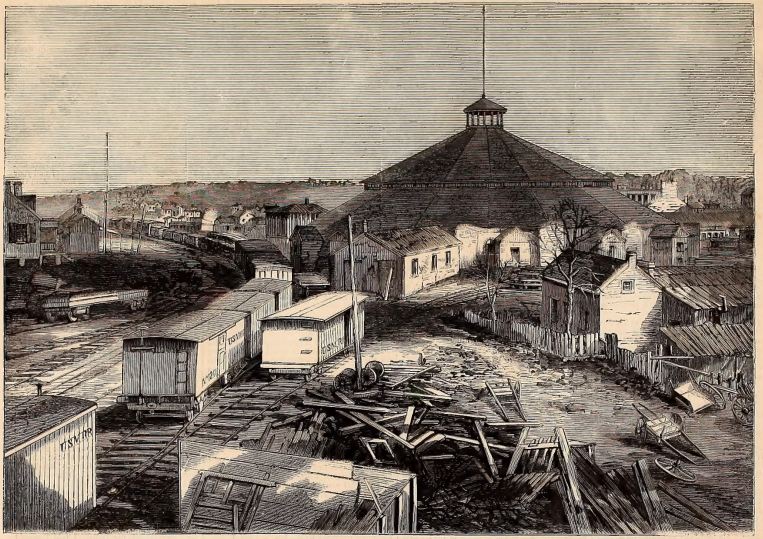
The Papal Government accepts the invitation to attend the congress.

It is thought that most of the other Powers would ask for further communications respecting the bases of the debate in the congress.



THE "GREAT EASTERN."

The steamship Great Eastern has been advertised for sale at auction on the 4th of January, by order of the mortgagees.



FRANCE.

THE COST OF THE MEXICAN FOLLY.

The Government has submitted to the Corps Legislatif a supplementary credit of ninety-one millions of francs, to assist expenses in Mexico.

THE GREAT ORGAN IN THE BOSTON MUSIC HALL.—[See Page 795.]

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC—THE GREAT DEPOT OF SUPPLIES ON THE RAILROAD.

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC—THE BRIDGE OVER BULL RUN—PRESENT APPEARANCE.—[FROM A PHOTOGRAPH.]

VERY HARD CASH.

By CHARLES READE, Esq.

AUTHOR OF "IT IS NEVER TOO LATE TO MEND," ETC.

CHAPTER XLIX.

Julia, as I have said, went to her own room, wounded unintentionally by a chance speech: she sat down sick at heart; and presently opened her window and looked out upon the starry night, and wondered where Alfred was now; that Alfred for whom nobody else had a human heart, it seemed. "Alfred! my poor Alfred!" and sighed, and half-expected to hear him reply. Then she said to herself, "They all called you false but me; yet I was right: and now they all call you mad; but not I: I believe nothing against you. You are my own Alfred still. Where have the wretches driven you to?" At this her feelings carried her away, and she cried aloud on him despairingly, and leaned upon the window-sill, and the tears ran fast for him.

Presently out of the silence of the night seemed to struggle a faint but clear voice:

"Julia!"

She started, and a muffled scream came from her. Then she listened, all trembling. Again the voice sighed, faintly but clear, "Julia!"

"Alfred?" said she, quavering.

"Yes. Pray be cautious; give no alarm. The house is watched; bring Edward."

She flew down stairs, and electrified Edward and Sampson with the news. "Oh, promise me not to betray him!" she cried.

"Hut!" said the doctor, starting to his feet, "what should we betray him for? I'll cure him for you. I can cure any lunatic that has lucid intervals. Where is he?"

"Follow me," gasped Julia. "Stay. I'll get rid of the servants first. I'll not play the fool, and betray him to his enemies." She sent Sarah eastward, and Jane westward, and then led the way through the kitchen door into the yard.

They all searched about, and found nothing. Then Julia begged them to be silent. She whispered, "Alfred!" And instantly a faint voice issued from the top of a wagon laden with hay and covered with a tarpaulin. "Julia!"

They all stood staring.

"Who are those with you?" asked Alfred, uneasily.

"Only friends, dear! Edward and Dr. Sampson."

"Ned, old fellow!" groaned Alfred, "you pulled me out of the fire; won't you help me out of this? I think my leg is broken."

At this Julia wrung her hands, and Edward ran into the house for his rope and threw it over the wagon. He told Julia and Sampson to hold on by one end, and seizing the other was up on the wagon in a moment. He felt about till he came to a protuberance; and that was Alfred under the tarpaulin, in which he had cut breathing-holes with his pen-knife. Edward sent Julia in for a carving-knife, and soon made an enormous slit: through this a well-known figure emerged into the moonlight, and seemed wonderfully tall to have been so hidden. His hands being uninjured, he easily descended the rope, and stood on one leg holding it. Then Sampson and Edward put each an arm under his, and helped him into the house.

After the body the mind. That is the rule throughout creation. They examined, not his reason, but his leg. Julia stood by with clasped hands, and a face beaming with pity and anxiety that repaid his pain. Sampson announced there were no bones broken, but a bad sprain, and the limb very red and swollen. "Now," inquired he briskly of the company, "what is the practice in sprains? Why, leeches and cold water."

Edward offered at once to run and get them.

"Are ye mad?" was the reply. "Daun't I tell ye that is the practice? And isn't the practice sure to be th' opposite of the remedy? So get water as hot as he can bear it, and no leeches."

Julia remonstrated angrily. "Is this a case for jesting?"

"Deevil a jest in it," replied the doctor. "Well, then, if ye must know, th' opera-dancers apply hot water to sprains: now what is their interest? t' expedite the cure. And the faculty apply cold water: and what is their interest? to procrastinate the cure, and make a long job of it. So just hold your tongues, and ring for hot water."

Julia did not ring; she beckoned Edward, and they flew out and soon brought a foot-pan of hot water. Edward then removed Alfred's shoes and stockings, and Julia bared her lovely arms, and blushed like a rose.

Alfred divined her intention. "Dear Julia," he said, "I won't let you: that is too high an honor. Sarah can do that."

But Julia's blood was up. "Sarah?" said she, contemptuously; "she is too heavy handed: and—hold your tongue; I don't take my orders from you;" then more humbly to the doctor, "I am a district visitor: I nurse all manner of strangers, and he says I must leave his poor suffering leg to the servants."

"Unnatural young monster," said the doctor, affecting horror. "G'im a good nip."

Julia followed this advice by handling Alfred's swollen ankle with a tenderness so exquisite, and pressing it with the full sponge so softly, that her divine touch soothed him as much or more than the water. After nursing him into the skies a minute or two, she looked up blushing in his face, and said, coaxingly, "Are you mad, dear Alfred? Don't be afraid to tell us the truth! The madder you are the more you need me to take care of you, you know."

Alfred smiled at this sapient discourse, and said he was not the least mad, and hoped to take care of her as soon as his ankle was well enough. This closed that sweet mouth of hers exceeding tight, and her face was seen no more for a while, but hid by bending earnestly over her work; only as her creamy poll turned pink the color of that hidden face was not hard to divine.

Then Edward asked Alfred how in the world he had escaped and got into that wagon. The thing was incredible. "Mirawculous," said Dr. Sampson in assent.

"No," said Alfred, "it looks stranger to you than it is. The moment I found my pistol was gone I determined to run. I looked down and saw a spout with a great ornamental mouth, almost big enough to sit on; and, while I was looking greedily at it, three horses came into the yard drawing a load of hay. The wagoner was busy clearing the pavement with his wheel, and the wagon almost stopped a moment right under me. There was a lot of loose hay on the top. I let myself down, and hung by the spout a moment, and then leaped on to the loose hay. Unfortunately there were the hard trusses beneath it, and so I got my sprain. Oh, I say, didn't it hurt? However, I crept under the hay and hid myself, and saw Wolf's men come into the yard. By-and-by a few drops of rain fell, and some fellows chucked down a tarpaulin from the loft, and nearly smothered me: so I cut a few air-holes with my pen-knife. And there I lay, Heaven knows how long: it seemed two days. At last I saw an angel at a window; I called her by the name she bears on earth: to my joy she answered, and here I am, as happy as a prince among you all, and devilish hungry."

"What a muff I was not to think of that," said Edward, and made for the larder.

"Dear doctor," said Julia, lifting a Madonna-like face with swimming eyes, "I see no change in him: he is very brave, and daring, and saucy. But so he always was. To be sure he says extravagant things, and stares one out of countenance with his eyes: well and so he always did —ever since I knew him."

"Mayn't I even look my gratitude?" whined Alfred.

"Yes, but you need not stare it."

"It's your own fault, Miss Julee," said Sampson. "While ye're fomenting his sprain the creature's fomenting his own insensate passion. Break every bone in a puppy's body, and it's a puppy still; and it doesn't do to spoil puppies: as ye're spoiling this one. Nlist me, ye vagabin. Take your eyes off the lady; and look me in the face—if ye can; and tell me how you came to leave us all in the lurch on your wedding morn."

Julia fired up. "It was not his fault, poor thing: he was decoyed away after that miserable money. Ah, you may laugh at me for hating money; but have I not good reason to hate it?"

Whist, whist, y' impetuous cracter; and let him tell his own tale."

Alfred, thus invited, delivered one of his calm, luminous statements; which had hitherto been listened to so coldly by one official after another. But the effect was mighty different, falling now on folk not paid to pity. As for Dr. Sampson, he bounced up very early in the narrative, and went striding up and down the room; he was pale with indignation; and his voice trembled with emotion, and every now and then he broke in on the well-governed narrative with oaths and curses, and observations of this kind: "Why dinnt ye kill um? I'd have killed um. I'd just have taken the first knife and killed um. Man, our Liberty is our Life. Dith to whoever attacks it!"

And so Edward, coming in with Alfred's dinner on a tray, found the soi-disant maniac delivering his wrongs with the lofty serenity of an ancient philosopher discussing the wrongs of another, Julia crying furtively into the tub, and the good physician trampling and raving about the room, like what the stoical narrator was accused of being. Edward stopped and looked at them all over the tray. "Well," said he, "if there's a madman in the room, it is not Hardie. Ahem."

"Madman? ye young ijjit," roared the doctor; "he is no madder than I am."

"Heaven forbid," said Alfred, dryly.

"No madder than you are, ye young Pump." This to Edward. "That's an ungenerous skit on his profession," said the maniac.

"Be quite now, chattering," said the excited doctor; "I tell ye ye niver were mad, and niver will be. It's just the most heartless imposture, the most rascally fraud, I've ever caught the Mad Ox out in. I'll expose it. Gimme pninkpapr. Man, they'll take y' again if we don't mind. But I'll stop that: these ineequities can only be done in the dark. I'll shed the light of day on 'em. Eat your dinner, and hold your tongue a minute—if ye can." The doctor had always a high sense of Alfred's volubility.

He went to work, and soon produced a letter headed 'PRIVATE MAD-HOUSES." In this he related pithily Alfred's incarceration, and the present attempt to recapture him, with the particulars of his escape. "That will interest th' enemy," said he, dryly. He vouched for Alfred's sanity at both dates, and pledged himself to swear to it in a court of law. He then inquired what it availed to have sent one king to Phalaris and another to Versailles in defense of our Liberty, since after all that liberty lies groveling at the mercy of Dr. Pill-box and Mr. Sawbones, and a single designing relative. Then he drew a strong picture of this free-born British citizen skulking and hiding at this moment from a gang of rogues and conspirators, who, in France and other civilized countries that brag less of liberty than we do, would be themselves flying as criminals from the officers of justice; and he wound up with a strong appeal to the press to cast its shield over the victim of bad laws and foul practices. "In England," said he, "Justice is the daughter of Publicity. Throughout the world deeds of villainy are done every day in kid gloves: but, with us, at all events, they have to be done on the sly: here lies our true moral eminence as a nation. Butter then your 'fiat lux.' Cast the full light of publicity on this dark villainy, and behold it will wither, and your oppressed and injured fellow-citizen be safe from that very hour."

He signed and read it out to them, or rather roared it. But he had written it so well he could not make it bad by delivery. Indeed, he was a masterly writer of English you must know. Julia was delighted; but Alfred shook his head. "The editor will not put it in."

"Th' editor! D'ye think I'm so green as to trust t' any one editor? D'ye think I have lived all these years and not learned what poor cowardly things men are? Moral courage! where can you find it? Except in the dickshiunary? Few to the world their honest thoughts avow; the groveler, policy, robs justice now,

> And none but Sampson dares to lift a hand
> Against the d—d corruption of the land.

Now, lad, I'm off to my printer with this. They are working night and day just now: there will be two hundred copies printed in half an hour."

"And me, doctor!" said Julia. "Am poor I to have no hand in it? How cruel of you. Oh pray, pray, pray let me help a little."

"Put on your bonnet, then, this minute," said he: "in war never lose a minute."

"But I am so afraid they may be lying in wait for him outside."

"Then we'll give them a good hiding: there are three of us; all good men and stanch," said the indomitable doctor.

"No, no," said the pugnacious Alfred. "Julia does not like fighting; I heard her screaming all the time I was defending myself on the stairs: let us be prudent: let us throw dust in their eyes. Put me on a bonnet and cloak."

"And a nice little woman you'll make, ye fathom."

"Oh, I can stoop—to conquer."

Julia welcomed this plan almost with glee, and she and Edward very soon made a handsome, brazen-looking trollop six feet high. Then it had to stoop, and Edward and Julia helped it out to the carriage, under the very noses of a policeman and a keeper, who were watching for Alfred: seeing which—oh frailty of woman!—the district visitor addressed it aloud as her aunt, and begged it to take care: which she afterward observed was acting a falsehood, and "where was her Christianity?"

Alfred was actually not recognized: the carriage bowled away to the great printing-house; it was on that side the water. The foreman entered into the thing with spirit, and divided the copy, small as it was, among two or three compositors: so a rough proof was ready in an incredibly short time: the doctor corrected it; and soon they began to work off the copies. The foreman found them Mitchell's newspaper list, and envelopes by the hundred, and while the copies were pouring in, all hands were folding and addressing them to the London and provincial editors. The office lent the stamps. The doctor drove Alfred to his own lodgings, and forbade him to reappear in Pembroke Street until the letter should come out in the London journals.

That night the letters were all posted, and at daybreak were flying north, south, east, and west. In the afternoon the letter came out in four London evening papers, and the next morning the metropolis and the whole kingdom were ringing with them, and the full blaze of publicity burst upon this dark deed.

Ay, stout Sampson, well you knew mankind, and well you knew the nation you lived in. Richard Hardie, in the very act of setting detectives to find Alfred's lurking-place, ran his nose against this letter in the Globe. He collapsed at the sight of it; and wrote directly to Dr. Wolf inclosing it, and saying that it would be unadvisable to make any fresh attempt. His letter was crossed by one from Dr. Wolf, containing Sampson's thunder-bolt extracted from the Sun, and saying that no earthly consideration should induce him to meddle with Alfred now. Richard Hardie flung himself into the train, and went down to his brother at Clare Court.

He was ill at ease. He felt like some great general, who has launched many attacks against the foe, very successful at first, then less successful, then repulsed with difficulty, then repulsed with ease, till at last the foe stands before him impregnable. Then he feels that ere long that iron enemy will attack him in turn, and that he, exhausted by his own onslaughts, must defend himself how he can. Yet there was a pause; he passed a whole quiet peaceful day with his brother, assuring him that the affair would go no farther on either side; but in his secret soul he felt this quiet day was but the ominous pause between two great battles; one of the father against the son, the other of the son against the father.

And he was right: the very next day the late defender attacked, and in earnest. But for certain reasons I prefer to let another relate it:

Hardie v. Hardie.

"Dear Sir,—If you had been in my office when I received your favor of yesterday relating deft.'s ruffian-like assault, you would have seen the most ridiculous sight in nature, videlicet, an attorney in a passion. I threw professional courtesy to the winds, and sent Colls off to Clare Court to serve the writ personally. Next day he found the deft. walking in his garden with Mr. Richard Hardie. Having learned from the servant which was his man, he stepped up and served copy of the writ in the usual way. Deft. turned pale, and his knees knocked together, and Colls thinks he mistook himself for a felon, and was going to ask for mercy, but Mr. Richard stopped him, and said his attorney was Messrs. Heathfield, in Chancery Lane; and was this the way Mr. Compton did business? serving a writ personally on a gentleman in weak health. So Colls, who can sneer in his quiet way, told him 'No,' but the invalid had declined to answer my letter, and the invalid had made a violent attack upon our client's person, avoiding his attorney, 'so, as his proceedings are summary, we meet him in kind,' says little Colls. 'Oho,' says Mr. Richard, 'you are a wit, are you? Come and have some luncheon.' This was to get him away from the weaker brother, I take it. He gave Colls an excellent luncheon, and some admirable conversation on policy and finance: and, when he was going, says this agreeable host, 'Well, Mr. ——, you have had your bellyful of chicken and Madeira; and your client shall have his bellyful of law.' And this Colls considers emphatic but coarse.

"I am, yours faithfully,

"John Compton.

"P.S.—Colls elicited that no further attempt will be made to capture you. It seems some injudicious friend of yours has been writing to the newspapers. Pray stop that."

On receiving this letter, Alfred bought another double pistol, loaded it, hired a body-guard of two prize-fighters, and with these at his heels, repaired to 66 Pembroke Street. No enemy was near: the press had swept the street alike of keepers and police with one Briarean gesture. He found Julia and Edward in great anxiety about their father. The immediate cause was a letter from Mrs. Dodd, which Edward gave him to read: but not till he had first congratulated him heartily on the ægis of the press being thrown over him. "The 'Tiser has a leader on it," said he.

Mrs. Dodd's letter ran thus:

"My dear dear Children,—I am coming home to you heart-broken, without your poor father. I saw an East Indian ship go to sea, and some instinct whispered, suppose he should be on board that ship! But, foolishly, I did not utter my thoughts: because they call these instincts women's fancies. But now even Mr. Green thinks he is gone to sea, as the town has been ransacked, and no trace of him can we find. I met my cousin, Captain Bazalgette, here, and he is promoted to the Vulture frigate, and sails to-day. I have told him all our misfortunes, and he has promised to overhaul that merchant ship if he comes up with her: but I can see by the way his eye shuns mine he has no real hopes. His ship is the swifter, but he may pass her in the night. And then he is bound for New Zealand, not India. I told Reginald my poor husband's expression of face is altered by his affliction, and that he takes himself for a common sailor, and has his medal still round his neck. Our cousin is very kind, and will do all he can. God can protect my darling at sea, as he has ashore: and in his power alone have I any trust. Any further stay here is vain: my heart, too, yearns for my other treasures, and dreads lest while I am here, and because I am here, some evil should befall you too. Expect me soon after this letter, and let us try and comfort one another under this the heaviest of all our many troubles.

"With sad heart, I am,

"Both my darlings' loving mother and friend,

"Lucy Dodd."

In the discussion of this letter Alfred betrayed a slight defect of character. He pooh-poohed the calamity: said David had now a chance, and a good one, of being cured: whereas confinement was one of the common causes of insanity even in sane persons. And he stoutly maintained that David's going to sea was a happy inspiration. Edward colored, but deigned no reply. Julia was less patient, and though she was too loving and too womanly to tell Alfred to his face he was deceiving himself and arguing thus indirectly to justify himself in taking her father out of the asylum at all, yet she saw it, and it imparted a certain coldness into her replies. Alfred noticed this, and became less confident and louder, and prodigiously logical.

He was still flowing on with high imperious voice, which I suppose overpowered the sound of Mrs. Dodd's foot, when she entered suddenly, pale and weary, in her traveling-dress.

Alfred stopped, and they all started to their feet.

At sight of Alfred she stood dumbfoundered a single moment; then uttered a faint shriek; and looked at him with unutterable terror.

He stood disconcerted.

Julia ran, and throwing her arms round Mrs. Dodd's neck, entreated her not to be afraid of him: he was not mad; Dr. Sampson said so. Edward confirmed her words; and then Julia poured out the story of his wrongs with great gushes of natural eloquence that might have melted a rock, and, as anti-climax is part of a true woman, ended innocently by begging her mother not to look so unkindly at him; and his ankle so sprained, and him in such pain. For the first time in her life Mrs. Dodd was deaf to her daughter's natural eloquence; it was remarkable how little her countenance changed while Julia appealed; she stood looking askant with horror at Alfred all through that gentle eloquent appeal. But nevertheless her conduct showed she had heard every word: as soon as ever her daughter's voice stopped she seemed to dilate bodily, and moved toward Alfred pale and lowering. Yes, for once this gentle quiet lady looked terrible. She confronted Alfred. "Is this true, Sir," said she, in a low stern voice. "Are you not insane? Have you never been bereft of your reason?"

"No, Mrs. Dodd, I have not."

"THEN WHAT HAVE YOU DONE WITH MY HUSBAND, SIR?"

CHAPTER L.

It was a thunder-bolt. Alfred hung his head, and said humbly, "I did but go up stairs for one moment to wash my hands for dinner; and he was gone."

Mrs. Dodd went on in her low stern voice, almost as if he had not answered her at all: "By what right did you assume the charge of him? Did I authorize you to take him from the place where he was safe, and under my eye?"

Alfred replied soberly: "He was not very safe, for he was almost burned to death. The fire liberated him, not I. After the fire I ran away from him: he followed me; and then what could I do? I took the best of it: and I took up my own desires to try and cure him. He longed for the sea: I tried to indulge him: I hoped to bring him back to you sane: but fate was against me. I am the most unfortunate of men."

"Mr. Hardie," said Mrs. Dodd, "what you have done was the act of a madman; and, if I believed you to be any thing but a madman, the sight of you would be intolerable to me; for you have made me a widow, and my children orphans."

With this she gave a great shudder, and retired in tears.

Alfred rose, pale and defiant. "That is her notion of justice," said he, bitterly; "pray it is yours, you two?"

"Well, since you ask my opinion," said Edward, "I think it was very presumptuous of you to undertake the cure of my father. You had undertaken it, you ought not to have left him a moment out of your sight."

"Oh, that is your opinion, is it? And you, dear Julia?"

Julia made no reply, but hid her face in her hands and sighed deeply.

"I see," said Alfred, sorrowfully. "Even you are against me. Young judge by first impressions not the motive. There is no justice in this world for me. I'm sick of life. I have no right to keep the secret of the house on fire from my room: there, I'll go: my heart is broken. No it is not, and never shall be, by any thing that breakhs. Mr. Edward Raven, I have got one friend left in this bitter world: and I'll make her the judge whether I have deserved this last injustice. I'll go to my sister."

He jumped up and hobbled slowly across the room, while Julia and Edward sat with their faces done by those five little words, so simple, so natural, yet so incredible, and to the hearers so awful. They heard, they understood, they apprehended, staring at him, while he hobbled across the room to go to his sister.

As he opened the door to go out he heard stout Edward groan and Julia utter a low wail. But of course he had no idea what it meant. He hobbled down a floor or two. But, no: he had gone far, there was a hasty whispering in the drawing-room. Mr. Edward jumped up with a great agitation, and begged him to return; Julia must speak with him. He turned; and his face brightened, Edward saw that, and sparkled in his own face away and stammered out, "Forget what I said to you. I am your friend, and always must be for her sake. No, no, I can not come in there with you; I'll go and comfort mamma. Hardie, old fellow, we are very unhappy, all of us: We are too unhappy to quarrel."

These kind words soothed Alfred's sore heart. He brightened up and entered the drawing-room. He found Julia standing in the middle of it, the color of ashes. Alfred was alarmed. "You are unwell, dearest," he cried; "you will faint. What have I done with my ungoverned temper?" He moved toward her with a face full of concern.

"No, Alfred," said she, solemnly, "I am not ill. It is serious, deep sorrow for one I love better than my own world. Sit down, and hear my poor Alfred; and oh God help me to speak to him!"

Alfred began to feel dire misgivings.

"Yes," said she, "I love you too well to let any hand but mine wound you." And here she took his sinewy hand with her soft palm. "I want to soften it in the telling: and ah, how can I? Oh, why is not throw upon me? Alfred, soul between you and all trouble, all sorrow?"

"My Julia," said Alfred, gravely, "something has happened to Jim."

"Yes, Alfred. She met with a terrible accident."

"Ah!"

"She was struck by an unfortunate man; he was not in his right mind."

"Struck? My sister struck. What, was there no man by?"

"No. Edward nearly killed the man afterward."

"God bless him."

"Oh, Alfred, be patient. It was too late."

"What, is she hurt seriously? Is she disfigured?"

"No, Alfred," said Julia, solemnly; "she is not disfigured: oh, far from that."

"Julia, you torture me. This comes of shutting her brother up. May Heaven's eternal curse light on those who did it. My poor little sister! How can weep, Julia! My heart is lead."

"I weep for you, darling; not for her."

"Ah, that is how they talk when those we love are— One word: I shall never see my poor little Jenny again; shall I?"

"Yes, Alfred: if you will but follow her steps and believe in Him who soothed her last hour, and made her face shine with joy like an angel's while we all wept around; oh dear, oh dear, oh dear, he said he had but one true friend in the world. Alas! it is so; you have but no now, who pity you and love you more than heart can utter; my own, my beloved, my bereaved."

What could soften such a shock as this? It fell, and his anguish was frightful, all the more so that he ascribed the calamity to his imprisonment, and mingled curses and threats of vengeance with his bursts of grief. He spurned the consolations of religion: he said heaven was as empty as earth, as cruel as hell.

She cried out, and stopped his mouth with her hand: she implored him to remember his mother, and prayed aloud for him: and when at last his agony found vent in tears, she put her innocent arms round his neck and wept with him.

Every now and then the poor fellow would almost shriek with remorse. "Oh, if I had only been kinder to her! if I had but been kinder to her!"

"You were kind to her," said Julia, softly, but firmly.

"No, no: I was always sneering at her. And why? I know myself better than you do: but my little mind fixed on a few phrases she had picked up from others, and I— He could say no more, but groaned with anguish: and let his remorse be a caution to us all. Bereaved we all must be, who live on and on: but this, bereavement bitterest pang, who can bear it?

"Alfred," said Julia, "do not torment yourself. We girls are little about a few sarcasms; it is the cold heart that wounds. You love her, Jane, and she knew it well, and joyed in it. You were always kind to her child, and that loving thoughts were for you. It was for she asked, and made your father send for you. And, hoped your prayer. And, Alfred, her last act was to write a few words to you, and trust them to her who she knew loved you better than herself, and who, I know, is in her wish, let us try and read them together, the last words of a saint (I have never seen them), and, if they do not soothe your grief, they will lift you think you were not a good brother to her you and I, and poor, poor Edward have hurt."

He made a sad sign of assent; and Julia rose and got the paper from her desk. The two fond ten words reappeared on the scene in a somewhat remarkable way, I will only say here, that when these poor creatures came to read them, and to turn burst out sobbing, so that they could not: so they held the paper, and tried to see the words in it through streaming eyes. And these two mourners had the room to themselves till midnight; for even Mrs. Dodd's humble respect for Alfred that, as soon as Julia, she was one of those who rise with the occasion: she took his wife and angel from heaven to her bereaved lover through all those bitter hours.

CHAPTER LI.

No life was ever yet a play: I mean an unbroken sequence of dramatic incidents. Calms will come, unfortunately for the novelist, in the best of plays. And I remember seeing it objected to novelists, by a young gentleman just putting his foot into the world, that "Critic-cism," that the writers aforesaid suppress the small intermediate matters which lie, and which come by the score between each brilliant event, and so present the ordinary and the extraordinary parts of life in fair proportion. Perhaps it is this remark had been offered by way of contrast between events themselves and all mortal attempts to reproduce them: for, on the stage, it would have been philosophized; but it is was a strange error to denounce the practice as destructive of probability. Probability is the last one trait the novelist and dramatist have in common with the evangelist. Those pupils skip fifteen years of the most interesting life Christ ever has witnessed, relating Christ's birth in full, and starting from his boyhood to his manhood every events of his thirtieth and subsequent years. And all the inspired histories do much the same thing. The truth is, that between dramatic, historic, chronicles, reports of trials at law, in a word, all narratives true or fictitious, except those which true or fictitious, the nobody's abridge the uninteresting facts as Nature never did, and dwell as Nature never did on the interesting ones.

Can nothing, however, be done to restore, in the reader's judgment, the proportion of the "sensational" and "the soporific," which all writers, that have readers, distort? Nothing I know without a hint my own manner, which something with it. And, therefore, I throw myself on the intelligence of my readers; and ask them to quick realize, by imagination, and no measure of time, and that to a year big with strange events, on which I have therefore dilated in this story, succeeded a year in which the brilliant things happened to the personages of this tale: in short, a year to be skimmed by as chronicler or novelist, and yet (mind you) a year of three hundred and sixty-five days six hours, or thereabouts, and as long as any other year. Into obtrusive troubles of our friends' hearts, especially the female hearts, their doubts, divisions, distresses, did not enter. Nothing of the kind this year I propose to divide into topics, and so to go by logical, rather than natural sequence of events.

The Lovers.

Alfred came every day to see Julia, and Mrs. Dodd invariably left the room at his knock.

At last Julia proposed to Alfred not to come to the house for the present; but to accompany her on her rounds as district visitor. "To see and soothe the bitter calamities of the poor had done her own heart good in its worst distress, and she desired to apply the same medicine to her beloved, who needed it: that was one thing: and then another was, that Mrs. Dodd was always rising when her mother left the room at that beloved knock: and to be angry with her poor widowed mother was a sin. "She is as unfortunate as I am happy," thought Julia; "I have got mine back."

Alfred assented to this arrangement with rather an ill grace. He misunderstood Julia, and thought she was sacrificing him to what he called her mother's injustice. This indeed was the interpretation any mean would have been pretty sure to put on it. His soreness, however, did not go very far; because she was so kind and good to him when they were together. He used to escort her back to the door of 66: and look imploringly; but she never asked him in. He thought her hard for this. He did not see the tears that flowed for that mute look of his the moment the door was closed; tears she innocently ministered to the sight of them would make him as unhappy as his imploring look made her. Manvis called! She should have called on Alfred. Oh, we men are very unjust, we like our sweet-hearts to be unhappier; that exercises us.

But when this had gone on nearly a month, and no change, Alfred lost patience: so he implored one day at the door to make a request. He asked Julia to marry him; and so put an end to this state of things.

"Marry you, child!" cried Julia, blushing like a rose with surprise and pleasure. "Oh, for shame!"

But the first thrill, she appealed to his candor whether that would not be miserably selfish of her to leave her poor mother in her present distressed condition. "Oh, Alfred, as pale, as spiritless, and inconsolable! My poor, poor mother!"

"You will have to decide between us two one day."

"Heaven forbid!" said Julia, turning pale at the very idea. But he repeated doggedly that it must come to that, sooner or later. Then he reminded her of her solemn engagement, and put it to her whether it was a moral proceeding in her to go back from her plighted troth? What had he done to justify her in thus turning back from her word? "I admit," said he, "that I have suffered plenty for your sake: but what have I done?"

Undeterred by the fear of immorality, the monotonous plea was the one reply to his many form reasons: "This is no time for me to abandon my mother."

"Julia, it is her you love; you don't care for me," snapped Alfred.

"Don't, dear Alfred?" murmured Julia.

"Forgive me! I'm a ruffian, a wretch."

"You are my Alfred. But oh, have a little patience, dear love."

"A little patience? I have the patience of Job." But even his went at last.

[I ought to say that they were in the passage now. The encroaching youth had gained an entrance by agitating her so at the door that she had to open it to hide her eyes (shame from the public.] She now gently reminded him how much happier they were than they had been a few months ago. "Ah, but then," said she, "I am almost happy: happier than I ought to be; but he quite so, but that I see you disconsented."

"Ah, you have so many about you that you love: I have only you."

"And that is true, my poor Alfred."

This softened him a little; and then she interwove her fingers with his, and so put back palms softly on his shoulder (you never saw a male do that, and never will), and implored him to be patient, and to trust her. "Oh," said she, "if you knew the distress it gives me to refuse to you my thing on earth, you would be generous, and not make me, by your hasty words, put out my lips sweet say 'no.'"

This touched him altogether, and he said he would not torment her any more.

But he went away discontented with himself for having given way. Lord did not smile at "yielding," but "being defeated." And as he was not only very deep in love, but by nature masterful, he, in the course of the afternoon, No. 66, and made hot love to her, as hot as if the attachment was just forming. Her mother could not go out that day, so the door directly: she could not go out he was at her heels. This passed but of Alfred thrilled her through the sense of sweet and hot pursuit: but, by-and-by, situated as she was between him and her mother, it worried her a little at times, and made her nervous. She spoke a little sharply to him now and then. And that it was new. It came to her notice that he did not like it. And so she used him to go back to Oxford. "I shall be the ruin of your mind if we go on like this," said she, wisely.

"What, leave the field to my rivals? No, no, love."

"What rivals, Sir?" asked Julia, drawing up.

"Your mother, your brother, your curates that would come after the moment I left your sick people, who back on your smiles and your sweet voice till I envy them; Sarah, whom you permit to be much more lovely than the gave you play on, the air you deign to breathe and brighten, every body and every thing that is near you. No: stay at home, Julia; and shall I resign you to them, and leave myself desolate? I'm not such a fool."

She smiled, and could not help feeling it was sweet to be pestered. So she said with matronizing dignity, and she and Julia consistently, "You are a foolish, impetuous boy. You are the plague of my life: and the sun of my existence." That passed off charmingly. But presently his evil genius prompted Alfred to endeavor to soften Mrs. Dodd by letter, and induce her to consent to his marriage with her daughter.

He received her answer at breakfast-time. It was a wonderful production, and cold: a well designed unmixed surprise at the proposal, and said that insanity being unfortunately in her own family, and the suspicion of insanity resting on himself, such a union was not to be thought of; and therefore, notwithstanding her respect for his many good qualities, she must decline with thanks the honor he offered her. She inserted a poisoned sting by way of postscript. "When you succeed in publicly renouncing the impression your own relations share with me, and when my husband owes his restoration to you, instead of his destruction, of course you will receive a very different answer to your proposal—which, even then I think you cannot with your dignity to renew it."

As hostile testimonies used to leave the disinherited one shilling, not out of a shilling's worth of kindly feeling, but that he might not be able to say he was wholly omitted through inadvertency, so Mrs. Dodd inserted this postscript merely to clench the nail and tantalize her enemy. It was the master-piece of feminine spite.

She would have been not a little surprised could she have seen how Alfred received her missive.

He sat in a cold stupor of dejection for a good half hour.

Then he lifted up his head, and said, quietly, "I'll get the trial over, and my sanity established, as soon as possible: and then I'll buy a yacht and hunt her husband till I find him."

Having settled this little plan he looked out for Julia, whose sympathy he felt in need of after such a stern blow.

She came out much later than usual that day, for she had been with her mother for the second time to show her Alfred's letter, and her answer.

"Ah, mamma," said poor Julia, "you don't love me as she does."

Mrs. Dodd sighed at this reproach, but said she did not doubt it. The mother in her senses would consent to such a match.

Julia bowed her head submissively and went to her darling. Alfred was waiting for her: he opened-mouthed to complain of her mother's cruelty, she stopped him at once, and asked him if he was willing to go and visit Jim, unreasonable letter. Why had he not consulted her first? He was subjected yourself to a rebuff, said she, angrily. "I could not think I should have saved you. It is nothing that concerns you. Let us go and see poor darling, and spending hours together? Do you think she does no violence to her own wishes here? and is she to meet with no return?"

"What, are you against me too?" said poor Alfred.

"No, it is you, who are our enemy with your unreasonable impatience."

"I am not so cold-blooded as you are, certainly."

"Humility and penitence would become you better than to retort on me: I am not the one to stray God on my knees to show me how to do my duty to both."

"Then it is you are not single-hearted like me. You want to please all the world, and reconcile the irreconcilable. It won't do: you will have to choose between your mother and me at last."

"Then of course I should choose my mother."

"I'll stay?"

"Because she claims my duty as well as my love; because she will be bowed down with sorrow, and needs her daughter just now more than you do; because you are my other self, and we must stay by ourselves."

"We have no more right to be unjust to ourselves than to any body else: injustice is injustice."

"Alfred, you are a high-minded Heathen, and talk Morality. Morality is a snare. What does it lead to? Why, nothing but a bear-leader was, and to deny myself; and you make it, oh, so difficult."

"But I suppose it will end in turning out your heathen and then taking your curate. Your moral sense would commend to that course."

"Alfred," said Julia, with dignity, "these words are harsh, and, forgive me for saying so, they are coarse. Such words as these insult us two, without my mother, if I were to hear many of them; for they take the bloom off affection and leave only the aspect without the grace. A gentleman and lady could be blessed in holy wedlock."

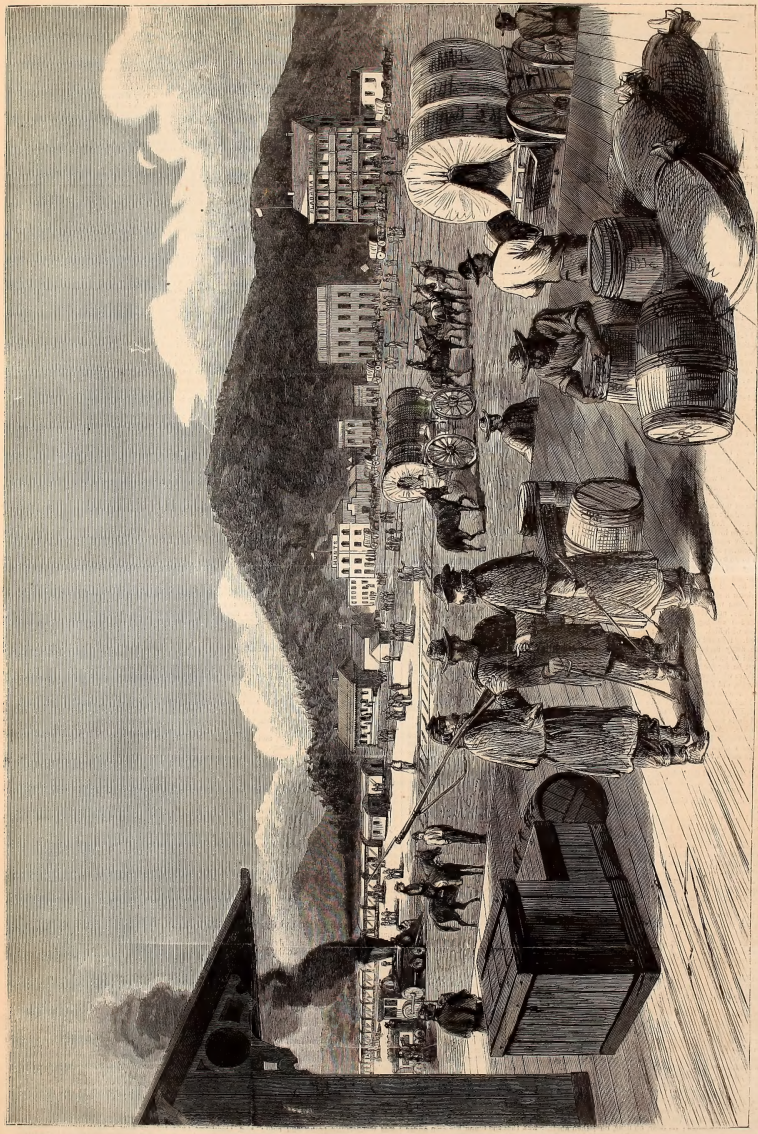
Alfred was staggered and mortified too: they walked on in silence now.

"Alfred," said Julia, at last, "do not think me behind you in affection, but wiser, for once, and our best friend. I do think we had better not see each other for a time. Pray, pray for Alfred."

"And why for a time? why not forever?"

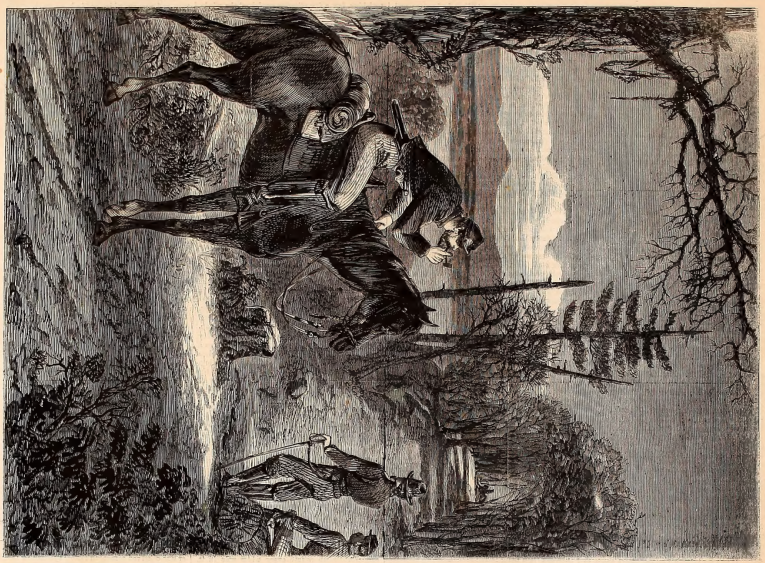
"If your heart draws no distinction, why not, indeed?"

"Thank you for that, dear Alfred: may you find some one who can love you more than I do."



The words choked her. But he was stronger, because in a passion. He reproached her bitterly. "If I had been as weak and inconstant as you are, I might have been cured of Drayton House long before I did escape. But I was faithful to my one love. I have some right to think Alfred knows you have been. You are no angel of beauty and goodness: you will go to Heaven, and I shall go to the devil now for want of you. But then you have no consistency nor true fidelity: so that has parted us, and now nothing in left me but to try and hate you."

The forced furiously on his heel.



"God bless you, go where you will," faltered Julia.

He replied with a fierce ejaculation of despair, and dashed away.

Then pride and sexual misunderstanding triumphed, after so many strange and bitter trials had failed.

THE ARMY OF THE CUMBERLAND—STEVENSON, ALABAMA.—FROM A SKETCH BY MR. THEODORE R. DAVIS.—[SEE PAGE 786.]

THE ARMY OF THE CUMBERLAND—THE COURIER LINE—FROM A SKETCH BY MR. THEODORE R. DAVIS—[SEE PAGE 796.]

THE ARMY OF THE CUMBERLAND—PACK-MULES IN THE MOUNTAINS—SKETCHED BY MR. THEODORE R. DAVIS.—[SEE PAGE 796.]

BLOCKADE-RUNNING EXPERIENCES.

In the winter of 1860-'61 I was a resident of a Southern city on the Atlantic coast. I had resided there for nearly fifteen years, except during the very warm months and an occasional business trip to Europe. My business was "commission-agency;" that is, I generally bought the great staple and shipped it to Liverpool, or elsewhere, on order, for the usual charges. Occasionally I purchased on my own account, sometimes realizing large profits, and sometimes suffering large losses. On the whole, my business career was reasonably successful. In the fall of '60 I was in the full tide of prosperity, and felt that a year or two more "as of like fish" would give me enough on which to live handsomely without business for the remainder of my days. Such hopes were, however, soon and violently blasted.

I have good reasons for feeling that my particular case has been a very hard one. I am a Northerner, and was sent South by a Liverpool house, all my family connections residing in Great Britain. I never "declared my intentions" to become a citizen of the United States; never voted in my life, nor took any special interest in political affairs; neither did I ever have any direct connection with the "peculiar institution." I came to the United States simply to do business, and did it. Consequently, when "my State" went out of the Union in company with several "sisters," I found my property unexpectedly suspected, and my entire business and connections threatened with destruction. In the brief two or three weeks that elapsed between the time I received the letter and was notified, and that we should go on again as before. But when that time arrived I was equally disappointed in hope, and felt that so far as business was concerned the sooner my affairs were closed the better. I therefore commenced all my available assets in cotton, and shipped it. Just before the blockade was established against our port I took passage, and sailed for Europe, having labored under, I suppose, and some South by a Liverpool house, all my family connections residing in Great Britain. I never "declared my intentions" to become a citizen of the United States; never voted in my life, nor took any special interest in political affairs; neither did I ever have any direct connection with the "peculiar institution." I came to the United States simply to do business, and did it. Consequently, when "my State" went out of the Union in company with several "sisters," I found my property unexpectedly suspected, and my entire business and connections threatened with destruction. In the brief two or three weeks that elapsed between the time I received the letter and was notified, and that we should go on again as before. But when that time arrived I was equally disappointed in hope, and felt that so far as business was concerned the sooner my affairs were closed the better. I therefore commenced all my available assets in cotton, and shipped it. Just before the blockade was established against our port I took passage, and sailed for Europe, having labored under, I suppose, and some South by a Liverpool house, all my family connections residing in Great Britain. I never "declared my intentions" to become a citizen of the United States; never voted in my life, nor took any special interest in political affairs; neither did I ever have any direct connection with the "peculiar institution." I came to the United States simply to do business, and did it. Consequently, when "my State" went out of the Union in company with several "sisters," I found my property unexpectedly suspected, and my entire business and connections threatened with destruction. In the brief two or three weeks that elapsed between the time I received the letter and was notified, and that we should go on again as before. But when that time arrived I was equally disappointed in hope, and felt that so far as business was concerned the sooner my affairs were closed the better. I therefore commenced all my available assets in cotton, and shipped it. Just before the blockade was established against our port I took passage, and sailed for Europe, having labored under, I suppose, and some

The warning I received of outward intentions induced me to hasten my departure. In forty-eight hours from the time of receiving the hint I was quietly reposing in my hotel in the city of New York. My attempt to run the land blockade was a miserable failure.

In New York I took passage in the British steamship Cerasus, for Nassau, New Providence. Before leaving the dock at Jersey City the custom-house officers were numerous and vigilant, putting their eyes on every package, trunk, and person going on board. Some packages were pronounced contraband of war, and taken ashore again. The owners (passengers) were very indignant. Only indignant, but I do not think the officials exceeded their duty in the least. When a passenger attempts to get surgical instruments and morphine on board, as part of his baggage, it is all very well if he succeeds, but if caught, he has much ground for complaint if the property only is taken possession of.

The ship was east loose and adieus were made. I looked around among my fellow-passengers. The scene reminded me strongly of the Anglo-Saxon case. Some fifteen men were there, all told, but scarcely two passengers were standing together. No one seemed desirous of speaking to or recognizing a neighbor. Somehow or other a feeling of nervous constraint crept over me. We were passed the Fort-walls of Fort Lafayette, and Sandy Hook appeared, and was soon left behind. The engines stopped and our pilot was discharged.

Presto! Instantly the passengers were clasped in each other's arms. Long-parted friends. A great weight seemed to have been lifted off from every man. Hurrah! we were out of the United States, on a foreign flag, and perfectly secure from capture. Most of the rejoicing over, I think, mainly related at what they called their escape, for, with perhaps one exception, I do not think the Government would have taken the trouble to detain them. However, I was seized upon by one of a group, and peremptorily invited to go and "take a drink." I did not require much persuasion to induce me to join the party. All restraint had vanished. Before half an hour each knew where the other belonged, and nearly all had become more or less high spirits at the prospect of soon reaching their homes.

Three or four days' sailing brought us in sight of the Bahama group of islands, and finally we made the harbor of Nassau, New Providence. This Island is about thirty miles in circumference, and is bounded on the northwest by a narrow channel, on the north by a bank about half a mile distant. The space between the two forms an excellent and secure harbor for vessels of moderate draught. The town of Nassau is situated near the west end of this channel or harbor, and vessels can pass in and out from either end, as they can from Long Island Sound.

Having received a friendly hint that by expeditious reaching the shore I might save my trunk, I was running a town, I found myself among the first arrivals from the steamer, and my only chance was to row the boat myself. The consequence was that some of the guests would probably take passage in the Cerasus for Havana. Immediately my registering name was called correctly. That I was surrounded by men who eagerly inquired the news. A few copies of the latest New York papers were in my hands, and I began to read, to dull hour.

Very few among our passengers secured accommodations at the hotel, and many of them had the utmost difficulty in finding a resting-place about the town of the most miserable description.

On finding myself settled, my first inquiries were as to the means of accomplishing the object for which I came and was detained. The Fingal and Globe, and almost immediately I ascertained that there was no possible chance of my being able to get away before December. The steamers themselves and pilots were, it seemed, very particular about their times of sailing. Lovers, it is said, date on moonlight nights, and seamen do not care to be out therein. Whether blockade runners have as fond recollections of moonlight nights as lovers are supposed to have, I am not prepared to say; but certain it is, they have a great respect for, and are largely, my almost constant companions, at all events. It was the first time in my life that I found my actions regulated by her ladyship. However, there was no help for it. I could learn if I desired whatever to do except to wait, I endeavored to pick up some information about the business of blockade running.

There were several steamers in the harbor—all of them in "for repairs"—and a very large commodular history. There lay the Indiana close in to the wharf. She had nearly discharged her cargo, which was chiefly arms, and was in excellent condition. She seemed very dirty, my filthy, but was a great favorite nevertheless, because she had been very successful, having run the blockade in and out some twenty times. During her last trip she was aground on the north point of the inner channel from the time they left Charleston or Wilmington, I forget which, until within a few miles of Nassau! I fear I would be drawing too largely on the credulity of the reader to state even the lowest estimate given me of the amount of money she had made by her success. It was positively fabulous. A little way out, at anchor in the channel, was the Ella, which had made three trips, and had been shot at nearly every time in running in or out. There were four or five tolerably neat patches on her deck, where the shot of the blockaders struck her. She had received nearly all of her cargo, and was almost ready. Her bottom was being scraped, to free her of every impediment possible retarding her speed. This scraping, by-the-way, is done in a very primitive manner.

On reaching the Mary Jane I found her surrounded by mud. Her bottom was being scraped, the negro fitting in each one. The sight was somewhat astonishing, but a few minutes explained the whole operation. Two negroes were attached to each boat. One dived with a scraper in his hand, and worked away at the bottom of the vessel as long as his breath lasted (a most agonizing length of time!), and then, as soon as he came up, his mate took the weapon, and he dived down. The Mary Jane was careened a little, so that when I got on board I was enabled to see perfectly all that was done in the water on one side. It was really astonishing how these colored men could perform so much work under such apparently disadvantageous circumstances.

Other steamers, screw and side-wheel, were lying in the harbor—some at the wharves and some at anchor. Most of them were ready for service to start, but nearly all were in waiting for a favorable conjuncture of circumstances.

The business of conveying goods to and from the Confederate States, as a business, seems to be conducted to some extent, or rather associations of the great factors of Charleston, Wilmington, and Savannah, nearly all of which is finally concentrated in the house of Fraser, Trenholm, & Co., of Liverpool. With them it is reduced to a regular system. Their vessels are swift, and their pilots and captains are the best and most experienced that money can secure. It has been a comparatively rare thing for them to miss getting in or out. Most of the captures of steamers hitherto made have been owned by parties who have been, for having made a profitable venture in the regular runners," embarked outside capital in a steamer of their own; and the result, so far, has generally been that she was, or at most two trips, they have fallen victims to the blockading fleet. Many of them have been captured on the first run.

Although it is not successful, as very great, yet it is a very expensive business to run a steamer. I was very well informed that a first-class pilot alone received four thousand pounds sterling, or say twenty thousand dollars in gold, for the round trip. The chief engineer, and in fact all hands, were paid extravagant prices. Yet, with all this, if a run is once made to and fro with good success, the loss, or very little, if captured on the second attempt. Sometimes these regular runners would take passengers and freight, sometimes not a single cent. When they did, the charge for a passenger was one hundred dollars in gold, and two hundred and fifty dollars per ton for freight, paid in advance. Since the commencement of the siege of Charleston I have been informed that these rates have been materially reduced. My steamer takes from five to twenty passengers each way, and as much freight as offers from Nassau; but the latter business is almost exclusively in the hands of the Frasers of Charleston. However great the competition may be in merchandise and the introduction of efficiency, there is little or none allowed in that which comes out of it.

A couple of days' sojourn at the hotel made me familiar with everything in the Island town, in it. The American portion, which was largely in the preponderance, I knew immediately. They were divided into two classes—secession. So much, indeed, that my person sojourning there with any feeling in favor of the Union" feeling, would not have been any thing else than uncomfortable. For myself, I was known by many there to be from a port which I represented perfectly that I was a foreigner, an Englishman, and never had taken any part whatever in the deadly quarrel between the States, and that I only understood me to be fed, and I believed my Government did and does, strictly neutral. Consequently I was not regarded with suspicion when I fraternized with the very few Union men around.

There are in Nassau some five or six what are called auction and commission houses. It is not necessary to mention their names, although some of them have a world-wide reputation as fashionable Correspondence for 1862. These men or firms have been frequently stigmatized in the North and sensational press as "Yankee pedlers" and such epithets of the rebels. It is true that nearly all the business done there passes through one or other of these commission houses, although I have no personal acquaintance with either of them, I have had a thorough appreciation in regard for the gentlemanly commissions are much greater and stronger than for the cause; and if it had so happe ed that the southern interest had been in northern people could have used that port to advantage, they would have been quite as ready to have done business for them, for a consideration, as for us. I could learn I think the permanent white inhabitants of the Bahamas are to a man intensely loyal to the powers that be, a great and terrible struggle now going on in the United States. The rebellion took away from them a large, and, I believe, the only source of revenue, namely, the wrecking business, and Providence (they think) has compensated them for that loss by sending them the blockade-running business. It is a mere question of "bread and butter," or dollars and cents, with them.

Time passed, and I was busily occupied with everything. There were generals, colonels, adjutants, quartermasters, engineers, surgeons, and in fact almost every grade of rank from the Confederate army. I saw men there fresh from my own home, who were able to inform me about nearly every thing that had occurred since my leaving it. Representatives of or from every Southern State of the Union assembled there. Arrivals from foreign ports had not to express a desire to know about this or that in particular about any one, because one would be produced in a very short space able to communicate the ultimest information—provided always that the inquirer was a known Southerner.

Every body knows that the negroes in the Bahamas, as well as in all of the other British West Indies, were made free somewhere about 1832. At all events, the colored population in Nassau, which is at least ten to one of the whites, are free. Now, I am not prepared to say a black man, if he is behaved himself, was not entitled to as much courtesy as a white man, consequently, while in Nassau, I, as well as nearly all strangers, gave every man and woman, white or black, as much of the sidewalk on meeting as would be yielded in New York or London. But some of the newly-arrived "Southern boys" had different ideas. Their notion was, that a "nigger was a nigger, anyhow;" and so, forgetting that they were under a "strong government," would sometimes set toward the colored people as they saw fit—the same as toward slaves in my own State. It became a noticeable fact, however, that the same individual never committed an offense a second time. One fellow, anxious, perhaps, to uphold the dignity of the white race, or the rights of the Confederacy, was walking along Bay Street. He met a very black negro, who yielded to him as much of the sidewalk as a white man would have done on Broadway or Broadway. It was not enough. He should have stood entirely aside. The Southern gentleman considered the negro's conduct insolent in the extreme, and knocked him down without ceremony. The result was that he was arrested by a squad of policemen (who are all negroes) and conveyed at once to the police station. Next morning, after what I regarded as a very fair hearing, the chivalric individual was fined fifteen pounds (seventy-five dollars), or so many days' imprisonment. Having no money, he went to the latter. I heard him declaiming that there was no justice on that island, except for the nigger against the white man.

The two weeks were laugnily and gradually away. I had selected my steamer, and paid my hundred dollars passage-money. Captain Ryan was considered one of the lucky ones. He told me about a day beforehand just when to be on board, and left exactly, which I was very glad of, that he would land me in Charleston in four days from the hour he was speaking. On the last night of my sojourn at the hotel I was in the public front out on the gallery which surrounds it, looking out upon the ocean. It was a very clear weather is magnificent. With a good glass a sail could have been seen many miles from port. The street was dimly lighted by occasional gas-lamps, few rods below. On that evening, when "darkness was upon the face of the waters," I took a powerful field-glass and looked out upon the ocean. The small bum-boats, schooners, brigs, and sailing craft generally, were clearly and distinctly visible, and as I looked upon them as a remarkable circumstance that I could not see a single blockade-running steamer, which I knew had several were there. This, I ascertained, was entirely owing to the particular color in which they were painted—a sort of dark-olive green—not white. The effect is remarkable. On a dark night, on the ocean, it seemed to me, from my limited experience, that the sharper you could see them, the thoroughly invisible they were. I was a hundred yards, when the same craft, if painted black, or any other color, could at the same time be seen for a mile distant. I have been told that the effect is not so apparent in daylight.

It happened while I was in Nassau that a steamer was about coming in loaded with cotton from Charleston or Wilmington. When about twelve miles from port she was discovered by the blockaders. These professing to know said it was the Rhode Island. Of course the cruiser made chase and gained on her at a fast sailer, compelled to go in between the runner and the land. The guests generally, of the hotel, and many others, rushed out to the public front. The two vessels soon became distinctly visible to the naked eye. The gun-boat appeared to be rapidly approaching her prey, but guns were opened on it. I could see the puff of smoke on the guns, and shot after shot was thrown in, but all in vain. Little Anna Smith, it was the first and only time I had ever seen and heard shots fired in anger, and I, as well as many others, ladies and gentlemen, felt with excitement. I could not help throwing all my sympathies in favor of the hunted craft. She had no power to resist her pursuer, and would not have done so if she was it if she had; her only defense was in her heels. At one moment it was feared that she had been struck. There was a terrible shower of shot, and another it was seen that she still held her course and was fairly leaving her pursuer behind. Probably where—so as to get away from her pursuer. At length she succeeded in getting within the jurisdiction of the fort, or rather that of Nassau, when pursuit was of course abandoned. The Anna Ella sailed into the harbor triumphantly with flying colors, and was received to me, with cheers.

But it became time to leave the place, and I did so without regret. My steamer had got all her cargo on board. She was a fine, high, full bark, her anchorage, and was lying outside of the bar and light-house. I was informed that her steamer was different from the custom-house. Officially speaking we were bound for St. John, New Brunswick; but I, who was a passenger, knew that we would make for Charleston direct. I found myself on deck at nine A.M. one fine morning, and was delighted at the prospect before me of reaching my old scene of operations within four days. From all I had heard recently I had come to regard my chances of capture as very small—scarcely worth thinking about. Had not this very morning's paper announced that I was not the captain one of the "lucky" ones? Had he not told me himself, confidentially, that this was his last trip, that when he got through this time his "pile," which he had made in this business, would then be large enough to satisfy him for life, and that he would then go to live by the side on the whole southern coast? To look at him was to gather confidence, so cool and self-possessed was he. Pooh! I thought. There was no more danger really than in going from Holyhead to Dublin. Of course I was in good spirits. Why should I not have been when so near the goal of my efforts and wishes for weary months?

The bell was rung, the anchor moved, and I could see that we were gliding through the water. I turned my glass toward the Royal Victoria, and saw that the hotel people, male and female, on the galleries waving handkerchiefs and watching us as we passed out to sea.

Almost from the moment of our starting the at-most vigilance was maintained. The whole expanse before and around us was scanned continuously with the greatest care. To the lookout's rumor every thing on the ocean, except the water, itself, is suspicious; we would have run away from a harmless bird if he exchanger if only the tops of her masts had been sighted. A glance at the map will show that the Bahama Islands stretch northward from one hundred and fifty miles to within sight from New-Providence. Consequently for that distance we were comparatively safe, provided we kept near enough to them to land. My captain, I believe, is a canon of international law, that the jurisdiction of every maritime power extends three miles from the low-water mark of any of the flag protects every vessel within this limit. Therefore, while we were in the neighborhood of these islands all was safe. Of course, I refer to get within the three miles of land, and so be in British water—the same in law, I suppose, as if we were riding in the Mersey or the Thames.

When about two hours under way, and nothing in Nassau was visible, a faint line of smoke was discovered in the sky. Our course was at once changed toward the land, but before another half hour had elapsed we were thrown into the greatest state of alarm by seeing a steamer bear swiftly down upon us, apparently regardless of every international law. We got close in to the land, and had serious notions of running on the beach, when to our great joy (not unmixed) relief, it was discovered that the highly suspicious craft was nothing less than the Margaret and Jessie, Captain Wilson, of Snaily Jo's fame, from Charleston, bound to a sister in fact, who on seeing us made for the land with all possible speed. Each had been running from danger apprehended from the other. The first impression our vessel as quite a joke immediately afterward, but it was none to me at the time.

There was no attempt whatever paid to the cleanliness of the steamer; nay, she was absolutely filthy. Accommodation for many passengers there was literally none, as it was not the business of the vessel to carry them. Nearly every available foot of space was occupied with bales of mess beef, pork, and bread, the regular manifest, nearly every man, from cook and coal-heaver up to the passengers, had some private venture of his own. I believe that I was the only person on board who had nothing but his wardrobe, if I may except a couple of lady passengers, who I at once think had any of "paying expenses" by the sale of the contents of their trunks on reaching Dixie. While I and these ladies and passengers were left to shift for ourselves on deck, in a very cramped and uncomfortable way, the accommodations of the vessel were made as ample and agreeable as the circumstances could possibly admit of. Indeed, they had the entire cabin, not occupied with cargo, to themselves. From the moment I set foot on the deck until I finally left the vessel, I did not go below once. In fact, neither I nor any of the rest of the passengers, or any of the officers or crew, except the cook or waiter, was permitted to enter the cabin. As for the captain, I do not think he ever ate or slept during the entire time I saw him on board.

One of the greatest difficulties of the steam blockade runner is the want of a good quality of anthracite coal, such, for instance, as is used by the coasting and inland steamers plying to and from New York city—a kind of coal that does not emit from the chimneys any visible smoke. The coal shipped in Nassau is known as a semi-anthracite, but sometimes, when the fires are new, its smoke will be visible. Now, when a steamer comes down at the rate of ten or twelve miles an hour, with a gentle breeze abaft, as the sailors say, the smoke from the chimneys will float in the air for many miles, thus frequently betraying to a cruiser or blockader that a steamer of some sort is in her vicinity, even before she can be seen by sight or the source of the smoke, and, if successful, a chase ensues, which in a few hours ends in capture or escape. In the very recent examination by the United States steamer Fulton, while on her way to New York, captured the Margaret and Jessie on her second trip in the business. The first that was seen of her was the smoke. She was burning soft coal.

After the vessel had started on her outward voyage a fine rate all that day and night, without seeing or being disturbed with any thing. Next day we were out on the Gulf Stream Atlantic, and in the track of passing vessels. The friendly land we left behind us. All danger for that day we considered at an end, as it was not likely any chance in a thousand that a Federal vessel would sight us. The only danger now to be considered (which was not small) was that in running through the blockading fleet and entering the harbor. I continued in good spirits, and would have been highly happy but for the cold, wet, warm and dirty. It was almost a dead calm. The sea was like glass. The sun was terribly powerful, and the heat from the water and deck was almost beyond endurance. There was no shade whatever. I endeavored, as the day advanced, to get allotted to me, with the least possible amount of clothing—in fact, with only trowsers, dunnel undershirt, and slippers. I never suffered so much in my life. The coal dust sometimes rained upon me, and adhered to my face and hands. I became as black and dirty as if at work in a coal mine. Mosquitoes—possibly dirtier. I consoled myself, however, with the reflection that my fellow-passengers and in fact every man on board, myself, was in no better condition than myself. The ladies, I am glad to say, were under their appropriate cabin.

We had now been nearly sixty hours at sea, and it was quite dark, in fact, very dark. Every man on board felt that the most critical period was approaching, if not actually upon us. Although still quite confident of getting in all safe, I could not resist a feeling of nervous anxiety that had crept over me. The blockading fleet was close to us, or rather, we were close upon it. Perhaps it was all around us. We knew of having just passed one suspicious-looking object. Our rate of speed became slow; then slower still, until finally we were apparently only drifting along. In half an hour, if all went well, the engines would be driven to their utmost capacity, and we should make a dash for port. Every eye on board was peering anxiously, piercingly into the dark expanse. We were still moving slowly, slowly and silently, but steadily toward our haven of rest and security. There was not a shadow of a light on board, and the darkness of the night could almost be felt. I could not see the mate, who I knew was not ten feet from me on the quarter-deck. All had a terrible interest in our progress, in getting through safely. If captured some would lose all, and all be in the wretched hold in captivity for an unknown length of time. Minutes seemed to turn into hours. I, who had no financial interest in the line, being a foreigner, with my passport secure about my person, became almost breathless with excitement and suspense. The darkness was such it were, concentrated in my eyes. I gazed out into the black darkness with such terrible eagerness that my eyeballs ached. I have had the most horrible fear crept over me that I had become blind!

Hark! some one near me whispered. I crawled, feeling my way toward the voice, and on reaching it, found my pilot and engineer standing. I stood close to me pointed outward, and a low voice uttered "Look there." I turned my eyes in the direction indicated, and with a sudden thumping sensation at my heart, barely saw for a second or two a dark mass upon the waters. It was a steamer, and evidently a blockader. Our progress was suspended; in another moment we would be run down and buried in the waters, and that was the end of the matter. I closed my eyes, and tried to cease thinking, but the inevitable crash-collision had penetrated my brain, and I could see myself in England and home. As it happened, however, I was much more frightened than hurt. The officers were on the alert, the danger was seen instantly altered, and in a few moments the black darkness hid us from every thing. Our back was turned on the blockader, and we were free to make the attempt again, a few miles further up, and I breathed more freely as I realized the fact that narrow escape from a blockader. But three glorious black blockade-running hours were thus lost, and those hours were precious. Another attempt success was diminished so much. However, the trial had to be renewed, and when the proper time arrived, our bow was turned toward the hostile land. Again was the same care exercised in passing through the fleet. How agonizingly slow we did move. I was nearly wild with the delay and danger, and asked the captain why he did not put on all speed and make a run for it. He answered that he feared any such step, as the noise created by fast running would have betrayed him. A few minutes more passed, when a shout of joy, irrepressibly ceased speaking when a hushed alarm was given. Light its meaning. Hope almost died within me, and I began to fear that finally we were really a great deal of danger in reaching the Confederacy by sea as well as by land. At that moment I heard the captain talk to the pilot of New York, or even in Louisville. The cause of the alarm was the same as before. There was a light on the bow, but one quite distinctly a steamer. I did not see it that time, because I suppose I was paralyzed with terror, and expected to feel such long and terrible straining as they had so recently experienced. The same course of conduct was pursued as before. We went on as well and as quietly as we could, and were, unfortunately, as the sequel proved, successful in getting out to sea again. The fact that I was on board on another attempt that night, consequently there was nothing left for us to do but put off and on out of sight until the following evening.

It lacked an hour or two of dawn when we came to a halt. The engines were kept going, that I thought the sun would never rise again. At length, however, he did appear, and we could see within either quarter the blockading vessels looking faces I never saw before. All of them had been on the same if not a greater ruck of excitement and anxiety than we had. We were left to our own fort each other, but with very sorry results. As for the officers, there was nothing unusual in their conduct. They had been in similar scrapes before, and had been successful notwithstanding. There was some comfort in knowing this.

The day had fairly broken over the face of the ocean the horizon was carefully scanned with telescopes, but nothing could be seen. All seemed as long as his glass was kept moving. Apparently his observations were satisfactory, as he was now in sight of land. The engines were to be soon one waiting, when all at once his gaze became fixed and steady. I turned my own field-glass in that direction in time to observe the mate with a heavy heart saw the masts and smoke-pipe of a large steamer. It was a Federal cruiser.

Now was the time to see what we did for, for she made chase almost immediately.

Our captain had a great deal of confidence in the speed of his vessel; consequently, when the chase began, he deliberately allowed the pursuer to get within a certain distance before he opened his full throttle-valves. It was deemed necessary to accustain just how fast she could go, as it was fair to presume that she would be very hard upon his pursuit. I did not like the experiment at all, but it was soon found that we could travel, with a little to spare, at a very much greater rate than she could. Our minds were, therefore, soon at ease about being captured by her. The only question was as to the chase. It was not our object to run clean away, because we might have gone so far off as to preclude us from running in that night, and the captain was determined on making the attempt. Only a moderate rate of speed was therefore maintained, so as to give hope to our pursuer, and draw her away a reasonable distance from the vicinity of our harbor, and thus decrease the danger of running in. This was managed admirably; for when it was considered that we had gone nearly far enough, our speed was increased, and the chaser was soon out of sight. We then doubled back toward the place where the chase commenced.

Night again covered us with her mantle, and we bowled along finely, anticipating no further trouble about getting in. We had effectually disposed of one stumbling-block in our way—the frigate that had chased us. My spirits began to revive. Nothing now seemed to be in the way of a prosperous voyage. On approaching the vicinity of where the blockading fleet ought to have been our speed was decreased, until we were apparently merely drifting along. We flew through the channels in the fleet. We flew through the water. Fort Sumter, according to some, was clearly visible, when thump, thud, thud was heard and felt by every man on board, and the engines ceased to work. My first thought was that the entire machinery had fallen through the bottom, and that we would sink in a few minutes. It was not quite so bad as that, but it might as well have been, so far as the present was concerned. A short examination proved that some vital part of the machinery had got broken or twisted. It did not know which, neither did any one. The fact that such an accident had occurred was enough. The wind had risen to a gale, and we were pitching and tossing on the trough of the pilot and perfectly helpless. I became utterly indifferent to my fate, and lay down in the quietest corner of the deck and slept soundly. Meantime every available hand had been called down to the engine-room. The work to do was beyond the power of human effort to do that in a few hours the damage was patched up, and we were again in motion. There was time given then to get in, if the machinery could only stand to us. Vain hope for those who entertained one! For once on this voyage I was not disappointed. We had not made more than an miles when the wounded part of the engine gave way, and we were again brought to a dead halt when within half an hour's sail from port. Every effort was however made to repair somehow and get going again; but the damage proved to be more than at the first accident. It was the work of hours, and daylight would be upon us before she could possibly have been put in motion.

Daylight did come, very much too quickly, and we were laboring heavily and helplessly on the same very spot we had been the night before. The wind had driven us many miles away from the fleet; and it did. But as soon as we could see around us we found that we were miles distant, our pursuer of the day before, returning from what she had considered a fruitless chase.

Yes, there was in good condition, and we utterly helpless, a mere hulk, pitching and tossing—now on the crest of huge waves, and now grinding in the trough of the sea. What could we have done? Nothing, except to quietly surrender, unable, of course, to resist. I preferred the fleet, as running away was impossible. In a very short space of time our enemy bore down upon us, apparently—as she had every way reason regarding her speed underwent considerable modification from the day previous. When within about a quarter of a mile of us she sent a boat full of armed men was quickly lowered into the boiling sea, and in five minutes reached our side. Four officers and a crew of twelve men, who were all that could be had enough of my steamer, and was very anxious to make a change as quickly as possible. On reaching the deck they were all very polite indeed, that the ladies were transferred to the landing-stage, owing to the violent tossing of the little boat after the steamer. The big one, but so much so that it was accomplished the rest of us were peremptorily ordered to follow, and we did. I, being a foreigner, had no idea of going back if I could possibly avoid it; and watching my opportunity jumped on the stage with the ladies, where my small hand was a hundred yards off. They could not help taking me in then, and when I reached the deck I must have looked the subject to look at. I was hungry, very dirty, more than half drowned, and not half clad. On informing the officers that I was a foreigner, I was allowed to go forward (I went into the ward-room (the officers' quarters), and furnished with all the material to look and feel like a gentleman again. To be once more clean, clothed, in comfortable quarters, and agreeable society, was indescribable. But my happiness at present was very bitter, nevertheless, at finding myself at last under the protecting guns of the Federal Government, after having at that time in Charleston, as I had anticipated.

It may be as well to mention here as elsewhere that, had not the accident to the machinery of our machinery, it was ascertained that, from our position, there was nothing in the way to prevent us from getting into Charleston on the night previous to our capture; but the most mortifying discovery was in learning that we were within two or three miles of the fleet, but having met with no other accident she went in safely early on the following night. But for the accident to the engine, both would have been in Charleston, without any hindrance, in less than three days from Nassau. Such are the chances and incidents to the trade, have occurred, and will occur frequently, much to the profits of the blockade fleet. It might be asked why the runners did not have also signals by which they could recognize each other. Indeed, I should have mentioned that they would while in Nassau. The answer was simple and conclusive. A signal, to be good for any thing, must be addressed, that is to be good for any thing, must be addressed to the eye or ear, and a colored light, a series of lights, or a gun, and a watchful blockader can see or hear these quite as readily as a runner. No, such runner is and must be a sort of Ishmael, going on the principle that if his own hand is not against every man every man's hand is against him.

The boarding party from the frigate took possession of every thing and every body as soon as they came on board. The officer in command, as soon as he ascertained the cause of so easy a capture, had the engine fires put out, and his thorough examination of her hold made as circumstances would permit. He was much relieved to find that there was no unusual quantity of water in the hold; that the captured vessel was not scuttled. A great deal had to be done in the way of transferring crew, passengers, clothes-bags, and other things to the captor, and in the communication between the two was rapid and frequent. The prize boat's crew had, however, to be sent nearly each trip, because the returning men were, almost to a man, excessively drunk—fully—many of them, at first, of some of the naval officers. Many, in fact nearly all of the crew of our steamer, had their watches, and part of them, in which my lady, which was stowed away in every available corner or hiding-place of the vessel, when the jolly tars got on board, their brethren of the sea had, I suppose, a friendly feeling for them. There was a tap in their stores on deck and below, wherever every where, except directly in the face of the officer. Those who were inclined got all they wanted, and more than they were aware of, I believe. These incidents were, however, soon over. The capture was made complete, a crew put on board, and she was taken in tow. I then fully realized that I was a prisoner.

I remained in the frigate some eight or ten days on the "Station," and must say that during that time I was treated with very great kindness; and when orders came to have me transferred to a Government vessel going North with the prize, I parted from my kind messmates in the ward-room with regret.

A few days more and the harbor of New York was reached. We, the prisoners, were all transferred to another ship and there detained and I was huddled in among the entire crew and passengers. I was in a state of high nervous excitement, tivity, and informed, after a very brief examination, that I was free to go where I pleased, provided I gave my parole not to attempt to leave Washington Court on Friday, and on other days when requested. I cheerfully accepted the conditions, bade adieu to my fellow-prisoners, and was left to fortunate, and soon found myself again comfortably settled in a hotel, almost a freeman.

It has not been evidently known to me dangerous to reach the Confederacy than even before. My friends, however, has grown so much more thick there notwithstanding all I have gone through. I can not wait until the Federal force: get possession of my town, though this may happen any day. I can not even await the next trip of the steamer Cornica, as she sailed only three days ago, and she will not sail again for nearly four weeks. There is a schooner up and nearly loaded for Bermuda, and I have very serious notions of taking passage in her, and thus get my fortune from that island. At all events I shall sail either for there or Nassau before the week is out, and fervently hope that I shall have "better luck next time."

THE GREAT BOSTON ORGAN.

WE publish on page 786 an illustration (taken from the description in the transactions of the Institute, Gustave Herter & Brother, of this city) of the great Boston organ, regarding which public curiosity has been excited.

Our space will not permit us to give more than extracts from the writer's description, accompanying the instrument itself with its house and the different parts; but these will be sufficient, with the illustration, to convey a just idea of the general proportions of this truly wonderful achievement in mechanism and art. The originator of the great work has justly earned the title of the Liszt in the history of the great organs. We extract from Professor Holmes's fine tribute to him:

It is made to the perfection of a single individual that our community is indebted for the privileges to see enjoy the possession of this noble and supreme order such as make cities illustrious by their presence. It is to him that the lover of all can wrong the highest susceptibilities to tell in print; and when we say that Boston owes the great organ chiefly to the personal efforts of Dr. J. Baxter Upham, the statement is only for the information of distant readers.

The result of two voyages to Europe, undertaken by Dr. Upham, chiefly with the object of examining the most famous organs and organ-factories of Germany, England, France, Belgium, and Great Britain, was the contract with Frederick Walcker of Ludwigsberg, Kingdom of Wurtemberg, for the building of the organ for the soloist experiments of these instruments; for building the great instrument which has been completed and built upon and listened to on the night of November 3.

The following description will be read with interest:

The great organ is a choir of nearly 6000 vocal throats. Its largest voice is an 32 foot open wood pipe, and its smallest creeps through them. Its finest tubes are too small for the eye to see. Its keys are moved by various changes and combinations of which its immense orchestra is capable, from the great roll of thunder to the loudest chorus, in which all its groups of voices have their part, to the tone of a single flute, or violoncello, or hand key-boards, and two pedals, or foot key-boards, command these varied combinations. Besides the familiar effects, for which the organ is incomparable, the crescendo and diminuendo of the gradations of sound from the lowest murmur to the loudest blast, and the dying fall by which it ends a piece, it has also the disturbing element, so to speak, of harmony, are not only provided for in the swell organ, but may be obtained by the combination of the various systems of pipes upon the entire instrument. In order to understand how to compass the Music Hall instrument, the student is there set to studying how the organ reaches among the various parts of its compass, and in what manner the perfection of all its parts, and in all its wide arrangement, is to be accomplished. In no way is the whole arrangement more the object of study than in the upper portion of the case, where the different divisions of the organ are known as the swell organ, the great organ, the choir organ, the solo organ, with all its curious contrivances for lightening the touch, swelling and diminishing the sound, and for the combination of sounds from different organs, from a single action to the full force of them all; such an instrument as not to be put into a case, but, being built up in the great proportions of a temple, it has its house built around it. In a noble instance like the present, where an artistic inspiration, a unity of idea, a sense of vital correspondence of the inward and outward presides over and pervades all, the house or outward temple seems rather to have grown up with that which it both hides and reveals, to have risen in its symmetry and grandeur to the music chosen by a true inner sense of the organ soul. Nor does the term house do sufficient justice to the beautiful design before us. It is in some sense the body of the organ, the outward visible embodiment of its interiors. Not, to be sure, like the animal or human body, itself composed of organs; but the body of the idea of the organ, the shadowing forth by correspondence of its co-working inner parts and uses, the typifying of all its history and prophecy, as music itself typifies the whole course and prophecy of life.

Digitized by Google

The structure is of black walnut, and is covered with carved statues, busts, masks, and figures in the boldest relief. In the centre a richly ornamented arch contains the niche for the key-boards and stops. A colossal mask of a singing woman looks from over its summit. The pedestal under it is surrounded by the host of Johann Sebastian Bach. Behind this rises the lofty central division containing pipes; and crowning it is a beautiful standing statue of St. Cecilia, holding her lyre. On each side of her a griffin sits as a guardian. This centre is connected by harp-shaped compartments filled with pipes to the two great round towers, on one side called Faith and on the other Fidelity. These magnificent towers each contain a lofty pedestal dome; and this ornamented on each side by two chorubs, whose heads almost touch the lofty ceiling. This whole portion of the sculpture is of eminent beauty. All the reliefs that run around the lower portion of the dome are of singular richness.

The whole base of the instrument, in the intervals of the figures described, is also covered with elaborate carvings. Groups of musical instruments, standing out almost detached from the back-ground, occupy the panels. Ancient and modern, clustered with careless grace and quaint variety, from the violin down to a string of sleigh-bells, they roll up all the echoes of forgotten music, such as the thousand-tongued organ blends together in one grand harmony. As we return to the impression produced by the grand whole, we are more and more struck with the subtle art displayed in its adaptations and symbolisms. Never did any structure we have looked upon so fully justify the fiat-name de Stael's definition of architecture,—"frozen music."

The outermost towers, their pillars and domes, are all square; their outlines thus passing almost by a single transition from the simple square figures of the central building, up through the square of the walls of Music Hall, to the round central part of the instrument, where a smoother harmony of outline is predominant. For in the great towers, which step forward, as it were, to represent the meaning of the entire structure, the lines are all curved, so that the slight discords which give sharpness and variety to its less vital portions were all resolved as we approach its throbbing heart. And again, the half-fantastic repetition of musical forms in the principal outlines —the lyre-like shape of the lower of the great towers, the harp-like figure of the connecting wings, the clustering trunk of the columns—fill the mind with musical suggestions, and deepen the wondering spectator to become the entranced listener.

Dr. Upham thus officially reports of the organ-house and its artist-builders:

In regard to the architectural form and enshrinement of the instrument I have time to say but a word. This part of the work the directors approached with no little difficulty and doubt.

No precedent of the kind that could be found for the upper end to meet the somewhat anomalous position that was to be occupied. It was only after months and years of patient effort and trial that the present fitting habitation for so noble an instrument could be obtained. The form of the structure is a design by Hammatt Billings. His were the outlines of general form and proportion. But to its present embodiment, if we except the cherubs on the top of the high towers, the germ alone remains. The finally adopted plan, in all its artistic and elaborate beauty and grandeur, belongs to that Indian Genius and Christian Heritor, of New York, whose designs, when submitted to Mr. Billings, were pronounced by him, with characteristic frankness and unselfishness, to be superior to his own, and urged upon the acceptance of the committee. It is impossible to speak in terms of too high praise of the care, attention, and conscientious application on the part of Mr. Herter himself and all in his employ to the work during the two years and more of its construction.—Be it the artist (who in the person of Christian Herter is with us to-night), from whose brain leaped forth, Minerva-like, the finest forms of human and ideal things, or the sculptor by whose cunning those were stiffened into shape and fixed in the willing wood—the moulders in clay and plaster—the carvers, engravers, and finishers—all labored with one mind toward the perfect result.

The inauguration of the great organ was a most impressing ceremonial.

REV. H. M. TURNER, CHAPLAIN FIRST UNITED STATES COLORED REGIMENT.

REV. H. M. TURNER.

We publish herewith a portrait of Rev. H. M. TURNER, the first man of color ever commissioned a chaplain in the United States service.

The Rev. H. M. Turner is a native of South Carolina, and is now near thirty-one years of age. He was born in the vicinity of Newberry Court House, grew up to a good-sized boy on the cotton fields with the slaves, and learned to tend by his own efforts. His mother, marrying in Abbeville village, carried him there, where he waited on some lawyers, who became so much impressed with his talent, that, in defiance of the prohibition of the law, they took pleasure in instructing him. He would listen to them talk and speak, and then go in the woods and repeat what he had heard. Thus his mind developed, and in his seventeenth year he became a member of the Methodist church. He was licensed to preach in his twentieth year, and displayed such intelligence in his first sermon that he made quite a sensation. From this time forth he attracted great crowds wherever he went.

Everywhere he came he became so well known that white churches were often thrown open to him of all denominations—a circumstance almost unknown, for the law of South Carolina strictly forbids colored men preaching. He traveled through Savannah (Georgia), Montgomery (Alabama), and Mobile, where he was known as the "boy preacher," and every one, white and colored, was rife to see and hear him. After visiting nearly all the great Southern cities, he settled at St. Louis, Missouri, and joined the African Methodist Episcopal Church. Bishop Payne sent him to Baltimore city. In April, 1862, Bishop Payne again sent him to Washington city, to take charge of the large colored church known as the Israel Bethel Church. Here his reputation soon rose, and it was nothing strange last winter to see on Sunday evenings several Congressmen sitting about in the church. In August, 1862, he delivered a sermon on the policy of organizing colored soldiers, which was published in the Washington Republican, and created some stir, and at first considerable opposition. He persevered, however, all his acts and speeches tending to the move were allowed to commence to recruit the regiment of which he is now chaplain. He was commissioned chaplain on the 10th of last September, entered upon active service a few days afterward, and is now with his regiment on his way to Texas to reinforce the gallant army which is led by General Banks.

Mr. Turner is a man of great personal courage: he fears no man and nothing. In large assemblies he can command attention when few others could. His size is ordinary, with yellow complexion and very sharp features.

THE SWAMP ANGEL.

ANGELS of good and ill are every where:
They haunt the city and the cottage lone;
They hover on unseen pinnions thin air,
And feels the stir of every laugh or moan.

And frequent the good angels are the bane
Of evil men, the name them evil things;
And darken ministers of death and pain
Oft bear the angel light upon their wings.

So are they changed. The angel of the wind,
That speeds the sailor swiftly o'er the flood,
In the sea storm of the crew behind,
Whose hands are eager for the stain of blood.

And many a mother has the angel blessed
Of the dark swamp, as, with convulsive smile,
She clasps her wondering infant to her breast,
While baffled blood-hounds lick their chops in vain.

Before the wicked city's traitor hold
Stands a swamp angel all smeared wise;
Perhaps some bondman's prayer has made it bold,
Thus to put fire to old and unseen guise.

And in sands back the hounds disappointed tone
Full with the message of rebounding ill:
And the pale hunters curse it with a groan,
For the swamp angel is a demon still.

MAP OF THE VICINITY OF KNOXVILLE, TENNESSEE, SHOWING THE LINE OF COMMUNICATION BETWEEN KNOXVILLE AND CHATTANOOGA.

THE THEATRE OF GENERAL GRANT'S OPERATIONS, SHOWING THE COUNTRY BETWEEN CHATTANOOGA AND CHARLESTON.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

Love generally makes a wise man act like a fool, and interest sometimes makes a fool act like a wise man.

"How do you like me, now?" asked a belle of her spouse, as she sallied into the room, with a sweeping train of muslin following her. "Well," said he, "to tell you the truth, it is impossible for me to like you any longer."

"Your wife's fat, but she's not handsome, Smith." "Well, Jones, that's expressing your opinion plump and plain, my friend." "You are right, Smith, that's exactly my notion; she is very plump and very plain!"

SENSATION NOVELS.—The Ghost and How to Lay Him. Published in white muslin and a spirit wrapper in shutting rice boundary. Also, The Skeleton Scullery Maid and the Spectral Cook. Boudoirs, 33, Red Lion's-yard. The Mysteries of the Dark Forest, or, the Bloody Spot upon the Black Hood. By Frightful Horror, Esq.

Fashionable circles were never so numerous as they are now. Almost every lady that appears in the street is the centre of one.

What are the points of difference between the Prince of Wales, an orphan, a bald head, and a gorilla? The Prince of Wales is heir apparent; an orphan has ne'er a parent; a bald head has no hair apparent; and a gorilla has a hairy parent.

An alderman lately lost his appetite, and the unlucky finder, being a poor man with a large family, was ruined in less than a fortnight.

Quin told Lady Berkeley that she looked blooming as spring; but, assuming that the season was not over so early promising, he added, "Would to Heaven the spring would look like your ladyship!"

"Madam, a good many persons were disturbed at the concert last night by the crying of your baby." "Well, I do wonder that some folks will go to concerts."

In a country church-yard we find this epitaph: "Here lies the body of James Robinson, and Ruth, his wife: and underneath this text—"Their warfare is accomplished!"

Many seek solace for their troubles in the gay French capital. They think the best plaster for their wounds is the plaster of Paris.

A CURIOSITY.—In the window of a shop in London a violin is exhibited for a low price, being "the property of a gentleman in fine condition."

If the art gives an example of industry, it is much more than a good many uncles do.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

MORTON'S GOLD PENS are now sold at the same prices as before the commencement of the war; this is entirely owing to the Manufacturer's improvements in machinery, his present large Retail Business and Cash-in-Advance System; for, until he commenced advertising, his business was done on Credit and strictly with the Trade.

The Morton Gold Pens are the only ones sold at old prices, as the makers of all other gold pens charge the Premium on Gold. 37 Government Tax, &c.; but Morton has in no case changed his prices, Wholesale or Retail.

Of the great monitors sent by mail to all parts of the world during the past few years, not one in one thousand has failed to reach its destination in safety; showing that the Morton Gold Pen can be obtained by any one, in every part of the world, at the same price, quality and style accepted.

Reader, you can have an enduring, always ready, and reliable Gold Pen, exactly adapted to your hand and style of writing, which will do your writing vastly better than Steel Pens; and at the present almost universal High Premium Price of everything, you can have a Morton Gold Pen cheaper, in proportion to the time spent upon it and material used, than any other Gold Pen in the World. If you want one sold on A. MORTON, No. 25 Maiden Lane, or inclose stamp for circular.

MR. PARTON'S NEW WORK IS READY.

GENERAL BUTLER IN NEW ORLEANS.

A History of the Administration of the Department of the Gulf to the close of 1862, with an account of the Origin of New Orleans, and a sketch of the previous career of the General, Civil and military. By James Parton, author of "Life of Jackson," "Life of Burr," "Life of Aaron Burr Jackson," &c. One vol. 12mo, with steel portrait and Maps. 600 pp. Price, in cloth, $1 50; full gilt extra, or antique, $2 50. When the extraordinary interest of the subject of this volume, and the rare ability of the author to clothe his relations of events with fascination are considered, it is evidently probable this book will prove no more interesting volume than this. Pub lished by

MASON BROTHERS
5 & 7 Mercer Street, N. Y.

Sportsmen, Tourists, and Army and Navy Officers.
Powerful and Brilliant Double Glasses.

Portables combined with great power in Field, Marine, Terrestr'l, Opera, and general out-door day and night double perspective glasses; will show distinctly a person to know him at from 5 to 6 miles. Spectacles of the greatest transparency power to magnify and improve the sight, without the distressing result of frequent change. Catalogues sent by enclosing stamp.

SEMMONS, Oculists—Optician,
669 Broadway, New York.

Holiday Gifts.

Engraved with Initial Letter, Old English, &c. Complete sets $1 50, by mail. Trade supplied.
JOHN F. PHELPS & CO., 620 Broadway, N. Y.

ALL ARTICLES FOR SOLDIERS
At Baltimore, Washington, and all places occupied by Union troops, should be sent by HARNDEN'S EXPRESS. No. 74 Broadway. Soldiers charged low rates.

6000 AGENTS wanted, to sell SIX new inventions Cards very rapid sellers. Send stamp for circular, &c. Address: sal pay great profits to Agents. Send 4 stamps and $3 paper particulars. EVERETT BROWN, Lowell, Mass.

Kirk's Charles the Bold.
Will be Published early in Dec.:
HISTORY OF CHARLES THE BOLD, DUKE OF BURGUNDY.
BY JOHN FOSTER KIRK.
Two volumes.....8vo.....With Portrait.

Mr. John Foster Kirk, whose intimate relation with the late Wm. H. Prescott, the historian, has just completed Vols. I. and II. of his History of Charles the Bold, and the Publishers take pleasure of announcing that this important contribution to our historical literature will be ready for publication early in December.

The remarkable epoch treated by Mr. Kirk is full of grand historical figures, and by his narrative an entirely new light is thrown on some of the most important events in Charles's career. His position as the "Napoleon of the Middle Ages" is fully sustained, and the influence he traced both of the ambition and of his fall upon the destinies of the principal European States.

From the Atlantic Monthly.

"We have no hesitation in assigning to Mr. Kirk's most fascinating narrative a place with the great achievements of genius in the department he has chosen to fill. His admirable industry and historical tact is welcomed the world over."

J. B. LIPPINCOTT & CO., Publishers,
715 and 717 Market Street,
Philadelphia.

Family Medicine.

By having the BRANDRETH PILLS on hand, should a sudden attack of sickness occur, they can be given at once and this will have effected a cure before the physician arrives.

As a Bilious remedy, and for costiveness, they have no equal.

PRINCIPAL OFFICE, 294 Canal Street.
Sold also at No. 4 UNION SQUARE, and by dealers.

Kirk's Charles the Bold.
Will be Published early in Dec.:
HISTORY OF CHARLES THE BOLD, DUKE OF BURGUNDY.
BY JOHN FOSTER KIRK.
Two volumes.....8vo.....With Portrait.

Mr. John Foster Kirk, whose intimate relation with the late Wm. H. Prescott, the historian, has just completed Vols. I. and II. of his History of Charles the Bold, and the Publishers take pleasure of announcing that this important contribution to our historical literature will be ready for publication early in December.

The remarkable epoch treated by Mr. Kirk is full of grand historical figures, and by his narrative an entirely new light is thrown on some of the most important events in Charles's career. His position as the "Napoleon of the Middle Ages" is fully sustained, and the influence is traced both of the ambition and of his fall upon the destinies of the principal European States.

From the Atlantic Monthly.

"We have no hesitation in assigning to Mr. Kirk's most fascinating narrative a place with the great achievements of genius in the department he has chosen to fill. His admirable industry and historical tact is welcomed the world over."

J. B. LIPPINCOTT & CO., Publishers,
715 and 717 Market Street,
Philadelphia.

Family Medicine.

By having the BRANDRETH PILLS on hand, should a sudden attack of sickness occur, they can be given at once and this will have effected a cure before the physician arrives.

As a Bilious remedy, and for costiveness, they have no equal.

PRINCIPAL OFFICE, 294 Canal Street.
Sold also at No. 4 UNION SQUARE, and by dealers.

CHLOASMA, OR MOTH PATCHES.

Blemishes on the face, called Moth, are very annoying, particularly to ladies of light complexion, as the discolored spots on the skin show more strongly on blondes than on brunettes, but they contribute greatly in marring the beauty on either; and anything that will remove such patches without injuring the skin in texture or color, would no doubt be considered a great achievement in medical science. Dr. B. C. PERRY, 49 Bond Street, having devoted his whole time to the treatment of diseases of the Skin, will guarantee to remove all Moth Patches and other discolorations from the skin, without injury to the texture or color of the skin. His success in this, as in other cases of Cutaneous Disease, is unparalleled. DISEASES OF THE SCALP and LOSS OF HAIR.—If attended to in time, baldness in every case is EVER CURED. For particulars enclose stamp for circular. No charge for consultation. DR. B. C. PERRY, 49 BOND STREET, NEW YORK.

American Watches For Soldiers AT REDUCED PRICES.

American Watches for Americans!

THE AMERICAN WATCH COMPANY give notice that they have lately issued a new style of Watch, especially designed for Soldiers and others who desire a good watch at a moderate price. These watches are intended to displace the low-priced, cheap watches of British and Swiss manufacture with which the country is flooded, and which never expected to keep time when they were made, being a reckless manufacture sent to this country because unsalable at home, and used here only for jockeying and swindling purposes.

We offer to sell our Watch, which is of the most substantial manufacture, an accurate and durable time-keeper, for $20. Silver Cases, Hunting pattern, as nearly as low a price as is asked for the fancy-named Aurora and Lepinas of foreign make, already referred to.

We have named the new series of Watches, Wm. Eaton, Boggs, Mann and Adams. They will be found on the plate of every watch of this manufacture, and is one of our trade-marks.

Sold by all respectable watch dealers in the loyal states. Wholesale orders should be addressed to

ROBBINS & APPLETON,
Agents of the American Watch Company,
182 BROADWAY, N. Y.

American Card Company's New Union Playing Cards.
National Emblems.

HOSTETTER'S CELEBRATED STOMACH BITTERS

HABITUAL CONSTIPATION—HOW TO EFFECT A CURE—PAIN AND PERMANENT COSTIVENESS.—Perhaps of all the prodigious to contrivances, especially those which allow but little exercise, to counteract that unfortunate habit of body, under such circumstances, might possibly be found in changing their sedentary employments for others of a more active kind; but this is by no means feasible. Habitual constipation is a very obstinate disorder. All the ordinary so-called remedies invariably aggravate it. None can be more injurious than the continued use of strong aperients. They at first relieve, but soon almost paralyze the bowels, rendering them so torpid that enormous doses of cathartic medicines are in effect required. In this, as in most other diseases, a gentle stimulus, in the true remedy; and a stimulation in the happiest proportion, of these ingredients, is found in HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS. This famous stomachic invigorates the whole intestinal canal, while quietly removing from its convolutions all impediment to a free passage through them. No mere purgative has this double operation. No ordinary stimulant effects the desired object. Cases of constipation, abandoned as hopeless by distinguished medical men, have been cured in a few weeks by the Bitters. To those who have tried all the medicines of the day without a cure, we say this irresistible stimulant and aperient. There is no sufficient reason why constipation should be the commonest of ordinary habits. HOSTETTER'S BITTERS, by supplying the vegetable bowel-strengthening tonic from exercise, will in all cases enable the system to perform its necessary functions regularly and healthily. Few persons can make proper allowances for the excitement in some cases, and the depression in others, produced in others, which are frequently the accompaniments of the diseases of females. The truth is, the ladies afflicted with these visitations often make heroic efforts to conquer them, and fail for the want of just such a stimulant and corrective as the "Bitters" afford. If the true nature of women's constitution were better understood, it would be seen that no blame attaches to her for these aberrations, but on the contrary, they should render her the object of a tender sympathy and a fonder care.

Sold by all Druggists and Country Grocers.

Hostetter's Stomach Bitters,
PREPARED AND SOLD BY
HOSTETTER & SMITH, PITTSBURGH, PA.
DEPOT FOR NEW YORK, 676 BROADWAY.

All interested in Shorthand should send for the PHONOGRAPHIC VISITOR, No. 1, 7 cents; Nos. 1 and 2, 13 cents. For explanation Circular and Specimen, address as above, and all the more general principles of the Art. Address J. GRAHAM, No. 681 Broadway, N. Y.

W. FORSYTH & CO.,

42 & 44 NASSAU ST., N. Y. (adjoining the P. O.)

Watches, Jewelry, Gold Pens
And Pencil Cases, of every description, for ONE DOLLAR. We defy competition in this branch of business. Please send for circular giving full particulars. Agents or those willing to act as such, the most liberal inducements are offered.

$60 A MONTH! We want Agents. Expenses paid, to sell our Ex. ting Pencils, Oriental Burners, and 12 other articles. 36 circulars sent free. SHAW & CLARK, Biddeford, Me.

AGENTS WANTED.—Call and see, or send 10 stamps for 30 sample, to Box 5,963, P. O. $5 to $10 a day. Agents wanted everywhere. Address W.M. MILLS & CO., No. 658 Washington Street, Boston, Mass.

Cloaks and Mantillas.

BRODIE

The Leader of Fashions!

Opened his Fall Stock on Thursday, 8th inst.,

And as usual stands unrivaled for Style, Quality, AND VARIETY.

300 Canal Street, New York.

THE "RIDGEWOOD" PATENT SMOKING CASE.

A Beautiful Holiday Gift.

Most ingenious in its combination of the Meerschaum Case, containing Pipe and Stem, Matches and Pipe Cleaner, with a handsome Tobacco Pouch attached, filling the Pipe by a valve, without the use of the fingers or waste of Tobacco, the whole carrying freedom from all odor, and portable as a Cigar Case. This is made for service, of various styles, at $1 25, $2 00, $2 25, $2 50, and $3 00 to $3 75 and $5 00; the two latter richly plated and engraved. Nothing can excel its Comfort, Utility, and Economy for all Smokers, at HOME or ABROAD, in the ARMY and NAVY. As a Present to friends, as a GIFT FROM THE LADIES, nothing could be more acceptable. FOR SALE BY DEALERS GENERALLY, in Cutlery or on the Marble, IT IS INVALUABLE. In the ARMY large Orders and commendations from all points daily attest this fact.

The Ridgewood Smoking Tobacco,

Of superior quality and flavor, in packages to fill the Pouch (about a week's smoking, $2 25 per doz.), and larger sizes for the General Trade. SMOKERS, DEALERS, and AGENTS invited to call and examine these Goods. Circulars sent on order. A LIBERAL DISCOUNT to Dealers. Single Cases sent by mail, post, on receipt of price and 25 cents.

RIDGEWOOD MANUFACTURING CO.
OFFICE 429 BROADWAY, cor. Howard Street, N. Y.

H. A. HARVEY, 34 Maiden Lane, N. Y. TWINES, Rope, CORDAGE, and Yarn, Steam Packing, Wick, CARPET WARP, Fish Lines, Blocking Cord, Lowe Mat and Spun Yarn, Tow, Wrtting and Wrapping PAPER, Envelopes, and Paper Bags.

Presents! Presents!
Soldier's Head-Quarters.
Rare Chance for AGENTS.
Head-Quarters for Army Corps Pins.

Any one wishing to become an agent, or wishing to purchase any thing in the Jewelry or Gold Pen and Pencil line, I will send a sample, on the receipt of $1, together with my wholesale circular with full instructions and Premium to agents either a Fine Gold Pen, with Pen Extension Case and Pencil, or a fine engraved Spring Locket for Brooch, or Gold Spring Ring, or Gold Charm, or a new style Vest Chain or Neck Chain, or a beautiful set of Jewelry. Also a Solid Silver Shield, or Gilded Army Corps, Division, or Co Pin, or the Kearney Cross Pin, with your Name, Regiment, and Co. handsomely engraved upon it. 15 per ct. allowed Agents on Corps Pins.

H. P. HAYWARD,
Manufacturing Jeweler, 208 Broadway, N. Y.

THE NICEST AND CHEAPEST CHRISTMAS PRESENT. Young Ladys' Picture Books, No. 1, 25 c.; No. 2, 50 c., containing 8 and 15 fine Steel engravings. Sent by mail. Also fine French Photograph Albums. ELLW. BEILER'S Foreign Bookstore, St. Louis, Mo.

Portable Printing Press.

For the Army and Navy
For 1 pr 1 in., Merchants, Druggists, and all who wish to print neatly, cheaply, and expeditiously. Consists of Cases, Sticks of Type, Cuts, &c., six cents. Press Co., 31 Park Row, N. Y., and 16 Lindell Row, St. Louis.

TO NEWSPAPER PUBLISHERS, BOOK and JOB PRINTERS.
The subscribers offer for sale, new:
1 DOUBLE-CYLINDER PRINTING MACHINE, with sheet-flyer, 31x54.
1 DOUBLE-CYLINDER PRINTING MACHINE, with sheet-flyer. Size of bed, 31x46.
1 DOUBLE-CYLINDER PRINTING MACHINE, with sheet-flyer. Size of bed, 31x46.
1 SECOND-HAND ADAMS PRESS, 30x40.
The above are all SECOND-HAND MACHINES, are warranted in first-rate order, having been thoroughly repaired. Will be sold on application to
R. HOE & CO.,
Nos. 29 and 31 Gold St., N. Y.

SALISBURY, BRO., & CO.,
AGENTS FOR THE UNITED STATES FOR THE CELEBRATED
ALBERT PEN.
Extension Holders and Gold Pens,
Of the most handsome and durable construction, put up in new fancy patterns. Sold at our desks and at very low rates quantities. They will retail for $3 each.

Price, per dozen.....$10 25
" 1 gross.....55 00
" 5 gross.....260 00
Sent by mail or express, prepaid. Address
SALISBURY, BRO. & CO., Providence, R. I.

Salesmen Wanted.
$75 a month, or commission allowed on sales. Apply to HALE & CO., Newburyport, Mass.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York,
Have just published:

HARPER'S MAGAZINE FOR DECEMBER, 1863, commencing a new Vol. 25 cents a Number, $3 00 a year.
HARPER'S MAGAZINE and HARPER'S WEEKLY, together, $5 00 a year.

HISTORY OF THE SIOUX WAR AND MASSACRES OF 1862 AND 1863. By ISAAC HEARD. 12mo. Illustrated with Portraits and Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

Holiday Presents.

J. H. Winslow & Co.,
100,000
WATCHES, CHAINS, &c., &c.
Worth $500,000.

To be sold for One Dollar each, without regard to value, and not to be paid for till you know what you are to get.

SPLENDID LIST!!

OF ARTICLES TO BE SOLD FOR ONE DOLLAR EACH.

100 Gold Hunting Cased Watches.....	$100 00 each.
100 Gold Watches	75 00 each.
200 Ladies' Gold Watches	50 00 each.
500 Ladies' and Gent's Silver Watches	20 00 each.
1000 Vest Gold Chains	5 00 to 10 00 each.
3000 Gold Band Bracelets	3 00 to 5 00 each.
3000 "	3 00 to 5 00 each.
3000 Cameo Brooches	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Mosaic and Jet Brooches	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Lava and Florentine Brooches..	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Coral, Opal, and Enamel Brooches	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Cameo Ear Drops	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Mosaic and Jet Ear Drops	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Lava and Florentine Ear Drops..	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Coral, Enamel, and Opal Ear Drops	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Gent's Breast Pins	2 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Studs	2 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Small Ribbon Slides	1 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Sets of Steam Studs	2 50 to 6 00 each.
3000 Sleeve Buttons	2 50 to 6 00 each.
6000 Plain Rings	2 50 to 5 00 each.
6000 Stone Set Rings	2 50 to 5 00 each.
6000 Lockets	2 50 to 20 00 each.
3000 Sets Ladies' Jewelry	5 00 to 10 00 each.
10000 Gold Pens, Silver M'ted Holders	4 00 to 5 00 each.
10000 Gold Pens, with Silver Extension Cases and Pencils	4 00 to 6 00 each.

All of the above list of Goods will be sold for one dollar each. Certificates of all the various articles, stating what each one can have, are first put into envelopes, sealed up, and mixed; and when ordered, are taken out without regard to choice, and sent by mail, thus giving all a fair chance. On receipt of the Certificate, you will see what you can have, and then it is at your option to send one dollar and take the article or not.

In all transactions by mail, we shall charge for forwarding the Certificates, paying postage, and doing the business, 25 cents each, which must be inclosed when the Certificate is sent for. Five Certificates will be sent for $1; eleven for $2; thirty for $5; sixty-five for $10, and a hundred for $15.

Agents, those acting as Agents will be allowed ten cents on every Certificate ordered by them, provided their remittances amount to one dollar. Also, one for every 25 cents for every Certificate, and remit 15 cents to us, either in cash or postage stamps. Great caution will be used by our correspondents in regard to giving their correct address, Town, County, and State.

J. H. WINSLOW & CO.,
599 Broadway, New York.

King on Steam.

NEW AND ENLARGED EDITION.
LESSONS IN PRACTICAL MECHANICS AND STEAM, the STEAM ENGINE, PROPELLERS, etc., etc.
FOR YOUNG ENGINEERS, STUDENTS AND OTHERS.
By the late W. H. KING, U.S.N.
Revised by Chief-Engineer J. W. KING, U.S.N.
EIGHTH EDITION, Revised and Enlarged, with Illustrations. In one vol., octavo, $2. Copies sent free by mail on receipt of price. Published by
D. VAN NOSTRAND, No. 192 Broadway, New York.

A Rare Chance to make a Fortune.—Town Rights sold, and State patent for $2 per acre. Sale of one machine more than pay cost of right. Take your chance of getting New York or a smaller town. Send stamp for a circular. Address
S. T. MACCLELLAN, 474 Broadway, N. Y.

SOLDIERS' COMPANY PINS.

Constantly on hand and Engraved to Order, and sent free on receipt of Price.
Every Co. Fitted A 1 in Solid Silver, $1.
Solid Silver, with Letters in GOLD Relief, $1 50.
Solid 18 k. GOLD, $2 50.

Corps Badges
Sent free by Mail or Express on receipt of Price.
Solid Silver. $1 50. Solid Silver, $1 50.
Enamelled. Enamelled.

Solid Gold, $4. Solid Gold, $4.
Badges for the 1st, 2d, 3d, 5th, 6th, 7th and 12th Army Corps.
1st Division Enameled Red, 2d Division White, 3d Division Blue.
None but perfect Goods sold.
Terms Cash in advance. Send for a Catalogue.
Address C. L. BALCH & Co.
Successors to 208 Broadway, New York.
J. G. PACKARD & CO.

Printing-Press for Sale.

One Taylor Double Cylinder, five Rollers, Table Distribution, Bed 38x54. Price $2500.
Apply to HARPER & BROTHERS, 329 Pearl St., N.Y.

Attention, Soldiers!

Every soldier should wear a BADGE WITH HIS NAME MARKED DISTINCTLY upon it. The Subscriber will forward to any soldier in the Army a solid Silver Badge, with his Name, Company, and Regiment engraved upon it, on receipt of One Dollar. The above cut represents one style of Badge furnished. It can be inclosed to any garment. Address
DROWNE & MOORE,
Manufacturing Jewelers, 208 Broadway, New York.
N. B.—All kinds of Corps and Co. Fits, Enameled, in Red, White, and Blue, by the one, 100, or 1000.

Broker's Stock of unredeemed goods for sale at 25 per cent. certain, consisting of a variety of rich and valuable goods worth from 75 cents to $300 each. Agents wanted. Send 3 cents for Circular and Terms.
ANDREWS & CO.,
168 Sudbury St., Boston,
Mass.

The largest assortment of rich and plain furniture in the city, made of the very best well-seasoned and selected material, by the best workmen in the country, under the immediate supervision of the firm, whose reputation for excellence of manufacture has been established seventy years. Also, an assortment of superior COTTAGE FURNITURE.

☞ Goods packed and shipped to all parts of the world.

Insoles, Belts, and Armlets.

SECURED BY LETTERS PATENT OF THE UNITED STATES AND GREAT BRITAIN.

These articles are purely Voltaic, and by the union of Metals produce a Voltaic current, which is excited by the moisture of the feet and body, diffusing a healthy and curative influence over the whole system. For Debility, being an effective cure for Rheumatism, Cold Feet, Gout, &c., and all nervous and chronic diseases.

METTAM & CO., PROPRIETORS
Insoles, $1 00; Belts, $2 00; Armlets, $2 00; sent by mail 30 c. additional. Office 429 Broadway. Send for circular.

Exterminates Catarrh, lost sense of Smell, and Hearing forever. Price $1. Send stamp for pamphlet. Depot, 619 Broadway, N. Y. NORTON & CO., Sole Agents.

If over 13, and your Board, Mosstache, &c., is of scanty, retarded growth, the use, for a short time, of the Vivia Swamp Shrub Balsam will stimulate them (harmlessly) to a very fine and vigorous growth. It has been thoroughly tried and found infallible. A small sample box of this remarkable Balsam, and the history of its discovery at Moloh, April 7, 1862, will be sent, sealed, on receipt of return postage. Address JOHN RAWLINS, 97 Broadway, N.Y.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

Agents, sale or female, Soldiers, and all having some time to spare, are particularly requested to write to us, to send us their address, and we will send in return, free information for which they will be thankful. We offer extra inducements. From $5 to $10 per day and expenses. We want addresses from every county in the U. S., and from every regiment in the Army. Address in full, RICHARDS & CO., 37 and 39 Nassau Street, Box 8181, N. Y.

DR. STERLING'S AMBROSIA

is a stimulating oily extract of young herbs, and herbs. It will cure all diseases of the scalp and itching of the head; stimulate healthy, beautiful growth to the hair from falling out or from turning prematurely gray, causing it to grow thick and long. It is unsurpassed for all other preparations, and can be relied on.

PRICE $1 00 PER BOTTLE.

Manufactured by DR. STERLING, 201 Canal St., New York. Depot No. 420 Broadway. For sale by all druggists.

"STOP AND READ."

A DOUBLE NUISANCE! BEES IN VARIETY AND INSTRUCTION.—MAN AND WOMAN.—Their Disputations, Functions. Illustrated. OUR SOCIAL RELATIONS.—Marriage Customs of England, Russia, Norway.—Divorces.—Crinoline.—The Hair Trade.—Shaving the Girls.—Fair Hair and Dark Hair.—The Races.—Mixture and Amalgamation.—Doom of the Red Man.—Woman Slaves in Russia.—Gheria.—Chinese Character and Customs.—The Two Great Empires of Russia and America.—Interesting Statistical Memoranda. Characters, and Biographies of Archbishop Whately and Mr. N. Sraing, in the December HOUSEHOLD JOURNAL. Sent by first post for 15 cents. Address
FOWLER & WELLS, No. 308 Broadway, N. Y.

SPLENDID HOLIDAY
PRESENTS.

Superbly finished watches, the beauty of which is only equaled by their chapness.—N. Y. Weekly, July 25th.

Particularly valuable for officers in the army, and travelers.—Forest Leaflet, Feb. 21.

Perfect, best and cheapest time-pieces ever offered.—N. Y. Illustrated News, Jan. 10.

Magic Time Observers,
The Perfection of Mechanism!
Being a Hunting, or Open Face, or Lady's or Gentleman's Watch combined, with Patent Self-winding Improvement.

A most pleasing novelty. One of the prettiest, most convenient, and durable of the many improvements sought for general and reliable use ever offered. It has within it and connected with its mechanism a new winding attachment, rendering a key entirely unnecessary. The watch winds itself by the movement of the pocket in walking or one being has 15 carat gold, it has the improved fully action lever movement, and is warranted a reliable timepiece. Price, superbly engraved, and the case richly chased, $204. Sample watches in neat morocco boxes, $35. If sent by mail, the postage is 50 cents; registering, 20 cents.

Silver Watches!
First-Class Hunting Time-Pieces.

FOR ACCURACY OF MOVEMENT, BEAUTY OF MATERIAL, AND, ALSO, ALL ESSENTIALS IN PERFECT TIME-KEEPERS, THESE WATCHES HAVE NO EQUAL.

UNIVERSAL APPROBATION!

An imitation so faultless that it can hardly be detected by the most experienced judges. The material being of the metals, like unto the precious, Silver and the other one German Silver, it can not be recognized by cutting or heavy engraving, unless it be used only in appearance, but in durability, the best resemblance of Solid Sterling Silver is claimed.

The sale of these watches in the army is a source of profitable business, retailing, as they very readily do, at sight and upward. Many hundred dollars can be made in a single pay-day in any camp where the regiments lie!

AT WHOLESALE only! In heavy hunting cases, beautifully engraved, white enamel dials, and fancy or plain, in good running order, by the half dozen, $65; postage, $2 50; registering, 20 cts. each; by the case. Can be safely sent by mail.

☞ TERMS CASH, invariably in advance. No agents employed; buyers must deal directly with us. If money is sent in any other way, we will not be responsible if it is or risk! Orders will meet the most prompt and faithful attention.

HUBBARD BROS., Sole Importers,
Nos. 208 and 210 Broadway, Cor. Courtlandt St., New York.

DO YOU WANT LUXURIANT WHISKERS OR MUSTACHES?—My Onguent will force them to grow heavily in six weeks upon the smoothest face without stain or injury to the skin. Sent to any part of the world, post free, to any address, on receipt of no order. A. G. GRAHAM. No. 109 Nassau Street, N. Y.

Elliot's New Repeaters

Are now ready. The most safe, compact, durable, effective, sure, and reliable Revolvers made. Carry large balls (No. 32 cartridge), are simply loaded and fired—nothing to be recently carried in the vest—whole length five inches—four barrels—carefully rifled, bored. The Trade supplied by ELLIOT ARMS CO., 404 Broadway, N. Y.

$200! $150! $100! $50!
PREMIUMS.

To Editors and Others!

I will pay the above-named amounts for the best four articles on either my Soap, Saleratus, or Concentrated Lye.

The articles must state the writer's experience in using the goods, and each article not less than six pages, and be published in the editorial columns of any good family newspaper.

Any party wishing to compete for the above, and desiring further information, may address the undersigned. Each person writing and publishing a notice as above, will mail a marked copy of the paper containing the notice to me, and also write me by mail, giving full address.

The Premiums will be awarded on the fourth day of July, 1864.

E. T. BABBITT,
64 to 74 Washington Street, New York.

Just what every Family wants. Savage & Co.'s No Chimney Burner for Hand Lamps and Lanterns, burns Kerosene Oil with a brilliant light without chimney, smoke, or odor. Saves 25 per cent. Offers 100 Patterns, No. 6, Queensware, Glass, &c. Send for circular. Sample sent free for 50 cts. American Institute Awarded 1st Premium and Medal, 1863.

EMPLOYMENT.

At your own home. It is the greatest discovery of the age. Profits 100 per cent. Demand single as Flour. Sample and secret worth $5. Sent on receipt of five stamps. Address C. MUNRO BROWN, 78 Brewster St., N. Y.

Cristadoro's Hair Dye.
THE BEST IN THE WORLD.
Cristadoro's Hair Preservative
Unequaled as a dressing. Both for sale everywhere, and applied at No. 6 Astor House, N. Y.

$75 A MONTH! I want to hire Agents in every county at $75 a month, expenses paid, to sell my new cheap Family Sewing Machine. Address S. MADISON, Alfred, Maine.

A Splendid Holiday or Bridal Present.

HARPER'S
Illuminated and Pictorial
BIBLE.

Including the Apocrypha. Superbly embellished by over Sixteen Hundred Illustrations, exquisitely engraved by Adams after Designs by Chapman, exclusive of a Series of Rich Illuminations in Colors, comprising Frontispieces, Presentation Plate, Family Record, Title-pages, &c. The whole forming a sumptuous Folio Volume.

PRICES.—Morocco, gilt edges, bevelled and panelled sides, $25 00; Morocco extra, gilt edges, $32 50; Full Calf, marbled edges, plain stamped, $18 00; Full Roan, marbled edges, $16 00.

The Pictorial Bible is printed from the standard copy of the American Bible Society, and contains Marginal References, Apocrypha, the Concordance, Chronological Table, List of Proper Names, General Index, Table of Weights, Measures, &c. The large Frontispiece, Titles to the Old and New Testaments, Family Record, Presentation Plate, Historical Illustrations, and Initial Letters to the chapters, Ornamental Borders, &c., are from original designs, made expressly for this edition, by J. G. Chapman, Esq., of New York. In addition to which, there are numerous large Engravings, from designs by distinguished modern artists in France and England; to which a full index is given.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers, New York.

For sale by A. Williams & Co., Boston; Smith, Englesh & Co., Philadelphia; Cushings & Bailey, Baltimore; Francis Taylor, Washington; Robert Clarke & Co., Cincinnati; Beers & Howe, St. Louis; J. W. Geddes & Co., Chicago; Dawson & Brothers, Montreal.

Beautiful Gift-Books
FOR THE HOLIDAYS.

LOSSING'S FIELD-BOOK OF THE REVOLUTION. Pictorial Field-Book of the Revolution; or, Illustrations by Pen and Pencil of the History, Scenery, Biography, Relics, and Traditions of the War for Independence. By Benson J. Lossing, LL.D. With over 1,000 Illustrations. 2 vols. 8vo. Cloth, $10 00; Sheep, $11 25; Half Calf, $12 50; Morocco, Extra, $15 00.

THE LAND AND THE BOOK; or, Biblical Illustrations drawn from the Manners and Customs, the Scenes and the Scenery of the Holy Land. By William M. Thomson, D.D., Twenty-five Years a Missionary of the A. B. C. F. M. in Syria and Palestine. With Two Elaborate Maps of Palestine, an accurate Plan of Jerusalem, and several hundred Engravings, representing the Scenery, Topography, and Productions of the Holy Land, and the Habits, Customs, Costumes, &c., of the People. Two elegant Large 12mo Volumes, Cloth, $4 00; Half Calf, $6 00; Half Morocco, $6 00.

MR. WIND AND MADAM RAIN. By Paul De Musset. Translated from the French by Lucy Hooper; by Emily Makepeace. Beautifully Illustrated by Charles Bennett. Square 4to. Cloth.

CHILDREN'S PICTURE-BOOKS. Square 4to, about 200 pages each, beautifully printed on tinted paper, embellished with many Engravings. Cloth gilt, $1 00 a volume; or, the Series complete in neat box, $5 00.

THE CHILDREN'S BIBLE PICTURE-BOOK. With Sixty-One Engravings by Harvey. Cloth gilt, $1 00.

THE CHILDREN'S PICTURE-BOOK OF SCENERY. With Sixty Engravings by Harvey.

THE CHILDREN'S PICTURE-BOOK OF THE ANIMAL KINGDOM. With Sixty Engravings by Harrison Weir.

THE POETS OF THE NINETEENTH CENTURY. Selected and Edited by the Rev. Robert Aris Willmott. With English and American Additions, arranged by Ernest A. Duyckinck. Uniform with "Poets of American Literature." Illustrated with 120 Engravings drawn by American and English Artists, including Birket Foster, W. Harvey, Harrison Weir, J. E. Millais, J. Mahoney, W. Hunting, C. Stanfield, J. Gilbert, F. Pickersgill, J. Tenniel, T. Dalziel, J. H. Hill, J. W. Cauliez, F. O. C. Darley, and others. In elegant small 4to form, printed on Superfine Tinted Paper, richly bound in Cloth Beveled, gilt edges, $4 00; Full Turkey Morocco, $8 50.

ABBOTT'S ILLUSTRATED HISTORIES. The Volumes of this Series are printed and bound uniformly, and are adorned with richly Illuminated Title-pages and numerous Engravings. 18mo, Cloth, 75 cents per Volume. The Volumes may be obtained separately; or the set complete in box, $13.

Henry III.	Mary Queen of Scots.
Darius the Great.	Queen Elizabeth.
Xerxes.	Charles I.
Alexander the Great.	Cromwell.
Hannibal.	Josephine.
Cleopatra.	Maria Antoinette.
Julius Cæsar.	Madame Roland.
Queen Anne.	Henry IV.
Nero.	Margaret of Anjou.
Alfred the Great.	Peter the Great.
Wm. the Conqueror.	Genghis Khan.
Richard I.	Tamerlane.
Richard II.	Hernando Cortez.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

☞ Sent by mail, postage-free, on receipt of price.

Commencement of the Twenty-Eighth Volume.

HARPER'S
NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE
For December, 1863.

TERMS.

One Copy for one Year $3 00
Two Copies for One Year 5 00
An Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of TEN SUBSCRIBERS, at $2 50 each, or 11 Copies for $25 00.
HARPER'S MAGAZINE and HARPER'S WEEKLY, together, one year, $6 00.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers.

Circulation over 100,000.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
Single Copies Six Cents.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year $2 00
One Copy for Two Years 3 00
And an Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of TEN SUBSCRIBERS, at $2 00 each, or 11 Copies for $20.
Terms to Clubs for Advertising, $1 50 a line per time, and One Dollar per line for outside Advertisements.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers.

IRONICAL.

MRS. COLUMBIA. "There! Perhaps I hav'nt taken the Rebel Kink out of the Old Flag with this BIGGEST INOS of mine!"

Davis Collamore & Co.,
479 Broadway, below Broome Street.

Are now Opening HOLIDAY GOODS in great VARIETY and of very beautiful styles.

ALSO DIADEMS, TEA, and TOILET SETS. GLASS WARE, ENGRAVED with CREST or INITIAL.

RICH CANTON COFFEE CUPS, &c., &c.

CHICKERS EGG DISHES.

Musical Boxes,

Playing 1, 2, 3, 4, 6, 8, 10, 15, 16, 24, and 36 tunes, and costing from $6 75 to $450 00. A beautiful article for HOLIDAY PRESENTS. My stock of Musical Boxes is the ONLY complete one now found in this country. M. J. PAILLARD, Importer, No. 51 Maiden Lane (up stairs), New York.

$7. WATCHES. $7.

A Beautiful Engraved Gold-Plated Watch, Lever Cap, small size, English Movements, perfect time-keeper. Sent free by mail, in neat case, for only $7. A Solid Silver, same as above, $9. Specially adapted to the ARMY. CHAS. P. NORTON & CO., 38 & 40 Ann Street, N. Y.

Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper, of Aug. 22, says: "MESSRS. NORTON & CO. have combined two very desirable things in a watch — cheapness and reliability. When it is known that for $7 a person can have an excellent timekeeper, there will be greater punctuality in all the affairs of life."

STAMMERING!

Cured by Bates' Patent Appliances. For Descriptive Pamphlets, &c., address

H. T. L. MEARS, 217 W. 23d Street, N. Y.

The Soldier's Gift

To the Loved One at Home.

We will deliver Free of freight charge, at any Express Office East of St. Joseph, Mo., any of our beautiful Albums of the value of $25 or more, that may be ordered by members of the Army or Navy of the United States as Presents to friends at home. We manufacture elegant styles of all prices to $15, and higher.

E. H. T. ANTHONY,
Manufacturers and Importers,
501 Broadway, N. Y.

Lands. To all Wanting Farms.

LANDS.—TO ALL WANTING FARMS.—Large and thriving settlement, mild and healthful climate, 30 miles south of Philadelphia by railroad. Both soil, produces large crops, which can now be seen growing. Twenty and fifty acre tracts, at from $15 to $20 per acre, payable with in four years. Good business opening for MANUFACTURERS and MECHANICS; schools, and good society. It is now the most improving place East or West. Hundreds are now settling and building. The large crops of the past season is laid out in town-ground lots, and sold at low prices, payable in small monthly payments. Prices full information will be forwarded. Address CHAS. E. LANDIS, Vineland Post Office, Cumberland County, New Jersey.

From the Editor of Rebel Robbery, Agricultural Editor of the Tribune:—"It is one of the most extensive fertile tracts, in the vicinity of a level position and suitable condition to please, and we know of this side of the West-ern prairies.

Learn to Skate in One Hour by using The American Parlor Or Floor Skate, Hard Rubber Rollers, Anti-friction Axles. Frederick Stevens, 215 Third Street, New York. 68 Kilby Street, Boston.

A GOLD OR SILVER WATCH
And a Gold Chain Free.

NEW STATIONERY FREE PACKETS for the Holidays. NEW and USEFUL INDUCEMENTS to AGENTS. Send for our New Circular.

G. S. HASKINS & CO., 58 Beekman Street, N. Y.

Shults' Ongwent, warranted to produce a full set of Whiskers in six weeks, or money refunded. Sent post-paid, for 30 cents. Address C. F. SHULTS, Troy, N. Y.

A Beautiful Complexion free from Tan, Pimples and Freckles, may easily be procured by using the "BALM OF THOUSAND FLOWERS." For shaving it is unequaled. It is composed of pure oil, honey, and other valuable articles, highly perfumed by which operation the skin is rendered soft and white, and free from blemish. Price 50 cents.

The Trade supplied by HOWARD, SANGER & CO., 105 and 107 Chambers Street, N. Y., and for sale by all Druggists.

Amalgam Bells.

Cheapest and best for Churches, Schools, Farms, Factories, &c. Equal in tone and durability to any other metal, and two-thirds less in price, or 12 cts. per lb. Send for a circular to the manufacturer, JOHN B. ROGERS, 128 PRATT, BETWEEN 4th & 5th, 199 Water St., N. Y.

Strange Stories of a Detective; or,

Curiosities of Crime.

BY A RETIRED MEMBER OF THE DETECTIVE POLICE.

PRICE 50 CENTS.

Published by DICK & FITZGERALD,
No. 18 ANN Street, N. Y.

Copies of the above book sent by mail, to any address, free of postage, on receipt of the price.

The Romance of Western Life.
American Tales, No. 1.
62 Double-Column Octavo Pages.

On the Plains;
OR,
A Race for Life.

A Story of Adventure among the Black Hills.

Price Ten Cents. Complete.

This fine romance, by one of the most eminent and widely popular authors, is overrunning with the excitement and novel incidents of hunters' and trappers' experience, and of Indian life and warfare. It is also full of the drollest humor, and has enough of a love story in it to give it a well-ad interest.

☞ So much never before has been given for the price of a cents. Single copies sent, post-paid, on receipt of price. For sale by all Booksellers.

SINCLAIR TOUSEY, Publishers' Agent,
No. 121 Nassau Street, New York.

THE

Atlantic Monthly

COMMENCES ITS TWENTIETH VOLUME with the JANUARY number. Its regular contributors are LONGFELLOW, HAWTHORNE, AGASSIZ, LOWELL, EMERSON, WHITTIER, HOLMES, and other of the LEADING AMERICAN WRITERS, and it aims to give its readers each month

☞ The Best Literature ☜

which American talent can furnish.

Subscription, $3 00 per year, postage paid. Liberal Reduction to Clubs. Specimen numbers sent on receipt of four cents postage. Address TICKNOR & FIELDS, Boston, Mass.

Opera and Field-Glasses

Of great power, from $3 50 to $25. Spectacles and Eye Glasses of every description.

B. H. HOES,
Manufacturing Optician,
Salesroom, 278 Broadway, up stairs. Send for circular.

ARMS and LEGS.

Selpho's Patent (established 24 years). These celebrated substitutes for lost limbs can be had only of WM. SELPHO & SON, 810 Broadway, N. Y.

FURS.
C. G. GUNTHER & SONS.
FUR WAREHOUSE,
46 Maiden Lane. New York.
Importers Manufacturers and Shippers of Raw Furs and Skins.

Invite attention to their extensive Assortment of Ladies' Furs now on hand.

HOLIDAY GOODS.
Schuyler, Hartley & Graham,
19 Maiden Lane AND 22 John Street,
31 Rue du Chateau D'Eau, Paris, Sands St., Birmingham, England.

French and English Fancy Goods.

PORCELAIN VASES. MANTEL ORNAMENTS. MARBLE CLOCKS. BRONZE STATUETTES. OPERA GLASSES. PORTEMONNAIES. OBJETS AND DESSKING CASES. CARVED WOOD WORK-BOXES. LADIES' CARDS. OPERA GLASSES. FANS. LEATHER BAGS. ALSO JET AND CORAL JEWELRY, DIAMONDS, WATCHES, &c.

MILITARY GOODS—GUNS—PISTOLS—CUTLERY, &c.

SCHUYLER, HARTLEY & GRAHAM.

IVORY SLEEVE BUTTONS

OIL STUDS—Red, White, and Black, engraved with Initials, 75c. per pair, will be sent free on receipt of the price by mail. Nine of Each, $1 50 per set; cash. For sale by WM. M. WELLING, manufacturer of Ivory goods, 397 Canal St., N. Y., sign of the Golden Elephant.

A BEAUTIFUL MICROSCOPE

For 30 cts. (coin preferred), magnifying small objects 500 times. FIVE DIFFERENT powers for $1 00. Mailed free. Address F. C. BOWEN, Box 926, Boston, Mass.

(A CARD.)

The Rev. CHARLES E. KING, formerly Secretary to the London Evangelical Alliance, and recently connected, as resident Minister and Physician, with the Venezuelan Mission, will visit Free of Cost on the Prescription with which he successfully treated, while in charge of the large Mission Hospital, upward of one hundred cases of CONSUMPTION in the first, second, and third stages.

The remedy is equally adapted to the treatment of Asthma, Catarrh, Bronchitis and all affections of the Lungs, Throat and Air-Passages; while it speedily invigorates the enfeebled Nervous System, and energizes the prostrated functions of the Stomach, Liver, and Bowels.

Permission is given to refer to the Presidents and Professors of the two Medical Colleges of the City, and to the Rev. MESSRS. ADAMS, POTTER, SAYRES, and VAN BUREN.

Address, with stamp,
Rev. CHARLES E. KING,
Station D, Bible House,
New York.

P. S.—I wish publicly to acknowledge the generosity of those publishers who, from a sense of humanity, have given this advertisement gratuitous insertion. Religious papers are earnestly requested to copy.

ROMAN SCARFS SENT BY MAIL EVERYWHERE

3.000 dozen pure Roman Scarfs.

Made from the Purest and Softest Silk.

These are the most beautiful, elegant, and economical Scarfs ever imported, as they are reversible, one Scarf is as good as two.

They are much worn in Europe by both ladies and gentlemen. Can be worn with either pin or ring.

The whole Scarf is sent at

WHOLESALE PRICES!

$1 50 AND $2 EACH.

A single Scarf sent by mail on receipt of the cash, and six cents for postage.

Very fine Gold Plated Scarf Pins or Rings
Worth $2, sent by mail, $1 00 each.

S. W. H. WARD, No. 387 Broadway, New York.

STEEL COLLARS

ENAMELLED WHITE,

Having the appearance and comfort of linen, have been worn in England for the last two years in preference to any other collar, as they are readily cleaned in one minute with sponge.

To Military Men and Travelers they are invaluable.

Price $1 each, sent by mail to any part of the Union on receipt of $1 15.

WHOLESALE AND RETAIL

AGENTS WANTED in every Town in the Union.

S. W. H. WARD, No. 387 Broadway, N. Y.

FRENCH FLANNEL

OVERSHIRTS

the largest assortment in New York. $2 75, $3, $3 75 each; all cut one pattern.

A single Shirt sent by mail on receipt of the cost. The cost of the measure to enclose—35 cents for each Shirt.

Give the size of your neck.

ENGLISH MEDIUM UNDERSHIRTS AND DRAWERS, $2, $2 25, and $2 50. SCOTCH LAMB'S WOOL UNDERSHIRTS AND DRAWERS. ALSO, FINE WHITE SHIRTS MADE TO MEASURE AT $24, $30, $36, AND $42 PER DOZEN.

Self-Measurement for Shirts.

Printed directions for self-measurement, list of prices, and drawings of different styles of shirts and collars sent free everywhere.

The Cash to be paid to Express company on receipt of goods.

S. W. H. WARD,
No. 387 Broadway, New York.

Fogg's Double-Action Patent Lever SKATE BUCKLE,

Manufactured and for sale on Straps, at wholesale, by F. STEVENS, Manufacturer of Skates, Straps, and Leather Goods, 510 Pearl St., New York, 68 Kilby St., Boston.

BILLIARD BALLS.

Patent compressed Ivory Billiard Balls, 2¼ and 2⅝ in., $16 per set. 2⅜ in. Bagatelle, $6 per set. 1¾ in. Bagatelle, $4 per set, with best assortment of Billiard Supplies. Manufactured and for sale by WM. M. WELLING, 397 Canal St., New York, sign of the Golden Elephant.

FISK & HATCH.

Bankers and Dealers in Government Securities,

AND

AGENTS FOR THE UNITED STATES FIVE-TWENTY LOAN,

No. 38 Wall Street, New York.

$15 Per Day Easy $15
And a Watch Free.

Employment for everybody, male and female. 100,000 men, women, and children wanted to act as our Agents in every Town and Village throughout the U. S. to sell our immensely popular, unequaled, and saleable extra large size FREE STATIONERY, RECIPES, and YANKEE NOTION PACKAGES, containing SIX WHOLE REAMS of paper, Pens, Pencils, Envelopes, 50 Miscellaneous articles, Parlor, Ladies' Fancy Work, Designs for needlework, Cottage Interior, Household Companion, Copy Conglomerate the Soldiers, Parlor Amusements, Letter Writer a Guide, Married Physician, Many Ways to Get Rich, Likenesses of Military Heroes, Union Designs, Gents' Pocket Calendars for 1864, YANKEE NOTIONS of all kinds, rich and costly Presents of Reasonable Jewelry, Rare Recipes, Games, Army Advice, &c., &c., &c., the whole worth, if bought separately, many dollars. Price each Package ONLY 25 cents retail. Wholesale rates to Agents very low, from 100 to 200 PER CENT. PROFIT ALLOWED. Our Packages stand unique as ever, alone, and above all competitors, and have long been acknowledged as the leading and only real valuable and standard Articles of the kind now manufactured. Packages of all description put up by the 100 for Sutlers, Peddlers, Wholesale Dealers, &c. Goods sent by Express safe to ALL PARTS of the Army South or Southwest. A SPLENDID SILVER HUNTING WATCH, ENGLISH MOVEMENTS, and correct timepiece, presented FREE to each person who acts as our agent. Send for our NEW CIRCULARS, containing Extra Premium Inducements, and Specimen Pkg. S. C. BEARDS & CO., 102 MASON ST., N. Y. The Great Original, Largest, and Oldest Prize Package Home in the World.

$35 WATCHES. $35
Genuine Full-Jeweled American Lever Watches, in 4 Ounce Coin Silver Hunting Cases, Gold Joints, for $35.

Also every variety of good Watches at equally low rates. All orders from the Army must be pre-paid, as the Express Companies will not take bills for collection or collect.

J. L. FERGUSON, Watch Maker,
206 Broadway New York.

FINE DRESS SHIRTS TO ORDER. UNRIVALED In Manufacture, Fitting, and Material. At UNION ADAMS, No. 637 Broadway.

Remington's

ARMY AND NAVY REVOLVER.

Approved by the Government.

Warranted superior to any other Pistol of the kind. Sold by Dealers Everywhere. Sold by the Trade generally.

E. REMINGTON & SONS,
Ilion, N. Y.

GOLD PENS AND CASES.

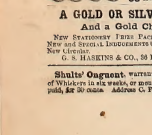
Retailed at wholesale prices. 14 kt. Gold Pen, Solid Silver Case, $1 50, warranted for one year, guarantee exchanging each Pen. Send for a circular. Fine Pencils, $1 00 per dozen.

E. S. JOHNSON, 15 Maiden Lane, N. Y.

MUNN & CO.,

Solicitors of American and Foreign Patents,

And Publishers of the ILLUSTRATED SCIENTIFIC AMERICAN, 37 Park Row, N. Y. Twenty-six years' experience in procuring Patents, rare. Specimens of the Paper, rare.



PREPARE FOR THE HOLIDAYS.

There is no Gift, or Present, which compares with the USEFUL HOUSEHOLD and MEDICAL Objects. As a source of amusement and instruction they are unsurpassed. The Microscope will be mailed, postage paid, for $2 25; or with 6 beautiful mounted objects, for $3; or with 24 objects, for $5.

Address, HENRY CLARK,
335 Broadway, New York.

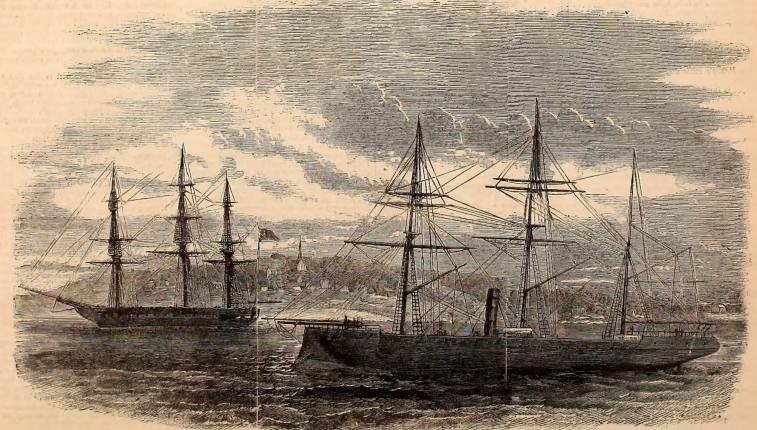
A liberal discount to the trade.

The only enamelled "Turn-over" Collar made in sections. Send 6f for a "Turn-over" or 75 cents for a "Stickup" to Box 3124, and receive it by return mail. A American enamelled Metallic Collar Co., 94 Pine St., N. Y.

AGENTS WANTED.—$9 positively made from 50 cts.! A singularly modest fly every article. Call and examine, or six samples sent free by mail for 50 cts.; retails for $15, by R. L. WOLCOTT, 161 Fulton Street, N. Y.

A Household Word.—Buy your Thanksgiving Turkey at BAILEY'S, Corner Division, New York.

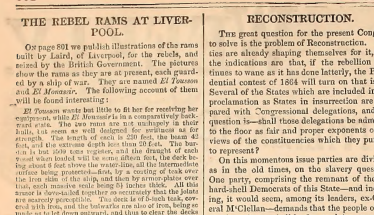
HARPER'S WEEKLY.



A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. VII.—No. 364.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 19, 1863. [SINGLE COPIES SIX CENTS. $3.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1863, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.



THE LAIRD RAM "EL MONASSIR," SEIZED BY THE BRITISH GOVERNMENT.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

THE LAIRD RAM "EL TOUSSON" SEIZED BY THE BRITISH GOVERNMENT.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

THE REBEL RAMS AT NEW ORLEANS.

POOL.

On page 801 we publish illustrations of the rams built by Laird, of Liverpool, for the rebels, and seized by the British Government. The pictures show the rams as they are at present, each guarded by a ship of war. They are named El Tousson and El Monassir. The following account of them will be found interesting:

El Tousson waste but little to fit her for receiving her engines, while El Monassir is in a comparatively forward state. The two rams are not uniformly in their build, but are both designed for service abroad or for draught. The length of each is 220 feet, the beam 45 feet, and the depth of hold less than 20 feet. The beam is but 360 tons register, and the draught of each is not much more than nine and one fifth feet. Reckoning about 6 feet above the water-line, all the intermediate surface between the ends is built by a system which uses the iron skin of the ship, and then by arrow-plates over that, each inclined to the vertical at 30 degrees. All this armor is three-inched together so accurately that the joints are scarcely perceptible. The deck is of 6-inch iron, covered with iron, and the bulwarks are also of iron, being so much as to form armor-guard, and thus protect the deck during action. Two retracting cylindrical turrets, on the principles invented by Captain Coles, are apportioned to each ship, one turret being before and the other abaft her superstructure. There is also a pilot-house, constructed of teak, and iron-plated. Each turret carries two guns, placed in the opposite way, so that they can be brought to bear nearly in the same direction at one time. The walls of the turret is a series of circular spaces, like that of an 8-shilling, and of these iron cells are to be filled by with teak, making one solid and uniform mass, which is to be again strengthened and rendered well-nigh impregnable by armor-plates. Each ship is furnished with a propeller and sharp iron prow or beak projecting from the bow, but under the water-line, to enable the vessel to run down, ironsram, and so damage an antagonist, somewhat in the way, but in a more powerful style, than the steam-ram from Virginia destroyed the Cumberland in the James River. The ships will be fitted in their construction with the name of "rams" but being driven to the vessels. At each side of the vessel is raised deck, forming a passage-way connection quarters for officers and men; and the fore-castle is said to carry one or two heavy guns, and to be fortified. In the captain's cabin are port-holes, out of the President; and there is no capacity for a 100 tons of coal. The machinery, as a matter of course, is all below the water-line. Their steering will be so formed as to protect the screw and rudder from shot or collision.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 19, 1863.

THE ARMIES.

ANOTHER period of inaction appears to be upon us. The battle of Chattanooga secured Grant's position at that point, enabled him to obtain supplies freely and abundantly, and to accumulate them there for a fresh advance into Georgia. But some time must necessarily elapse before that advance can be commenced. Soldiers say that it will take sixty days to make Chattanooga a proper base for an offensive movement against Rome and Atlanta. During all this time, therefore, it will be safe to look for dullness in the army of the Cumberland —quarrelling, sickness, the destruction of supply-trains, captures of bushwhackers, etc., are likely to be the most prominent events in the history of the army during the months of December and January.

The armies in Virginia are notoriously going into winter-quarters. Whether the winter advance of Meade was intended to provoke a battle with Lee, or merely to prevent the rebel army from being weakened by sending a large batch of reinforcements to Longstreet or Harder, certain it is that all thought of active operations appears to have been abandoned on both sides for the present. Neither General is a tumultuous of advancing into what may now be properly termed the Great Virginian desert, or of leaving his base unshielded in Fairfax and Loudoun. Until February, we presume, we shall hear nothing more exciting from Northern Virginia than Mosby's raids and Kilpatrick's reconnoissances.

Nor is it probable that Burnside will attempt anything more than to hold his position in East Tennessee, and the Virginia and Tennessee Railroad. To advance on Abingdon by the route Longstreet took in retreating will be a very proper course for a season when Grant and Meade are ready to move from their respective bases. As an independent operation it could yield no fruits that would compensate for the risk it would involve.

So at Charleston and on the Rio Grande. It is to us not to indulge sanguine hopes of any striking news from there for some time to come. It is difficult to see what Gilmore can do—in addition to what he has done already—without large reinforcements. Banks seems to have completed his work for the present by the capture of Brownsville, and the occupation of the line of the Rio Grande.

On the whole, the prospect of a couple of months of comparative dullness may be considered fair. In February next our armies will have swelled by a conscription of 300,000 fresh men, will be in a condition to move simultaneously and vigorously on the various points in the rebel States which they now menace. Grant from Chattanooga, Gilmore from Morris Island, Meade from Manassas, Burnside from Knoxville, and perhaps Butler from Norfolk, will advance with the prestige of past victory and present strength. They ought to be successful. The bulk of their armies will be veteran. They will be superior to the enemy in numbers, equipment, and morale. They will be under Generals whom they and the nation can trust. They ought to crush out the rebellion before Congress adjourns.

RECONSTRUCTION.

THE great question for the present Congress to solve is the problem of Reconstruction. Parties are already shaping themselves for it, and the indications are that, if the rebellion continues to wane as it has done latterly, the Presidential contest of 1864 will turn on that issue. Several of the States which are included in the proclamation of the President have already prepared with Congressional delegations, and the question is—shall those delegations be admitted to the floor as fair and proper exponents of the views of the constituencies which they purport to represent?

On this momentous issue parties are divided, as by a chasm, on the slavery question. One party, comprising the remnant of the old hard-shell Democrats of this State—and including, it would seem, among its leaders, ex-General McClellan—demands that the people of the Southern States shall be free to claim representation in Congress at any time they please without regard to the social institutions which they favor for their respective States. This party is understood to be patronized by Mr. Montgomery Blair of the Cabinet, and to be represented by the so-called delegation from Louisiana. Another party, at least as numerous and as influential as the first, declares that the whole object of the war having been slavery no State shall be readmitted to the Union until it shall have rooted out that institution. This party is represented in the Cabinet by Secretary Chase, and has for its Congressional exponents the leading members of the Republican majority.

It is between these two parties that the great battle of the Congress of 1863–4 will be waged. It needs no sagacity to foresee that the Democrats—Republicans of New England will side with the latter the peace men will espouse the cause of the former.

On both sides the common sense there is one point to be made. It is due to the country that Congress should admit to its floor no sham delegations, whatever latitude it may do. If an individual, or several individuals, present themselves as representatives of this or that constituency, and no man of loyalty can be misled by a fair majority of the ordinary and legitimate members of that constituency, it is clear that they ought not to be admitted. Men are ready to claim admission to Congress from States in insurrection, and their claim is chiefly based on their hostility to slavery. Now that hostility is, in some view, a very proper sentiment. But it does not constitute a warrant for a seat in Congress. On the other hand, some semi-rebels in Louisiana appear to be desirous to send some of their property from the wreck by sending certain persons to Washington as members of Congress, having previously sent their slaves to Cuba to keep an Asylum for them prior to Richmond as members of the rebel Congress. It is not pretended that these persons received a fair majority of the suffrages of the legally-qualified voters in the constituencies which they claim to represent. It is notorious that a majority of those were in the rebel army. Under these circumstances Congress would seem to have a very simple duty to perform in excluding these pseudo-representatives.

When a State like Missouri, whose population has not been diminished to any material extent by the war, elects representatives by the usual or nearly the usual vote, there is every good reason for excluding them, whether they are Abolitionists or Copperheads. Their opinions are their affair, not the nation's. But where individuals claim to represent Louisiana or North Carolina, and it is demonstrable that at their election not above a tithe of the legally-constituted voters deposited their suffrages, it would be a fraud to admit them to Congress as legally elected members.

There is no reason to be in a hurry to solve the problem of reconstruction. It will be time enough to do that when the rebel armies of Lee and Bragg are scattered, and present the only safe rule is the old rule of truth and honesty—to admit no man to Congress who can not show that he has been fairly elected by the votes of legally-constituted voters; and to refuse no man a seat, whatever his opinions may be, who can show such an election.

THE WAR.

THE TERROR AT THE SOUTH.

THE following letter comes to the Lounger from an officer of one of the New York regiments in the Army of the Gulf. The revelation of the suffering of faithful American citizens under the fierce terrorism of the rebellion is startling. The rebel General Orders which our correspondent inclosee, and which follow his letter, were found upon an officer of the rebel General Mouton's brigade, captured by a detachment of Major-General Washburn's division, near St Martinsville, south of the Red River. They show how desperate is the resistance made by Southern men against the "Confederate Government," and how earnest their hate of the "liberty and independence" proffered them by a slaveholding oligarchy:

CAMP AT VERMILION BAYOU, LOUISIANA, November, 1863.

To the Lounger in the Library:

The circular which I inclose will tell you its own story, and will be allowed, I hope, to find a response in that sympathies and daith of a hundred thousand loyal men and women. Were there no other evidence existing of loyalty in rebellious Louisiana—of true, tried, unwavering loyalty, which love and lies be being, even though hunted, persecuted, and measured by such incarnations of traitorous hate and cruelty as Sterling Price, Richard Taylor, and Alfred Mouton—this circular would nevertheless triumphantly prove the fact.

ARE there, Mr. Lounger, among the worthy people whom you visit weekly, some who have never felt the burdens of the war, save in the tax-gatherer has knocked now loudly at their doors, and who have never felt the bitter bitterness of the loss to which they have mourned the decline of gold, and yet who have complained loudly of its hardships? Are there among them persons who think the old Union ship must yet outride the storm has wavered, and whose hearts have grown captious, even beneath the graceful shadow of the Old Flag? If such there be, let me ask them to read and learn how the Wittingtons, the Thrasers, the Lewis, the Hebbards, the Robertsons, have been made the victims of a relentless and cold-blooded persecution! Learn how their homes are rooms and trades of their State; proscribed, outlawed, murdered in secret, because—and I would that it might be blazoned in characters of fire before Copperheads' eyes—because they could not [lift the traitor's hand against their beloved country! Here, then, is evidence of the true patriot spirits! The soul of all the Army of the Gulf cries out to them in sympathy and encouragement.

This circular has probably been prepared for distribution to the people of the State, and has, undoubtedly, the authority of our Generals in this Department.

Yours in loyalty,

GENERAL ORDERS.—No. 1.

HEAD-QUARTERS, FORCES SOUTH OF RED RIVER, VERMILION BAYOU, November 14, 1863.

Information has been received that there are bands of robbers, deserters, marauders, and stragglers from the army above Houston, on the Colcasieu River, in the parish of Rapides, down to the lower parishes, extending into the parishes of Lafayette and St. Mary, on the Bayou Teche, which are committing depredations, robberies, and incendiarism, and who are encouraging others to desert and join the bands in their hands. Such men can only be considered as outlaws, traitors, and deserters.

In consequence:

1. You will proceed with your battalion up to the Calcasieu River, and in the vicinity of Hineston, in the parish of Rapides, and from that point scour the whole country up to the settlements in Natchitoches Parish, if necessary, to the Bayou Teche, in search of these outlaws, highwaymen, and traitors. All such bands, beyond the pale of society, must be exterminated, especially the leaders; and every man found with arms for the purpose of resisting the operations of the Confederate laws, or against whom satisfactory evidence may be given, must be executed on the spot.

No prisoners should be taken. Such as are not sufficiently implicated for immediate execution must be liberated, and, if convicts, ordered to report forthwith. Men by the men and women by women. Negroes, Carrizo, Huddleston, have been designated as some of the ringleaders.

By order of Brigadier-General ALFRED MOUTON:

LOUIS BUSH, Assistant Adjutant-General.

To Major O. A. FRANKLIN, Fifteenth Texas Infantry.

These instructions are to be kept secret, and no one is allowed to know the objects of your movements except yourself.

True copy:

LOUIS BUSH, Assistant Adjutant-General.

Lieutenant G. J. DESLAND, Acting Adjutant.

AN ANTI-IMPERIAL VIEW IN FRANCE.

A LATE number of the Correspondant, a monthly Parisian review, contains an article upon French policy in Mexico, from the pen of M. Rio, which is interesting and valuable as an anti-Imperial view of the subject. There is no longer any doubt of the loyalty of the Emperor to the United States. There is no question that he has constantly besought Great Britain to join him in recognition of the independence of the "Confederacy." His conquest of Mexico proceeded upon the expectation of the ruin of the Government and country. Whatever else he may be he is no friend of ours; and he is a more dangerous enemy than Great Britain because he is more subtle.

The article in the Correspondant begins by the proposition that the sympathy of France belongs to the cause of civil organization in this war of anarchy as in all others. It sketches our political history since the adoption of the Constitution, and the great fidelity and knowledge, showing, what no one competent to speak now denies, that the invasion has no other object than the perpetuity of slavery. What affinity then, asks M. Moreau, exists between France and the rebel States? Is the community of political religion, as some pretend? A few words prick that bubble, and lead to the conclusion that "liberal, conservative, and Catholic France has nothing in common with the cause of the South, which is merely slavery."

The article shows that the interests of France imperiously demand the maintenance of the Union upon the great, traditional, general ground that the prosperity of Britain must be balanced by another maritime state of the first class. The reasons which originally recommended this policy to France are of course stronger. The Emperor opposes ours other than it agrees with it," is the judgment of M. Moreau; and he does not find for any possible expansion whether any danger so threatening as that flowing from our destruction here. His article, which we can only commend to the thoughtful consideration of the reader, concludes in these words:

Does it therefore follow (from the recent exercises of the Government) that the end of the civil war is as near as we should wish? We do not venture to affirm it. The rebel Generals of the South may yet substitute themselves upon the defensive for a long time, and even signally check their adversaries. Their numerous attacker, dearly bought, as a victor whose armies are recruited with difficulty. If the rebel Government can continue to support its armies, and armies within an ever narrower circle, the Southern people, weary of their sufferings and resultless war, will force peace upon leaders who have deceived them. In a future article we shall consider whether France has bartered or hindered this result."

WORDS AND THINGS.

IN a Rifle speech at Gettysburg Mr. Seward speaks of the rebels as our "misguided brethren." It is true in a certain sense that all sinners are our brothers. Morrissey, Arnold, Hyer, Benjamin, murdered his wife and two children in a London cab a few weeks since, are all in a certain sense misguided. But is it not very superfluous to use those words as if they covered the case? The rebels at the South know exactly what they are fighting for, what they mean to accomplish if they can. They are sagacious and desperate; and while Mr. Seward does well in reminding us that those are many who are deluded, and while we know, as the letter from Louisiana which we publish elsewhere in these columns shows, that there are hundreds of brave hearts still beating faithful to the country, yet it is no less undeniable that any policy in treating the rebels from the idea that they are to be conciliated would be as futile as for the Parliament of England to have regarded Laud, Strafford, and the King as misguided brethren.

In fact this country could not be engaged in a war in which the enemy would have the humanity as the rebels. They are stout, resolute, irreconcilable. They are men to conquer or to be conquered. They have shown their pluck, their skill, their endurance. Now fine words butter no parsnips. Open enemies must not be treated as friends by saying "We are sorry to be so counted, they are to be conquered. If we clearly understand that, we are as safe in victory as in battle. If we deceive ourselves, we shall lose the victory even if we win the battle.

RESULTS.

THE London Spectator, one of our ablest and generally most intelligent friends in England, says that the only satisfactory aspect of the war is under series of conflicts equally without result—the North is not suffering much because the South is not; and its loss; the South not suffering much, because its laboring class is not in the field." When the Spectator sees the speech of Mr. Lincoln it will change its opinion. Meanwhile what does it mean by "equally without result?" Has there been as yet no result? Is the opening of the Mississippi, the holding of Chattanooga, and the marching upon Rome in Virginia no result? Is the unbroken will fields of victory, no result? In the clear exhaustion of emancipation as an integral part of the policy of the war is there no result? Is the universal unanimous support of the Government by States that have opposed it, no result? Or is nothing a "result" but a final and complete overthrow of the Rebellion?

If the editor of the London Spectator, upon his way home from his office at night, were only going a hundred yards, a friend who said "Tut! tut! still walking home, and only made a hundred yards? Why, my dear editor, it seems to me that the only visible prospect for you is another series of steps, equally without result." What would the learned editor say? Certainly in his shrewd way he would answer: "My good fellow, it is only by a series of steps that I get on at all; and if I can make every hundred yards with the same result as the last hundred, I shall soon be at home and happy to see you."

A MELANCHOLY EVENT.

THE gentleman who call themselves a Conservative Union Committee, and who lately met in Cincinnati to consider whether General McClellan should be held as a candidate for President or Vice-President, are remarkable for never representing any public or popular movement whatever. They are the ruins of the old Whig party. The Lords here have once had office and years for it still; and they revenge their disdain for being unable to return the signs of the times by separate hats of those who are wiser. They are the gentlemen who nominated Mr. Fillmore in 1856, and in 1860, professing a peculiar and exclusive veneration for the Union and the Constitution, they nominated Mr. John Bell. The present statesmen, upon the first opportunity, became a rebel; and his late supporters, who, if they could learn any thing, would know that Mr. Bell was the only perfect "gentleman" present the "conservation" which is simply unquestioning submission to slavery, now propose the name of General M'Clellan as their candidate for some office not specified.

His enemies, of course, will rejoice that his chances are destroyed before the campaign begins. Any party which should take a candidate from the hands of such politicians as Mr. Ward, Mr. Mr. Leslie Combs, and Mr. Washington Hunt—all of them gentlemen with an unerring genius for defeat and unequaled in their wonderful simplicity—but it expected to lose. And they touch their candidate not merely to make him ridiculous. "Everybody," they say, "is his name was mentioned for the Presidency; now it is suggested for the Vice-Presidency. People will think that he is the most estimable elephant on our hands? shall we put him in the front parlor or under the stairs? Let us adjourn and think it over."

When a man remembers the vital importance at this great crisis, that the principle upon which he has been elected and the interests of civilization themselves, are at stake; that the solution of the question requires the most profound study in the human liberty and the people; and that it can be reached only as the people revolve wisely and justly, and then see the foolish of lack politicians offering to be leaders and saviors, he can not but wonder at the singular fortunes of a General once so universally trusted and honored, but now a worn a hundred fold more unfortunate in his friends than in his enemies.

EUROPE AT HOME.

A KING has just died in Denmark who never wished to be king. He heartily disliked his throne, and was always willing to abdicate. His political principles were republican; and within the last few weeks, when the independence of Denmark has been threatened by Russia, he said plainly that if he were pushed to the wall he would declare a republic in Denmark, call upon the people, lead them, and leave Europe to the consequences of that proceeding.

This was King Frederick Seventh of Denmark. He had two royal wives, from each of which he was separated, and married, at last, Louis Rameau, a pretty ballet-dancer, who proved to be his most devoted and, as he insisted, most valuable friend. Once, when he was coldly received in the Southern Danish provinces, he said at a banquet that, although he was a king, he did not mean to lose his privilege as a man to marry the woman he loved best. Such frankness seldom hurts a king, and he is thought to have been the best monarch that Denmark has had for a hundred years.

His death complicates European politics. It makes the settlement of the Schleswig-Holstein question necessary. The same will be recognized by all who remember the war of fifty years ago, which ended, nothing; for it is precisely the same disputed point which is now raised, whether Germany or Denmark shall govern the Duchies. The question is one of those which Louis Napoleon's Congress might determine, if his Congress could ever meet, or agree, or enforce its agreements. In any case it is another European trouble. We may relieve ourselves from it by not forcing it upon the Powers. The European Powers will have their hands full at home. Our struggle will be decided by American hands and heads upon American soil; and the peace which Europe has not reached, after centuries of war, because it always awaits a very radical settlement, we shall establish upon immutable foundations.

LITERARY.

ANTHONY TROLLOPE is now the most popular of English novelists after Dickens, Thackeray, and Bulwer, although doubtless he has much less value in the market. His works are the result of sturdy British resolution and industry; and the secret of their charm is that they contain common sense—the faithful pictures of the life around him. Average human character in its various aspects of love-making, and sister, starting, Intrigue, wilfulness, weakness, bravery, thriftiness, amiability, and good sense, is the material upon which he works. There are no high lights of imaginative color upon his pictures. There is nothing inspiring and haunting in his effects. He is a careful observer, an unexaggerating delineator; and he has such humor and sense and good heart that every thing he writes is graphic, entertaining, and instructive. His last story, "Rachel Ray" (Harpers), is not below the best he has written. In fact it is among the very best of recent novels.

The very opposite to Mr. Trollope is Miss Braddon, who has written, "John Marchmont's Legacy," is also issued by the Harpers. Miss Braddon has always a story to tell involving passion, crime, and mystery. In this story she has the readers off without a case of bigamy or even murder, though there is enough of villainy of other sorts to make up for the plot of a good half dozen thrilling sensation stories. Tastes differ in respect to novels as well as other things. Miss Braddon's novels are not to our taste; and they are to that of an immense class of readers, who will pronounce "John Marchmont's Legacy" quite equal to "Aurora Floyd."

"Peculiar" is the title of a novel by Epes Sargent (Carleton). Its sale is already very large—a fact which shows the interest it has excited. The story is exceedingly characteristic tale of American life; for it has born with unsparing hand all the interior and inveterable social horrors of the system which has plunged the country into war. That is the object of the book. It is a slow fire, the good-natured pride fire of the most wretched of men and women. As a tale it is in some parts almost too painful, too tragical. But it will remain to the household horror of every one else as a picture of actual life in America in the nineteenth century.

The Christmas books, if not very many, are to be very beautiful. The Harpers announce their Illustrated Bible in a noble gift, the "Book of the Nineteenth Century," copiously and richly illustrated, and a delightful book with Lossing's "Field-Book of the Revolution," one of the most interesting chronicles ever published.—Putnam announces illustrated a small quarto of "Child's Book." It is as fine a volume as our publishing resources can produce, and the best of our artists have contributed to it. The book-trade is always as charming as a Christmas carol, and brings the holidays with it; and although the copies of this issue have been rapidly taken, the purchasers of Christmas shops and all epicures in books should at least look at them.—Schreiber (Tickner & Fields) is of Prescott" the historian (Tickner & Fields) is e Co. have a new edition of Dr. Holland's poem "Bitter-Sweet," arranged in gorgeous holiday attire. Its typographical apotheosis is a proof of its popularity.—Shelden & Company announce a reprint edition of the Works of Charles Dickens. We believe, nearly completed. The latest volumes contain "Hard Times" and a delightful edition of Christmas Stories.

In every respect this is by far the most beautiful edition of Dickens published either in America or England. The paper and typographical editions by Darley are not among the least of its attractions.

Among all the beautiful books, old and new, which appear with the season, there is also promise of the speedy publication, by Lippincott of Philadelphia, of the "History of Charles the Bold," by John Foster Kirk, the amanuensis and reader of the historian Prescott. We have carefully read a large part of the work in sheets, and feel very sure that our impression will be confirmed by the public. The subject is fortunate for a writer who makes his first essay at this time and in this country. It is the story of the struggle between the King of France, Louis XI., and his great Burgundian vassal, for the establishment of the French nation. It is the conflict between Feudalism and the modern spirit. Mr. Kirk is obviously amply accomplished for his task. He is familiar not only with the chronicles, published and unpublished, of the period, but with the general literature which throws upon his work all the side-lights that illustrate and interpret the times of which he writes. His style is remarkably simple, pure, and vigorous. It is only five years since, therefore, that, for a time, apparently too subdued and level, it rises with occasion into a picturesque energy. It is bowing of the head. Simple, and we own is more pleasing to us than that of Prescott, which if clear, and polished, and careful, is neither simple nor picturesque.

Mr. Kirk's work is quite sure to take rank with our best histories, and to secure to him, in public recognition, the worthy reward of his long and faithful labor.

We must mention in a line the republication by Leypoldt, of Philadelphia (who publishes Mr. Lowell's marvelous translations of Heine's "Grenadiers," and more recently his "Book of Songs"), of Matthew Arnold's masterly essay upon Henry Heine, one of the acutest and most delicate criticisms of the time.

"Mr. Wind and Madame Rain," translated from the French of Paul de Musset, and quaintly illustrated by Oscar artist Chaffard, is one of the most thoroughly delightful juveniles of the season. It has just that amount of half allegorical, half humorous fancy which affords every child pleasure to the rising generation. (Harpers.)

"The Life of Toulouinet L'Ouverture" (Redpath) is the biography of a man whose name has been vaguely known through the world since 1791. Madame Elizabeth reported of "The Hour and the Man," and whom Mr. Phillips's historical lecture has drawn in fragments from the dim recesses of all his hearers. This is Toulouinet's biography by Dr. Beard, and his autobiography. At this time it is of the greatest interest. The life of the black saint was born a black African slave, and he died the victim of the jealousy and fatality of Napoleon Bonaparte, who sent him to a French prison out of "the horrors of St. Domingo." Whoever would know exactly what those horrors were should read this book; and he will learn, as no well-informed student longer doubts, that they sprang from the slaveries and atrocities of the Old World, and from the savage blood-thirstiness of the blacks. A more instructive and tragical tale was never told. We commend it to every thoughtful American citizen.

ARMY AND NAVY ITEMS.

WASHINGTON going hints at the removal of General MEADE, and points to the appointment in his place of General BANKS.

Lieutenant BARTH, of Company F, of the Second Rhode Island Cavalry, and Lieutenant HOWARD, of the Second Rhode Island Artillery, have been sentenced, the former to be hard labor on Fort Jefferson for three years, and the latter to imprisonment for six months, for plundering from a planter while out on a foraging expedition.

The Assistant Surgeon's examination for promotion is favorably. He is now permitted to receive the visits of his friends.

Captain JEROME B. TAFT, formerly of the Fifty-ninth New York Volunteers, was executed as a spy by the rebels, residing on the Fountaine River, Illinois, before the last rebel incursion into that section.

It is stated that General GRANT has captured, since his departure for Chattanooga, four companies of rebel cavalry, dressed and seventy-two canons and ninety thousand prisoners from the enemy.

Colonel TYLER, of the Sixty-fifth Pennsylvania, Captain O'BRIEN, of the Sixty-third New York, and Colonel WOOD, of the Thirty-second U. S. Colored Troops, New Hampshire, having satisfactorily defended themselves before a Court of Inquiry, have been restored to their positions in the army.

Captain Asa G. HUGHES, Second New York State Militia Eighty-second United States Volunteers, who was discharged the service about the 1st of May, 1862, on account of his sanitated to his command, by order of the President, as the instance of Judge-Advocate-General HOLT, and with the present month, on account of meritorious services in the field, during the seven days' battles and subsequent retreat before which Captain HUGHES was arraigned and honorably acquitted, and reinstate their wishes.

The statement that General FOSTER of the French Minister, Count MONTHOLON, had been ordered to leave Mexico at Secretary Seward's instance, is false. Mr. SEWARD has no power to dictate to any of the foreign Ministers in Mexico, or other information procurable by the Department, that would warrant such a measure. Neither General FOSTER, nor the French Ministry, have any information now which was not known at the time of his interview.

Lieutenant-General WILLIAM H. HOEARS, whose brilliant charge on the enemy at Orange Grove has been repeatedly mentioned in the most favorable terms by General Meade, and Tarbox's the entire of this brigade's movements commanding the Second Corps.

Captain R. CHAMBERS, formerly of General KEOGH'S Staff, has been appointed Assistant Adjutant-General of the cavalry contraband of the defenses north of the Potomac.

Captain FREEMAN, First Connecticut Heavy Artillery, has been appointed Assistant Commissary of the Nineteenth Regiment colored troops.

In connection with the Army of the Potomac states that General THOMAS FRANCIS MEAGHER was captured during the late engagement, and is now a prisoner in the hands of the enemy. He was not on duty, but was visiting the army in Virginia's dress.

The rebel General PEARSON, with his Staff, has left for the Confederate capital, having been duly exchanged for the head-quarters of his brigade. Being cut off from Tennessee, he is expected to take command in the field of operations.

Rear-Admiral THOMAS had assumed the duties of Quarter-master-General, in the absence of General MEIGS, who was expected that command would be duly conducted to the delivery of troops through Quarter-masters at Alexandria, Washington, and Baltimore, and transportation distributed, discovered that immense frauds had been practiced upon the Government by the connivance of contractors and Quarter-masters, amounting to several millions of dollars. Several of the Quarter-masters, Brevet-Major and Brevet-Colonel have been sent to the Old Capitol Prison.

The Secretary of the Navy has promoted Engine Driver of the monitor Lehigh, to the grade of Acting Master in the volunteer service, for distinguished gallantry under a severe fire of the enemy from Fort Moultrie.

Major-General BUTLER has appointed Major General W. CLARK, Third New York Cavalry, Cavalry Inspector in his Department.

Brevet-Major-General BURNS, when QUANTRELL had killed in the rebel papers several times during the month of October, is still alive and well at Fort Smith, Ark., on the 24 of December.

The rebel Lieutenant-General POLK and Staff were in Montgomery, November 15, on their way to their new field of duty in Mississippi.

Major PITCHFORK, of the Second Michigan, has been heard from. His wounded leg has been amputated, and he is doing well. The most singular part of his capture is that he fell into the hands of a brother in the rebel ranks.

Rumors, generally credited, but unconfirmed, are in circulation that General PEMBERTON has been appointed to the command of the forces in South Carolina.

It is reported that General SHOWMAN and Staff, and Colonel CAMPBELL, have been ordered to Kansas, but that they declined to accept the appointment.

The following promotions in the volunteer service have been appointed: ROBERT PITCHFIRE, LEONARD B. SWAIN, A. S. HOLLIS, JOHN C. MCCLELLAN, and JOHN C. MCCLELLAN, JR., to be M. HOUGHTON, and JAMES H. THOMPSON.

The Secretary of the Navy has appointed the captains in the attack and capture of the south side of Morris Island, the Secretary of the Navy has appointed Acting Captain WILLIAM KRAFT to the grade of Acting Master in the volunteer service.

A pamphlet containing charges and specifications preferred by Brigadier-General A. L. HOUGHTON, U.S. Volunteers commanding First Division, Fifth Corps, Army of the Potomac, against Chief of Staff to General Meade, by Jacob G. FRICK, Colonel of the One Hundred and Sixteenth Pennsylvania Volunteers, has been distributed among the members of the Senate. The charges are the following: "1. Drunkenness on duty. 2. Habitual and unreasonable sentiments," "violation of fifth Article of War." "Conduct unbecoming an officer and a gentleman," "disciplina, and tending to mutiny and sedition," "promised that he would be responsible for making an officer and a gentleman," and "drunkenness." He is alleged that these charges were in the hands of Brigadier-General HOUGHTON, and subsequently forwarded to the President, General HALLECK, and General HUNT, Chief of Artillery. The object seems to be to revoke himself.

An specimen of the charges we give the specification of the first charge:

In that—Staff, on the Brigadier-General A. A. HOUGHTON, commanding, etc., did say, "I'll G—d—d I with none our staff and he can report to me in person to-day (alluding to McCLELLAN) to Washington, and that the whole d—d Staff can go to Washington and be d—d," or words to the like tenor and effect. I believe the army would willingly see the last of McCLELLAN and his Staff." Dated at Camp, 27th day of November, A.D. 1863.

General Grenfell has been appointed a member of a court-martial to try the cases of civilians accused of certain offenses.

Dr. SWAIM, Medical Inspector of the Sanitary Commission, left Washington last week for Harrison's Ferry, Centre County, Pa., to examine the sites for the location of the new hospitals in that quarter, in connection with the commission.

Captain RUTHERFURD has been appointed Chief Quartermaster of the cavalry corps, Army of the Potomac, vice Colonel BECKWITH, promoted.

Captain WHITTAKER has been appointed Assistant Quartermaster, and assigned to duty at the head-quarters of the Department of Washington.

Steps are to be taken by Congress at an early date for mustering out of service a large number of negro and white troops, who have been recruited that about forty will be then weeded out from the army.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

On Monday, December 14, the Thirty-eighth Congress of the United States met for the first time in the Capitol at Washington. Both branches of the national legislature were organized by the choice of Hon. GALUSHA A. GRIMES, of Iowa, President Hamlin, and the House under the Hon. SCHUYLER COLFAX. The Rev. Mr. SUMDERLAND, Chaplain of the Senate, opened the proceedings with appropriate prayers. The Hon. JOHN W. FORNEY was elected Speaker on the 8th right of the Senators from West Virginia to take their seats. The election of Senators for the State of Missouri, was also brought up, but was not voted upon. A bill to increase the pay of officers was introduced by Senator LANE, to which the Senate adjourned.——In the House, the Clerk read the roll of members-elect, and the States of Kentucky, Maryland, Virginia, West Virginia, Oregon, Missouri, and California alone responded to their names. The first ballot for nomination for Speaker sent to the Clerk's desk, and the following result was announced. The Speaker elect delivered a brief but satisfactory address. The oath was administered to the members, and the House adjourned.

On Tuesday, December 15, the Senate, in session, the Hon. Mr. WILSON, of Massachusetts, submitted a resolution to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the Secretary to sell the Cherokee Indian lands, and to apply the proceeds to the payment of the Cherokee claims. Senator CLARK introduced a bill to grant a pension to John Brown, the keeper of the Lighthouse on Sand Island. Bills were introduced by Senator DAVIS, of Kentucky, declaring, in effect, that the rebels are not to be discharged either from the soldiers and their white officers should not prevent the escape of any slave from his master, and soldiers are just reward. The resolution was laid over. A discussion occurred upon the bill to increase the pay of officers, after which the Senate went into executive session.——In the House, the Hon. SCHUYLER COLFAX was re-elected Speaker, and W. A. HALL, of Indiana, Clerk. Mr. COLFAX then addressed the House. A joint resolution was offered by Mr. WADSWORTH, of New York, declaring that the election of General GRANT and his officers and soldiers, and ordering a medal to be struck in honor of the recent victory by the United States. The resolution received the emphatic endorsement of the House, and was unanimously adopted after a debate. A resolution was offered by Mr. COX, of Ohio, requesting the President to open negotiations with a view to the exchange of our prisoners in the hands of the rebels, and to the Secretary of War to report to the House Department on the subject. The resolution elicited some discussion, and was finally adopted. Mr. ARNOLD, of Illinois, introduced a bill to prevent rebels from holding offices in the United States. The bill was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. A bill was introduced to increase the pay of officers, and extending this so be of high national consequence, I have determined to call upon you, as upon each of the other Governors, assemble at their places of worship, and return special thanks to Almighty God for the great achievement of the national cause.

A. LINCOLN.

PRESIDENT'S DISPATCH

TO GENERAL THOMAS, DATED NASHVILLE, DEC. 9, 1863

To Major-General Rosecrans, Chattanooga:

Longstreet is in full retreat up the valley. Your orders about following with cavalry shall be carried out.

My division of cavalry attacked the enemy's cavalry in one of the passes of the Clinch Mountains yesterday morning, and are pushing them vigorously.

Couriers from Knoxville arrived last night. The road is clear.

Sherman arrived here yesterday.

J. G. FOSTER, Major-General.

SHERMAN'S DISPATCH.

The Herald correspondent telegraphs under date of Knoxville, December 5: The siege of Knoxville is raised, and Longstreet, with his army, is in full retreat toward Virginia. It virtually terminated yesterday, when, at noon to-day, the advance guard of our reconnoitering, under General Sherman, arrived here.

LONGSTREET'S LAST ATTACK.

On the night of 28th ult., Longstreet made a fierce attack on Knoxville, which continued nearly all night. In the following morning the rebels charged on General Ferrero's position at Fort Saunders, and were carefully received, with a heavy shower of musketry, hundred men, leading two bands 3 and thirty-four prisoners. Our loss was only twenty-five killed and wounded. On the same day, and Longstreet occupied a cross until seven o'clock in the evening to take away their wounded and dead.

CHATTANOOGA.

We have nothing further from our side at Chattanooga. The following telegram speaks in the Southern papers:

Chattanooga, Dec. 8, 1863.

General Cooper, Richmond:

The enemy has driven back across the Chattanooga-Dalton road, including the rail road bridge at Tunnel Hill. They have also fallen back on our rear-guard, under General Clayton.

BRAXTON BRAGG.

HARDEE FALLING BACK.

The news from Chattanooga reports General Hardee as falling back with the rebel army in the direction of Dalton. He represents the enemy as in the command. The impression is that Tennessee are said to be filled with deserters from the rebel army.

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.

All is calm in the army of the Potomac. So says the best dispatch from that quarter. General Lee is getting his troops into winter quarters in the old position on the south side of the Rapidan. General Meade will not begin the work of crossing the river until the question of difference between pickets or guerrillas, we need hardly expect much fighting of a decisive character from the armies of either head or until the winter begins to break up.

CHARLESTON.

The latest news from Charleston states that General Gillmore was then shelling the city, throwing twenty shells in the direction of Sumter every hour. The Confederate had been removed to the rear of the city, the fire having, it is supposed, destroyed it. The Circular Church steeple had been dismembered, but Fort Johnson and the Battery Bulkhead, on the south side of the harbor, were still free from our batteries. The rebel flag which has been removed from the Moultrie House is no longer visible, it probably on account of its being torn from the ruins. The rebels are constructing a new section of the Charleston and Northern, under cover of a hospital flag, which they keep flying over the cars. Rations, and the supply of forage for our forces, in accordance with the usages of war, have been cut down to half. The rebels in the city have been down a few days ago, and revealed a formidable force of rebels, who were captured by the rebels. The firing on the part of the secret hospital flag.

TEXAS.

The following has been received from General Banks, dated Brownsville, Texas, November 25:

To His Excellency Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States:

I am in occupation of Brazos Island, Point Isabel, and Brownsville. My most sanguine expectations are more than realized. Every movement has been successful. The mission effecting the Government of Texasalipas. The first is to enforce the interests of Mexico and the United States. Every thing is now so favorable as could be desired. N. P. BANKS, Major-General.

OUR PRISONERS AT RICHMOND.

The condition of our ingrieved soldiers at Richmond is constantly improving by the weight of the measures rewarded to them. During the past week three hundred and thirty-five prisoners, consisting of a number of officers, officers for the sick, clothing, reading matter, and subsistence stores, have been sent to Richmond under the Libor Prison, Belle Island, Castle Thunder, and the to have vacationists.

ANOTHER ACCOUNT.

Assistant Surgeon C. O. Wright, of the Thirty-fifth Ohio, who has been for some time confined in Libby Prison, and arrived at Washington on the 7th inst., has furnished the following statement: He received through other sources, it is ascertained that the rebels have not been in the habit of starving prisoners to death, and that their condition has been much alleviated thereby. Only two or three of the prisoners who have been guilty of brutality to the prisoners have been punished, and these have been appointed in their places. The prisoners are taken to their rooms in the prison, and given to the sandwiches, while the rats on the street is from twelve to fifteen cents each. Fresh meat twice per week, and rice in gobs. Persons sending supplies for the prisoners by the rebels are charged only the transportation. All substantial food, as delicacies, except for the sick, are not permitted, and the rebel clothing is limited and allowed to the sumer to forward actual necessaries. The Richmond papers are complaining that the supply of forage in the hospitals, the bulk of their consignments being sent to the prisoners. The arrangements for the distribution of the supplies forwarded are said to be very good and the distribution, as a general thing, made in good faith.

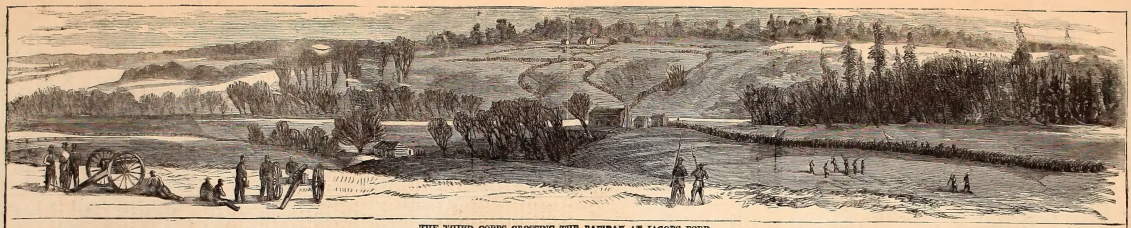
MESSAGE OF GOVERNOR BRADLEY.

The Message of Governor Bradley was published on 7th. He represents the financial condition of the State as satisfactory, and says it complies with the requisitions of the militia for home defense from guerrillas and robbers, and that it is the province of privileged citizens. A majority of the people has met the efforts to place sufficient force in the field for the protection of the State in a prompt and better guarded than at any time heretofore since the rebellion. In the same way he recommends legislation into the Secretary of War, the thorough organization of militia and volunteer forces for the protection of the people, and security will again brighten the decadent house of our border people. He also recommends the action of the State to the defense of the Government. Kentucky's relations to the Government he says, are fully known and defined, but no new position is taken. It is conceded that every loyal citizen should be willing to make any sacrifice for the Union, but that the Union is; and this is a step in advance to Kentucky.

FREE NEGRO LABOR.

Adjutant-General Thomas has issued a tour of inspection of the Government plantations, and has given much attention to the subject of free labor. He says the success of the free labor system has been such that it has elicited the highest commendation from the Government, and he expresses himself to the effect that what he saw of the working of the system convinced him that the question of employing negro labor had passed from an enigma to a fact.

UNION FEELING IN ARKANSAS.



The Union feeling gains strength in Arkansas. The people are taking the side of allegiance by hundreds. At a convention held at Fort Smith, which was most patriotic in the sentiments expressed, Colonel Johnson, of the Fifty-fourth Arkansas Infantry, presided. The object of the meeting was to reveal that Arkansas should be a free State after the war.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

A NEW ANGLO PIRATE SPEED.

The Government has decided to stop the Pampero on the Clyde. The owner alleges that she does not defy, but say as she, from the numerous merchant ships regularly trading to the Clyde, and that she is not to be satisfied with the statement, and had a gun-boat moon close to the Pampero to prevent her escape.

THE THIRD CORPS CROSSING THE RAPIDAN AT JACOBS FORD

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC—BROOKS'S BRIGADE OF WARREN'S CORPS CROSSING GERMANIA MILLS FORD.—[SKETCHED BY A. R. WAUD.]

THE DRUMMER BOY OF OUR REGIMENT—EIGHT WAR SCENES.

THE CIGNANCOURT MYSTERY.

ONE fine morning in October, 1811, a little party set out for an excursion to the suburbs of Paris, from the Rue de Bondy. It consisted of Madame Morin, a widow of about forty, buxom, weather-beaded, active, always engaged in some speculation or another; a girl of about sixteen, with her head full of romances, Angélique Delaporte, the daughter of Madame Morin by her first husband, from whom she had also divorced, and Adolphe Raguoleau, a shrewd, hard lawyer, whose numerous dealings with the widow in her house speculations had by no means turned out ill for him.

Raguoleau had had an invitation to breakfast from the widow for some time past; it had been put off, for various reasons, till Sunday enough, however, he refuses breakfast, but the widow insists on his going with her and her daughter to see a country-house she is thinking of buying, and of which she wants his opinion. The man of business consents; a cab is called, and they all three get in. "By the barrier of Rochechouart, coachman!" says the widow. What on earth makes Raguoleau start and turn uneasily in his seat? Muttering something about the road being up, he tells the coachman that he can't go that way; he must go by the barrier de la Villette. Off they start, Angélique, whom no one may suppose to be the life of the little party, looking perhaps, as she often always does, some theatrical scene in which her admirers declared she had no rival on the stage, or describing to her bewildered mother some dramatic scene in the "Mysteries of Udolpho," or some of the novels of that kind, which the girl always had to her hand. The hour is reached, but the house just looks inside and then gives a word to three others who are standing ready; the cab is stopped, and Raguoleau is left to himself, the two women are arrested. The four men, who are agents of police, take them into the nearest dwelling, and without the least compunction begin to search them. They find nothing, but Angélique asks what is all about. "We were spying," the girl says, "with M. Raguoleau to see a house that my mother thought of buying." The commissionaires seem roguish, for the entries in her book of the bankerchief that does not look quite right, and writes a word to it, when out falls a folded piece of paper. On examination this roll was found to contain fifteen drafts payable to order, but without name of payee, drawn by fourteen of them for 50,000 francs each, and the fifteenth for 10,000 francs, all on stamped paper, and dated the 30th of April last. Each draft on examination by them which seemed to have served as a copy for the others; three letters in Raguoleau's handwriting; and a paper containing the envelopes, on which were written "Unseal and read." This direction was followed by the agents, who found the following composition in the handwriting of Angélique, like all the rest: "If ever in my life a day of justice come for me, you shall be the first to whom I will confess it." This is what you said to me in the Louvre, when we met there, three days before I consented to give up to you voluntarily that which you since took from me by force, in the sight of every one who knows you. There useless to enter into the details of horrors which even you can not but shudder. How could nature vomit such a monster as you are! Here, then, it is settled between us a day of justice—or my day of vengeance. Ah! what luxury for the oppressed! In my power as my slaves have been. Cringe! double! crawl! return to me that which is mine, and thank my children for the choice I give you. If I only existed, would I not have force enough with all the liberty required by the horrible monstrosities dictated by you against me! Two hundred thousand francs is the amount of the drafts that you will sign. You will write on each draft, 'Good for the sum of' the same value received in cash, and you will sign. I shall compare your writing, and take care that I find it like. I give you a quarter of an hour to choose. If you prefer vengeance, on the instant I myself will execute it.

"You conceive that it can only be the affair of half a second to denounce you to ordain. As I am without fear prolong the pleasure—here would be a case for the most complete every kind of barbarity which imagination could suggest."

On the arrest of the women the police had sent off to a house in Cignancourt, which the two had taken on lease, saying that she intended to establish a dairy. It was a small house in the middle of a large garden. Here, suddenly, the servants, a man and woman whom they had hired for the purpose, the two women began the preparations which were necessary before the presentation of the above address to Raguoleau. Besmearing to the house were two small cellars and one large one. These were lighted from the windows above by two large openings. The first step was to have the large one completely blocked up. Before then was secured the subterranean vault, without which no melodrama of that day was complete. A door in the next cellar could likewise be ground at the further end of the cellars. To this was fastened a chair, and to this again a padlocked chain. Before all was placed a table, on which were arranged writing materials. A slight iron stove was replaced by two candles in iron candlesticks.

The widow and her daughter had bought a pair of neat pistols, and the man-servant, who was now charged to give lessons in shooting to Angélique, while the anxious mother listened up above to the girl's practicing, whether any noise escaped in the cellar could be heard. Not a sound; screams, cries, and shooting all passed unheard. Every thing being thus prepared, a full rehearsal took place; but, as Raguoleau's appearance could not be looked for under the circumstances, Lefèvre, the man-servant, took his part. The widow, her daughter, and the female servant seized him, and placed him in the chair, then Angélique advanced with the pistols in her hands, and with a menacing gesture ordered the bound man the document we have given above.

And it was to fill this part that Raguoleau had been invited to the country excursion. The police, who had gone to the house, found that every thing was prepared for the final representation. Lefèvre and Jacotin, the two servants, were on the look-out for the arrival of the party. Rest, table, chair, chain, and pistols—all were there; the candles had been kept alight constantly for three days past. While the police were interrogating the servants, the mother and daughter were brought in. They confessed that all these preparations were for Raguoleau, who had swindled them, they declared, but in such a way that he could not be laid hold of; and that their object was to compel by force a restitution which the law would not afford. Drafts to the amount of nearly £200,000 francs) had been prepared that they might reject those which should seem to have been signed under constraint. They had succeeded in getting more than frightening him into signing the drafts.

A noose of silk cord had been found in the cellar.

"What did you want that for?" they were asked; "the pistols were enough to frighten him."

"If he had thought that the noise of the pistols would stop us," said Angélique, "the noose would have shown him another object."

"And suppose Raguoleau had resisted?"

"Oh, then," she said, "it would not have been a murder, but a duel."

All four, mother, daughter, and servants, were committed to prison.

And now all the police got knowledge of the attempt to be made on Raguoleau's life or purse? But is not the latter always attacked by affairs. Toward the end of September, Raguoleau had gone to the police with a little invitation addressed to him by the widow Morin, begging him to dine with her always keep your word, and I require you to give me a mark of your friendship by choosing five minutes this evening to see me. I live so far off, I shall send to order ten of the best that I can get." There seemed nothing very dreadful in this; but the lawyer declared that the widow had managed long ago by the women to get him into their power. A woman—a friend, of course—had come to him a long time back they had sworn this, and that the day of the breakfast was the one chosen for the execution of an agreement which, when they had examined by the police, and declared that what Raguoleau had stated was quite true. Madame Morin had also been in the habit of writing letters down on their luck and ready for any thing, or two escaped convicts who would undertake Raguoleau's settlement for a consideration. Lefèvre, Jacotin, and the widow had afterward found Lefebvre and Jacotin hesitate, and had threatened Lefebvre with the pistols, and when he had signed the drafts, they were to strangle him with the noose, and then to put his body up in a sack and throw it by night into the Seine.

The acquaintance of the widow with Jonard had been about a fortnight.

Every one of our readers who has been to Paris must have noticed the large Hôtel de Saint-Phar, in the Boulevard Montmartre. In 1808 there was for sale a large house occupying this same site and known by the same name. The widow determined to buy it, intending to furnish it and let it out. Raguoleau happened to be after the house himself; but, knowing that the widow's purse was more insistent for the purchase, and foreseeing an advantage to himself, he withdrew from competition, and recommended the widow at once accepted, giving in payment an annuity contingent on the lives of Raguoleau, his wife, and their two children. There is no need to say how much more which Madame Morin got deeper and deeper into the debt of the shrewd lawyer, into whose hands the property, of course, fell. Madame Morin died in April, 1811, that with a sorrowful heart the widow gave up the keys to Raguoleau. Some days all her pecuniary troubles one body had sustained her. Her chief difficulty was to pay the annuity to Raguoleau; but she had found a friend in Jonard, whom she had consulted at the time of the purchase. This woman, hiding her real calling by ostentatious display, had succeeded in getting out at by the police in consideration of her giving them any news that she thought might be of use to them. In her lodgings in the Rue Montmartre, she, a bard, after cutting the cards, had declared that Raguoleau would be dead before the year was within the year. There was no resisting this, and the widow signed the contract, and, although her dupes were deceived, her faith in Jonard's powers was not shaken; she consulted her till, as we have seen, when the game was getting dangerous, Jonard thought it would be prudent to withdraw the gratitude of the capitalist and the protection of the police by revealing the criminal designs of her clients.

On the 10th January, 1812, the four prisoners were brought up for trial. Mother and daughter were charged with a joint attempt at extortion by signatures by violence, and an attempted homicide; the servants were charged as their accomplices. The attention of the audience was concentrated on Angélique her youth, and the singular part she had played in affair, made her the object of the popular interest. Raguoleau's position was not a pleasant one: he had published a justification of his dealings in the widow's property, and was forced to make it appear that he did not in any way take advantage of his position as a confidential friend. The very, too, in which he had played into the hands of the police was one that he tried very hard to extenuate; but, from the evidence, it appeared very clear that the two women—the mother, by all accounts, weak, foolish, and looking up to her daughter as a goddess; the daughter a silly, sentimental, novel-reading girl—had been led on by the fortune-teller as long as she could extract money for her witchcraft without danger to herself. The counsel, in their defense, acknowledged a criminal intention; but could it have been carried out? Two women had been let alone? Raguoleau knew of their intended crime, but makes himself an accomplice at the instigation of the police. Fearing to give them time for reflection, he hurries them off, knowing that the police are waiting in ambush for them. So long as the act remained undone, who could say that it would have taken place? The whole gravity of the case was in the evidence of Jonard, a wretch in the pay of the police, and utterly unworthy of credit. Angélique reads her own defense—composed for her, no doubt, but put in her mouth that her talent for declamation and her youth might have due weight with the jury. She declared that Jonard had worked upon her affection for her mother whom she saw in difficulties, the cause of which she already knew. Jonard had suggested to her the idea of killing Raguoleau—an idea she had always refused to entertain; she had never sought to do more than to get back some of her mother's consent to her plan only by prayers and tears. Sometimes Raguoleau had refused to sign, why have killed him? All traces of the attempt would have been destroyed, and his accusation would have been considered as that of proof; and why kill him if he signed? To do so would be certain ruin. The drafts would be traced if put in circulation; the handwriting on them, the same on all, would be recognized, their origin would be known; it would be asked how persons so recently his debtors could have the means for so large an amount, and the crime would infallibly be discovered. "Barrera, if Jonard had been set at liberty, as was intended, either he would have remained silent, knowing that he had done no more than was said (his share in the conspiracy would have besides prevented him from making complaints), or, if he did this, it would only be necessary to destroy the drafts. The jury, convinced by declaring that already, before the arrival of Raguoleau, they had begun to be frightened at their own actions, and by deploring the fate in store for the mother.

Mother and daughter were, however, found guilty of an attempted extortion; the question as to homicide was negatived. Their sentence was ex ea not help thinking, as the public did at that time, one of extraordinary severity. They were condemned to twenty years of hard labor and to public exposure before the Palais de Justice, and this sentence was immediately carried out. They were confined in the prison of Saint Lazare, and bore their punishment with exemplary resignation.

Lefèvre and Jacotin were at first found to be accomplices of the attempt, but without having begun the execution of the crimes—a distinction of great weight in the French law. On appeal, the case was sent for fresh trial, when they were condemned to five years of hard labor.

Thus the attempt of a foolish girl and a still more foolish woman to set a chopper out of a seemingly impossible position, a trial which illustrates a knotty question in French law—where does the commencement of execution of a premeditated crime of this kind actually take place?

CURIOSITIES OF CIPHER.

In 1680, when M. de Louvois was French Minister of War, he summoned before him, one day, a gentleman named Chamilly, and gave him the following instructions:

"Start this evening for Basle, in Switzerland; you will reach it in three days; on the fourth, constantly at the window, station yourself on the bridge over the Rhine, with a port-folio, ink, and a pen. Watch all that takes place, and make a memorandum of whatever you see. Continue doing so for two hours; have a carriage and post-horses awaiting you; and, at four precisely mount and travel night and day till you reach Paris. Be on the instant of your arrival hastes to me with your notes."

At Chamilly obeyed; he reached Basle, and on the day, and at the hour appointed, stationed himself, pen in hand, on the bridge. Presently a market-cart drives by, then an old woman with a basket of fruit passes; anon a little urchin trundles a hoop by; then a well-dressed gentleman in blue top coat jogs past on his gray mare. Three o'clock chimes from the cathedral tower. Just at the last quarter a tall Franciscan friar, cowled and tonsured, saunters up, goes to the middle of the bridge, lounges over the parapet, looks at the water; then he takes a step back, and strikes three hearty blows on the footway with his staff. Down goes every thing and in five minutes not a soul is to be seen of release sounds, and he jumps into his carriage. Shortly before midnight, after two days of ceaseless travelling, Chamilly presented himself before the minister, feeling rather ashamed at having such trifles to record. M. de Louvois took the port-folio with eagerness, and glanced over the notes. As his eye caught the mention of the yelping horse-dealer a gleam of joy flashed across his countenance. He rushed to the king, roused him from sleep, spoke in private with him for a few moments, and then, while he who had been called held in readiness since five on the preceding evening were dispatched with haste. Eight days after the news of Strasbourg was hastily surrounded by French troops, and summoned to surrender: it capitulated, and the open gates on the 30th September, 1681. Evidently the three strokes of the stick given by the fellow in yellow costume, at a appointed moment, were the signal of the success of an intrigue concerted between M. de Louvois and the magistrates of Strasbourg, and the man who has seemed to the spectator as ignorant of the motive as was M. de Chamilly of the motive of his.

Now this is a specimen of the safest of all secret communications—one which can only be resorted to on certain rare occasions. When a lengthy dispatch is required to be forwarded, and when such means as those given above are not at hand, then some other method must be employed. Herodotus gives us a story to the point; it is found also, with variations, in Aulus Gellius.

"Histiæus, when he was anxious to give Aristagoras notice to revolt, could find out no other way, as the roads were guarded, of making his wishes known: which was by taking the trustiest of his slaves, shaving all the hair from off his head, and then pricking letters upon the skin, and waiting till the hair grew again. This accordingly he did; and, as soon as ever the hair was grown, he dispatched the man to Miletus, giving him no other message than this: 'When thou art come to Miletus bid Aristagoras shave thy head, and look thereon.' Now the marks on the head were a command to revolt." (B. v. 35.)

In this case no cipher was employed. We shall come now to the use of ciphers.

When a dispatch or communication runs great risk of falling into the hands of an enemy, it is necessary that its contents should be so veiled that the possession of the document may afford him no information whatever. Julius Cæsar and Augustus Cæsar, the two great kings of ancient history in policy, as they consisted merely in placing D in the place of A; E in that of B, and so on; or else in writing B for A, C for B, etc.

Secret characters were used at the Council of Trent; and Rabanus Maurus, Abbot of Fulda, and archbishop of Mayence, in the ninth century, has left us an example of two ciphers, the key to which was discovered by the Benedictines. It is only a wonder that any one could have failed to unravel them at the first glance. This is a specimen of the first:

Nq.q wrm-ss Bnn.fc. .trsk. ghrmn.q-.mmrt.rs

The clew to this is the suppression of the vowels, and the filling of their places by dots—one for a, two for e, three for i, four for o, and five for u. In the second example the same sentence would run—Knckpkk rtxxs Bpnfkcfckk, etc., the vowels being filled up by the consonants following in A, p, q, r. By changing every letter in the alphabet we make a vast improvement on this last; thus, for instance, we might write the letter of a with a b, with c with v, and so on. This is the system employed by an advertiser in a provincial paper, which we took up by chance in the waiting-room of a dentist, where it had been left by a farmer. As we had nothing better to spare before the tooth was due, we spent them in deciphering the following:

Jp Sjdsljch rxa rsdd ci sljar, Bsiw rsdd xr mbt and the answers were read: "If William can call or write, Mary will be glad."

A correspondence was carried on in the Times during May, 1857, in cipher. We give it along with the explanation:

WWS...Zy Ejfpdsj Tj tpmf t vpsegs ez mlgyq qse fjf Ejfpdsj. Tj tpmf t vpsegs jf ftw wfsz mfuufst. Ujol tfdsfu typf. Tj xjmm tfoe zpv t xsjuuf vpsegs—Tz xt xtjdm e-p. Hfqf zpv mf. Xsjuuf vpsegs jg xyvq ez wsse fc jsf.—May 8.

The means—"On Tuesday I sent a letter to Byrne for you. May I speak fully on all matters at the interview? Direct to me, Post-office. I want to say here, invisible. When may I go to Canterbury, if only to look at you?"

A couple of days later Byrne advertises, slightly varying the cipher:

WWS—Szlidzlu bshtwvsr "Tuwwzjdlu sxst" Wdy wdgyqzq hsxsdtsxc. Qdwdtr—Tj. Discover something Eschelon-like for another advertisement.—Byrne.

This gentleman is rather mysterious: we must leave our readers to conjecture what he means by "Eschilion-like." On Wednesday came two advertisements from the lady, and from the lover. WWS. herself seems rather sensible:

TYDEPLO ez ystyr ez slqyqec-sli. T ssyw jsf ofo ebte ez ftfsz. Tj ssyw jsf ofo ebte ez ftfsz.—May 16.

"Instead of going to Canterbury, I think you had much better stay at home and mind your business."

Excellent advice; but how far likely to be taken by a lady from any advertising sheet?

WWS—Fuwe jefz qlsqe Jqdpcd T hzye ldv jsf ez ssryq jsf ez ssryq. Jqdpcd ytue hr qsp ssryqe slgy I dcsyr qcxe qsp hfqm qse wpeqpd. Tq jzi lep ftfsz ez ssryq jsf ez ssryq. Ro nzzqze jsf slcsyqe lzqp.

"Glad your father answers. I want to ask you to prove you have me. Tuesday night at one o'clock have a cab from the window for letters. If you are not able at one I will wait for you. Ever, my darling wife."

Only a very simple Romeo and Juliet could expect to preserve secrecy by so slight a displacement of the alphabet.

When the Chevalier de Rohan was in the Bastille, he contrived to contrive to convey to his intelligence that his accomplice was dead without having confessed. They did so by passing the following shirt into the dungeon—there was a shirt: "Mg dulhxcgkug glgj yxuj; lm ct elgz ah." In vain did he puzzle over the cipher; in vain he rang for counsel. It was too short; for the shorter a cipher letter, the more difficult it is to make out. The light dawned, and he turned on his hard bed, sheepishly revolving the mystic letters in his brain; but he could make nothing out of them. Day dawned, and with its first glance he was boring over them: still in vain. He pleaded guilty; for he could not decipher "Le prisonnier est mort; il n'a rien dit."

We noticed in a back number of Once a Week some cases, or, we are sorry, we forget, Colonel Aulic Nestave. Did the writer really intend concealing her name by simply inverting it? It was rather a clever idea, and she might, for all we know, have signed in the way of ordinary humdrum folk. If, however, you invert a message, and then turn it into cipher, the difficulty of reading it is greatly enhanced.

Another method of veiling a communication is that of employing numbers or arbitrary signs in the place of letters, and this admits of many refinements.

Here is an example to set the reader's ingenuity:

1 4 5 11 15 2-2 +4 31 +61 ÷ 81 72 8-2 : 28 45 3-1 9 +7 =-1-

We just give the hint that it is a proverb.

The following is much more ingenious, and difficult of detection:

	A	B	C	D	E	F	G	H
A	a	d	g	l	n	q	t	x
B	b	f	h	m	o	r	u	y
C	c	j	i	p	s	v	w	z

Now suppose that I want to write England; I look among the small letters in the foregoing table for e, and find that it is in a horizontal line with n, and vertical line with n, so I write down En; n is in line with a and n, so I put down An; continue this, and England will be represented by Enaackdonsnh. Two letters to represent one is not overfetious; but the scheme devised by Lord Bacon is clumsy enough. He represented every letter by permutations of a and b; for instance,

A was written aaaaa, B was written aaaab,
C was written aaaba, D was written aaabb, and so through the alphabet. Which would thus be transformed into aabba, aaaaa, baaaa, abaaa, baaab. Conceive the labor of composing a whole dispatch like this, and the great likelihood of making blunders in writing it!

A much simpler method is the following. The sender and receiver of the communication must be agreed upon a certain book of a specified edition.

The dispatch begins with a number; this indicates the page to which the reader is to turn. He must then count the letters from the top of the page, and give them their value respectively according to the order in which they come; omitting those which are repeated. By these numbers he reads his dispatch. As an example, let us take the beginning of this article: then, I=1, n=2, s=3, t=4, e=5, m=6, d=7, l=8, a=9, r=10, o=11, omitting to count the letters which are repeated. In the middle of the communication the page may be varied, and consequently the numerical significance of each letter altered. Even this could be read with a little trouble; and the word "impossible" can hardly be said to apply to the deciphering of cryptographs.

A curious instance of this occurred at the close of the sixteenth century, when the Jesuits were endeavoring to establish relations between the scattered branches of their vast monarchy, which at that period embraced a large portion of Italy, the Low Countries, the Philippines, and enormous districts in the New World. They accordingly invented a plan, which they varied from time to time, in order to disconcert those who might attempt to pry into the mysteries of their correspondence. The cipher, composed of fifty signs, was of great value to them through all the troubles of the "League," and was even then thought unbreakable. Some of their dispatches having been intercepted, Henry IV. handed them over to a clever mathematician, Viete, with the request that he would find the clew. He did so, and was able also to follow it as it varied, and France profited by the discovery by his discovery. The court of Spain, disconcerted at this, accused Viete before the Roman court as a sorcerer and in league with the devil. This highpreceding only gave rise to laughter and ridicule.

A still more remarkable instance is that of a German philosopher, Hermann, who, about 1674, that he had discovered a cryptograph absolutely incapable of being deciphered, without the clew being placed in his hands; and defied all the acute and learned societies of Europe to discover the key. However, a French refugee, named Bonneau, encouraged, after eight days' study, to read it. This cipher—though we have the rules upon which it is formed before us—is no perfect cryptograph either. It is grounded on some changes of numbers and symbols; numbers vary, being at one time multiplied, at another added, and between every number that the letter e, which occurs nine times in the paragraph, is represented in eight different ways; s is used eight times, and has seven various signs. Indeed the same letter is scarcely ever represented by the same figure. But this is not all; the alphabet which appears in the place of i takes that of u shortly after; another symbol for u stands also for i. How any one could have solved the mystery of this cipher is astonishing.

Now let us recommend a far simpler system, and one which is very difficult of detection. It consists of a combination of numbers and letters. Both parties must be agreed on a key-arrangement such as that in the second line below, for on it all depends

```
1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 0
4 7 3 9 1 0 5 8 6 2
```

Now in turning a sentence such as "The army must retire" into cipher, you count the letters which make the sentence, and find that t is the first, h the second, e the third, a the fourth, r the fifth, and so on. Then look at the table. t is the first letter; 4 answers to 1; therefore write the fourth letter in the place of t; that is r. h is the 2; for h is the second, put the seventh, which is 9; for e, take the second, 8. The sentence will stand "4*r*9 1*s* 8*e* 3*y* 5*r*6*e*." Any key is of course possible to discover this cipher.

All these cryptographs consist in the exchange of numbers or characters for the real letters; but there are other methods quite as intricate which dispense with figures.

The mysterious cards of the Count de Vergennes are as instance. De Vergennes was Minister of Foreign Affairs under Louis XVI., and made use of cards of a peculiar nature in his relations with the diplomatic agents of France. These cards were used in letters of recommendation or passports which were given to strangers about to enter France as they were intended to furnish information without the knowledge of the bearers. This was the system. The card given to a man contained only a few words, such as:

ALPHONSE D'ANGEHIA.
Recommandé à Monsieur
le Comte de Vergennes, par le Marquis de Paysegue,
Ambassadeur de France à la Cour de Lisbonne.

The card told more tales than the words written on it. It first indicated the nation of the stranger. Yellow showed him to be English; red, Spanish; white, Portuguese; green, Dutch; red and white, Italian; red and green, Swiss; green and white, Russian; etc. The person's age was expressed by the shape of the card. If it were circular, he was under 25; oval, between 25 and 30; octagonal, between 30 and 45; hexagonal, between 40 and 50; square, between 50 and 60. Baldness showed that he was over 60. Two lines placed below the name of the bearer indicated his build. If he were tall and lean, the lines were waving and parallel; tall and, stout, they converged; and so on. The expression of his face was shown by a flower in the border. A rose designated an open and amiable countenance, while a tulip marked a pensive and spiritualistic appearance. A thistle round the border, according to its length, told whether the man were bachelor, married, or widower. Dots gave information as to his political and religious. A full stop after his name showed that he was a Catholic; a semicolon, that he was a Lutheran; a comma, that he was a Calvinist; a dash, that he was a Jew; no stop indicated his as an Atheist. So also his morals and character were pointed out by a pattern in the angles of the card, such as one of these

So, at one glance the minister could tell all about his man, whether he were a gamester or a debtor; what was his purpose in visiting France; whether he were a spy or else to claim a legacy; what was his profession—that of physician, lawyer, or man of letters; whether he were to be put under surveillance or allowed to go his way unmolested.

We come now to a class of cipher which requires a certain amount of literary dexterity to conceal the clew.

During the Great Rebellion, Sir John Trevanion, a distinguished cavalier, was made prisoner and locked up in Colchester castle. Sir Charles Lucas and Sir George Lisle were shot in cold blood after surrendering to "malignants:" and Trevanion has every reason for expecting a similar fate. He is allowed to receive visitors, though in a hearty curse in round cavalier terms at the canting, crop-eared scoundrels who hold him in durance vile, and muttering a threat to be laid by the sword in hand, facing the foe, he is startled by the entrance of the jailer who hands him a letter:

"May't do thee good, Sir John," says he; "it has been well looked to before it was permitted to come to thee."

Sir John takes the letter, and the jailer leaves him his lamp by which to read it:

"Worthy Sir John,—Having got the best comfort of it affirmed, cannot much, I fear me, help you now. That which you have to do, you must do for yourself. It will require that I do owe you, stand not upon asking of me. Do not mend me—do but what I say, and I shall be more I ville. I know that, if debte curse, if ordinary hour fear it, it shall not reach you. Remember, it is a high honour, to have such a rewarde of your loyalty. Pray yet that you may have time to repent you of your sins, and that you will grudge any sufferings: only if he submission unto you can have you to be a member of a wise man. Tell me, an if you can, to do for you any thinge that you think have due. Your servant, that pray back on Wednesday. Rettinge your servant to command.

R. T.

Now this letter was written according to a prearranged cipher. The following is the method it was to tell. In this way, Sir John made out—

"Panel at east end of chapel will be found to be loose. Having pray, the prisoner begged to be allowed to pass an hour of private devotion in the chapel. By means of a false key, which unlocked the door, when the hour had expired the chapel was empty—the bird had flown.

An excellent plan of indicating the telling letter or word is through the heading of the letter. "Sir," would signify that every third letter was to be taken; "Dear Sir," every fourth letter. "My dear Sir," that every ninth was to be selected. A system, very easy of detection, is that of having pierced cards, through the holes of which the communication was written. The card was then removed, and the blank spaces filled up. As for example:

MY DEAR X.—The lines I now send you are forwarded by the kindness of Mr. Y., who will also be able to tell you the message delivered yet [to] my brother? [He] quick answer, that I have all means, through that you would act with discretion and dispatch.

Yours ever, Z.

Put your card over the note, and through the piercings you will read: "The bearer is not to be trusted."

The following letter will give two totally distinct meanings, according as it is read, straight through, or only by alternate words:

MADEMOISELLE,—
Je m'empresse de vous écrire pour vous déclarer que vous vous trompez beaucoup si vous croyez que vous me ferez jouer le rôle de dupe. Il est bien vrai que pour vous éprouver, je vous ai fait croire que j'étais amoureux de vous très devenue l'objet de ma raillerie. Ainsi ne doutez plus de ma flamme vue dit et écrit qui n'a eu que de l'aversion pour vous, et qui aimerait mieux mourir que de vous voir obligé de vous épouser, et de changer le nom de Mlle. en celui de Mme. Je suis toute sa vie, bien bon de vous aimer, comme je vous le dis et vous le prouve dessinée, croyez-moi; et si vous êtes encore Comtesse et persuadée que vous êtes encore vous serez encore plus exposée à la rigie du tout le monde, et particulièrement de celui qui n'a jamais été et ne sera jamais

M. N.

We must not omit to mention Chronograms. These are verses which contain within them the date of the composition. So at Graz, on the musical occasion of the Emperor Ferdinand's coming-by:

FerDInanDVs seCVnDVs pIe VIXit pIo obIIt:

that is, 1637.

A very curious one was written by Charles de Bovelles: we adopt and explain it:

The heads of 9 monks and five cells ..... M.DCCCC
Add one the tail of a bull I
Form, the four legs of a rat IIII
And you have my date in full ..... M.DCCCCLXIIII.
(1864.)

It is now high time that we show the reader how to find the clew to a cipher. And as illustration is always better than precept, we shall exemplify from our own experience. With permission, too, we shall drop the plural for the singular.

We—I! My friend Matthew Fletcher once lent a property some years ago, bequeathed to him by a great-uncle. The old gentleman had been notorious for his parsimonious habits, and was only known through the county by the nickname of Miser Tom. Of course every one believed that he was vastly rich, and that Mat Fletcher would come in for a mint of money. But, somehow, my friend did not find the stores of coin on which he had calculated, hidden in worsted stockings or cracked pots; and the savings of the old man which he did light upon consisted of lost trifling sums. Fletcher became firmly persuaded that the money was hidden somewhere; where he could not tell, and he often came to consult me on the best expedient for discovering it. It is all through my intervention that a search was put down the whole house, from his ears, tear up every floor, and root up every flower or tree throughout the garden, in his search after the precious hoard. One day he burst into my room with radiant face.

"My dear fellow!" he gasped forth, "I have found it!"

"Found what?—the treasure?"

"All but—I want your help now"; and he flung himself excitedly into an arm-chair.

I took it up, and saw that it was covered with writing in cipher.

"I readed it out of a secret drawer in Uncle Tom's bureau!" he exclaimed; "I have no doubt of it's purport. It indicates the spot where all his savings are secreted."

"You have not deciphered it yet, have you?"

"No. I want your help; I want another head besides mo' tails of the screwl, though I sat up all night studying it."

"Come along," said I, "I wish you joy of your treasure. I'll read the cipher if you give me time."

So we set down together to work to find the slip of paper before us. Here is the inscription:

```
                    D
+A5B32D,9D,A3,57J+J59D6S8T+3=3—5+9 X 10—29—
                    A
J*B8,8,A 1A6B1,*9,9 X+I—7—9,*9—7—9—3,46J18—
                    B
=8,*19,852—8D6S8D,8S,8B2B3,9,D4,2J3+8,9A=A59J
IA7=—+—=8B1A,*9D—+2.
```

"Now," said I, "the order of precedence among the letters, according to the frequency of occurrence, is this, e o i u t h y r c g l m w k p q x z. This, however, is their order, according to the number of words begun by each, respectively, t o a w b h i f m d s. The most frequent compounds are th, ng, ee, ll, nn, tt, dd, an. Pray, Matthew, do you see any one sign repeated oftener than others in this cryptograph?"

"Yes; 8; it is repeated 23 times," said Fletcher, after a pause.

"Then you may be perfectly satisfied that it stands for e, which is used far oftener than any other letter in English. Next, look along the lines, and see what letters most frequently accompany it."

"2 is undoubtedly; 6 follows 8 in several places, and 3 and 9 also, but in others. In the second line we have 2 § 8—8 2 §—2 §; and in the third, 2 § 8 again."

"Then we may fairly assume that 2§8 stands for the."

"The, to be sure," burst forth Fletcher. "Now the next word will be money. No! it can't be, the o will not suit; perhaps it is treasure, gold, silver, diamonds."

"Wait a little bit," I interposed. "Now look what letters are doubled."

"88 and 33," said my friend Mat.

"And please observe," I continued, "that where 3 draw a line and 9 follows it, 3 and 9 are double 6, then a again. Probably this is the middle of a word, and as we have already supposed 9 to stand for e, 3 must be n, making a very likely combination. We may be sure of the t now. Near the end of the second line there is a remarkable group—that in which three letters of the know recur continually. Let us write the out, leaving blanks for the letters we do not know, and placing the known letters above their figure of double symbols. Then it stands—eytheeth—beyhe—the—. Now, here 9 has been a repeated letter lines, and from its position it must be a consonant. I will put in its place one consonant after another. You see r is the only one that forms three words. Letters into words. —ertherefth—here. here the—sure-ly some of these should stand out distinctly separated—here. here. here the. Look! I can see at once what letters are wanting; th— between there and here must be thro, and then here is—must be—there. Now we have found these letters.

```
Sun, rock, lash, spirit, —=a, +=n, 6=e
```

and I can confirm the 3 as y by taking the portion marked A—after. Here we get an end of an adjective in the comparative degree; I think it must be fairer.

"Let us next take a group of ciphers higher up; I will pencil over it D. I take this group because it contains some of the letters we have found out—lath. Earth must be the end of a word, for none begin with th in English. Now what letters will suit eath? Possibly h, probably d."

"Yes!" exclaimed Fletcher, "death, to be sure. I can guess at the rest. Uncle Tom evidently did feel that a solemn duty devolves upon me, namely, that of acquainting Matthew Fletcher, my heir, with the spot where I have hidden my wealth! Go on, go on."

"All in good time, friend," I laughed. "You observe, we can confirm our guess as to the sign 9 being used for d, by comparing the passage 29—9D—9—. Here we have and—d—and—. But t, and letter is awkward: you can not make 9 into a; s to hand, would be no sense."

"Of course not," burst forth Fletcher. "Don't you see it all? I had better let my excellent nephew know where I have deposited—"

"I shall not," interrupted I. "You are right, I believe. I is the signification of 9. Let us begin the whole cryptograph now: I. th. di. t. re. end. s."

"Demand us!" cried Fletcher.

"You have it again," said I. "Now we obtain an additional letter, namely, m, for s, demand us is certainly to remind me. We must begin again: Note this. to remind me."

"This is," called out my excited friend, whose eyes were sparkling with delight and expectation.

"Go on; you are a trump!"

"These, then, are our additional letters: 3=i, 7=m, 8=s, 9=i, 5=o. To remind me is. t. s. e. m. death m. a. f. o. m. death, I read my death, and t. s. e. m. I guess to be, if I feel. So it stands thus: 'Note. —This is to remind me, if I feel my death nigh, that I had better—'"

I worked on now in silence; Fletcher, leaning his chin on his hands, and his elbows resting into his eyes with breathless anxiety. Presently I exclaimed,

"Hatres. Mat! I think you said hatres!"

"I—I—I—hy very dear fellow, I—"

A very excellent man was your uncle; a most economical!

"All right, I know that," said Fletcher, cutting me short. "To read the paper: I have a spade and axe on my library floor, all ready to go to work the moment I know where to begin."

"Then this is what I read," said I, taking up my new transcription:

"Note.—This is to remind me, if I feel my death nigh, that I had better move to Birmingham, as hardware is a good investment. Signed, Thomas Tom, the treasurer of the Necropolis Company are translators."

Fletcher bounded from his seat. "The old shiner! mine! secure!"

"A very estimable and thrifty man, your great-uncle."

"Confounded old stingy —," and he slammed the door upon himself and the substantive which designated his uncle.

And now the very best advice we can give to our readers, is to set to work at once on the simple cipher we have given the commencement of this paper, and to find it out.

HUMORS OF THE DAY

ON ANCIENTE JESTS.

THE Kynge with a prodelic compasse redynge thereof thynge coste hyr equalle wythe thy woman and he asked me why she was so angry? Lord Mayor, answered I, she is angry because she is not angry with you. Sir, said he, if it could please his humanitie, and his Majestie, to know the cause of her angre, I am sure he would not be angry with her. Sir, yt semeth now since it not XXX, but XLmt since, at which time I was Sheriff, upon the occasion of Kynge Henry VIII. coming to wedd the Lord Mayr if he will have that woman to be his wife? Sir, I have not seen her these 3 years, and then there is a proverbe 'Wide out, warne not!' which signifieth that the Kynge is known to the Lord Mayr as a dygge by a pylgrim, and caused him to fall off of his horse. Sir, I have not seen her these 3 years, and then ye Comedyens came that Sir Tommas de Maddelone was the only Man I ever saw made 3 Jests, and then ye Citizens of London is famous for its witties and not for its wit.

SUE, Ay ye place, which now, while ok ax you this is the best seat in the house, and I will not give it up. If you rush now, if ye want the last month for a lie, what'ut it be the 1st of April?

When is a ship-owner like an omnibus in Broadway? When it's block'-in!

A TRYING MOMENT.—When your new coat comes home from the tailor's.

AN IRISH CAPTAIN.—A son of Erin enlisted the public against bankruptcy. He was a Captain in the Purse-Regt on his account, as he is not married to her.

When the late Mr. Nash, who was a Jew, was a candidate for the office of Sheriff of London, a Jew Rabbi objected to his election that a Jew would thus come to have the appointment of the Ordinary of Christians, indeed," replied Nash, "no need hanging!"

Every body has heard of the famous letters that passed between the celebrated Mrs. Partington and Dr. Byron, the most laconic correspondence in history:

"Pay me no tribute, or if you don't."

"O Donnell."

"I owe you no tribute, and if I did—"

"O'Neill."

THE LAST.—"What on earth am I to do with that incorrigible son of mine?" inquired an anxious father of a friend. "Why, send him to a reformatory, child!" was the reply. "Why, what possible benefit would that be?" inquired the anxious parent. "Why, it would, at least, be the way of keeping him in check."

The judge interrupted Carson in the midst of his speech, when the latter was about to leave the court by saying: "One at a time, Mr. Carson, if you please." Presently the judge left the court, and Carson was heard to say to a brother barrister, "Did you ever hear a judge have a translation given to him?"

At dinner one day Mr. Rogers related a story of a nervous gentleman who kept a fire-escape—a kind of cord, to be used in case of conflagration, by means of which he suddenly descended one night by the stand, and breakfast, ing on the sidewalk. Presently a man came by, and seeing him breakfasting at the door, he descended in his cash in great haste, and cried out, "Fire! fire!" "Fire!" said the man who had been to the opera) out of her earrings.

When James T. Brady first opened a lawyer's office he took a moment to consult a friend, who had occupied by a cobbler. He was somewhat annoyed at the presence of his predecessor's sign, and asked him if he could get rid of his own. One day an Irishman entered. "Is Mr. Brady within?" he asked. "I should think he had," tartly responded the cobbler, "for he has been in the office for the last six months." The Irishman looked around at the solitary table and a few law books. "Blackberries?" he exclaimed, "I'll not have any of them. I'm sure he must be doing a mighty fine business—ye ain't got but one left."

Punch says he is never cold on that Canada was of much benefit to England; for all the mother country ever got from those regions was wars, and Fenians, and taxes to pay the Canadian bankrupt, and even that commences—"Bore, brothers, now."

A sculptor of talent was engaged to give his testimony. "There was a vast crowd gittin' about him, him and said the lawyer, 'Now, Mr. Sculptor,' and he handed said the same, 'Read I hatchlined, with a loud voice, 'Hit tis, man is killed why don't you stand back hand give 'im a little room?'"

THE ARMY OF THE CUMBERLAND—THE FOURTH CORPS, UNDER GENERAL GORDON GRANGER, STO

ORMING MISSIONARY RIDGE.—Sketched from the Left of the Line by Mr. Theodore R. Davis.—[See Page 812.]

VERY HARD CASH.

By CHARLES READE, Esq.

AUTHOR OF "IT IS NEVER TOO LATE TO MEND," ETC.

CHAPTER LII.

Born the parted lovers were wretched. Julia never complained, but drooped, and read the Psalms, and Edward devised plans for her in tears over them. He questioned her and obtained a lame account: then he began to bend on screening Alfred than on telling the truth.

So he called on the other; and found him dissolute, and cruel, and—a heathen philosopher for comfort, and finding none. Edward questioned him, and he was reserved, and even sulky. Sir Imperthalion Impudent was sulky, and he upbraided, and out came his wrongs. Edward said he was a pretty fellow: and wanted it all his own way. "Suppose my mother, with her present feeling," was to take a leaf out of your book, and use all the influence she possesses over me? Come, old fellow, I know what love is, and one of us shall have the girl he loves, unless any harm should come to my poor old mother, and your blunder—oh, that would put it out of the question, I feel—but let us hope better. I pulled you out of the fire, and somehow I seem to like you better than ever after that; let me pull you out of this now."

"Pull away," cried the impetuous youth. "I'll trust you with my life: ay, with more than my life, with my love; for you are the man for me: reason is always uppermost with you.

Give me the man that is not passion's slave . . .

And I tell you it is in hearts ease, sir,—"

"Oh, bother that. If you are in earnest, don't quote, but put on your hat and come over."

He assented; but in the middle of putting on his coat made this little observation: "Now I see how wise the ancients were: yes, friendship is better than love, more constant, free from the heats and chills of that impetuous passion: its pure bosom is ruffled by none of love's jealousies and storms. Solem e mundo tollunt qui tollunt amicitiam."

"Oh, bother quoting; come and shed hands with Julia." They were soon at Mrs. Dodd's and in the City. Edward sobered in Alfred, saying, "Here is the other Impetuosity;" and sagely referred for a little while to them he came for: they were sitting hand in hand, he gazing on her, with inspiration for copy. "That is all right," said Edward, dryly: "now the next thing is, you must go back to Oxford directly, and read for your first class."

The proposal fell like a blight upon the reconciled lovers. But Edward gave potent reasons. The defeat of law were cruel: Alfred's love, Edward had already obtained one postponement of the trial on frivolous grounds. Now the Oxford examination and Doncaster races came on at a fixed date, by a Law of Nature, and admit of no "postponement and relief." "You know my words, you will get your class before you will get your trial, and it won't hurt you to go into court a first-class man. Then, if you should have to quarrel by letter, you two, I know. Come, will you do what I tell you? or is friendship but a name?" Oh, Brutus!" He ended with great though quiet force: "Come, you two, which is better, to pass like the scissors, or part like the thread?"

Similes are no arguments; and perhaps that is why they convince people so. Alfred compared to the scissors and thread; and only asked with abnormal humility to be allowed to taste the joys of reconciliation by one visit: the third found him at Oxford; he called on the head of his college to explain what had prevented his return for Easter: in the Christian twelve months ago, and asked for rooms. Instead of siding with a man of his own college so cruelly injured, the dignitary was amazed by the bare assertion, and said he must consider. Insanity was a terrible thing.

"So is false accusation, and so is false imprisonment," said Hardie, bitterly.

"Unquestionably. But I have at present no means of deciding how far those words apply." In short, he could give no answer; must consult the other officers, and begged to convey his reply by letter.

Alfred's pride was deeply mortified, not less by a certain cold repugnant manner than by the words. And there came over his heart a sickening feeling that he was now in the eyes of men an intellectual leper.

He went to another college directly, and applied to the tutor there. The vice-president sent him with a letter to the dean; the dean invited Alfred to call, and told him hesitatingly the college was full; he might put his name down, and perhaps get in next year. Alfred retired, and learned from the porter that the college was not full. He sighed deeply, and the sickening feeling grew on him; an incradicable stigma rested upon him. Mr. Reade Dodd was no worse than the rest of the world, then; every mother in England would approve her resolution. He wandered about the streets of his intellectual triumphs. He stood in the great square of the Radcliffe, a place where he often picked out, but with somewhat grand and inspiring, especially to scholars who have fought their keen, though bloodless, battles there. He looked at the wide dome and gilt inscription of the Schola Metaphysices, in which he had met the scholars of his day and defeated them for the Ireland. He wandered into the theatre, and eyed the rostrum, where he had not mumbled, but recited, his Greek prize poem with more than one thunder of academic applause: thunder compared with which Drury Lane is a mere cracker. Those places were unchanged; but he, sad scholar, wandered among them as if he was a ghost, and all them were stony phantoms of antediluvial past, never, never to return.

He telegraphed Sampson and Edward to furnish him with certificates that he had never been insane, but the victim of a foul conspiracy; and, when he received them, he went with them to St. Margaret's Hall; for he had heedlessly hinted that the new principal was a first-rate man, and had openly vowed he would raise that "refuge for the destitute" to a place of learning.

Hardie called, sent in his card, and was admitted to the principal. He was about to explain who he was, when the doctor interrupted him, and told him politely he knew him by reputation. Hardie, encouraged by this, shrewdly, "to what I owe this application from an undergraduate so distinguished as Mr. Hardie?"

Then Alfred began to quake, and, instead of replying, put a hand suddenly before his face and one courage by one ebbed away.

"Come, Mr. Hardie," said the principal, "don't be discomposed: a fault once owned is half atoned; and I am not disposed to be hard on the errors of youth: I mean where there is merit to balance them."

"Sir," said Alfred, sadly, "it is not a fault I have to acknowledge, but a misfortune."

"Tell me all about it," said Dr. Alder, guardedly.

He told it, omitting nothing essential that could touch the heart or excite the ironical humor of an academician.

"Well! your case is more wonderful than fiction," said the doctor. And I conclude the leaders of this tale are all of the doctor's opinion: so record of it is sent out.

Alfred offered his certificates.

Now Dr. Alder had been asking himself in that plain phrase of his, what to do with young genius, who was sane now, but of course had been mad, only had forgotten the circumstance. But the Irish testimonials to Ireland's honor into his Hall suddenly overpowered him. The probabilities that he might win first-class for Ireland was too enticing; nothing venture, nothing have. He determined to venture.

Mr. Reade Dodd of the Close house shall always be open to good morals and good scholarship while I preside over it, and it shall be open to them all of every creed. Mrs. Dodd was dignified and made sacred by 'unmerited calumny.'"

Once this fine speech, like Minerva herself, came from the head: Alfred was overcome by it in tears. The doctor was touched, and even began to fancy it had originated that noble speech.

It was no easy thing things by halves, so Dr. Alder gave Alfred a delightful set of rooms, and made the Hall pleasant to him. He was treated by a growing connection in the Hall made an excellent acquisition. This opinion, however, was any thing but universal: and Alfred, finding himself in the Hall, shunned and crowed about him, and betted on him for the schools as freely as he would a colt the Hall was going to enter for the Derby.

He read hard, and judiciously, but without his old enthusiasm. His mind seemed to have died out; he had seen so many first-rate men just miss a first class. The brilliant creature analyzed all his Aristotelian treatises, and wrote the synopses clear with marginal references on some plausible system. Alfred could not see or kept the whole subject before his eye, till he obtained a singular mastery. Same system with the Thucydides and Tacitus and Livy and the third period inks. Then the brilliant creature drew lists of all the hard words he encountered in his reading, copied them in the twelve months, and read these lists till mastered. The stake was singularly heavy in his case, so he guarded every point.

And at this period he was not so unhappy as he expected. The laborious days were sweetly, and twice a week at least came a letter from Julia. Oh how his grave academic room with oaken panels and carved chair and table shone on the table! It was opened, and seemed written with sunbeams. No quarrels on paper! Although weeks had elapsed, Julia enabled in her hand: Haret lateri lethalis arundo! She trembled at herself: she felt a savage passion had been touched in her, and she prayed day and night against jealousy.

But I must now, to justify my heading, skip some months, and relate a remarkable incident that befell her in the said character. On the first of August in the year of good Christian woman, one of her patients, asked her to call on Dr. Barkington, that lodged above. "He is a queer body, and very different from you and me, I think his complaint is, he don't get quite enough to eat."

"Barkington!" said Julia, and put her hand to her bosom. She went and tapped at his door.

"Come in," said a childish voice.

She entered, and found a wizzened old man seated, mending his own coat.

He rose, and she saw that he was a district visitor. He said he had heard of her; they called her the beautiful lady in that court. This was news to her, and made her blush. She said she came to read a chapter to him; he listened as to some gentle memory of childhood. She prescribed him a glass of port-wine, and dispensed it on the instant. Thus physicked, her patient became communicative, and chattered on about his native place—but did not name it—and talked about the people there. Now our district visitor was, if the truth must be told, a compound.

She would permit her pupils to talk about earthly affairs, on condition they would listen to heavenly matter for double the worth. So she let this old man run on, and he told her he had been a banker's clerk all his life, and saved a thousand pounds, and come up to London to make his fortune on the Stock Exchange; and there he was sometimes a bull, and sometimes a bear, and, whichever he was, certain foxes called brokers and jobbers got the profit and he the loss. "It's all the same as a gambling table," said he. "The jobbers and brokers have got the same odds the bank has at Rouge et Noir, and the little system I had got me is doomed beforehand." Then he told her that there was a crossing-sweeper near the Exchange who came from his native place, and had started as a sweeper, and come down to that, only he called it rising, and used to speak with a shudder of when he called in the funds: and often told him to look out and get a crossing. And lo! one day when his was cleaned out and desperate, and beginning with the other ghosts of little capitalists about the tomb of their money, he saw his countryman full, and the broom by dint of his hearty sweeping he made a rush, and so did a wooden legged sailor; but he got first to the broom, and began to sweep while others picked up his crossings, and who proved dead as a herring; and he succeeded to his broom, and it made money for him. By change, though he never could: still, by degrees he picked up a pocket-book in that neighborhood, with a lump of money, which he kept very wary advertised in—no newspapers. And now Julia thought it time to interpose the eighth commandment, the golden rule, and worth 'a cycle of learning.

He became a favorite of hers: he used always to say: she even thought she had seen his face before: but she could not tell where. She gave him good advice and treats, and—one day, as he plowed his heart with her sweet voice, and sowed the good seed in the furrows—seed which, like the parable of seeds, often seems lost but not die, but comes out green after many days.

One Saturday she invited him to dine with the servants' hall. He came about the church time, and went away in the afternoon while she was with her mother. But she asked Sarah, who served her, to talk about him, and he was a rum customer; kep asking questions all dinner-time. "Well," says I, 'you go to your company, you are; be you a lawyer? for you examines us; but you don't tell us nothing.' Yes sez he, 'I am a lawyer, and also simple; she says it by every thing, and about Mr. Alfred's lawsuit with his father and all."

"Then that was indiscreet; but after all what did it matter?

"Who knows, miss?" Sarah replied; "lawyer said it would be expedient. If you please, miss, who is he? Where does he bide? Where does he come from? Where does he know Hardies?"

"I should think not. Why?"

"Because I'm much mistaken if he doesn't." Then pulled out a solid lock, she asked, "D'e a he know your papa?"

"Oh no, Sarah! How should he?"

"Then why," said Sarah: "I don't know, you are all in the dark about this old man: I'll tell you something; I took him out of the way of Jane's sweetheart when a drinking a dish of tea; I had him into the police a minute; and in course there was a search into the affairs of your papa loving sir. Miss, if you'll believe me, the moment he claps eyes on them there picture, he hallows out, and shakes his fingers and hands like fits here. 'It's him!' says he; 'it's him!' and stares at the picture like a stuck pig. Forgot I was close behind him, I do suppose." She's his daughter," says he, in a whisper, a curious whisper; seemed to come out of his stomach. What's the matter with Mary J., just so. He gave a great start, as if my speaking had wakened him from a trance, and says he, 'Nothing,' as quiet as a lamb. 'Nothing isn't much,' says I, just so. "It useth't to be any thing at all when I was your age, sir,' says he, quarrin. But I paid him in good coin; says I, 'Old man, where you comes from do the folks use to start and halla when they sees a fit, and that? So he laughed" and fling their two arms abroad like a wind-mill in March, and all for—nothing?' So at that he changed colour, as my uncle would call all of a tremble. However, at dinner he perks up, and drew from me more simple Jane our cook too. But he didn't look toward me much, which I set opposite to watch my lord."

"Sarah," said Julia, "this is really curious mysterious; you are a good, watchful, faithful girl; and to tell the truth, I sometimes fancy I have seen the Barkington's face; however, I will solve this little mystery to-morrow; for I will ask him: thank you, Sarah."

On Monday she called on Mr. Barkington to solve the mystery. But instead of solving her curiosity she excited it. Mr. Barkington was gone, bag and baggage. When Edward was told of this business he thought it remarkable, and repeated that he had not seen the man.

So do I; for it is my fourth time Edward have recognized him.

DAVID DODD.

The history of a man is the history of his mind. And that is why you have heard so little of late about the simplest, noblest, and most unfortunate of my fellow-passengers. Insanity is various as eccentricity; I have spared the kind-hearted reader some of David's vagaries; however, when I left him at Naples, he had settled down into strange phase of lunacy, in which the distant past seems nearly obliterated, and memory exists, but revolves in a narrow round of things present: this was accompanied with a positive illusion, to wit, a fixed idea that he was an able seaman, and, as usual, what mental power he retained came out strongest in support of this idea. All this was marked by a bodily agility somewhat more than natural in a man of his age. Owing to the wind astern he was enabled to run into Constantinople with all steam-tug came up with him: and he did run into port, not because he feared pursuit, but because he was desperately hungry; and he had no suicidal tendencies whatever.

He made for a public house, and called for some bread and cheese and beer; they were supplied, and then lo! he had no money to pay for them. "I'll owe you till I come back from sea, my bobo," said he, coolly. On this the landlord collared him, and David shook him off into the road, much as a terrier throws a rat from him; then there was a row, and a naval officer, who was crossing about the bands, came up and asked it. There was nothing at all unseamanlike in David's conduct, and the gentleman took a favorable view of it, and paid the small demand; but not with unlevanted motives; he was the second lieutenant of H. M. Frigate Vulture, as she had a bad name, thanks to her last captain, and was short of hands; he took David aside and asked him would he like to ship on board the Vulture.

David said yes, and suggested the foretop. "Oh yes," growled the officer, "I dare say all want to be there." He then gagged this Jacky Tar's intellects; asked him latter also how he send a frigate's foretop-gallant-yard down upon deck; and, to show how seamanship sticks in the brain when once it gets there, David answered told him. "You are rather old," said the lieutenant, "but you are a seaman;" and so took him on board the Vulture at Spithead, before Green began to search the town in earnest. Nobody acts his part better than some demented persons do; and David made a very fair lunatic, notwithstanding his forty-five years: and the sea did him good within certain limits, between him and the past lay some intellectual or cerebral barrier as impenetrable as the great wall of China; but on the other side of it he had all his faculties improved. Of course the crew soon found out the gap in his poor brain, and called him Soft Dick, and played on him a little; but by degrees he won their affection; he was so wonderfully sweet-tempered: and besides, his mind being in an abnormal state, he took neither grog, and gave his allowance to his mess-mates. One day he showed an unexpected art. He and were lying becalmed in southern latitudes, and, time hanging heavy, each whiled it how he might; one fiddled, another wrote to his friends, some fished for sharks, another whistled for a wind, scores fell into the form of meditation without the reality, and one got a pen and ink and some amused himself killing flies on the bulwark. Now this shocked poor Billy: he put out his long arm and with one snapped a dead fly. "Was the row?" said the operator.

"You mustn't," said Billy, solemnly, looking into his face with great dreamy eyes.

"You be ——," said the other, and lent him a tap on the cheek with the open hand, that did not seem to mind this; his skin had little sensibility, owing to his disorder.

Jack recommenced on his flies, and the bystanders laughed. They alway laughed now at every thing Billy said, as Society used to laugh when the late Theodore Hook could get the mustard at dinner; and would have laughed if he had said, "Yes see me sad, I have just lost my poor father."

David stood looking on at the slaughter with he helpless gravity air.

At last he seemed to have an idea, he caught Jack up by the throat and knee, lifted him with gigantic strength above his head, and was just going to hurl him shrieking into the sea, when a dozen strong hands interfered, and saved the man. Then they were going to bind Billy hand and foot; but he was discovered to be perfectly calm; as they remonstrated instead, and presently Billy's commander-in-chief, a boy called George White, shoved in and asked him in a shrill inquiring voice how he could be such a "My dear," said Billy, with great humility and placidity, "I was killing God's creatures, no ullowance:* so, ye see, to save their lives, I was obliged."

At this piece of reasoning, and the simplicity and gentle manner with which it was delivered, there was a roar. It subsided, and a doubt arose whether he was altogether in the wrong.

"Well," said one, "I don't say he'll ——— in the little creatures, if they could speak their mind."

"I've known a ship founder in a fair breeze all along of killing 'em," said one old salt.

Finally, one Bill Bird, a Yorkshire seaman, remarked that "it served the lobber right for not listening to reason."

"Reason!" And, indeed, methinks it was lovely and touching that the divine in the human heart and superior reason should have shot from his heart or from Heaven across that poor benighted brain.

But it must be owned his mode of showing his humanity was somewhat unusual, not to say normal, and smacked of lunacy. After this, however, the affection of his mess-mates was not so contemptuous.

Now the captain of the Vulture was Billy's cousin by marriage, Reginald Bazalgette. Twenty years ago, when the captain was a boy, they were great friends; of late Bazalgette had seen less of him; still it seems strange he did not recognize him in his own ship. But one or two causes co-operated to prevent that. In the first place the man had been turned in and out from not so sharp in another; and Captain Bazalgette had been told to look for David in a merchant ship bound for the East Indies. In the next place insanity alters the expression of the face wonderfully, and the captain of a frigate sees his eye over four hundred sailors at muster, a hundred at work, not to examine their features, but their dress and bearing at the one, and their handiness at the other. The worst place of luck was that Mrs. Dodd did not know David called himself William Thompson. So there stood "William Thompson" large as life on the ship's books, and nobody the wiser. Captain Bazalgette had a warm regard and affection for Mrs. Dodd, and did all he could. Indeed, he took great liberties: he stopped and overhauled several merchant ships for the truant; and, by-the-by, on one occasion William Thompson was one of the boat's crew that manned a midshipman from the Vulture alongside a merchant ship to search for David Dodd: it turned out the man had somehow slipped aboard in the boat, but the very name was new to him. He examined it, but clearly from that time he was told his loving tyrant, George White, they had been overhauling a merchant ship and looking for one David Dodd.

It was about mid-summer the Vulture anchored off one of the South Sea islands, and sent a boat ashore for fruit. Billy and his friend, another little tyrant, George White, were among the crew. Off goes George to land, and Billy sits down on the bulwark to lavish eye upon him. The water was calm: but the boy with the headlessness of youth and in search of fruit, dived, was seized with cramp and screamed to his comrades. They ran, but they were half a mile from the boat. Billy dashed into the water and came up with George just as he was sinking for the last time; the boy gripped him; but by his great strength he dragged George down with him, and would have drowned both, and swam for the shore. Meantime the sailors got into the boat, and rowed them off to the frigate.

Now Billy was undressed and his head under the main-deck scuttle, when the surgeon, who had helped strangle him by gripping his neck with both arms. Anyway, by the boy's account, just as they were undressing him, he revived. Billy gave a great shriek and turned over on his back; and George paddled with his hands, but Billy soon after laid the dead body with him in the boat was yet fifty yards off. And George screamed and pointed to the place, and the boat's crew saw that he was right. But the surgeon was so clear the sailors saw Billy lie motionless at the bottom, and thought he was feigning, and drew him up: but his face came up alongside a deadly white, with staring eyes, and they shuddered and let him sink again.

They took him into a house and stripped him, and rubbed him, and wrapped him in blankets, and put him by the fire, but he was dead as a herring.

Then having dried his clothes, they dressed the body again and laid him in the boat, and sent the Union Jack over the dead boy's shoulders and unwillingly back to the ship, George sobbing and moaning over the body, and not a dry eye in the boat.

The body was carried up the side, and uncovered, just as it had been taken from the water. The surgeon was sent for and examined the body: and then the grim routine of a man-of-war's deck swept him from the captain to the boy.

The captain read the service, the captain gave the stereotyped order to bury him at noon next day, and the usual preparations were made: he sewed up in his hammock with a portion of his clothes and bedding to conceal the outline of the corpse, and then covered with the Union Jack, and the poor skipper was laid out for burial, and covered by the Union Jack.

I don't know whether any of my young readers are directly interested in the proceedings of the just related. If not, I will just remind them that even Edward Dodd was prepared to oppose the marriage of Alfred and Ada, if any reason for it should befall his father at sea, owing to Alfred's imprudent interference in rescuing him from Drayton House.

CHAPTER LIII.

MINUTE study of my fellow-creatures has revealed to me that there are many intelligent persons who think that a suit at law commences at once. This is not so. Many writs are signed and decided by the special pleaders, and no newspaper notices such, and, as a stiff encounter of this kind actually took place in Hardie v. Hardie, a word of prefatory explanation may be proper. Suitors come into court to try by an issue: an issue is a mutual lie direct: and toward this both parties are driven upon paper by the laws of pleading, which may be briefly described as: Every statement of the adversary must either be contradicted by a counter-statement and avoided: "Avoided" means neutralized by fresh matter. 2. Nothing must be advanced by plaintiff which does not disclose a cause of action in point of law. Nothing advanced by defendant, which, if true, would not be a defense to the action. These rules exclude a vast number of palpable cheats and vices that mark all the unprofessional arguments one ever hears; for on a breach of any one of the said rules, the opposite party demurs—the demurrer is argued before the judges in banco, and, if successful, the faulty plaint, or faulty plea, is dismissed, and often of course the cause won or lost thereby, and the country saved that trouble, and the suitors the expense, of trying an issue.

So the writ being served by Pit's attorney, and his appearance put in by Deff.'s, the paper battle began by Alfred Hardie, through his attorney, serving on Deff.'s attorney "THE DECLARATION." This was drawn by his junior counsel, Garrow, and ran thus, after specifying the count and the date:

1. The Deft. by Joseph Heathfield his attorney says he is not guilty.

2. And for a further plea the Deft. says that before and at the time of the alleged imprisonment Plt. was a person of unsound mind and incompetent to take care of himself and a proper person to be taken care of and detained and it was unfit unsafe improper and dangerous that he should be at large thereupon the Deft. being the uncle of the Plt. and a proper person to cause the Plt. to be taken charge of and to produce care and treatment in that behalf did cause the Plt. to be so taken charge of and detained under due care and treatment, etc. etc.

The first plea was the stinger, but too long to cite verbatim. It put the plain issue, Is the plaintiff, at and before the time, etc., had conducted himself like a person of unsound mind, and of course that he was not? The second plea was so clear the sailors saw Billy lie motionless at the bottom, and thought he was feigning, and drew him up: but his face came up alongside a deadly white, with staring eyes, and they shuddered and let him sink again.

They took him into a house and stripped him, and rubbed him, and wrapped him in blankets, and put him by the fire, but he was dead as a herring.

Then having dried his clothes, they dressed the body again and laid him in the boat, and sent the Union Jack over the dead boy's shoulders and unwillingly back to the ship, George sobbing and moaning over the body, and not a dry eye in the boat.

The body was carried up the side, and uncovered, just as it had been taken from the water. The surgeon was sent for and examined the body: and then the grim routine of a man-of-war's deck swept him from the captain to the boy.

The captain read the service, the captain gave the stereotyped order to bury him at noon next day, and the usual preparations were made: he sewed up in his hammock with a portion of his clothes and bedding to conceal the outline of the corpse, and then covered with the Union Jack, and the poor skipper was laid out for burial, and covered by the Union Jack.

I don't know whether any of my young readers are directly interested in the proceedings of the just related. If not, I will just remind them that even Edward Dodd was prepared to oppose the marriage of Alfred and Ada, if any reason for it should befall his father at sea, owing to Alfred's imprudent interference in rescuing him from Drayton House.

CHAPTER LIII.

MINUTE study of my fellow-creatures has revealed to me that there are many intelligent persons who think that a suit at law commences at once. This is not so. Many writs are signed and decided by the special pleaders, and no newspaper notices such, and, as a stiff encounter of this kind actually took place in Hardie v. Hardie, a word of prefatory explanation may be proper. Suitors come into court to try by an issue: an issue is a mutual lie direct: and toward this both parties are driven upon paper by the laws of pleading, which may be briefly described as: Every statement of the adversary must either be contradicted by a counter-statement and avoided. "Avoided" means neutralized by fresh matter. 2. Nothing must be advanced by plaintiff which does not disclose a cause of action in point of law. Nothing advanced by defendant, which, if true, would not be a defense to the action. These rules exclude a vast number of palpable cheats and vices that mark all the unprofessional arguments one ever hears; for on a breach of any one of the said rules, the opposite party demurs—the demurrer is argued before the judges in banco, and, if successful, the faulty plaint, or faulty plea, is dismissed, and often of course the cause won or lost thereby, and the country saved that trouble, and the suitors the expense, of trying an issue.

So the writ being served by Pit's attorney, and his appearance put in by Deff.'s, the paper battle began by Alfred Hardie, through his attorney, serving on Deff.'s attorney "THE DECLARATION." This was drawn by his junior counsel, Garrow, and ran thus, after specifying the count and the date:

By statute 4 & 5 Vic. c. 99, s. 108.

1. The Deft. by Joseph Heathfield his attorney says he is not guilty.

2. And for a further plea the Deft. says that before and at the time of the alleged imprisonment Plt. was a person of unsound mind and incompetent to take care of himself and a proper person to be taken care of and detained and it was unfit unsafe improper and dangerous that he should be at large thereupon the Deft. being the uncle of the Plt. and a proper person to cause the Plt. to be taken charge of and to produce care and treatment in that behalf did cause the Plt. to be so taken charge of and detained under due care and treatment, etc. etc.

The first plea was a mere form of pleas, under the statute.

The second raised the very issue at common law the plaintiff would try.

The third made John Compton knit his brows with perplexity. "This is a very nasty plea," said he to Alfred, in a confidential way. "If we join issue on it we must be defeated; for how can we deny the certificates were in form; and oft have I heard you say the lease enough to be declared to Colls, who drew these pleas for them?"

"Mr. Colvin, Sir."

"Make a note to employ him in our next staff pleading."

Alfred was staggered. He had thought to ride rough-shod over defendant: a common practice with young counsel and solicitors. Lawyers fight hard. The pleas were taken to Garrow; he said there was but one course: to demur. Then the plaintiff joined issue on all the defendant's pleas, and as to the last plea the plaintiff said the same was bad in substance." Defendant rejoined that the same was good in substance, and thus Hardie v. Hardie was brought to the two pleas, a question of law for the judges, and an issue for the mixed tribunal loosely called a jury. And I heard hardly any one but should the plaintiff win one of the pleas and the defendant the other, the cause would be won by the defendant.

Postponing the history of the legal question, I shall show how Messrs. Heathfield fought off the issue, and cooled the ardent Alfred and sickened him of law.

In theory every Englishman has a right to be tried by his peers, and in fact there are many gentlemen in every court, each of whom has by precedent the power to refuse him a jury, by simply pronouncing in set terms after the writ, until the death of one of the parties, when the action, if a personal one, dies too: and, by a singular anomaly, which may be found in practice, if a slippery Deft. can't persuade A. or B., judges of the common law court, to connive at what I venture to call

THE POSTPONEMENT SWINDLE,

he can actually go to C. D. and E., one after another, and obtain rejected application, and at the previous refusal of the other judges to delay and baffle justice goes for little or nothing; so that the postponing swindler has five to one in his favor.

Messrs. Heathfield began this game unluckily. They applied to a judge in chambers for a month to plead. Mr. Compton opposed in person, and showed that this was absurd. The judge thought so too, and gave but days to plead. Issue being joined, Mr. Compton pushed on for trial, and the cause was entered for the November term. Toward the end of the term Messrs. Heathfield applied to one of the puisné judges for a postponement, on the ground that a principal witness could not attend. Application was supported by the attorney's affidavit to the effect that Mr. Spence was in Boulogne, and had written to him to say that he had met with a railway accident, and feared he could not possibly come to England in less than a month. A respectable French doctor confirmed this by certificate. Compton opposed, but the judge would hardly hear him, and postponed the trial as a matter of course: this carried it over the sittings into next term. Alfred groaned, but bore it patiently; not so Doctor Sampson: he raged against acres tribunals.* See how men deteriorate the moment they get out of the full light of publicity. What English judge, sitting in the light of Short-hand, would admit Jack swears that Gill says' for legal evidence. Speers has sworn to no facks. Heathfield has sworn to no facks but th' existence of Speers's hearsay. They are a couple o lyres. I'll bet ye two pounds t' a shilling Speers is as well as I'm."

Mr. Compton quietly reminded him there was a direct statement—the French doctor's certificate.

"A medical certificent!" shrieked Sampson, amazed. "Mai—dear—Sir, a medical certificent is but an article in commerce—like an attorney's conscience. Gimme a guinea, and I'll get you sworn sick, diseased, disabled, or dead this minute, whichever you like best."

"Come, doctor, don't fly off: you said you'd bet ten pounds to a shilling Speers is not on invalid at all. I say done."

"Done."

"How will you find out?"

"How? I'll write to the chief-takers on 'em, to be sure."

He wrote off to the prefect of police at Boulogne, and in four days received an answer headed, "Information in the interest of families." The prefect informed him there had been no railway accident: but that the Sieur Speers, English subject, had really hurt his leg getting out of a railway carriage six weeks ago, and had kept his room some days; but he had been cured some weeks, and going about his business, and was an excellent walker to Paris.

On this Compton offered him the shilling. But he declined to take it. "The lie was self-evident," said he, "and here's a judge who couldn't see't, and an attorney couldn't. Been all their business to deceive too. Oh the darkness of the professional mind!"

The next term came. Mr. Compton delivered the brief, the judges, sitting in chambers, etc., and Alfred came up with a good heart to get his stigma removed by twelve honest men in a jury box. But in the first case called out of its order and put before him, then another, till term wore near an end. Then Messrs. Heathfield applied to another judge of the court for a postponement. Mr. Richard Hardie, plaintiff's father, a most respectable man, and a Lord Mayor's Court. Medical certificate and letter herewith.

Compton opposed. Now this judge was a keen and learned lawyer, and had had long years of all professional tricks. He heard the two attorneys, and delivered himself to this effect, in spite of counsel and solicitors, who, I shall make up order. The defendant has been here before on a doubtful affidavit. You know, Mr. Heathfield, that I have refused to grant the plaintiff's evidence, and his conduct under cross-examination confirmed me. I think I should not be just nor humane to keep this plaintiff in suspense, and civilizer mortium, any longer. You can take out a commission to examine Richard Hardie."

To this Mr. Compton pulled him, but the commission was issued in time; and now the opening, Mr. Heathfield went to another judge with another disabled witness; Peggy Black. That judge was humane, was unwilling to interfere in a ster's children—in an affidavit: and they had been examined by commission in the interval. Mr. Compton opposed, and pointed out the blot. "You don't want the children in the witness-box," said he, "and you can't get at the evidence of our trial because one of your witnesses prefers nursing other people's children to facing the witness-box."

The judge nodded assent. "I make no order," said he.

Mr. Heathfield went out from his presence and sent a message by telegraph to Peggy Black. "If you must have them examined, telegraph the same at once, certificate by ——."

The accommodating maiden telegraphed back that she unfortunately had the measles, and if the children: medical certificate to follow by post. Four judges out of the five were now applied to in vain. But Mr. Heathfield thickened the hole in his face affidavit with Peggy's telegram, and slipped down to Westminster to the chief judge of the court, who, I think, had no opportunity of watching the growth and dissemination of this imposition. Mr. Compton's opposition fought this time by counsel and with a powerful affidavit. But luck was against him. The judge had not seen the case in original standing; Compton's counsel was feeble; did not feel the wrong: how could he? lawyers fatten by delays, and nobody physicked a fever by force. The postponement was granted.

Alfred cursed them all, and his own folly in believing that the alleged lunatic would be allowed fair play at Westminster or any where else. Garrow said, "Don't be discouraged: suspended to the press again. He wrote a long letter exposing with fearless irony the postponement swindle as it had been played on Hardie v. Hardie: and wound up with this fiery peroration:

"This Englishman sues not merely for damages, but to recover lost rights dearer far than money, of which he says he has been unjustly robbed; his right to walk in daylight on the soil of his native land without being seized, and tied up for life like a nigger or a dog; his footing in society; a chance to earn his bread; and a place among mankind: ay, among mankind! for it lacks but a few years of the full age of society's, and an alleged lunatic is a lunatic till a jury clears him.

"Now, you, gentlemen, is not such a suitor acred in all wise and good men's minds? Is he not defendant as well as plaintiff? Why his stake is enormous compared with the nominal defendant's; and, if I know right from wrong, to postpone his trial a fourth time would be to insult Divine justice, and trifle with human misery, and shock the common sense of mankind."

The doctor's pen neither clipped the words nor minced the matter you see. Reading this

* Nautical phrase, meaning without stink or limb, or flagrantly advanceurement; as there is of grog.

Plaintiff Alfred Hardie by John Compton to wit. his attorney sues Thomas Hardie For that the Deft. assaulted Plt.

the water came into Alfred's eyes: "Ah, stanch friend," he said, "how few are like you! To the intellectual dwarfs who conspire with my oppressors, Hardie v. Hardie is but a family squabble. Parvis omnia parva." Mr. Compton read it too; and said from the bottom of his heart, "Heaven defend us from our friends! This is enough to make the courts decline to try the case at all."

And, indeed, it did not cure the evil: for next term another malade affidavitaire was set up. Speers to wit. This gentleman deposed to having come over on purpose to attend the trial; but, having inadvertently stepped aside as far as Wades, he lay there stricken with a mysterious malady, and had just strength to forward medical certificate. On this the judge, in spite of remonstrance, adjourned Hardie v. Hardie to the summer term. Summer came, the evil day drew nigh: Mr. Heathfield got the venue changed from Westminster to London, which was the fifth postponement. At last the cause came on, the parties and witnesses were all in court, with two whole days to try it in.

Dr. Sampson rushed in furious. "There is some deviltry afloat," said he. "I was in the House of Commons last night, and there I saw the defendant's counsel carwigging the judge."

"Nonsense," said Mr. Compton, "such suspicions are ridiculous. Do you think they can talk of nothing but Hardie v. Hardie?"

"Mad—dearest Sirr—my son met one of Heathfield's clerks at dinner, and he let out that the trib was not to come off. Put this and that together now."

"I will come off," said Mr. Compton, "and in five minutes at farthest."

In less than that time the learned judge came in, and before taking his seat made this extraordinary speech.

"I hear this cause will take three days to try; and we have only two days before us. It would be inconvenient to have it unfinished; and I must proceed on circuit the day after to-morrow. It must be a remanet; no man can do more than time allows."

Plaintiff's counsel made a feeble remonstrance; then yielded. And the crier with sonorous voice called on the case of Bread v. Cheese, in which there were pounds at stake but no principle. Oh, with what zest they all went into it; being small men escaping from a great thing to a small one. Never hopped frogs into a ditch with more sincerity. Alfred left the court and hid himself; and the scalding tears forced their way down his cheeks at this heartless proceeding: to let all the witnesses come into court at a vast expense to the parties: and raise the cup of justice to the lips of the oppressed, and then pretend he knew a trial would last more than two days, and so shirk it. "I'd have made that a reason for sitting till midnight," said poor Alfred, "not for prolonging a poor injured man's agony four mortal months." He then prayed God earnestly for this great postponer's death as the only event that could give him back an Englishman's right of being tried by his peers, and so went down to Oxford heart-heavy.

As for Sampson he was most indignant, and said a public man had no business with a private car: and wanted to appeal to the press again; but the doughty doctor had a gentle but powerful ruler at home, as fiery horses are best ruled by a gentle hand. Mrs. Sampson requested him to write no more, but look round for an M.P. to draw those repeated defeats of justice to the notice of the House. Now there was one Mr. Bite, who had taken a prominent and honorable part in lunacy questions; headed committees and so on: this seemed the man. Dr. Sampson sent him a letter saying there was a flagrant case of a sane man falsely imprisoned, who had now been near a year applying for a jury, and jiggled out of this constitutional right by arbitrary and unreasonable postponements: would Mr. Bite give him (Dr. Sampson) ten minutes and no more, when he would explain the case and have documentary evidence behind him for Mr. Bite to test his statement. The philanthropical M.P. replied promptly in these exact words:

"Mr. Bite presents his compliments to Dr. Sampson to state that it is impossible for him to go into his case, nor to give him the time he requests to do so."

Sampson was a little indignant at the man's insolence; but far more at having been duped by the public assumption of philanthropy. "The little pragmatical impostor!" he roared. "Write what a sense of relief it caused Bugs off the mask of humanity when there is no easy éclat to be gained by putting t on." He sent the philanthropical Bite's revelation of his private self to Alfred, who returned it with this single remark: "Hounscull quanti sunt!"

Dishonest suitors all try to postpone; but they do not gain unmixed good thereby. These delays give time for more evidence to come in; and this slow coming, and chance, evidence is singularly adverse to the unjust suitor. Of this came a notable example in October next, and made Richard Hardie determine to precipitate the trial, and even regret he had not fought it out long ago.

He had just returned from consulting Messrs. Heathfield, and sat down to a nice little dinner in his apartments (Sackville Street), when a visitor was announced; and in came the slouching little figure of Mr. Barkington alias Noah Skinner.

DIAMOND CUT DIAMOND.

Mr. Hardie suppressed a start, and said nothing. Skinner bowed low with a mixture of his old cringing way, and a certain sly triumphant leer, so that his body seemed to say one thing, and his face the opposite. Mr. Hardie eyed him and saw that his coat was rusty, and his hat napless; then Mr. Hardie smelt a beggar, and prepared to parry all attempts upon his purse.

"I hope I see my old master well," said Skinner, cringing.

"Pretty well in body, Skinner; thank you."

"I had a deal of trouble to find you, Sir. But I heard of the great lawsuit between Mr. Alfred and you, and I knew Mr. Heathfield was your solicitor. So I watched at his place day after day: and at last you came. Oh, I was so pleased when I saw your noble figure; but I wouldn't speak to you in the street, for fear of disgracing you; I'm such a poor little guy to be addressing a gentleman like you."

Now this sounded well on the surface, but below there was a subtle something Mr. Hardie did not like at all: but he took the cue, and said, "My poor Skinner, do you think I would turn my back on a faithful old servant like you? have a glass of wine with me, and tell me how you have been getting on." He went behind a screen and opened a door, and soon returned with a decanter, leaving the door opened: now in the next room sat, unbeknown to Skinner, a young woman with wire eye-lashes, sewing buttons on Mr. Hardie's shirts. That nature gentleman gave her instructions, and important ones too, with a silent gesture; then reopened and filled the bumper high to his faithful servant. They drank on another's healths with great cordiality, real or apparent. Mr. Hardie then asked Skinner carelessly, if he could do anything for him. Skinner said, "Well, Sir, I am very poor."

"So am I between you and me," said Mr. Hardie, confidentially: "I don't mind telling you; these confounded Commissioners of Lunacy wrote to Alfred's trustees, and I have been forced to replace a loan of five thousand pounds. That Board always sides with the insane. That crippled me, and drove me to the Exchange; and now what I have left is all invested in timebargains. A month settles my fate: a little fortune, or absolute beggary."

"You'll be lucky, Sir, you'll be lucky," said Skinner, cheerfully; "you have such a long head: not like poor little me. The Exchange soon burnt my cravings. Not a shilling left of the thousand pounds, Sir, you were so good as to give me for my faithful services. But you will give me another chance, Sir, I know; I'll take better care this time." Mr. Hardie shook his head sorrowfully, and said it was impossible. Skinner eyed him askant, and remarked, quietly, and half aside, "Of course I could go to the other party: but I shouldn't like to do that. They would come down handsome."

"What other party?"

"La, Sir, what other party? why Mrs. Dodd's, or Mr. Alfred's; here's the trial coming on, you know, and of course if they could get me to go on the box and tell all I know, or half what I know, why the judge and jury would say backing Mr. Alfred up for mad was a conspiracy."

Mr. Hardie quaked internally; but he hid it grandly, and once more was a Spartan gnawed beneath his robe by this little fox: "Whist," said he, sternly, "after all I and mine have done for you and yours, would you be so base as to go and sell yourself to my enemies?"

"Never, Sir," shouted Skinner, zealously; then in a whisper, "not if you'll make a bid for me."

"How much do you demand?"

"Only another thousand, Sir."

"A thousand pounds!"

"Why, what is that to you, Sir: you are rich enough to buy the eighth commandment out of the tables of ten per cent.: and then the lawsuit, Hardie versus Hardie!"

"You have spoken plainly at last," said Mr. Hardie, grimly. "This is extortion money he threats. Do you know that nothing is more criminal, nor more easy to punish? I can take you before a magistrate, and imprison you on the instant for this attempt. I will, too."

"Try it," said Skinner, coolly. "Where's your witness?"

"Behind that screen."

Peggy came forward directly, with a pen in her hand. Skinner was manifestly startled and disconcerted. "I have taken all your words down, Mr. Skinner," said Peggy, softly: then to her master, "Shall I go for a policeman, Sir?"

Mr. Hardie reflected. "Yes," said he, sternly: "there's no other course with such a lump of treachery and ingratitude as this."

Peggy whipped on her bonnet.

"What a hurry you are in!" whined Skinner; "a policeman ought to be the last argument for old friends to run to." Then, fawning spitefully, "Don't talk of indicting me, Sir," said he; "it makes me shiver: why how will you look when I up and tell them all how Captain Dodd was took with apoplexy in our office, and how you nailed fourteen thousand pound's off his senseless body, and forgot to put them down in your balance-sheet, so they are not whitewashed off like the rest."

"Any witnesses to all this, Skinner?"

"Yes, Sir."

"Who?"

"Well; your own conscience, for one," said Skinner.

"He is mad, Peggy," said Mr. Hardie, shrugging his shoulders. He then lolled himself full in the face, and said, "Nobody was ever seized with apoplexy in my office. Nobody ever gave me £14,000, and if this is the probable tale with which you come here to break the law and extort money, leave my house this instant: and if ever you dare to utter this absurd and malicious slander, you shall lie within four stone walls, and learn what it is for a shabby vagabond to come without a witness to his back, and libel a man of property and honor."

Skinner let him run on in this lond, triumphant strain till he had quite done; then put out a brown skinny finger, and poked him lightly in the ribs, and said, quite quietly, and oh, so dryly, with a knowing wink,

"I've—got—THE RECEIPT."

THE BATTLE OF CHATTANOOGA.

We devote pages 808 and 809 to an illustration of a scene in the great battle of Chattanooga, from a sketch by Mr. Theodore R. Davis. Mr. Davis writes:

"THE STORMING OF MISSIONARY RIDGE, NOVEMBER 25, 1863, BY THE FOURTH CORPS.

"HEAD-QUARTERS MAJOR-GENERAL GORDON GRANGER, CHATTANOOGA, NOV. 27.

"On Wednesday afternoon the Fourth Corps was ordered to carry the rifle-pits at the base of Missionary Ridge. After the carrying of these works it was discovered that they were so commanded by the guns upon the ridge that, in order to hold the works, the rides itself must be taken. Which was done. How, would take more space than I can give.

THE CAPTURE OF ORCHARD KNOB, CHATTANOOGA, BY HAZEN'S AND WILLICH'S BRIGADES, DEPLOYED AS SKIRMISHERS, NOVEMBER 23, 1863.

SKETCHED BY MR. THEODORE R. DAVIS.—[SEE PAGE 813.]

"The color-sergeant of the Seventy-ninth Indiana, Henry C. Lawrence, carried his colors far in advance of his regiment, which was the first to commence the ascent. The whole army are admiring him.

"Such a quantity of prisoners came into the keeping of the provost marshal of the corps, Captain Kaldenbaugh, that it was thought at one time another corps would have to be ordered up to take them in hand."

On page 812 we give

THE CAPTURE OF ORCHARD KNOB.

Mr. Davis writes:

"HEAD-QUARTERS MAJOR-GENERAL GORDON GRANGER, Dec. 27, 1863.

"On Monday afternoon, the 23d inst., the division of General Wood was ordered to make a reconnoissance toward Orchard Knob—a commanding position held by the rebels within range of the guns of Fort Wood. The division formed outside of our fortifications, General Harker on the right, Willich in the centre, and General Beatty on the left. The division advanced with the Fifth Kentucky, Ninety-third Ohio, Eighth Kansas, and Eighty-ninth Illinois as skirmishers. These carried this important position with splendid gallantry."

THE LOSS OF THE "ISAAC NEWTON."

We illustrate on this page the burning of the Hudson River steamer Isaac Newton, which took place on the night of 5th inst., off Fort Washington. The following account of the catastrophe is condensed from the Herald report:

It appears that the Isaac Newton—one of the finest steamboats running on the Hudson River, between this city and Albany—left her wharf, at the foot of Cortlandt Street, about six o'clock on Saturday evening, under the command of Captain Peck. She had between 150 and 200 passengers on board at the time, besides the usual quantity of freight and her ordinary complement of firemen, deck hands, etc. She went along very smoothly and quietly for about an hour, when suddenly a tremendous explosion occurred on board, and in an instant all was confusion and alarm. The large boiler had exploded, scattering an unlimited amount of pent-up steam and boiling water into every exposed portion of the vessel. The furnaces, which were in close proximity to the boiler, were blown into pieces by the tremendous force of the explosion, and the red-hot coals and burning wood were in consequence cast about the steamboat, setting fire to it, and thereby adding tenfold to the horror of the situation. The luckless vessel was in a few minutes under the full control of the fiery elements, and to attempt to describe the scene would be impossible.

Fortunately very few of the passengers were on the open decks, where they would have been exposed to the horrible dangers of death by scalding or burning. It was just about the time when most of the passengers were at their supper, or preparing for a comfortable nap in their berths, expecting to wake up all safe and sound in Albany. The lady passengers were easily settled in the cabin, and the men were either in the after portion of the vessel smoking, or, as stated above, eating their suppers in the refectory.

In the mean time the signals of distress were answered from the shore at each side. A propeller, called the Jennie P. Miller, and the tow-boat Herald soon got near the burning steamer and took off most of the passengers—half dead from fear and excitement. Several canal-boats also came up in good time, and did good service in rescuing the passengers. A number of row-boats put out from the shore, and it is said a few of the passengers availed themselves of these light barks to reach the friendly land once more.

Four person are known to have been killed and fifteen others injured perhaps fatally.

CHARLES C. GUNTHER, THE MAYOR ELECT.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]

THE MAYOR ELECT.

HON. CHARLES GODFREY GUNTHER was born in New York, on 7th April, 1822, and with his father and one of his brothers carries on a large fur business there. Before he was of age to vote he was an active working member of the Democratic party, and subsequently became a member of the Young Men's Democratic General Committee, of which body he was several times chairman. In 1855 he was elected a Governor of the Alms-house, and became afterward President of the Board. In 1861 he ran unsuccessfully for Mayor, Mr. Opdyke winning the day. On the 1st of the month he ran a second time, and was elected over the Republican candidate, Mr. Blunt, on the one hand, and over the nominee of Mozart and Tammany, Mr. Boole, on the other.

Mr. Gunther is greatly respected as a high-toned, honorable merchant. In politics he has hitherto been a Hard-shell Democrat. We believe, however, that he has been unjustly classed with the peace party

THE SOWING OF THE AGES.

STEADILY the Ages sow
Ever-living seeds—
Many-germed seeds;
And the flowers come and go,
Though the blinded generations
Scorn them as the weeds.

Seeds of truth and seeds of right—
Strong perennial seeds—
Ever-growing seeds;
And the harvests ripen bright
Though the generations count them
Not among their needs.

They are beaten down in wrath—
Madly beaten down—
Vainly beaten down;
And they spring up in the path,
Prickly, of the generations
That their growth disown.

Sharper leaves from tougher roots,
Growing bloodless fast—
Growing earless fast;
Till a crop of steel upshoots,
Spearing through the generations
Prone upon it cast.

And this last crop of the seeds
Surely must be good—
Must be wondrous good;
Precious crop for sorest needs,
For the prostrate generations
Water it with blood.

DESTRUCTION OF THE HUDSON RIVER STEAMBOAT "ISAAC NEWTON" BY FIRE, DECEMBER 5, 1863.

ADVERTISEMENTS

MORTON'S GOLD PENS are now sold at the same prices as before the commencement of the war; this is entirely owing to the Manufacturer's improvements in machinery, his present large Retail Business and Cash-in-Advance System; for, until he commenced advertising, his business was done on Credit as strictly such as the Trade.

The Morton Gold Pens are the only ones sold at old prices, as the makers of all other gold pens charge the Premium on the Gold, Government Tax, &c.; but Morton has in no case changed his prices, Wholesale or Retail.

Of the great numbers sent by mail to all parts of the world during the past few years, not one in a thousand has failed to reach its destination in safety; showing that the Morton Gold Pen can be obtained by any one, in every part, of the world, at the same price, promptly executed.

Reader, you can have as enduring, always ready, and reliable Gold Pen, exactly adapted to your hand and style of writing, which, "like your writing, rarely changes than your face; and at the present almost universal High-Premium Price of everything, you can have a Morton Gold Pen cheaper, in proportion to "value spent upon it and material used, than any other Gold Pen in the World. If you want one call on A. MORTON, No. 5 Maiden Lane, or inclose stamp for circular.

Sixth Thousand Ready Next Week.
Bayard Taylor's Novel.
HANNAH THURSTON.

A
Story of American Life.

The critics of the press are nearly unanimous in its praise. From various and modern we extract the following:

From the N. Y. Independent.
"Mr. Taylor has written a good novel."
From the N. Y. Daily Times.
"There is life and individuality about his portraits."
From the Boston Transcript.
"To us its signal merits is its truth."
From the Boston Gazette.
"Will meet the commendation of thinking women."
From the Albany Evening Journal.
"Hannah Thurston will be eagerly read."
From the Springfield Republican Daily Press.
"Will greatly increase the author's fame."
From the Lackawanna Register.
"The book is one of marked and powerful character."
From the Philadelphia Evening Bulletin.
"Eminently successful as a novel—full."
From the Albion Weekly.
"He has written a book on the popular heart."
From the Boston Daily Traveller.
"The cleverest such as we must every day."
From the Philadelphia City Item.
"An original, witty, delightful, refreshing novel."
From the Albany Journal. (Second Notice.)
"A book of great power. Better than a notice."
From the Norfolk Journal.
"A mode of graceful and correct English."
From the Boston Post.
"Full of intellect, energy, love, of the same genus."
From the N. Y. Tribune.
"Graphic and suggestive pictures with which it abounds."

From the Home Journal.
"Like all that has gone before, glowing and graphic."
From the N. Y. Commercial Advertiser.
"Many new admirers will read it with pleasure."
From the Rev. Bedford Mercury.
"It is one of the books to be bought."
Price $1.50.

C. P. PUTNAM, Publisher, No. 441 Broadway, N. Y.
. Copies sent by mail.

J. W. EVERETT & CO.,
METROPOLITAN
PURCHASING AGENCY.

We will forward to any address, on receipt of order accompanied by cash, ANY ARTICLES required by the Army, the Navy, or the Pocket, in the LOWEST Prices, JEWELRY, BOOKS, ALBUMS, PHOTOGRAPHS, PLAYING CARDS, MUSIC, PUBLICATIONS, etc. etc. We will forward GAME OFFICIAL ORDERS—4 cts. of any of the Prominent Officers of the Army and Navy, Stationery, Envelopes, Foreign Embellished, &c., at 10 cents each, six for $1, or a dozen for $1 60, free by mail.

Dominoes for the Million.

AMERICAN PATENT DOMINOES—Ivory Enameled Blocks, being neat, durable, and a perfect substitute for the more expensive kinds. Single sets, 15 cents, by mail; per doz., $1 60; per 100, $10. Address as above.

Union Badge.
PER HUNDRED,
$100—$8 00.
SINGLE BADGES, 15 cents.
Sent free by express or Mail.
Address
J. W. EVERETT & CO.,
111 Fulton Street
or P. O. Box 2014,
New York City.

Send for Circular.

$50 for $20.

For $20 we will forward by mail or express, pre-paid, the following: One Fine Gold-Toned Hunting-Case Watch, 12 Gent's Soi Rings, 3 Gold Pens and Extension Holders, 1 Set Studs, 1 Fancy Watch Keys, 1 Jeweled or Scarf Pins, 4 pair Sleeve Buttons, 3 Sets and Gleus for Studs, 1 Double-Glass Lockets, and 3 Chester-field Shirt Pins. Address THOMAS CAFFERTEY & CO., Providence, R. I.

Portable Printing Offices.

For the Army and Navy Hospitals, Merchants, Druggists, and all who wish to print neatly, cheaply, and expeditiously. Circular sent free. Shoots of Type, Cuts, &c., at very low rates. Adams Press Co., 21 Park Row, N. Y., and 25 Lincoln St., Boston.

Broker's Stock of unredeemed goods for sale at 81 per cent. below cost; consists of a variety of gold and silver goods; worth from 75 cents to $3 00 each. Any person sending 25 cents, we will forward, by return mail, a sample article they will receive. For other inducements, send 3 cent stamp for circular. Address

ANDREWS & CO., 208 Sudbury St., Boston, Mass.

Family Medicine.

By having the BRANDRETH PILLS on hand, should a sudden attack of sickness occur, they can be given at once, and often will have effected a cure before the physician arrives.

As a Bilious remedy, and for costiveness, they have no equal.

PRINCIPAL OFFICE, 294 Canal Street.
Sold also at No. 4 UNION SQUARE, and by dealers.

KENDALL'S AMBOLINE.

AMBOLINE
FOR THE HAIR

Kendall's Amboline for the Hair is a purely vegetable compound. It will restore the hair from falling out or turning grey. Gives dandruff as and as a dressing superior to all other preparations.

MISS FANNY STOKES, the beautiful and talented actress, says, "I have used Kendall's Amboline for my hair, and find it a very superior article. I have no hesitation in recommending it to every lady who desires a full and luxuriant head of hair"

KENDALL'S AMBOLINE is put up in boxes containing two bottles, price $1. Sold by all Druggists. Depot 500 Broadway, N. Y.

Cavalry and Artillery.

Sold Silver, $1 25. Sold Silver, $1 25.

Sold 18 k. Gold, $5 00. Sold 18 k. Gold, $5 00.

Send for cut in receipt of Price. Also all Arms Corps, Co., and Division Pins, engraved to order, by the single one, 100, or 1000, and sent to any part of this country. Terms cash in advance. Send for a circular. Address

BROWNE & MOORE,
Manufacturing Jewelers, 208 Broadway, New York.

$153 a year pays Board and Tuition at Hudson River Institute, Claverack, N. Y. Superior English, Normal, Classical, French, Musical, Painting, Military and Commercial Branches. Sixth quarter Jan. 5. Terms open. Commercial Departments thoroughly practical. 18 Instructors. Rev. ALONZO FLACK, A.M., Principal.

American Card Company's
New Union Playing Cards
National Emblems.

Goddess of Liberty 🜆 Eagles

The suits are EAGLES, SHIELDS, STARS, and FLAGS. Colonel in place of King; Goddess of Liberty for Queen; Major for Knave.

The Union Playing Cards are the first and only genuine American cards ever published, and as the time of their occurring to Act of Congress, they can be manufactured only by the American Card Company.

The Cards are rapidly taking the place of Cards bearing Foreign emblems. The demand for them is unprecedented in the Card Trade, and they will soon become the Leading Cards in the United States.

In playing with these Cards, they are to be called by the emblems represent, and so the emblems are as familiar as household words everything among the people of the American Republic, they can be used as readily the best cornbeef as cards bearing Foreign emblems.

The Union Cards are the most pleasing and attractive card ever issued. They are printed in the highest style of the art, and each pack is put up in an elegant Card Case, suitable to keep them in when not in use, and them in handsome dozen boxes for the trade.

Two Sample Packs in Card Cases, sent, post-paid, on receipt of $1. Address

AMERICAN CARD COMPANY,
455 Broadway, or 165 William St., N. Y.

ECONOMY, DURABILITY, and CONVENIENCE.—The "Empire" No Chimney Burner, for Kerosene Oil Lamps, patented Aug. 11th, '63, gives a brilliant light free from smoke or smell. It can be carried and handled freely without being extinguished. The latest and acknowledged the best burner in use. Liberal terms to the trade. Sample sent, post-paid, for 75 cents. Circulars free. Agents wanted.

PETER EESIG & CO., Manufacturers,
No. 2 Platt Street, N. Y.

When the Boys Come Home. "Mother would comfort Me." Two new songs by composer of "When this Cruel War is over," "Rally round the Flag, Boys!" "Call," 50 new instrumental songs and quartettes, 50 c. Silk and Indian Rubber corsages, $2, mailed.

FREDERICK BLUME, 705 Bowery, N. Y.

Cloaks and Mantillas.
BRODIE,
The Leader of Fashions!
Opened his Fall Stock on Thursday, 5th inst.,
And as usual stands unrivaled for Style, Quality, AND VARIETY.
300 Canal Street, New York.

American Watches
For Soldiers
AT REDUCED PRICES.

American Watches for Americans!

THE AMERICAN WATCH COMPANY give notice that they have lately issued a new style of Watch, expressly designed for Soldiers and others who desire a good watch at a moderate price. These watches are intended to displace the worthless, cheap watches of British and Swiss manufacture with which the country is flooded, and which were never expected to keep time when they were made, being refuse manufacture sent to this country because unsalable at home, and used here only for jockeying and swindling purposes.

We offer to sell our Watch, which is of THE MOST SUBSTANTIAL MANUFACTURE, AN ACCURATE AND RELIABLE TIME-KEEPER, and in Sterling Silver Cases. Hunting pattern, at nearly as low a price as is asked for the funny-named Anores and Lepines of foreign make, already referred to.

We have named the new series of Watches, WM. ELLIOT, BOSTON, MASS., which name will be found on the plate of every watch of this manufacture, and is one of our trade-marks.

Sold by all respectable watch dealers in the loyal states. Wholesale orders should be addressed to

ROBBINS & APPLETON,
Agents of the American Watch Company,
182 BROADWAY, N. Y.

THE "RIDGEWOOD" PATENT
SMOKING CASE

A Beautiful Holiday Gift.

Most ingenious in its combination of the Meerschaum Case, containing Pipe and Stem, Matches and Pipe Cleaner, with a handsome Tobacco Pouch attached, filling the Pipe by a valve, without use of the fingers or waste of Tobacco, the whole arranging themselves from all other portable and a Cigar Case. It is made for service, of various styles, at $1 75, $2 00, $2 25, $2 50, and $3 00 to $15 and $20 00; the two latter richly plated and engraved. Nothing can excel in Comfort, Convenience, and Elegance. The Patent at HOME or ABROAD, in the ARMY and NAVY. Sold by Jewelers and to Friends. As a Holiday Present it will be found to be more acceptable. FOR THE SOLDIER OR SAILOR, it is the Companion of Hours, it is INVALUABLE. Large Orders, with commendation from all points in the Army, daily solicited.

Also, The Ridgewood Smoking Tobacco,

Of superior quality and flavor, in packages to fill the pouch (about a week's smoking), $2 25 per doz.), and larger sizes for the General Trade. SAMPLES, DEALERS, will Outlets invited to call and examine these Goods. Circulars sent on order. A LIBERAL DISCOUNT to Dealers. Single Cases sent by mail, post, on receipt of prices and stamps.

RIDGEWOOD MANUFACTURING CO.,
OFFICE 429 BROADWAY, cor. HOWARD STREET, N. Y.

H. A. HARVEY, 34 Maiden Lane, N. Y., TWINES, Ropes, CORDAGE, and Yarns, Steam Packing, Wick, CARPET WARP, Fish Lines, Blocking Cord, Lemon Twine, Hammocks, Wadding and Wrapping PAPER, Envelopes, and Paper Bags.

Presents! Presents!
Soldier's Head-Quarters.
Rare Chance for AGENTS.
Head-Quarters for Army Corps Pins.

Any one wishing to buy, sell, exchange, or wishing to purchase any thing in the Jewelry or Gold Pin and Fancy Line, will send us a postal card on the receipt of it, together with my wholesale circular with full instructions how to proceed, and we will send them a fine Gold Pen, with Extension Case and Pencil, or a fine engraved Spring Locket or Bracelet, or California Diamond Seal Stone Ring, or a new style Vest Chain or Neck Chain, or a beautiful set of Jewelry. Also a Gold Silver Shield, or Silver Army Corps, Division, or Co. Pin, or the Kearney Cross Pin, with your Name, Regiment, and Co. handsomely engraved upon it. 15 per ct. allowed Agents on Corps Pins.

E. V. HAVILAND,
Manufacturing Jewelers, 208 Broadway, N. Y.

Sportsmen, Tourists, and Army and Navy Officers.
Powerful and Brilliant Double Glasses.

Portability combined with power in a pocket field glass, called Tourists', Opera, and general out-door day and night double perspective glasses, will show distinctly a person to know him at from 3 to 6 miles. Spectacles of the greatest transparent power to strengthen an old sharpsighted eye without the distressing result of frequent changes. Catalogue sent by mail on receipt of stamp.

SEMMONDS, Oculists—Opticians,
691 Broadway, New York.

HOSTETTER'S
CELEBRATED
STOMACH BITTERS

HABITUAL CONSTIPATION.—HOW TO EFFECT A CERTAIN AND PERMANENT CURE.—Some acceptance of life predispose to costiveness, especially those which allow but little exercise. Persons who contract this unfortunate habit of body, under these circumstances, might possibly be relieved by changing their sedentary employments for others of a more active kind; but this is by no means certain. Habitual constipation is a very obstinate disorder. All the ordinary so-called remedies invariably aggravate it. Nothing can be more injurious than the continued use of strong aperients. They at first irritate, and finally almost paralyze the bowels—rendering them so torpid that enormous doses of cathartic medicines have no effect upon them. A mild aperient, combined with a gentle stimulant, is the true remedy; and a combination in the happiest proportion, of these ingredients, is found in HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS. This famous stomachic invigorates the whole intestinal canal, while quietly removing from its convolutions all those elements to a free passage through them. No mere purgative has this double operation. No ordinary stimulant effects the desired object. Cases of constipation, demanded as hopeless by distinguished medical men, have been cured in a few weeks by the Bitters. To those who have tried all the medicines of the dispensary in vain, we say try this irresistible stimulant and aperient. There is no sufficient reason why constipation should be the concomitant of sedentary habits. HOSTETTER'S BITTERS, by supplying the whole with blood will likewise be relieved from excessive fullness. In these cases enable the system to perform its necessary functions without the aid of drugs. In a word, they never make permanent weakness for the excitement in some case, and the same ultimate result in every case. Invalids, who frequently suffer from habitual costiveness, are the victims of diseases of females. The truth is, that bodies affected with these villainous ailments baffle heroic efforts to recover them, and fall for the want of just such a stimulant and correction as the "Bitters" afford. If the true state of woman's constitution were better appreciated, it would be seen that no female ought to bear her sufferings otherwise than that, on the contrary, they should render her the object of a tender sympathy and a fonder care.

Sold by all Druggists and Family Grocers.

Hostetter's Stomach Bitters,

PREPARED AND SOLD BY
HOSTETTER & SMITH, PITTSBURGH, PA.
DEPOT FOR NEW YORK, 695 BROADWAY.

$60 A MONTH! We want Agents at $60 a month, expenses paid, to sell our Everlasting Pencils, Pencil-Tips, and Pens. Address SHAW & CLARK, Biddeford, Maine.

AGENTS WANTED.—Call and examine, at 19 Ann Street, or by mail for 75 cents, that retail for $3, unparalleled for every purpose. Address
E. L. WOLCOTT, 170 Chatham Square, N. Y.

Kirk's Charles the Bold.

Will be Published early in Dec.:

HISTORY OF CHARLES THE BOLD, DUKE OF BURGUNDY.

By JOHN FOSTER KIRK.

Two volumes.....8vo.....With Portrait.

Mr. John Foster Kirk, whose intimate relations with the late Wm. H. Prescott are well known, has just completed Vols. I. and II. of the History of Charles the Bold, and the Publishers have the pleasure of announcing that this important contribution to our historical literature will be ready for publication early in December.

The remarkable epoch treated by Mr. Kirk is full of grand historical figures, and by his narrative an entirely new interest is thrown on some of the most important events in Charles's career. His position as the "Napoleon of the Middle Ages" is fully indicated, and the influence he traced both of the ambitious and of the fall upon the destinies of the principal European States.

From the Atlantic Monthly.

"We have no hesitation in assigning to Mr. Kirk's most fascinating narrative a place with the great achievements of genius in the department for his element to fix. An advent among the historians will be welcomed the world over."

J. B. LIPPINCOTT & CO., Publishers,
715 and 717 Market Street,
Philadelphia.

—SIDE A JACK HORNER. The old nursery rhyme never considered that the rider would have to pay for the hurry of the boy that put Cantering Coin into his hand. A child sway from before the horse's head. These wonderful Sheets are born for role by S. W. SMITH, No. 169 Broadway. Call for the little folks, and take a ride, or send stamp for illustrated circular.

ALL ARTICLES FOR SOLDIERS

At Baltimore, Washington, and all places occupied by Union troops, direct to HARPER'S WEEKLY EXPRESS, No. 74 Broadway. Sutlers charged low rates.

6000 AGENTS wanted, to sell SIX NEW INVENTIONS—Sewing Machines, Cooking Stoves, Washing Machines, all pay great profits to Agents. Send 4 stamps and get 50 paper pictures. Freeman Brown, Lowell, Mass.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York,

Have just published:

HISTORY OF THE SIOUX WAR AND MASSACRES OF 1862 AND 1863. By ISAAC V. D. HEARD. With Portraits and Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $1 25.

THE BIVOUAC AND THE BATTLE-FIELD; or, Campaign Sketches in Virginia and Maryland. By Captain GEORGE F. NORTON. 12mo, Cloth, $1 25.

Holiday Presents.

J. H. Winslow & Co.,
100,000
WATCHES, CHAINS, &c., &c.
Worth $500,000.

To be sold for One Dollar each, without regard to value, and not to be paid for until you know what you are to get.

SPLENDID LIST!!

OF ARTICLES TO BE SOLD FOR ONE DOLLAR EACH.

100 Gold Hunting Cased Watches	$100 00 each.
100 Gold Watches	50 00 each.
200 Ladies' Gold Watches	25 00 each.
200 Ladies' and Gent's Silver Watches	15 00 each.
3000 Vest and Neck Chains	5 00 to 10 00 each.
2000 Gold Band Bracelets	5 00 to 10 00 each.
2000 "	3 00 to 5 00 each.
3000 Cameo Brooches	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Mosaic and Jet Brooches	4 00 to 6 00 each.
2000 Lava and Florentine Brooches	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Coral, Onyx and Em. Brooches	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Cameo Ear Drops	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Mosaic and Jet Ear Drops	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Lava and Florentine Ear Drops	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Coral, Pea., and Opal Ear Drops	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Gent's Breast Pins	2 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Gent's Scarf Pins	2 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Gent's Ribbon Slides	2 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Sets of Sleeve Studs	2 50 to 6 00 each.
3000 Sets of Buttons	2 50 to 6 00 each.
4000 Plain Rings	2 50 to 5 00 each.
4000 Stone Set Rings	2 50 to 5 00 each.
4000 Lockets	5 00 to 10 00 each.
3000 Sets Ladies' Jewelry	5 00 to 10 00 each.
10000 Gold Pens, Silver M'ted Holders	4 00 to 5 00 each.
10000 Gold Pens, with Silver Extension Cases and Pencils	4 00 to 6 00 each.

All of the above list of Goods will be sold for one dollar each. Certificates of all the various articles, stating what each one can have, are first put in envelopes, sealed up, and mixed; and when ordered, are taken out without regard to kind, and sent by mail, thus giving all a fair chance. On receipt of the Certificate, you will see what you can have, and then it is at your option to send one dollar and take the article or not.

In all transactions by mail, we shall charge for forwarding the Certificates, paying postage, and doing the business. No certificate, which must be inclosed for the Certificate is sent for. Five Certificates will be sent for $1; eleven for $2; thirty for $5; sixty for $10; and a hundred for $15.

Agents who make selling as Agents will be allowed ten cents on every Certificate ordered by them, provided their remittances amount to one dollar. Any person will collect Certificates for every Certificate, and remit 15 cents to us, either in cash or postage stamps. Great caution should be used by our correspondents in regard to giving their correct address, Town, County, and State. Address

J. H. WINSLOW & CO.,
295 Broadway, New York.

SOLDIERS' COMPANY PINS And Corps Badges.

Constantly on hand and Engraved to Order, and sent free on receipt of Price.

Every Co. From A. to Z., solid Silver	$1 00
Solid Silver Letters in Gold Relief	1 50
Solid 18 K. Gold	3 00
Solid Silver Corps Badges (plain)	1 00
" " " (enameled)	1 50
" Gold " "	3 00

Cavalry Badges

Terms Cash in advance. Send for a Catalogue. Address C. L. BALCH & CO., 208 Broadway, New York.

Printing-Press for Sale.

One Taylor Double Cylinder, five Rollers, Table Distribution, Self Inker, $3500.
Apply to HARPER & BROTHERS, 329 Pearl St., N.Y.

STERLING'S AMBROSIA

DR. STERLING'S AMBROSIA is a scientific and healing extract of roots, barks, and herbs. It will stop any disorder of the scalp and itching of the head, and gradually eradicate dandruff, prevent the hair from falling out or from turning prematurely gray, causing it to grow thick and long, and entirely different from all other preparations, and can be relied on.

Price 75 CENTS PER BOX, containing two bottles. DR. H. STERLING, Sole Proprietor, Depot No. 482 Broadway. For sale by all druggists.

DESIRABLE VALUABLE GIFTS!

1st ARTOMATIC SELF-SEWER for $1. Adapted for all the Sewing Machines. Guides the work without the hand; Tucks, Hems, Seams, Cords, Binds. Sent any where, with printed directions, free, on receipt of One Dollar.

2d SHOEMEN WORK, TWO STRANDS, for Machines..... 10c.
3d Silvered Hemmers and Shield..... 15c.
4th Needle Book and 100 Barbed's Needles..... 25c.
Needle Contents and 50 " ..... 35c.
Illustrating Gazette for Machines.
Address BARTLETT'S NEEDLE AND SEWING Machine Depot, 482 Broadway, N. Y.

Opera and Field-Glasses

Of great power, from $3 50 to $25. Spectacles and Eye Glasses. Also HOLIDAY GOODS in Great Variety. B. H. HOON, Manufacturing Optician, 319 Broadway, up stairs. Send for circular.

$75 a MONTH! I want to hire Agents in every county, at $75 a month, expenses paid, to sell my new cheap Family Sewing Machines. Address S. MADISON, Alfred, Maine.

Cavalry and Artillery Fine in Fine Silver, with Name. Samples sent to Sol diers on receipt of $1 25; also Army Corps Badges for $1 00. Liberal discount made to agents.
E. N. FOOTE & CO., Manufacturers of Jewelry, 208 Broadway, New York.

$200! $150 $100! $50!
PREMIUMS.

To Editors and Others!

I will pay the above named amounts for the best four articles on either my Soap, Saleratus, or Concentrated Potash.

The articles must be awaded on the fourth day of July, 1864.

64 to 74 Washington Street, New York.

Meeks' Cabinet and Furniture Warehouse,
No. 699 BROADWAY, and 333 and 335 Fourth Street.

New and elegant Designs, of superior Workmanship, at reasonable prices, manufactured of the very best well-seasoned and selected material, under the supervision of the firm, whose reputation has been established several years. Every description of Furniture manufactured to order and executed promptly.
Goods packed and shipped to all parts of the world.

SPLENDID HOLIDAY PRESENTS.

Superbly finished watches, the beauty of which is only equaled by their chronometer.—N. Y. Weekly, July 25.

Particularly valuable for fitness in the survey, and travelers.—Frank Leslie's, Feb. 21.

Prettiest, best and cheapest watch in the market.—N. Y. Illustrated News, Jan. 16.

Magic Time Observers,
The Perfection of Mechanism!
Being a Hunting, or Open Face, or Lady's or Gentleman's Watch combined, with Patent Self-winding Improvement.

A most pleasing novelty. One of the prettiest, most convenient, and best and cheapest timepieces for general and reliable use ever offered. It has within it and connected with its machinery its own winding attachment, rendering a key entirely unnecessary. The cases of this Watch are composed of two metals, the outer one being fine 16 carat gold. It has the improved ruby action lever movement, and is warranted a accurate timepiece. Price, superbly engraved, per case of half dozen, $204. Single watches and movements can be had. If sent by mail, the postage is 26 cents; registering, 20 cents.

Silver Watches!
First-Class Hunting Time-Pieces.

FOR ACCURACY OF MOVEMENT, BEAUTY OF MATERIAL, AND, BOTH, FOR CHEAPNESS IN PRICE, THESE WATCHES MUST INSURE

UNIVERSAL APPROBATION!

An imitation so faultless that it can hardly be detected by the most experienced judges. The material being of fine metals, the outer one fine quality Silver and the inner one German Silver, it can not be recognized by coloring or damp engraving, making it not only in appearance, but in durability, the best resemblance of Solid Sterling Silver to imitation.

The sale of these watches in the army is a source of enormous profit, running, as they very readily do, at $25 and upward. Many hundred dollars can be made in a single day by any one of ordinary business tact!

AT WHOLESALE ONLY! In heavy hunting cases, beautifully engraved, with enamel dial, and figure or beads, in good running order, by the half dozen, $66; pocket, $8 50; registering, $9 50. Sold only by the case. Can be safely sent by mail.

TERMS CASH, INVARIABLY IN ADVANCE. No agents employed; buyers must deal directly with us. If money is sent us by express or mail in a registered letter, it is at our risk! Orders will meet the most prompt and faithful attention.

HUBBARD BROS., Sole Importers,
Broadway, cor. Courtlandt St., New York.

DO YOU WANT LUXURIANT WHISKERS OR MUSTACHES?—Secured before them to grow heavily in six weeks (upon the smoothest face) without stain or injury to the skin. Price $1—sent by mail, post free, to any address, on receipt of an order. S. C. GRAHAM, No. 109 Nassau Street, N. Y.

The Printer's Devil.

This large bandsome, and beautifully illustrated literary and miscellaneous family journal will be sent six months on trial for only Twenty-five Cents. This gives all an opportunity to secure a really good paper for a small sum. Now is the time to give it a trial. Published at Printer's Devil Building, 125 Fulton Street, New York." Sold by all newsdealers.

The Bound Boy.

If over 15, and your Beard, Moustache, &c., is of scanty, retarded growth, the use for a short time of the Tonsorine Sea-Sponge Steam Bandage will stimulate them to a speedy fine and vigorous growth. Has been thoroughly tried and found reliable. Is a small sample box and an account of the discovery of this remarkable Balsam at Shiloh, April, 1862, will be forwarded on receipt of postage. Address John Rawlins, 797 Broadway, New York.

Do you want to make yourself

KNOW THE FUTURE!!!?—Go

See the PRINTER'S DEVIL for Dec. 1, at all Newsdealers in the U. S.

SALISBURY, BRO., & CO.,

AGENTS FOR THE UNITED STATES FOR THE CELEBRATED

ALBERTINE

Extension Holders and Gold Pens,

Of the most handsome and durable construction, put up in new fancy cases of one dozen each, and not sold in any less quantities. They will retail for $3 each.

Price, per dozen..... $ 0 25
Or 3 dozen for..... 0 00

Sent by mail or express, prepaid. Address
SALISBURY, BRO., & CO., Providence, R. I.

Salesmen Wanted.

$75 a month, or commission allowed on sales. Apply to HALE & CO., Newburyport, Mass.

Elliot's New Repeaters

Are now ready. The most safe, compact, durable, efficient, sure, and reliable Revolvers ever made. Five shots (No. 32 cartridge), are rapidly loaded and fired—consequently carried in the vest—while loaded are five-shooting four barrels—each rifled quite to the breech. The Trade supplied.
ELLIOT ARMS CO., 404 Broadway, N. Y.

DR. B. C. PERRY,
DERMATOLOGIST,
49 Bond Street, New York.

Formerly of 29 Winter Street, Boston, treats successfully all Diseases of the Scalp, Loss of Hair, and Premature Bleaching: Also, removes Moth Freckles, and other Discolorations from the face, without injury to the texture or color of the skin. Consultation free.
For pamphlet containing testimonials for Circulars.

A Sewing Machine for $5.

Unequaled for
COMMON HAND NEEDLES,
And all kinds of Makes—
Common Hand Stitch.

GATHERS, HEMMING, SEAMS, TUCKS, RUNS up Braiding; each Machine is put up in a highly ORNAMENTAL WORK-BOX, with full directions, 50 of BARTLETT'S ADJUSTABLE NEEDLES, and sent anywhere ordered on receipt of Five Dollars, addressed to the BARTLETT'S NEEDLE AND SEWING MACHINE furnishing Depot, 482 Broadway, N.Y.
Machines sent to any address..... $5
..... $24

A Splendid Holiday or Bridal Present.

HARPER'S Illuminated and Pictorial BIBLE.

Including the Apocrypha. Superbly embellished by over Sixteen Hundred Illustrations, exquisitely engraved by Adams after Designs by Chapman, exclusive of a Series of Rich Illuminations in Colors, comprising Frontispieces, Presentation Plate, Family Record, Title-pages, &c., the whole forming a sumptuous and Rich Vol'e.

PRICES.—Morocco, gilt edges, bevelled and panel'd sides, $20 00; Morocco, antique, gilt edges, $18 00; Calf, marbled edges, blank stamped, $18 00; Full Roan, marbled edges, $12 00.

Harper's Pictorial Bible is printed from the standard copy of the American Bible Society, and contains Marginal References, the Apocrypha, a Concordance Chronological Table, Table of Weights, Measures, &c. The large Frontispieces, Titles to the Old and New Testaments, Family Record, Presentation Plate, Historical Illustrations, and Initial Letters to the Books, Chapters, Commencement of Psalms, are from original designs, made expressly for this edition, by J. G. Chapman, N. A. The Family Bible is illustrated in which there are numerous large Engravings, from designs by distinguished Artists, intended to illustrate the Scripture text which a full Index is given.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers, New York.

For sale by A. WILLIAMS & CO., Boston; SMITH, ENGLISH & CO., Philadelphia; MILLER, ORTON & MULLIGAN, Auburn; PEASE TAYLOR, Washington; ROBERT CLARKE & CO., Cincinnati; DERBY, MILLER & DERBY, St. Louis; J. CLEMAN & CO., Chicago; DAWSON & BROTHERS, Montreal.

Beautiful Gift-Books
FOR THE HOLIDAYS.

LOSSING'S FIELD-BOOK OF THE REVOLUTION. Pictorial Field-Book of the Revolution; or, Illustrations by Pen and Pencil of Men, Places, Biography, Scenery, Relics, and Traditions of the War for Independence. By BENSON J. LOSSING. Over 1000 Illustrations. 2 vols. 8vo, Cloth, $10 00; Sheep, $11 25; Half Calf, $12 50; Morocco, gilt edges, $18 00.

THE LAND AND THE BOOK; or, Biblical Illustrations drawn from the Manners and Customs, the Scenes and the Scenery of the Holy Land. By W. M. THOMSON, D.D., Thirteen Years a Missionary of the A.B.C.F.M. in Syria and Palestine. With Two elaborate Maps of Palestine, an accurate Plan of Jerusalem, and several Hundred Engravings, representing the Scenery, Topography, and Productions of the Holy Land, and the Customs, Manners, and Habits of the People. Two elegant Large 12mo Volumes, Cloth, $4 00; Half Calf, $6 00; Half Morocco, $6 50.

MR. WIND AND MADAM RAIN. By LOUIS DE MURSIER. Translated, with Permission of the Author, by JOHN ALBERTSON. Beautifully Illustrated by GUSTAVE RENOUTE. Square 4to, Cloth.

CHILDREN'S PICTURE-BOOKS. Square 4to, about 300 pages each, beautifully printed on tinted paper, and illustrated with many Engravings. In Cloth gilt, $1 50 a volume; or, the Series complete in neat box, $6 00.

THE CHILDREN'S BIBLE with Sixty-One Engravings by Eighty Engravings, from Designs by Harvey, Overbeck, Weir, Schmolz, &c.

THE CHILDREN'S PRAYER-BOOK, containing the Morning and Evening Prayer, with Sixty Illustrations by Harvey and Weir.

THE CHILDREN'S PSALTER. With Sixty Illustrations by Harvey and Weir.

THE CHILDREN'S PROVERBS. With Sixty Illustrations by Harvey and Weir.

THE POETS OF THE NINETEENTH CENTURY. Selected and Edited by the Rev. ROBERT ARIS WILLMOTT. With English and American Additions, arranged by EVERT A. DUYCKINCK. Edition of "Victorian and American Literature." Illustrated with 120 Engravings drawn by American and English Artists, including Birket Foster, W. Harvey, Harrison Weir, J. E. Millais, H. Melville, W. Mulready, C. Stanfield, J. Gilbert, F. R. Pickersgill, J. Tenniel, T. Dalziel, J. H. Hill, J. W. Archer, G. Thomas, and Whymper, and elegantly modified to form, printed on Superfine Tinted Paper, richly bound in extra Cloth beveled, gilt edges, $4 00; Full Turkey Morocco, $8 00.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

Sent by mail, postage-free, on receipt of price.

Commencement of the Twenty-Eighth Volume.

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE
For December, 1863.

TERMS.

One Copy for one Year	$3 00
Two Copies for One Year	5 00

An Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of Five Subscribers, at $3 00 each, or 11 Copies for $35 00.
HARPER & BROTHERS will receive Subscriptions, together, one year, $5 00.
HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

Circulation over 100,000.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
Single Copies Five Cents.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year	$3 00
Two Copies for One Year	5 00

And an extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of TEN SUBSCRIBERS, at $2 50 each, or 11 Copies for $25.
Postage to Subscribers in the United States, Free of Charge, and One Dollar per Year for outside Advertisements.
HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

ANOTHER "STRIKE."

GRANDMA. "Well, Father; I wish you would give us your advice! CLARA and GEORGE have tried every thing—but Children say they positively will not go to school till their pocket-money is raised to FIVE CENTS a day."

FISK & HATCH.

Bankers and Dealers in Government Securities,

AND

AGENTS FOR THE UNITED STATES FIVE-TWENTY LOAN,

No. 38 Wall Street, New York.

FOR

Holiday Presents,

SEE

J. H. Winslow & Co.'s

Advertisement on page 815.

HOLIDAY GOODS.

Schuyler, Hartley & Graham,

19 Maiden Lane AND 22 John Street,

81 Rue du Chateau d'Eau, Paris, Sands St., Birmingham, England.

French and English Fancy Goods.

PORCELAIN VASES. MANTEL ORNAMENTS. MARBLE CLOCKS. BRONZES. CLOCK REGULATORS. PHOTOGRAPH ALBUMS. CHESS AND DRESSING CASES. CARVED WOOD WORK-BOXES. ARTISTS CASES. OPERA GLASSES. FANS. LEATHER GOODS. ALSO JET AND CORAL JEWELLERY. DIAMONDS, WATCHES, &c.

MILITARY GOODS—GUNS—PISTOLS—CUTLERY, &c.

FINE ENGLISH SKATES.

THE BOWEN MICROSCOPE.

Magnifying small objects 500 times. MAILED FREE everywhere for 50 CENTS. Five of different powers for $1 00. Address F. C. BOWEN, Box 220, Boston, Mass.

FURS.

C. G. GUNTHER & SONS.

FUR WAREHOUSE.

45 Maiden Lane New York.

Importers Manufacturers and Shippers of Raw Furs and Skins.

Invite attention to the extensive Assortment of Ladies' Furs now on hand.

NATIONAL BATTLE PIN.

McClellan, Grant, Hooker, Rosecrans, Banks, Meade, Gillmore, Burnside, Hooker, Franklin, and Sigel. All are the same pattern as the cut, only a little larger. The battle-ground and date are on the reverse. Each likeness is taken from life, and from its size and finish is fine gold. By enclosing $1, a sample will be sent by mail, securely sealed in one of the army. The undersigned has the exclusive right of manufacture, and the inventor of this beautiful keepsake and record of gallant acts.

LUCIUS PHILLIP, 179 Broadway, N. Y.

Metallic Artificial Legs.

Made of Corrugated Brass or other Metals.

Patented Jan. 6th, 1863, by the Universal Joint and Artificial Limb Co.

Weight only Four Pounds.

Soldiers' price, $80 ; civilian's, $75. Send for a Circular. J. W. WESTON, Agt., 691 Broadway, N. Y.

A GOLD OR SILVER WATCH

And a Gold Chain Free.

NEW STATIONERY IN 32D2 PACKETS for the Holidays. New and Special Inducements to Agents. Sold for cent. New Circular.

G. S. HASKINS & CO., 28 Beekman Street, N. Y.

A Household Word.—Buy your Housekeeping Articles of HOUSEKEEPERS, a Copper Emblem New York

A Bad Breath.—The Greatest Curse the human family is heir to. How many lovers it has separated—how many friends forever parted. The subject is so delicate, your nearest friend will not mention it, and you are ignorant of the fact. To effect a radical cure, use the "BALM OF THOUSAND FLOWERS" as a dentifrice night and morning. It also beautifies the complexion, removing all tan, pimples, and freckles, leaving the skin soft and white. Price 50 cents. For sale by all druggists.

The Trade supplied by HOWARD, SANGER & CO., 165 and 167 Chambers Street, N. Y., and for sale by all Druggists.

Davis Collamore & Co.,

479 Broadway, below Broome Street.

Are now Opening HOLIDAY GOODS in great VARIETY and of very beautiful styles.

ALSO DRESSING, TEA, AND TOILET SETS. GLASS WARE, ENGRAVED WITH CREST OR INITIAL.

BLUE CANTON COPPER URNS, &c., &c.

CHICKEN EGG DISHES.

The Soldier's Gift

To the Loved One at Home.

We will deliver Free of freight charge, at any Express Office East of St. Joseph, Mo., any of our beautiful Albums of the size of 35 or more, that may be ordered by members of the Army of the United States or Navies and Presents to friends at home. We manufacture elegant styles at all prices to $25, and higher.

E. & H. T. ANTHONY,

Manufacturers and Importers,

501 Broadway, N. Y.

Learn to Skate in One Hour by using The American Parlor Or Floor Skate.

Hard Rubber Rollers, Anti-friction Axles.

Frederick Stevens,

215 Pearl Street, New York.

628 Kilby Street, Boston.

Musical Boxes,

Playing 1, 2, 3, 4, 6, 8, 10, 12, 16, 24, and 30 tunes, and cost only $7. A Solid Silver one as above, $7. Specially adapted to the ARMY. H. E. BONTON & CO., 58 & 60 John Street, N. Y.

Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper, of Aug. 22, says: "Messrs. BONTON & CO. have received the first consignments of this kind that have arrived in a state—cheapness and reliability. Being a branch of the old established and well known jewelry house, there will be greater punctuality in all the affairs of life."

STEINWAY & SONS'

GOLD MEDAL GRAND AND SQUARE PIANOS are now considered the best in Europe, as well as this country, having received the first Prize Medal at the World's Exhibition in London, 1862.

The principal reason why the Steinway Pianos are superior to all others is, that the firm is composed of five practical pianoforte makers (father and four sons), who devote all their energies to improvements, and under whose personal supervision every part of the instrument is manufactured. Warerooms, Nos 82 & 84 Walker Street, N. Y.

$35 WATCHES. $35

Genuine Full-Jeweled American Lever Watches, in 4 Ounce Coin Silver Hunting Cases, Gold Joints, for $35.

Also every variety of good Watches at equally low rates. All orders from the Army must be prepaid, as the Express Companies will not take bills for collection on delivery.

J. L. FERGUSON, Importer of Watches, 208 Broadway, New York.

$15 Per Day Easy $15

And a Watch Free.

Employment for everybody, male and female. 100,000 men, women, and children wanted to act as our Agents in every Town and Village throughout the U. S. to sell our immensely popular, successful, and saleable extra large size FREE STATIONERY, RECIPES, and YANKEE NOTION PACKAGES, containing fine Writing Materials, such as Paper, Pens, Pencils, Envelopes, Blotters, Beautiful Initiators, Ladies' Fashion Plates, Designs for Needlework, Cottage Keepsakes, Household Conveniences, Comp Comprehensive Soldiers', Parlor and Amusements, Letter Writer's Guide, Medical Preparations, Money Ways to Get Rich, Likenesses of Military Heroes, Union Designs, Great Pocket Calendars for 1863, YANKEE NOTIONS of all kinds, rich and costly Presents of Fashionable Jewelry, Rare Recipes, Games, Army Advice, &c., &c., &c., the whole worth, if bought separately, many dollars. Price each Package ONLY 25 cents retail. Wholesale rate to Agents very low, from 100 to 200 per cent. profit allowed. Our Packages stand same as ever, alone, and above the competition, and have long since achieved the title of the leading and only real valuable and standard Articles of the kind now manufactured. Full and explicit descriptions put up by the 1000 for orders. Full directions all parts of the country. Goods sent by EXPRESS, C. O. D. to all parts of the army South and Southwest. A SPLENDID GOLD SILVER WATCH, warranted MOVEMENTS, and correct timepiece, with a chain free to each person who acts as our agent. Send for our new Circulars, containing Extra Premium Inducements, free. S. C. HICKADS & CO., 102 NASSAU ST., N. Y. The Great Original, Largest, and Oldest Price Package House in the World.

EVERY SUFFERER should supply himself with a remedy to counteract, all the ills, diseases, scratches, and bruises that is to be subjected to on his tour some numbers, and unluckily some more than others. Davis' Pain Killer is the remedy sold by all dealers in medicines.

For Holiday Presents

Be sure and read R. T. HAYWARD'S Notice on page 814.

FINE DRESS SHIRTS TO ORDER. UNRIVALLED In Manufacture, Fitting, and Material. At UNION ADAMS, No. 637 Broadway.

Remington's

ARMY AND NAVY REVOLVER.

Approved by the Government.

Warranted superior to any other Pistol of the kind. Also Pocket and Belt Revolvers. Sold by the Trade generally.

E. REMINGTON & SONS,

Ilion N.Y.

ROMAN SCARFS SENT BY MAIL EVERYWHERE

3.000 dozen pure Roman Scarfs.

Made from the Purest and Softest Silk.

These are the most fashionable, elegant, and economical Scarfs ever imported, as they are reversible; one Scarf will do for two ways.

They are much worn in Europe by both ladies and gentlemen. Can be worn with either pin or ring.

The whole lot will be retailed by mail at PRICES!

$1 50 AND $2 EACH.

Sent to any part of the U. S. by mail on receipt of the cash, and six cents for postage.

Very fine Gold Plated Scarf Pins or Rings

$1 00 each.

S. W. H. WARD, No. 387 Broadway, New York.

STEEL COLLARS

ENAMELLED WHITE.

Having the appearance and comfort of linen, have been in use during the past few years in preference to any other collar, as they are readily cleaned in one minute with a sponge.

To Military Men and Travelers they are invaluable.

Sent to any part of the U. S. by mail, post paid, on receipt of $1 25.

WHOLESALE AND RETAIL.

AGENTS WANTED in every Town in the Union.

S. W. H. WARD, Sole Agent for U. S., 387 B'way, N. Y.

FRENCH FLANNEL

SHIRTS AND EXHIBITERS.

the largest assortment in New York. $9 75, $8, $8 75 each; all cut one very full.

A fit warranted or sent by mail on receipt of the cost. The cost of postage on shirts, 24 cents each. Directions for self-measurement sent free.

Also a large assortment of UNDERSHIRTS AND DRAWERS, $2, $2 25, and $2 50. SCOTCH LAMBS WOOL UNDERSHIRTS AND DRAWERS. ALSO, FINE WHITE SHIRTS MADE TO MEASURE AT $24, $30, $36, AND $42 PER DOZEN.

Self-Measurement for Shirts.

Printed directions for self-measurement, list of prices, and drawings of different styles of shirts and collars sent free everywhere.

The cash can be paid to Express company on receipt of goods.

S. W. H. WARD,

No. 387 Broadway, New York.

PRESENTATION

SWORDS

Military and Masonic Goods.

Emerson & Silver,

Office No. 447 Broome Street, second door west of Broadway, N. Y., Factory, Trenton, N. J.

Manufacturers of rich presentation and Masonic regulation swords, fine spurs, belts, jewels, flags, banners, &c., at which our facilities are unsurpassed. We make every part within our own establishment, and are constantly getting up new and unique designs.

OVER 30,000 SWORDS made for United States Government since the War.

Agents Wanted.

To sell the most interesting and popular BOOK on the War yet published. "GENERAL BUTLER IN NEW ORLEANS: A Full Account of the Capture of New Orleans, and Gen. Butler's Administration There," with much other interesting matter. By JAMES PARTON, author of those most interesting of American Biographies, "Life of Andrew Jackson," "Life of Aaron Burr," &c., &c. Everybody wants to read Mr. Parton's new book. Agents can do finely with it. Retail price $2. Apply to the Publishers.

MASON BROTHERS, Nos. 5 and 7 Mercer St., N. Y.

Fogg's Double-Action Patent Lever

SKATE BUCKLE,

Manufactured and for sale on Straps, at wholesale, by F. STEVENS, Manufacturer of Skates, Straps, and Leather Goods, 310 Pearl St., New York, 63 Kilby St., Boston.

BILLIARD BALLS.

Patent compressed Ivory Billiard Balls, 2¼ and 2⅜ in., $10 per set. 2⅝ in. Bagnelles, $8 per set. 1¾ in. Bagnelles, $6 per set. 19 Dail Pool, $30 set. THOS. W. H. WELLING, 577 Centre St., New York, sign of the Golden Elephant

GOLD PENS AND CASES.

Retailed at wholesale prices. 14 ct. Gold Pen, Gold Silver case, $1 50, warranted for one year, guarantee accompanying each Pen. Send for a circular. Pens repointed on receipt of 50 cents.

E. S. JOHNSON, 15 Maiden Lane, N. Y.

MUNN & CO.,

Solicitors of American and Foreign Patents,

And Publishers of the ILLUSTRATED SCIENTIFIC AMERICAN, 37 Park Row, N. Y. Pamphlets of Information concerning Patents, free. Specimens of the Paper, free.

PREPARE FOR THE HOLIDAYS.

There is no Gift or Present, which combines so much Utility and Beauty as Mounted Objects. As a source of amusement and instruction they are unequaled. This Microscope will be mailed, postage paid, for $2 50, or with 3 lenses and mounted objects, for $3; or with 24 objects, for $5.

HENRY CRAIG,

205 Broadway, New York.

A liberal discount to the trade.

The only enameled "Turn-over" Collar made in metal. Send $1 for a "Turn-over" or 75 cents for a "Stand-er." Do Not Buy, and receive it by return mail. American enameled Metallic Collar Co. 34 Union Sq., N. Y.

AGENTS WANTED — 93 positively made from 59 cts.; urgently needed by every person. Call and examine, or an sample sent free by mail for 60 cts. retail. 78 Nassau St., WOLCOTT, 179 Chatham Square, N. Y.

HOLIDAY GIFTS

For Ladies.

Prang's Album Pictures, in Oil Colors, ought to grace the Photograph Album of every Lady. 100 subjects, such as

Autumn Leaves, Flowers,

Fruits, Birds-Eggs,

Views on the Hudson and of Central Park, &c., &c., are now ready.

For Children.

Little Red Riding Hood, the prettiest, most original book published this season. In the shape of a paper doll, and gives the old tale of Little Red Riding Hood in verses, with 36 Illustrations in Oil Colors.

For sale at all Booksellers.

Published by

L. PRANG & CO.,

Boston, Mass.

Beware the Northeaster.

Totally exclude Wind, Rain, Snow, and Dust from the most exposed doors and windows, without the sacrificing of the free use of the same for ventilating purposes. They take up but little room, keep the rattling of the sashes, and are deadeners of sound from the street or otherwise. For circulars with references to thousands of our most respectable citizens, address, THE PATENT METALLIC WEATHER STRIP COMPANY, 544 Broadway, corner Bleecker Street, over the Manhattan Savings Bank.

LOCAL AGENTS WANTED EVERYWHERE.

IVORY SLEEVE BUTTONS

Engraved with initials, The, per pair, sent free on receipt of the price. Pearl, $1 50 per set each. WM. M. WELLING, manufacturer of fancy goods, 577 Centre St., N. Y., sign of the Golden Elephant.

The Best Writers in America

Contribute each month to the

Atlantic Monthly

Subscription Price Three Dollars per year. 1600 pages of literature, reading which Americans look on figuratively. A liberal reduction to Clubs. Send Four Cents for Specimen number, or ten times postage stamps for Bound Volume. TICKNOR & FIELDS, Boston.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. VII.—No. 365.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 26, 1863. [SINGLE COPIES SIX CENTS. $3.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1863, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

HON. SCHUYLER COLFAX,

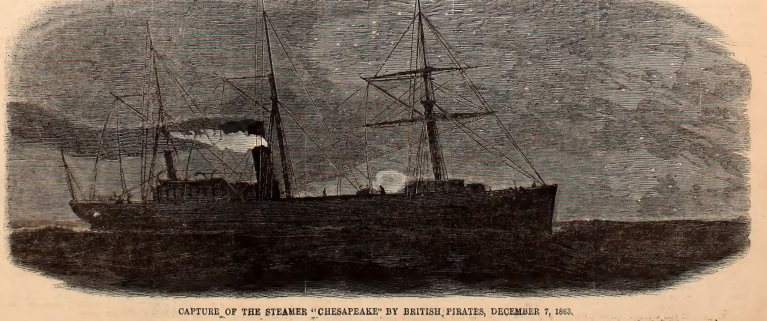
THE NEW SPEAKER.

We give on this page a Portrait, from a photograph by Brady, of the Hon. SCHUYLER COLFAX, who has just been elected Speaker of the House of Representatives. Mr. COLFAX was born in New York City on the 23d of March, 1823, and is descended from General SCHUYLER and Captain COLFAX, both of whom fought in the Revolution. At thirteen years of age he removed to Indiana, where he soon began life as a printer, in which humble capacity he rose to a position of influence and honor. About twenty years ago he became the proprietor of The South Bend Register, and as a necessity of his position became connected with the politics of his State. His political connection was with the Whig party, so long as it retained its organization, after which he became an earnest Republican.

Mr. COLFAX has now been a member of Congress for nearly ten years. He was elected Representative from Indiana in 1854, and has held the office ever since. In the thirty-fifth Congress he was chosen Chairman of the Committee on Post-offices and Post Roads, and for one or two years past he has been one of the Regents of the Smithsonian Institute.

In his personal appearance he is a little below the medium height, has dark eyes and hair, and a large forehead. He is a fluent speaker, distinct in his utterance, and impressive. He is very bland and courteous in demeanor, and kind and affable in all his social relations. On the 7th of December, 1863, he was elected Speaker of the House. Although the position was never of greater moment than in the present session, yet only a single ballot was cast, the result of which was the election of Mr. COLFAX by a vote of 101 to 81. This decided vote settles at once all doubt as to the firm purpose of the House to support the Administration.

HON. SCHUYLER COLFAX, THE NEW SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]



CAPTURE OF THE STEAMER "CHESAPEAKE."

ON Wednesday, December 9, H. B. Cromwell & Co., of this city, received a telegraphic dispatch from the Mayor of Portland stating that the steamer Chesapeake, owned by them, had been captured twenty miles northeast-by-east from Cape Cod, at half past one o'clock, Monday morning, by British pirates, who had started from New York as passengers. The Chesapeake, of which we publish a sketch on this page, was on her way to Portland, Maine.

From statements made by Captain Willett, who commanded the steamer, we learn that the piratical party consisted of fifteen persons, headed by a Mr. Osborne, a court jester from St. John, New Brunswick. The whole party concerned in the perpetration of this daring outrage—an outrage which did not stop short of cold-blooded murder—was made up of British subjects, residents of St. John and Carleton, New Brunswick. The seizure took place in the following manner:

The Captain had retired for the night. The second engineer (Owen Shaffer) had charge of the engine, and the chief mate (Charles Johnson) held the watch. At a quarter past one the pirates were up and doing. The first notification of their presence was given in the deliberate and unnecessary murder of Shaffer, who had just returned from oiling the engine when he received a mortal wound in the neck. Johnson, the mate, was going to the pantry, and witnessed the deed. On his way to the captain's room he was himself fired at, and received two wounds, one in the arm and another in the knee. He succeeded in arousing the captain, who, soon after his arrival on deck, was put in irons, having been fired at fifteen or twenty times, but, strange to say, without injury. The chief engineer (James Johnson) also was wounded. In all these cases of firing at the officers of the Chesapeake there was no attempt at parley, no warning of any sort; the pirates were sheer onwards. The officers being all secured—one of them killed, two wounded, and the others put in irons—the helmsman and third engineer alone being left at their posts, Osborne took charge of the vessel, and all was quiet again. After the seizure the prisoners were treated with great consideration, and the bona fide passengers, five in number, were left at their liberty, on condition of their non-interference. These five passengers were all old sea-captains. All the ordinary operations usual on shipboard went on as usual until Tuesday morning, when the vessel was brought to anchor in Seal Harbor, off the island of Grand Manan. Thence she was brought up the bay toward St. John, having received on board a new captain, viz., John Parker, of the privateer Retribution. At Dipper Harbor, twelve miles from St. John, the captives were allowed just ten minutes to transfer themselves and their baggage to the pilot-boat, which was towed up to within seven miles of St. John by the Chesapeake, when the latter cast off low and returned down the bay, picking up on the way a schooner supposed to have had guns, ammunition, coal, etc., on board for the new pirate.

These pirates gave Captain Willett a copy of "Orders from the Confederate Government," which is without official seal—a mere fabrication, which will not save the rogues from hanging if they are caught. Similar plots, it is believed, have been formed against other vessels. The Chesapeake was built in 1852, by J. A. Westervelt, and is 450 tons burden.

CAPTURE OF THE STEAMER "CHESAPEAKE" BY BRITISH PIRATES, DECEMBER 7, 1863.

CHRISTMAS, 1863.

Is the first grand days of the prophets
God stood with His armèd men;
In the last grand days of the Christians
He standeth with them again.

His presence then won the battle
That was for the Christ to be;
And His presence now is conquest
For the Christ that made men free.

And the early strife was holy,
By the peace it ushered in;
And the later is God's command ment,
By the peace it hath to win.

For the peace of Christ hath millions
Accepted the battle trust;
And yet, till His peace is perfect,
Shall war for the right be just:

War for the right unshaken,
To partake not of a sin;
War with its outward horrors,
And the heavenly peace within.

The right is the peace eternal:—
And thus is this Christmas morn
Rich in that day's fruition
When she Prince of Peace was born.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 26, 1863.

THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

THE Message of this year is the most important document ever submitted by the Executive to Congress and the country. Elsewhere in our columns we give an abstract of its important points, and in the President's own words, because a concise and clear statement is not possible. There has been occasionally some sharp criticism of his "style," but there are few state papers more direct and incisive than his. He knows exactly what he means to say, and says exactly how to say it. And when his Messages and letters are compared with those of our Chief Magistrate for every year, the true American ring, their manly faith in human rights and the people, are as unprecedented as they are inspiring.

The President's plan of reconstruction is familiar to all our readers. It is simple and radical; it is also inevitable. For either the rebels must be left to overcome when the Union lays their arms and rush back to the Union to secure political power, or they must understand that their chiefs can be excepted from pardon, and that the system for which they took up arms having ceased legally to exist, all hope of its restoration must be abandoned. The former is the Copperhead plan. It proposes that whenever a rebel chooses to say that he returns to his allegiance he may resume all his political rights. The President's plan proposes that he shall resume his political rights, not when he says that he is sorry, but when he says that he is sorry in such a manner that he can reasonably be believed.

That something more than an oath to the Constitution is necessary to secure the peace of the Union is clear enough from the fact that Jefferson Davis himself does not allow that he has violated his oath. In his view secession is consistent with the Constitution. Resistance to coercion is not, according to him and the State Rights school, rebellion. Simple repetition of such an oath, therefore, would be merely the first step to another conspiracy, because it leaves the object of the conspiracy untouched. Now the paramount duty of the Government is not merely to punish, but to prevent rebellion. But it is clear that when the rebel guns are silenced the Union is not necessarily restored. The initiation of political action in the States which rebellion will leave sullen and passive must proceed from the National Government. And how more simply and wisely than as the Message suggests?

The President has been often accused of tardily following instead of leading public opinion. But it is his great merit that he exactly saw this to be a war in which the people must save themselves. If they were unequal to the task, a popular government was a failure. And therefore he has sought only to be the executive magistrate of their will, which he has divined with more sagacity than any public man in our history. It is that sagacity which now admonishes him to put into clear and simple form the settlement to which the national common-sense irresistibly tends. He has done it. Not as an advocate, or partisan, or fanatic, but with the sane wisdom and passionless equity which has marked his official career from the moment he commended himself to the prayers of his old friends and neighbors at Springfield, and set forth to undertake as vast a duty as was ever committed to man.

THE REBEL MESSAGE.

As the Message of the President of the United States is evidently a simple appeal to the intelligence of a great free people, so that of Jefferson Davis is an elaborate effort at imposition upon a mass of ignorant and deluded followers, whom he and the other rebel chiefs have always controlled, first by keeping them ignorant, and then by inflaming their passions. Had these men ever allowed the truth to be spoken in the Slave States, had they not always nullified the cardinal provision of the Constitution protecting the freedom of speech, they could never have "organized" the Southern people into rebellion. The leaders hold their victims now as they always held them, by means of ignorance maintained by terror.

The Message of Davis is the last word of haughty desperation. Many of its statements are plainly false; and its reasoning manifestly feeble, as when he speaks of the United States as a power which might end the war by division. Pray, where and what are the United States after disunion? The baffled conspirator shakes his impotent fist at Great Britain because it would not directly help to found a nation devoted to slavery upon the ruins of a friendly ally loving liberty. He fawns upon France in saying that if the people of Mexico choose to change their form of government it is a right which we (the rebels) have exercised and can not deny to another people. It is well said, for the people of Mexico have been heard upon the question of the Empire in the same way that the Southern people were heard upon that of the Confederacy. The rebel chief finds the most gloomy reverses of the rebellion "inexplicable." The currency of the Confederacy, he says, is three times too large for its business, and the glimpses he gives of the bankruptcy of part of the rebel States are enough to occasion still more "inexplicable" disasters. As he approaches the end of his discourse all the rancor of his hate breaks forth in denunciation of abuse of our generals and of our conduct of the war; and with pitiful inconsequence this defeated traitor, defeated and further utterly by has been beaten in the field, and how hollow are all his resources and hopes for the future, complains that the Government he has defied will not concede him to be victorious!

The judgment of the world can not mistake the significance of this Message. It is not the strain of a man who "has founded a nation," it is the fierce cry of rage and despair.

A NEW BUREAU.

Now that the policy of the Government is matured settled, it is clear that one of the chief questions of the immediate future will be the care of the freedmen. In ordinary times, when emancipation is enforced by law, as in the case of the British colonies, and especially in those, as the rage and pride of the planters prevent a fair trial of the experiment. They refuse to treat honestly as a laborer those whom they have been used to drive as cattle, and the inevitable consequence is that the great plantations fall into ruin, and the laborers take to the bush. Nothing is surer than that if the planters of Jamaica had been as equal to the new condition introduced by emancipation as the slaves were, the prosperity of the island would never have been disturbed.

The condition of our emancipated slaves is such as to require that most faithful and intelligent care. The operation of the act is to attract them to our lines. They come in groups of utterly destitute men, women, and children. The most unfortunate of these human beings, they yet do not find corresponding sympathy. Even the Government which has freed them, and which invites them to enlist as soldiers, does not treat them honorably, and pays them not the wages of the white soldiers, with whom they bravely fight and share the peril. They are left often a month allowed by the law for the general employment of contrabands. Homeless, almost friendless, utterly destitute and dependent, this rapidly-increasing class of our population demand a peculiar care. It is idle to say that no particular class of persons can be provided for, but they must all take their chance, because to recognize that common-sense is the basis of statesmanship when we establish a Bureau of Indian Affairs and a Department of Agriculture. Indians and farmers are the two classes directly interested; but does any body quarrel with the bureaus for such reasons?

The sagacity of the President will undoubtedly lead him to make some proposition to Congress for establishing a Bureau of Freedmen, charged with the care of this exceptional class. Davis says in his Message, with a sly leer at Europe, "By the Northern man, on whose ignorant prejudices he kindly restraining influence is exercised, they [the negroes] are treated with aversion and neglect." But the reluctance to handle the subject, and the prejudice against the word Abolitionism, the dull slang about "one idea," must give way to plain practical common-sense, or the country will be dishonored.

MERRY CHRISTMAS.

OUGHT it not to be a merry Christmas? Even with all the sorrow that hangs, and will forever hang, over so many households; even while the war still rages, even while these various questions yet to be settled—ought it not to be, and is it not, a merry Christmas?

How well the time has seized the spirit of the great festival in the elaborate and beautiful picture which we publish this week! The central scene is the home of the soldier and his Christmas welcome from wife and darlings, for just that is the central scene of our American holidays this year. It is the soldier who has saved us our homes and filled our holidays with joy. It is the soldier who is lifting the dark winter-cloud beyond which smiles the bright spring of national regeneration. It is the soldier who is securing the peace that will make the life of children sleeping together in the crib, and over whom the dear old bear, Santa Claus, is bending, a long and happy holiday.

Next year let us hope that the delicate, and thoughtful, and forcible pencil of our friend Nast may draw a picture of the National reunion, of the return of the prodigal who has been living on husks and with harlots, the rebel soldier returning to his country and his fellowmen, the soldier who does not know that in fighting the brave man whom we see in the picture of to-day, he was fighting his true friend, as well as honor and liberty. Peace on earth is the Christmas benediction. Blessed then the brave men upon the Rio Grande, in Louisiana, along the Mississippi, in the mountains of Chattanooga, in the Valley of Knoxville, upon the Potomac and the Rappahannock, and the James River; among the North Carolina barrens and the South Carolina Islands, with the great army of sailors upon the rivers and the sea—to all, whether on sea or land, heroes of the good cause, honor and blessing: for their stout hands and hearts, with the supporting sympathy and faith of the whole people, are the peacemakers of the nation.

UNMASKING.

THE Richmond Whig says that it really looks as if the South might be overrun. On another day it declares that the rebellion can only retrieve its misfortunes by imitating the methods adopted by the Yankees in retrieving theirs; and it calls for a "self-reliant General at a great army to be put in the path of General Grant in three weeks. It says again that the rebels would be a race of cowards if they should ever suppose that the possibility of ever yielding to a foe so contemptible, so cruel, so loathed and abhorred as the Yankees, if they are the race they have believed themselves to be they will not give way to despondency, but nerve themselves for a final struggle for their last fatal sacrifices. In fact, they will die in the last ditch.

This strain of remark is a fit accompaniment to the melancholy Message of Davis. It is the unmusical whistling of boys in the grave-yard, announcing not their courage but their foreboding. In these articles, as in the Messages of Davis, there is, on the part of the rebels, the same travesty of noble sentiment and heroic resolve which, in the case of a well-organized and suffering people striving for relief are solemn and touching, but which in the merely factitious and contemptible in the months of men who deliberately undertake a bloody revolution with no other purpose than the perpetuity of slavery.

The British aristocracy has tried hard to depict these rebellious American citizens as worthy of sympathy, like the Poles or the Greeks. But the statement labored to paint them as a small band of noble gentlemen struggling for their liberties against the mob and democratic tyranny. This wretched effort has also failed. All the masks begin to fall. The rebel leaders are appearing. The conspiracy of slaveholders is at last seen to be as base and inhuman as that of St. Bartholomew's Day against the Huguenots. That too was loudly commended. Muretus called it a great victory of the true faith. And if Slavery had prevailed in this contest, as Europe did in France, the aristocracy, which fears popular rights, would have hailed it, in the spirit of Muretus, as a signal triumph of the true faith.

LITERARY.

DR. WORTHINGTON HOOKER'S "Science for the School and Family" (Harpers) is one of his clear and simple expositions, containing, as he says, only what every child ought to know. Of the singular competency of Dr. Hooker to the treatment of the subjects he selects for his text-books we have evidence in that of Miss Peabody, the experienced head of the Boston Kindergarten. She says of the "Child's Book of Nature," Dr. Hooker, that "it will be a great help to our object-teacher," and is the very best introduction of children to flowers."

It is in her "Kindergarten Guide" (T. O. H. P. Burnham), just published in Boston, that Miss Peabody speaks of Dr. Hooker. She and her sister, Mrs. Horace Mann, whose admirable "Moral Culture of Infancy" is included in the second volume, have had long and extensive experience as teachers, and the first Kindergarten upon a great and scientific basis was that of Miss Peabody. Now, as she says, they are springing up in all our cities, and the necessity of a "Guide" is apparent. The theory of the Kindergarten is simply experience and common-sense applied to the teaching of children. It requires that the most clumsy thing shall not be considered competent to the most delicate work, and that to teach so as not to make knowledge distasteable to the child and medicine demands a tenderness and thoughtfulness which are no more universal than other rare qualities. The Kindergarten interesting and fascinating to all who have little folks to teach or to be taught.

Charles Dickens's Christmas story for the year is entitled "Mrs. Lirriper's Lodgings." It tells how Mrs. L. carried on the business; how the First Floor did this, and the Side Room did that; how the Second Floor kept a dog, and the Third Floor knew the Potteries; with details of the proceedings at the Police Office and the Parlors. What Mrs. Lirriper's Lodgings were, several personages can be ascertained at the small charge of ten cents. (Published by Harper & Brothers.)

The holidays will bring no more fascinating book for boys than Henry Mayhew's "Boyhood of Martin Luther" (Harpers), and parents will not enjoy it less than the children. It is a fresh story to almost every body but scholars; for although one of the greatest of men historically, Martin Luther's life is not as familiar to boys as that of many an old Greek and Roman. Mr. Mayhew has worked with his heart as well as his head, and has made a truly delightful book, even retaining a quaint old German flavor, which is an added charm.

ARMY AND NAVY ITEMS.

GENERAL MEADE has demanded that a court of inquiry shall be held in reference to his late movements. It is said that the result of this inquiry will decide the question of his future career.

DESERTERS from the rebel lines state that a large number of soldiers in the Southern armies will take advantage of the amnesty offered in the President's Proclamation, as soon as they can become acquainted with its provisions. The Richmond Sentinel, speaking of this amnesty, regards it as a measure similar to that tried in Europe.

FURLOUGHS are at present being freely given both to the officers and men of the Army of the Potomac.

THE British schooner Maria Alberta was captured, on the 6th of November, while attempting to run the blockade into Bay Port, by the schooner Two Sisters. She had arrived from Havana for Matamoras.

JEFF DAVIS has just been denounced in the rebel Congress as the author of the late defeat at Chattanooga.

General LONGSTREET in his retreat from Knoxville lost four thousand prisoners and nearly all his cannon and trains.

The President writes a letter to General GRANT, congratulating him in the following terms:

"MAJOR-GENERAL GRANT,—Understanding that your battles at Chattanooga and Knoxville is now secure, I wish to tender you, and all under your command, my more than thanks—even my profoundest gratitude—for the skill, courage, and perseverance with which you and they, over every difficulty, have conducted the operations which God bless you all! A. LINCOLN."

The rebel General, the guerrilla, who last year was in a buggy with a female masking for DIXIE, and closely pursued by Federal detectives.

Within the last three weeks nearly three hundred men have died of wounds or disease in the Chattanooga hospitals.

Rebel guerrillas have been collecting in considerable force about the mouth of the Mississippi, and capturing at the mouth of Red River. Their purpose seems to have been to capture vessels and load with them cotton for the to reinforce General BRAGG. We very much fear that these vessels will be thrown rather late in the day.

Guerrillas also are reported as very active between Memphis and Little Rock.

The Twenty-ninth Pennsylvania Regiment has been ordered home from Fort Wool on furlough, having re-enlisted as veteran volunteers.

The next day after the United States steamer Commodore Barney left the Eastern Bar Charleston, she captured the celebrated blockade-runner Minna, which prize was one of the finest of the vessels that have run to Galveston Mouth Bar Sound.

The rumor that Bragg was out among the prisoners of war in the hands of the Confederate authorities at Belle Isle and Libby prison, is proven to be entirely without foundation, but sent a gentleman of veracity and responsibility, to make personal persons.

The orders under which the steamer Chesapeake was captured were issued from a Judge ADVOCATE GENERAL, and not from the privateer Retribution, but now, until caught, remains of the steamer Chesapeake.

Mr. CLEMENT C. BARCLAY, of Philadelphia, has gone to Washington to present to the Secretary of War a petition to visit Richmond, as a member of the Sanitary Commission, to render its services in relieving to our suffering soldiers in Libby Prison and elsewhere.

Lieutenant-Colonel HENRY S. RUSSELL, Second Massachusetts Cavalry, has resigned and left for Fresh Pond. Major-Chassells Cavalry, the first mounted colored regiment that has been raised.

Major-General LEW WALLACE is at Poughkeepsie awaiting orders.

General F. P. BLAIR, of General GRANT'S staff, has returned to Washington.

The prize steamship Jupiter, captured while trying to run the blockade from Wilmington, was sold on Wednesday at Philadelphia for twenty-nine thousand dollars.

The Corps d'Afrique, under General G. L. AGASSIZ, has been ordered from Fort Hudson to Baton Rouge last July.

The command of Matagorda Bay gives us substantially the control of Central and Western Texas, and of all the cotton which can be exported from that region.

The Indians soldiers in hospital, in and around Washington, Alexandria, Harrisburg, and Baltimore, are to be removed to Indianapolis.

The Federal force is now firmly planted in every rebel State.

The success of our arms during the last year has enabled the Government to make a reduction of over two hundred millions of dollars in the war estimates for the ensuing fiscal year.

JOSHUA C. CRESWELL, an influential citizen of Fairfax County, and the personal friend of Governor PEIRPOINT, of Virginia, has received permission from the War Department to return to his home. He was compelled during the retreat of several Union men in Castle Thunder, captured by Mosby's guerrillas in that County.

Since March 1, 1861, the naval bureau has been obliged to purchase 1,000 vessels, of which 418 vessels has been promptly furnished by the Messrs. DU PONT of Wilmington, and the Messrs. HARRIS, Brandywine Powder Mills, Powder compositor. The above mills supply the necessities of the navy of the United States, and compelled to ask no supply from a foreign market.

The rebel ram is watched, and missing in the steps of Knoxville falls short of 1600.

Admiral FARRAGUT has already made arrangements with Mr. WHITNEY, who is raising the monitor Keokuk at Charleston Harbor, also to raise the Housatonic.

The Chesapeake left Shelburne, NOVA SCOTIA, on Saturday last, with only a small amount of coals. She was supposed to be gone about for them.

The rebel Congress has passed a bill prohibiting the employment of negroes in the army.

Senator FOOTE, of Tennessee (rebel), adverting to the proclamation of amnesty, says he does not apprehend it. Richmond, admits that the poor fellows had been reduced to starvation, but the blame rests upon Secretary of the rebel Commissary.

The Louisiana Herald is advised from Richmond "that the month of December is regarded as the most trying one of the whole war, as the entire future and success of the rebellion depending in a very great measure upon the issue."

According to a dispatch received December 12th from General BANKS, the rebel authorities decline to receive any more packages or provisions for the Union prisoners, or any more money, as an explanation of this refusal, says, One of their papers, as an explanation of this refusal, says, that the entire capture of these supplies is a claim upon the part of the South.

The new gun-boat Kansas is said to be ready to sail from Boston harbors in pursuit of the Chesapeake.

The Mobile Register says that the war has been practically carried into Africa, and that, viz., the sending of negroes in the Gulf States, on account of so many slaves being driven South.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

SENATE.—December 9. Mr. Foster presented resolutions of the General Assembly of Connecticut for modifying the Enlistment Act, so that town organizations should be credited for men raised under former calls. Mr. Lane gave notice of bill indemnifying citizens of Lawrence for damages by Quantrell's raid. The President's Message was read. Joint resolutions from the House proposing thanks to General Grant received and laid over for consideration. —December 10. After transacting informal business the Senate adjourned to Monday, the 13th, to allow time to arrange the committees.—December 14. Mr. Dixon presented petition of Assessors for increase of compensation, and gave notice of bill exempting clergymen from conscription. Standing Committees were elected, the following being chosen Chairmen of the most important: Foreign Relations, Sumner; Finance, Fessenden; Commerce, Chandler; Agriculture, Sherman; Military Affairs, Wilson; Naval Affairs, Hale; Judiciary, Trumbull; Post-office, Collamer; Public Lands, Harlan; Indian Affairs, Doolittle; Pensions, Foster; Claims, Clark; District of Columbia, Grimes; Territories, Wade. Mr. Wilson introduced resolutions thanking Generals Hooker and Meade, and the Army of the Potomac, for their conduct at Gettysburg, and General Banks and his army for the capture of Port Hudson; referred to Military Committee, as was the joint resolution offering thanks and a gold medal to General Grant. Mr. Lane introduced bill striking out the $300 commutation clause in the enrollment act, and increasing the pay of soldiers. Mr. Wilson presented resolutions from the Massachusetts Legislature for an increase of pay of soldiers. Mr. Hale received unanimous permission to introduce bill for more effectually repressing the rebellion by prohibiting the holding of any person in servitude except by contract. Mr. Wilkinson introduced bill granting pensions to persons wounded in the Indian wars in Minnesota. Mr. Wilson introduced bill to increase the bounty to volunteers.—December 15. Mr. Wilson presented memorials from paymasters' clerks, hospital stewards, and inspectors of customs in Boston, asking for an increase of salary. Mr. Henderson presented a memorial relative to a new railway line between New York and Washington. Mr. Lane, of Kansas, introduced a bill to prevent speculative traffic in gold, silver, and foreign exchange. It prohibits, under penalty of a fine of not less than $1000 or more than $10,000, and imprisonment for not less than one month or more than twelve months, the sale of gold, silver, or foreign exchange by any banker or broker except at his regular place of business, and prohibits the sale of these articles unless actually delivered and paid for on delivery. Mr. Foote introduced a bill granting public lands to the People's Pacific Railroad and Telegraph Line. Mr. Sumner submitted resolutions directing the Judiciary Committee to consider the expediency of appointing commissioners to revise, simplify, correct, and arrange the public statutes of the United States; laid over. Mr. Anthony offered a resolution of thanks to General Burnside and the officers and soldiers of his army. Mr. Lane, of Indiana, introduced a bill amending the act defining conspiracies, and that for enrolling and calling out the national forces. Mr. Davis, of Kentucky, called up the resolutions relating to the exchange of prisoners, and argued against the policy of refusing to exchange white prisoners because the rebels refused to exchange negro captives. Mr. Johnson, of Maryland, replied, urging the continuance of the exchange, and that Southern prisoners equal in number to the colored prisoners in the hands of the enemy should be retained. He maintained that our colored soldiers must be protected. Mr. Davis rejoined, condemning the policy of the Administration in carrying on the war. The debate was continued by Messrs. Hale and Lane. The resolution was referred to the Military Committee. The Senate then went into executive session.

HOUSE.—December 9. Invitation of the Russian Admiral to visit his vessels accepted. Notices of the following bills presented: By Mr. Hubbard, to equalize enrollments and subdivisions of districts; by Mr. Stevens, to fix the time for election of members of Congress; to place colored soldiers on the same footing with whites in regard to pay, bounty, and pensions; to authorize the construction of the Pacific Railroad; to repeal the fugitive slave laws of 1793 and 1850; to repeal the joint resolution of July 17, 1862, explanatory of the act for suppressing the insurrection. Mr. Cox's resolution urging the President to take measures for the exchange of prisoners came up; Mr. Washburne presented a substitute approving the efforts of the Administration, and recommending their continuance; the substitute was agreed to by 94 to 73, and the resolution passed by 106 to 46. Mr. Julian gave notice of a bill to amend the fugitive slave acts so as to prevent the return of fugitives. The President's Message was received, read, and 50,000 extra copies ordered to be printed.—December 10. Mr. Pendleton gave notice of a bill to admit members of the Cabinet to the floor of the House, with the privilege of debating upon matters belonging to their departments. Rev. W. H. Channing was elected chaplain, receiving 86 votes to 55 given for Bishop Hopkins. The House adjourned to Monday, the 14th.—December 14. The Speaker announced the Standing Committees, the following being the Chairmen of the principal ones: Elections, Dawes; Ways and Means, Stevens; Claims, Hale; Commerce, Washburne; Public Lands, Julian; Post-office, Alley; District of Columbia, Lovejoy; Judiciary, Wilson; Manufactures, Moorhead; Agriculture, Clay; Military Affairs, Schenck; Naval Affairs, Rice; Foreign Affairs, Davis, of Maryland; Territories, Ashley; Expenditures of War Department, Deming; Expenditures of Navy Department, Baxter. Mr. Fernando Wood introduced a resolution reciting that the President had declared that the Union cause had gained important advantages, and that we could now "offer to the insurgents an opportunity to return to the Union without imposing upon them degrading or destructive conditions; therefore Resolved, that the President be requested to appoint three Commissioners who shall be empowered to open negotiations with the authorities at Richmond to the end that this bloody, destructive, and inhuman war shall cease, and the Union be restored upon terms of equity, fraternity, and equality under the Constitution." The resolution was laid on the table by a vote of 98 to 59. The Committee on Military Affairs was instructed to inquire into the expediency of increasing the pay of privates in the army to $25 per month, and increasing the pay of officers and musicians 40 per cent; and also to inquire into the expediency of paying for losses of property occasioned by Morgan's raid into Ohio and Indiana. The Committee on Agriculture was instructed to report on the expediency of establishing an Emigrant Bureau, in connection with the Department of the Interior. A joint resolution was passed directing the Secretary of the Treasury to furnish semi-monthly to Congress a statement of receipts and disbursements, the other Secretaries to furnish him with a weekly statement of their disbursements. Mr. Julian's resolution directing the Judiciary Committee to report a bill repealing and modifying sections of the fugitive slave laws, was laid on the table by a vote of 82 to 74.—Resolutions to the following effect were presented; but debate arising, they were laid over under the rules: By Mr. Wadsworth, that the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited to the States, are reserved to the States or to the people, and that the Executive can not interfere with their exercise by the people; by Mr. Cox, that the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to the House the report of General M'Clellan concerning his operations as Commander-in-Chief, and Commander of the Army of the Potomac; by Mr. Harding, that whenever rebellion in any State has been put down, such State shall be restored to all its rights including that of regulating its domestic institutions, free from all Congressional or Executive control or dictation; by Mr. Finch, that the Federal Government has power to use the army and navy to put down resistance to the authority of the United States, but not to reduce the States to the condition of Territories; and that the war should not be waged to overthrow the institutions of any of the States, but only to maintain the Constitution and preserve the Union and the rights of the States, and that when these objects are attained the war ought to cease. Mr. Holman offered a series of resolutions to the effect that the doctrine that insurrectionary States should be reduced to the condition of Territories, and governed by the will of Congress or the Executive, is wrong; that the war ought to be waged only to put down the armed insurrection; not to interfere with the rights of the States; that when the people of these States submit to the Constitution they should be restored to all their rights; and that Congress should make all necessary appropriations to carry on the war in order that "through a vigorous prosecution of the war peace on the basis of the Union of the States and the supremacy of the Constitution may be most speedily obtained." These resolutions were laid on the table by a vote of 82 to 74. Mr. Lovejoy offered a resolution instructing the Committee on the Judiciary to inquire into the expediency of placing into any bills which they may report a provision putting all soldiers without distinction of color upon the same footing as to pay. Mr. Cox moved to lay the resolution on the table, but the motion was not agreed to, and the resolution passed. On motion of Mr. Arnold a resolution was passed instructing the Committee on Commerce to inquire into the operation of the Reciprocity Treaty with the British Provinces, and to suggest any alterations which may make it more beneficial to both parties.—December 15. A message was received from the President, recommending a vote of thanks to Captain John Rogers, the captor of the ram Fingal, this preliminary being required by law in order that he may be raised to a higher rank in the navy. Mr. Stevens introduced a resolution referring the different portions of the President's Message to proper Committees—that relating to the condition of the rebellious States to a select Committee of nine. Mr. Davis of Maryland offered a substitute that the portion which relates to the duty of the United States to guarantee a republican form of government to the States be referred to a select Committee of nine, who should draw up the necessary bill. Mr. Brooks of New York was opposed to any instructions being given to the Committee; but if such were given, he would be disposed to add that they should inquire also "whether republican government has not been abrogated and overthrown in the North as well as the South since the revolution began." Mr. Davis's substitute was adopted by a vote of 89 to 80, and the remainder of Mr. Stevens's resolutions were adopted. On motion of Mr. Cox, it was resolved that seven additional committees be appointed to examine into and report upon the accounts and expenditures of the different Departments, these committees to have all the powers of Committees of Investigation. Mr. Cox's resolution calling for the Report of General M'Clellan was adopted.

THE MESSAGE.

The President's Message and the Reports from the Heads of the Departments give the main events in the history of the year. We present the leading points:

Foreign Relations.

We remain in peace and friendship with foreign powers. The efforts of disloyal citizens of the United States to involve us in foreign wars, to aid an inexcusable insurrection, have been unavailing. Her Britannic Majesty's Government, as was justly expected, have exercised their authority to prevent the departure of new hostile expeditions from British ports. The Emperor of France has, by a like proceeding, promptly vindicated the neutrality which he proclaimed at the beginning of the contest. Questions of great intricacy and importance have arisen out of the blockade, and other belligerent operations, between the Government and several of the maritime powers, but they have been discussed, and, as far as was possible, accommodated in a spirit of frankness, justice, and mutual good-will. It is especially gratifying that our prize courts, by the impartiality of their adjudications, have commanded the respect and confidence of maritime powers.

Finances.

The receipts during the year from all sources, including loans and the balance in the treasury at its commencement were $901,125,674 86, and the aggregate disbursements $895,796,620 65, leaving a balance on the 1st July, 1863, of $5,329,044 21. Of the receipts there were derived from customs, $69,059,642 40; from internal revenue, $37,640,787 95; from direct tax, $1,485,103 61; from lands, $167,617 17; from miscellaneous sources, $3,046,615 35; and from loans, $776,682,361 57; making the aggregate $901,125,674 86. Of the disbursements there were for the civil service, $23,253,922 08; for pensions and Indians, $4,216,520 79; for interest on public debt, $24,729,846 51; for the War Department, $599,298,600 83; for the Navy Department, $63,211,105 27; for payment of funded and temporary debt, $181,086,635 07; making the aggregate, $895,796,630 65, and leaving the balance of $5,329,044 21. But the payment of funded and temporary debt, having been made from moneys borrowed during the year, must be regarded as merely nominal payments, and the moneys borrowed to make them as merely nominal receipts, and their amount, $181,086,635 07, should therefore be deducted both from receipts and disbursements. This being done, there remains as actual receipts, $720,039,039 79; and the actual disbursements, $714,709,995 58, leaving the balance as already stated.

The Navy and the Blockade.

The duties devolving on the naval branch of the service during the year, and throughout the whole of this unhappy contest, have been discharged with fidelity and eminent success. The extensive blockade has been constantly increasing in efficiency. If the navy has expanded, yet on so long a line it has so far found it impossible to entirely suppress illicit trade. From returns received at the Navy Department it appears that more than one thousand vessels have been captured since the blockade was instituted, and that the value of prizes already sent in for adjudication amount to over thirteen millions of dollars. The naval force of the United States consists at this time of five hundred and eighty-eight vessels, completed and in the course of completion; and of these seventy-five are iron-clad, or armored steamers. The events of the war give an increased interest and importance to the navy which will probably extend beyond the war itself. The armored vessels in our navy completed and in service, or which are under contract and approaching completion, are believed to exceed in number those of any other power; but while these may be relied upon for harbor defense and coast service, others of greater strength and capacity will be necessary for cruising purposes, and to maintain our rightful position on the ocean.

Colored Soldiers.

Of those who were slaves at the beginning of the rebellion, full one hundred thousand are now in the United States military service, about one-half of which number actually bear arms in the ranks; thus giving the double advantage of taking so much labor from the insurgent cause, and supplying the places which otherwise must be filled with so many white men. So far as tested, it is difficult to say they are not as good soldiers as any. No servile insurrection, or tendency to violence or cruelty, has marked the measures of emancipation and arming the blacks.

Emancipation Laws and Proclamations.

Those laws and proclamations were enacted and put forth for the purpose of aiding in the suppression of the rebellion. To give them their fullest effect there had to be a pledge for their maintenance. In my judgment they have aided and will further aid the cause for which they were intended. To now abandon them would be not only to relinquish a lever of power, but would also be a cruel and astounding breach of faith. I may add, at this point, that while I remain in my present position I shall not attempt to retract or modify the Emancipation Proclamation, nor shall I return to slavery any person who is free by the terms of that proclamation, or by any of the acts of Congress. For these and other reasons it is thought best that support of these measures shall be included in the oath; and it is believed that the executive may lawfully claim it in return for pardon and restoration of forfeited rights, which he has a clear constitutional power to withhold altogether, or grant upon the terms he shall deem wisest for the public interest. It should be observed, also, that this part of the oath is subject to the modifying and abrogating power of legislation and supreme judicial decision.

The Proclamation of Amnesty, appended to the Message, is one of its most important features. This we give in full:

The Proclamation of Amnesty.

Whereas, In and by the Constitution of the United States, it is provided that the President shall have power to grant reprieves and pardons for offenses against the United States, except in cases of impeachment; and, whereas, a rebellion now exists, whereby the loyal State governments of several States have for a long time been subverted, and many persons have committed and are now guilty of treason against the United States:

And, whereas, with reference to said rebellion and treason laws have been enacted by Congress declaring forfeitures and confiscation of property and liberation of slaves all upon terms and conditions therein stated, and also declaring that the President was thereby authorized at any time thereafter by proclamation to extend to persons who may have participated in the existing rebellion, in any State or part thereof, pardon and amnesty, with such exception and at such time, and on such conditions as he may deem expedient for the public welfare.

Whereas, the Congressional declaration for limited and conditional pardon accords with the well-established judicial exposition of the pardoning power; and, whereas, with reference to the said rebellion, the President of the United States has issued several proclamations with provisions in regard to the liberation of slaves; and, whereas, it is now desired by some persons heretofore engaged in the said rebellion to resume their allegiance to the United States, and to reinaugurate loyal State governments within and for their respective States; therefore I, Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States, do proclaim, declare, and make known to all persons who have, directly or by implication, participated in the existing rebellion, except as hereinafter excepted, that a full pardon is hereby granted to them and each of them, with restoration of all rights of property, except as to slaves, and in property cases where the rights of third parties shall have intervened, and upon the condition that every such person shall take and subscribe an oath, and thenceforward keep and maintain said oath inviolate; and which oath shall be registered for permanent preservation, and shall be of the tenor and effect following, to wit:

I, ——— ———, do solemnly swear in presence of Almighty God that I will henceforth faithfully support, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States and the Union of the States thereunder, and that I will in like manner abide by and faithfully support all acts of Congress passed during the existing rebellion with reference to slaves, so long and so far as not repealed, modified, or held void by Congress, or by decision of the Supreme Court; and that I will, in like manner, abide by and faithfully support all proclamations of the President made during the existing rebellion, having reference to slaves, so long and so far as not modified or declared void by decision of the Supreme Court. So help me God.

The persons excepted from the benefits of the foregoing provisions are all who are, or shall have been, civil or diplomatic officers or agents of the so-called Confederate Government; all who have left judicial stations under the United States to aid the rebellion; all who are, or shall have been, military or naval officers of said so-called Confederate Government above the rank of colonel in the army or of lieutenant in the navy; all who left seats in the United States Congress to aid the rebellion; all who resigned commissions in the army or navy of the United States, and afterward aided the rebellion; and all who have engaged in any way in treating colored persons, or white persons in charge of such, otherwise than lawfully as prisoners of war, and which persons may have been found in the United States service as soldiers, seamen, or in any other capacity; and I do further proclaim, declare, and make known, that whenever, in any of the States of Arkansas, Texas, Louisiana, Mississippi, Tennessee, Alabama, Georgia, Florida, South Carolina, and North Carolina, a number of persons, not less than one-tenth in number of the votes cast in such State at the Presidential election of the year of our Lord 1860, each having taken the oath aforesaid and not having since violated it, and being a qualified voter by the election law of the State existing immediately before the so-called act of secession, and excluding all others, shall re-establish a State Government which shall be republican, and in no wise contravening said oath, such shall be recognized as the true Government of the State, and the State shall receive thereunder the benefits of the constitutional provision which declares that "The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion on application of the Legislature, or of the Executive when the Legislature can not be convened, against domestic violence."

And I do further proclaim, declare, and make known that any provision which may be adopted by such State government in relation to the freed people of such State which shall recognize and declare their permanent freedom, provide for their education, and which yet may be consistent, as a temporary arrangement, with their present condition as a laboring, landless, and houseless class, will not be objected to by the national Executive.

And it is engaged as not improper that, in constructing a loyal State government in any State, the name of the State, the boundary, the subdivisions, the constitution, and the general code of laws as before the rebellion be maintained, subject only to the modifications made necessary by the conditions hereinbefore stated, and such others, if any, not contravening said conditions, and which may be deemed expedient by those framing the new State government. To avoid misunderstanding, it may be proper to say that this Proclamation, so far as it relates to State governments, has no reference to States wherein loyal State governments have all the while been maintained; and for the same reason it may be proper to say, that whether members sent to Congress from any State shall be admitted to seat constitutionally, rests exclusively with the respective houses, and not to any extent with the Executive. And still further, that this Proclamation is intended to present the people of the States wherein the national authority has been suspended, and loyal State governments have been subverted, a mode in and by which the national authority and loyal State governments may be re-established within said States or in any of them, and, while the mode presented is the best the Executive can suggest with his present impressions, it must not be understood that no other possible mode would be acceptable.

Given under my hand, at the city of Washington, the eighth day of December, A.D. one thousand eight hundred and sixty-three, and of the independence of the United States of America the eighty-eighth.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

By the President:
WILLIAM H. SEWARD, Secretary of State.

REPORTS FROM THE DEPARTMENTS.

The Report of the Secretary of the Treasury presents an elaborate exposition of the financial condition of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1863, with estimate, for the year ending June 30, 1864. We give its leading features, in round numbers, disregarding all sums of less than one million of dollars.—It was estimated that the receipts of the Government, apart from loans, for the year ending June 30, 1863, would be 160 millions; the amount was actually 124 millions, the deficiency arising from internal revenue, which it was estimated would produce 85 millions, while the receipts were only 37 millions. It was estimated that the actual expenditures of the year would be 693 millions; the amount was 714 millions; of this sum 590 millions were derived from loans, which form an addition to the public debt. This debt on the 1st of July, 1862, was 508 millions; our debt was therefore on the 1st of July, 1863, 1098 millions. The expenditures of the Government for the present fiscal year are estimated at 749 millions; of which 161 millions will be derived from customs and taxes, and the remaining 588 millions from loans. The debt of the nation on the 30th of June, 1864, will then be 1686 millions. The actual amount on the 30th of September, 1863, was 1228 millions. The estimates for the fiscal year commencing July 1, 1864, are only approximations, and are based on the supposition that the war will still continue. The revenue from ordinary sources is put down at 206 millions, the expenditures at 751 millions, leaving 545 millions to be provided for by loans. According to these estimates our entire debt on the 30th of June, 1865, will be about 2232 millions. In order to make the internal revenue bring in the sum of 150 millions the Secretary recommends increased taxes and duties upon various articles of luxury, prominent among which are that the duty on distilled spirits be fixed at sixty cents per gallon; on tobacco from five to twenty-five cents per pound, on petroleum ten cents per gallon; and on cotton two cents per pound. The Secretary thinks that there will be no difficulty in procuring loans at reasonable rates.

The Report of the Secretary of War gives a rapid resumé of the military operations of the year, the main features of which are that; upon the whole, their influence "in suppressing the rebellion and restoring the authority of the Government can scarcely be overestimated." In the West "the rebel territory has been cut in twain, and the States West of the Mississippi no longer furnish supplies to the rebels, while the people of these States are showing such signs of returning loyalty that a speedy restoration of civil government may be confidently anticipated." The operations against Charleston have not accomplished all that was anticipated; but they have exhibited great skill and bravery on the part of our forces. By the recent operations in Texas the chief avenue of the rebels for foreign commerce and foreign aid is cut off. In the East there has been little material change. The armies of Lee and Meade occupy nearly the same relative positions as they did a year ago; the combats have been attended by about equal loss on both sides, without material advantage to either. Western Virginia is clear from any rebel force. Nothing of importance has taken place in the Departments of Virginia and North Carolina. In the Department of Missouri the enemy have been driven across the Arkansas. The question of the exchange of prisoners is treated at length. The essential points are, that the agreement by which prisoners on either side were to be released on parole until exchanged has been systematically violated by the enemy. At Vicksburg and Port Hudson we captured and paroled about 35,000, not a few of whom, without having been exchanged, have since been found in the Confederate armies; and again, the Confederate Government refuses to consider our colored soldiers or white officers who command them, when captured, as prisoners of war, but treats them as criminals, refusing to exchange them. As the matter now stands they have 13,000 of our soldiers, while we have 40,000 of theirs. They refuse to exchange man for man, demanding that we should give all of theirs in exchange for all of ours. To this we can not accede. In the mean while our prisoners in their hands undergo the utmost hardships, while theirs in our hands are well cared for. If necessary, we must resort to retaliation.—The conscription has been enforced in twelve States, bringing in 50,000 soldiers and $10,000,000 of money. The question of abolishing the $300 exemption clause is commended to the consideration of Congress. The conduct of the colored troops in our armies is commended.—The operations of the Ordnance Department are given in detail. We give a few details, which are a sample of the whole. At the opening of the war we had 1052 siege and coast guns, and have since procured 1064; of field-artillery we had 231 pieces, and have procured 2734; of infantry fire-arms we had 473,000, and have procured 1,950,000; of cavalry fire-arms we had 31,000, and have procured 338,000; of balls and shells we had 363,000, and have procured 2,562,000, and so on in proportion. At first we were compelled to rely on foreign countries for our arms and munitions; now we manufacture them ourselves. Our troops have been paid up to October 31, 1863.——General Halleck presents a long, elaborate, and able Report upon the military operations of the year. This report is so compact as to admit of no satisfactory abridgment. The leading facts have already been given in our current Numbers.

The Report of the Secretary of the Navy presents a careful account of the growth and present condition of our fleet, with a summary of its operations during the year. At the commencement of the present Administration we had 76 vessels, of which only 42 were in commission. At the time of the last Report of the Secretary a year ago we had 427 vessels, with 3268 guns, tonnage 340,036 tons. We have now 588 vessels, with 4443 guns, tonnage 467,967 tons; an increase, exclusive of losses, of 161 vessels, 1175 guns, 127,931 tons. We have, meanwhile, lost 32 vessels, with 166 guns, tonnage 15,985 tons. Of these lost vessels 12 were captured, 3 destroyed to prevent their falling into the hands of the enemy, 4 were sunk in battle or by torpedoes, and 13 lost by shipwreck, fire, and collision. Of our present 588 vessels 46 are iron-clad steamers for coast service; 29 iron-clad steamers for inland service; 203 side-wheel steamers; 198 screw-steamers; and 112 sailing vessels. The number of vessels captured by our blockading fleets, exclusive of a large number destroyed on the Mississippi and other rivers, is 1045; of these 547 were schooners, 179 steamers, 131 sloops, 30 brigs, 26 barks, 15 ships, and 117 yachts and small boats. The value of the prizes sent into court for adjudication is fully $13,000,000.

CAPTURE OF A REBEL GARRISON.

From Fortress Monroe General Butler reports that on the 13th a detachment under Colonel West captured a garrison at Charles City Court House, consisting of 8 officers and 82 men, destroying their camp and equipments. In this expedition the New York Mounted Rifles marched 76 miles in 44 hours, the New York 139th 61 miles in 54 hours, mostly in a severe storm, moving day and night.

TENNESSEE.

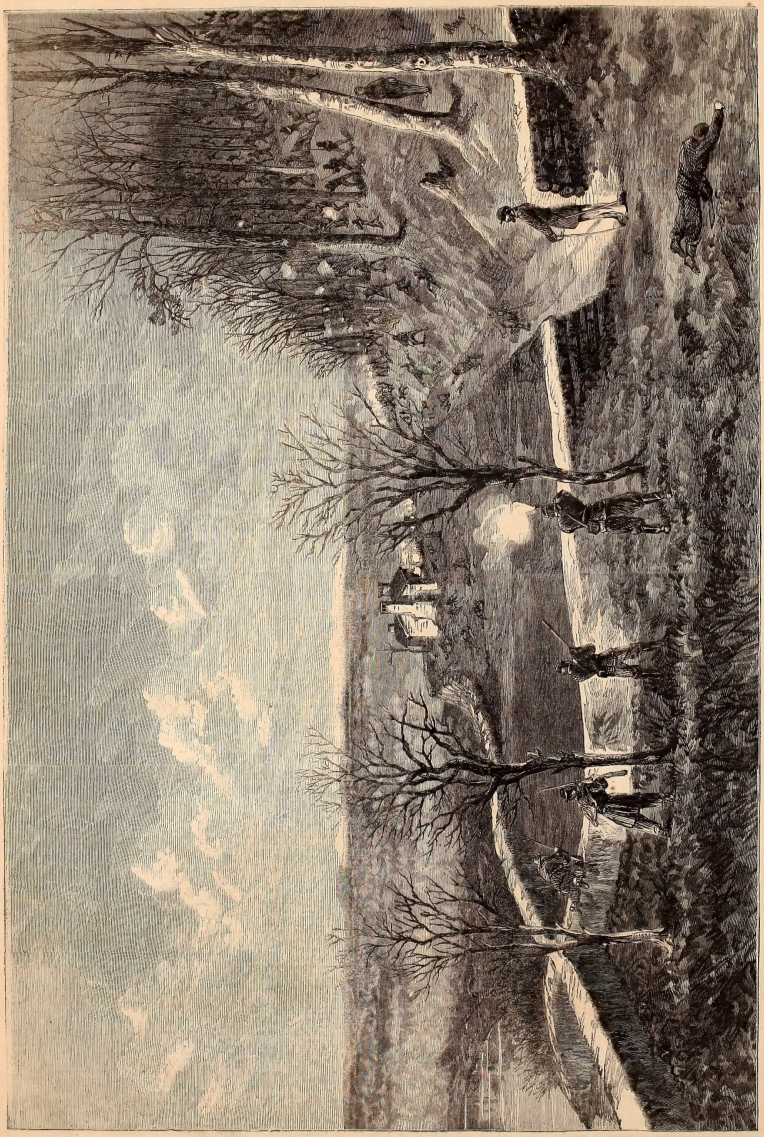
Nothing important, upon which reliance can be placed, is reported of the movements and position of Bragg's army, now commanded by Hardee, or of Longstreet's forces in their retreat from Knoxville. General Burnside, at his own request, has been relieved from his command, in order that he may attend to private business. He is succeeded by General Foster.

TEXAS.

General Banks has returned to New Orleans. The latest news from his expedition to Texas is to the effect that our forces under Major-General Washburne have seized the approaches to Matagorda. The rebel garrison of Fort Esperanza, consisting of 1000 men, fled at the approach of our troops, first blowing up the magazines. A high gale prevented the co-operation of the gun-boats with the land-forces, or the enemy would probably have fallen into our hands. Ten guns were captured, ranging from 24 to 108 pounders. The command of Matagorda Bay substantially gives us the control of Central and Western Texas, and all the important points on the sea-coast except Galveston.

LOSS OF THE "WEEHAWKEN."

The "Monitor" Weehawken was sunk in Charleston Harbor on the 6th of December. A storm, severe but not dangerous, had sprung up; the water dashed over the vessel, pouring down the forward hatchway, and filling the anchor-room, but without exciting any apprehension. The apparatus for preventing the rush of water to the cabin was out of order, and the water poured in in a steady stream while officers and men were at dinner. When the cry "She is sinking!" was raised the confusion was so great that the proper means of shutting off the other compartments were neglected, and the vessel went down in a few minutes. About 30 men, who were below and unaware of the danger, were carried down. The vessel itself will be raised.

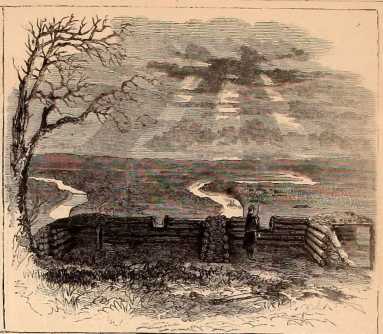


THE CHESAPEAKE PIRACY.

A daring act of piracy was committed on the 7th of December in the seizure of the steamer Chesapeake, plying between New York and Portland, by a gang of rebels who had embarked upon her as passengers. Full details of this exploit are given on page 817. We have as yet no accounts of the recapture of the steamer, though it is hoped that it will be effected.

FOREIGN NEWS.

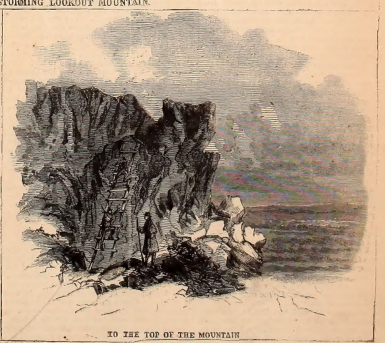
THE EUROPEAN CONGRESS.



THE correspondence between the French and English Governments relating to the proposed European Congress, has been published. On the 4th of November the French Emperor wrote to "Madame my sister," the Queen of England, setting forth his reasons for desiring the Congress, and requesting her Majesty to participate in it. On the 11th Earl Russell replied that the matter should be taken into consideration. Diplomatic correspondence ensued; explanations were asked and given; and the decision of the British Government was finally announced on the 25th, in these words: "Not being able to discern the likelihood of those beneficial consequences which the Emperor of the French promised himself when proposing the Congress, her Majesty's Government, following their own strong convictions, after mature deliberation, feel themselves unable to accept his Imperial Majesty's invitation." The reply also contained the significant intimation that "Her Majesty's Government have good grounds to believe that no Austrian representative would attend a congress where any proposition for the surrender of Venetia by Austria was to be discussed."

THE ARMY OF THE CUMBERLAND—CAPTURE OF REBEL WORKS AT THE WHITE HOUSE, ON LOOKOUT MOUNTAIN, NOVEMBER 24, 1863.—[SEE PAGE 828.]

TOP OF LOOKOUT MOUNTAIN, SUNRISE, NOVEMBER 25, 1863



REBEL BATTERY ON THE TOP OF LOOKOUT MOUNTAIN

GENERAL HOOKER'S COLUMN STORMING LOOKOUT MOUNTAIN

THE CREST OF LOOKOUT MOUNTAIN

TO THE TOP OF THE MOUNTAIN

THE ARMY OF THE CUMBERLAND.—CAPTURE OF LOOKOUT MOUNTAIN.—SKETCHED BY MR. THEODORE R. DAVIS.—[SEE PAGE 828.]

VERY HARD CASH.

By CHARLES READE, Esq.

AUTHOR OF "IT IS NEVER TOO LATE TO MEND," ETC.

[Printed from the Manuscript and early Proof-sheets purchased by the Proprietors of "Harper's Weekly."]

CHAPTER LIV.

MR. HARDIE collapsed as if he had been a man inflated, and that truth had punctured him. "Ah!" said he. "Ah!" said Skinner, in a mighty different tone: laughed triumph in it.

After a pause, Mr. Hardie made an effort and said, contemptuously: "The receipt (if any) was flung into the dust-hole and carried away. Do you think I've forgotten that?"

"Don't you believe it, Sir," was the reply. "While you turned your back, I just picked the money. I said to myself, 'Obo, is that the game?' and nailed the receipt. What a couple of scoundrels we are! I wouldn't have her know it for all your money. Come, Sir, I see it's all right; you will shell out sooner than be posted."

Here Peggy interposed; "Mr. Skinner be more considerate; my master is really poor just now."

"That is no reason why I should be insulted and indicted and trampled under foot," snarled Skinner, in a rage.

"Show me the receipt and take my last shilling, you ungrateful, vindictive viper," groaned Mr. Hardie.

"Stuff and nonsense," said Skinner. "I'm not a viper; I'm a man of business. I've got five hundred pounds, and I'll show you the receipt and keep dark. But I can't afford to give it you for that, of course."

Skinner triumphed, and made the great man apologize, writhing all the time, and wishing he was a dirty dog, that he might bite Skinner and ten honest shillings a week for his income. Having eaten humble pie, he agreed to meet Skinner next Wednesday at midnight, alone, under a certain lamp on the North Kensington road; the interval (four days) he required to raise money upon his scrip. Skinner bowed himself out, fawning triumphantly. Mr. Hardie stood in the middle of the room motionless, scowling darkly. Peggy looked at him, and saw some dark and sinister resolve forming in his mind: she feared it, for she, as such women can divine. She laid her hand on his arm, and said, softly, "Richard, you are not going to—" Hardie ed to find his soul read through his body, like a placard through a pane of glass. He trembled.

But it was only for a moment. "His blood be on his own head," he snarled. "This is not my seeking. He knows what it is to have Richard Hardie to despair."

"No, no," said Peggy; "there are other countries besides this. They've not gather all you have, and cross the water? I'll follow you to the world's end, Richard."

"Mind your own business," said he, fiercely.

She made no reply, but went softly and sat down again, and never took her eyes on his face. Mr. Hardie wrote to Messrs. Heathfield to get Hardie v. Hardie tried as soon as possible.

Meantime came a second phenomenon: gliding down Sackville Street, victorious, Skinner suddenly stopped, and clenched his hands; and his face writhed as if he had received a deadwound. In that instant Remorse had struck him like lightning, and, looking, whence came the lightning. The sweet face and voice that had smiled on him, and cared for his body, and cared for his comfort, came to his mind and knocked at his heart and conscience. He went home miserable with an inward conflict; and it lasted him all the four days: sometimes Remorse was the better, sometimes Avarice. He came to the interview still undecided what he should do. But, meantime, he had gone to a lawyer and made his will, leaving his little all to Julia Dodd: a bad sign that he felt like compounding with his awakened conscience.

It was a dark and gusty night. Very few people were out. Skinner waited a long while, and shivered, for his avarice had postponed the purchase of a great-coat until Christmas-day. At last, by the incorrect second-hand, Mr. Hardie emerged from a side street. Skinner put his head in the lion's mouth.

They met. Mr. Hardie said, quietly, "I must ask you, just for form, to show me you have the Receipt."

"Of course, Sir; but not so near please: no snatching, if I know it."

"You are wonderfully suspicious," said Mr. Hardie, trying to smile.

Skinner looked, and saw by the lamplight he was dealing with a man very dangerous a moment, Sir," said he, and on Mr. Hardie's complying, took the Receipt out, and held it up under the lamp.

Instantly Mr. Hardie drew a life-preserver, and sprang on with the savage curse. And entered a shriek of dismay; for he was met by the long shiny barrel of a horse-pistol, that Skinner drew from his pocket, and leveled full in the haggard face that came at him. Mr. Hardie recoiled, crying, "O! O! for Heaven's sake!"

"What!" cried Skinner, stepping forward and hissing, "do you think I'm such a fool as to meet a thief unarmed? Come, cash up, or I'll blow you to atoms."

"No, no, no!" said Mr. Hardie, piteously, retreating as Skinner marched on him with long extended pistol. "Skinner," he stammered, "th-this is a-not b-b-business."

"Cash up, then; that's business. Fling the five hundred pounds down, and walk away. Mind it is loaded with two bullets; I'll make a double entry on your great treacherous carcass."

"It's no use trying to deceive such a man as you," said Mr. Hardie, playing on his vanity, "I could not get the money before Saturday, and so I listened to the dictates of despair. Forgive me."

"Then come again Saturday night. Come alone, and I shall bring a man to see I'm not murdered. And look here, Sir, if you don't come to the hour and do the right thing with our any more of these unbusiness-like tricks, by Heaven I'll smash you before noon on Monday."

"I'll come."

"I'll have you to Mr. Alfred and Miss Dodd."

"I'll come, I tell 'ou."

"I'll post you for a thief in every brick in the Exchange."

"Have mercy, Skinner. Have pity on the wretched man whose bread you have eaten. Tell you I'll come."

"Well mind you do, then cash and all," said Skinner, mildly, but with the most consummate resentment those humble words awakened.

Each walked backward a good dozen steps, and then they both differed some yards. Skinner taking good care not to be tracked home. He went up the high stairs to the hole in the roof of his house, and lighted a rush-light. He had half a mind to kindle a fire, he felt so chilly: but he had stopped up the vent, partly to keep out the cold, partly to shun the temptation of burning fuel. However, he stopped the keyhole with paper, and the chinks of the window, till he had shut the wintry air all out. Still then, what with the cold and what with the reaction after the great excitement, his feeble body began to shiver desperately. He thought at last he would light a foot-warmer he had purchased for one of his customers; but would only spend a halfpenny worth of charcoal. And he wouldn't; he would look at his money; that was warmer. He unrolled the precious part of his straw mattress and took out a bag of gold. He spread it before him, counted it, put the floor and put the candle down among them. The sparkled; they were all new ones, and he rubbed them with an old worsted sock and enjoyed every week. "That's better than any fire," he said, "they warm the heart. For one thing they are my own, all to myself. I'm not a beggar, nor take them of a thief for a bribe to keep dark and befriend honest folk." Then remorse gripped him for a moment. "Myself what I was going to do. "To rob an angel," was the answer. "Five fourteen thousand pounds is the figure. I could give it her in a moment. Curse him, he would have killed me for it."

Then he gathered about and took out his will.

"Ah," said he, "that is all right, so far. But what is a paltry three hundred when I help a poor sort of fellow-creature? Ah, Julia, Julia, to ease his conscience, he took a slip of paper, and wrote on it a short account of the Receipt, and how he got it, and left it in the open answer how I guided his hand, he added, "Miss Dodd lives at 49 Pembroke Street, and if I die it is right it to her as soon as I am well of my cold." Whether this preceded an unconscious resolve which he was not aware of, or whether it some time, or whether it awakened such a resolve, I hardly know: but certain it is, that here he stopped, and for the first moment of doing it; and, more seriously he entertained the thought, the more good it seemed to do him. He put the "Miss Dodd" and "Pembroke" aside, as she had lent him, and read a bit: then finding his feet frozen he began to undress. Still he read, and put it under his feet and read. The good words began to reach his heart more and more: to dull the sense of cold. The sentences never had guided his hand, he added, "Miss Dodd lives at 49 Pembroke Street, and if I die it is right it to her as soon as I am well of my cold." Whether this preceded an unconscious resolve which he was not aware of, or whether it some time, or whether it awakened such a resolve, I hardly know: but certain it is, that here he stopped, and for the first moment of doing it; and, more seriously he entertained the thought, the more good it seemed to do him. He put the "Miss Dodd" and "Pembroke" aside, as she had lent him, and read a bit: then finding his feet frozen he began to undress. Still he read, and put it under his feet and read. The good words began to reach his heart more and more: to dull the sense of cold. The chafer warmed his feet and legs. "Ay," said he, "men don't want fires; warm the feet and the body warms itself. Ah, I'll keep the Receipt" and held it in his hand, and eyed it precisely, and asked himself could he really part with it. He thought he could—to-day. Still holding it tight in his left hand, he read on the good but solemn words that seemed to speak to him upon that ill-gotten paper. "How good it was of her," he thought, "to come day after day and feed me, and think of my body, my body and soul!" She asked nothing back. She didn't know he could make her any return. "Bless you! bless her!" he cried, with a burst of love. "I have been to her, and she so kind to me! She would never let me want, if I took her fourteen thousand pounds. Like enough she would have sent; and help me save my poor soul, that I shall damn if I keep this money." He read it again. Lead us not into temptation. I repent. Lord have mercy on me a miserable sinner!" And tears relieved those wrung words, those tears of penitence, sincere, at least for the time.

A sleepy hangnor now came over him, and the good book fell from his hand: but his resolution remained unshaken; by-and-by waking up from a sort of heavy doze he took, as it were, a last look at the receipt, and muttered, "Ah, Julia, how heavy it feels!" But presently he roused himself, full of his penitent resolution, and murmured again, brokenly, "I'll—take it to—Pembroke Street to—morrow: to—mor—row."

CHAPTER LV.

MR. HARDIE raised the money on his scrip, and at great inconvenience; for he was holding up five hundred thousand pounds' worth of the Turkish Bonds over an unfavorable setting day, and wanted every shilling to pay his broker. If they did not rise by next settling day he was a beggar. However, being now a desperate gamester, and throwing for his last stake, he borrowed this sum, and took it with a heavy heart to his appointment with Skinner. Skinner never came. Mr. Hardie waited till one o'clock. Two o'clock. No Skinner. Mr. Hardie went home hugging his five hundred pounds, but very uneasy. Skinner did not appear that day. She shook her head, and said it looked very ugly. Skinner had, most likely, got angrier and angrier in his thinking on the cause. "You will never see him again till the day of the trial: and then he will go down and bear false witness against you. Why not leave the country?"

"How can I, simpleton? My money is all locked up in time-bargains. No, I'm tied to the stake; I'll fight to the last: and, if I'm defeated and disgraced, I'll die, and end it."

Peggy begged him not to talk so. "I've been down to the court," said she, softly, "to see what it is like. There's a great hall; and he must speak through a hole in the box like places where they try 'em. Let me be in that hall with the five hundred pounds, and I promise you he shall not bear false witness against you. Will both go; you with the money, I with my woman's tongue."

He gave her his hand like a shaky monarch, and said she had more wit than he had.

Mr. Hardie's counsel contrived to postpone Hardie v. Hardie six times in spite of Compton, could not hurry it on now with his co-operation. It must be entered for another or another a good fortnight; and in this fortnight Hardie senior endured the tortures of suspense. Skinner made no sign. The days were stood upon the paper, for next day, a short case of disputed contract, and Hardie v. Hardie.

The witnesses subpœnaed on either side in Hardie v. Hardie began to arrive at ten o'clock, and a tall, stately man paraded Westminster Hall, to see if Skinner came with them; all other anxieties had merged in this: for the counsel had assured him, nothing unexpected turned up, Thomas Hardie would have a verdict, or if not, the damages would be nominal.

Now, Mr. Hardie's promise, was to settle the whole lawsuit; for, while trial of the issue was being postponed and discussed, another question had been argued and disposed of. The very Queen's counsel, unfavorable to the suit, was bribed with a brief, and actually delivered them in court with more skill, clearness, and effect than Garrow ever could; then sat down, and, without a word, was contemptuously to Mr. Compton, "That is your" argument, think."

"And admirably put," whispered the attorney, in reply.

"Well; now Mr. Saunders Knock it to pieces."

Instead of that, it was Sergeant Saunders that made himself ridiculous: judge had a peck at him: then another: till they left him scarce a feather to fly with; and when Alfred's counsel rose to reply, Hardie stopped him, and the chief-of-the-court, Alfred's postponing enemy, delivered his judgment after this fashion:

"We are all of opinion that this plea is bad in law. By the common law of England no person can be imprisoned as a lunatic unless found lunatic by a jury. It has been held so for centuries, and down to the last case. And by the 8th of Henry VI. no person can be imprisoned as a lunatic unless by the authority of the Chancellor, or the justices of the peace, without remedy unless he could prove malice in the person who had procured his incarcerating him. As for the statute, it does not mend the matter, but rather the reverse; for it expressly protects the authorities who act in lunacy under the orders and certificates, and this must be construed to except from the protection of the statute the very matter we have here."

The three puisne judges concurred, and gave similar opinions. One of them said that if A. imprisoned B. for a felon, and B. sued him, it was no defense to say that B., in his opinion, had been insane. Judge Talfourd cited Lord Ellen-Anderdon v. Burrows, and Lord Mansfield's judgment in a very old case, the name of which I have unfortunately forgotten.

Judgment was entered for the plaintiff; and the defendant's ingenious plea struck off the record; and Hardie v. Hardie became the leading case. But in law one party often wins the skirmish, and the other the battle. Mr. Hardie grand fight, as I have already said, was to be to-day.

But the high hopes and ardor with which the young lovers had entered on one concerted move were worn out by the postponement swindle, and the adverse events delay had brought on them. Alfred was not idle: he was being examined in the schools; and had plumply refused to leave a tribunal that named its day and kept it—for Julia's sake. Like enough she should have actually opened the case. He did not believe true. He would not believe it. Julia was there, but sad and comparatively listless. One of those strange vague reports, which often herald more circumstantial accounts, had come home, whispering darkly that her father was dead, and buried on an island in the South Sea. She had kept this from Alfred, lest his journey to Edward's wish: but she implored him to restrain his fatal openness. In one thing both were unanimous: Compton should not have his way. Julia would not, and Alfred could not be candid; not to tell Alfred this at present. "Oh, do not go and disgrace him just now," she said, "or he will do something rash. No, he must and shall get his first class, and win his trial; and then you know any lady will be too proud to marry him. Then he is married and happy, you can tell him I did all I could for him, and begged him to be considerate, and was his friend, though I could not—be—his—wife."

She could not say this without crying: but she said it for all that, and meant it too.

Besides helping Mr. Compton to get up the evidence, this true and earnest friend and lover had attended the court day after day, to watch how things were done, and, woman-like, to see what pleased and what displeased the court. And so at last the court crier cried, with a loud voice, "Hardie v. Hardie!" Julia's eyes ever to be very anxiously for Alfred, and up rose Mr. Garrow, and stated to the court the substance of the declaration: "To this," he said, "three pleas have been pleaded: first, the plea of not guilty, which is a formal plea; also another plea, which has been demurred to, and struck off the record; and, lastly, that at the time of the alleged imprisonment the plaintiff was of unsound mind, and a fit person to be confined; which is the issue now to be tried."

Mr. Garrow then sat down, very tired of this preliminary work, and wondering when he should have the lock to conduct such a case as Hardie v. Hardie: and leaned forward to be ready to prompt his senior, a portly counsel, whom Mr. Compton had retained because he was great at addressing juries, and no point of law could now arise in the case.

Colt, Q.C., one like a tower, knowing very little of the facts, and seeming to know every thing. He had a prodigious business, and was rather indolent, and often shunned his brief at home, and then mastered it in court—if he got time. Now, it is a good general's policy to open a plaintiff's case very gently, and reserve thunderric for the reply; and Mr. Colt always took this line when his manifold engagements compelled him, as in Hardie v. Hardie, to take his case first and learn it afterward. I will only add, that in the course of his opening he was on the edge of seven distinct blunders; but Garrow watched him and always shot a whisper like a bullet just in time. Colt took it, and glided away from incipient error imperceptibly, and with a tact you can have no conception of. The jury did not: and the cracking of this machinery; Sergeant Saunders did, and grinned satirically; so did poor Julia, and her cheeks burned and her eyes sparkled indignant fire. And, terror of horrors! Alfred did not appear.

Mr. Colt's opening may be thus condensed: The plaintiff was a young gentleman of great promise and distinction, on whom, as usual in those cases, a false imprisonment charge was settled. He was a distinguished student at Eton and Oxford, and no doubt was ever expressed of his sanity: he proposed to call and take his money out of his trustees' hands by a marriage settlement. On this his father, who up to that time had managed his trust as a principal trustee, showed him great personal hostility for some time, and looked out for a rod: but rod was soon found in his brother, the defendant, a person who, it would be proved, had actually not seen the plaintiff for a year and a half; yet, with great recklessness and inhumanity, had signed away his liberty and his happiness behind his back. From a variety of causes, which he had that any body can buy, a couple of doctors—were, as usual, easily found to sign the certificates. These same doctors had never seen him but for five minutes, and signed in manifest collusion with the defendant. They described him as a gentleman away on his wedding morning —on his wedding morning, gentlemen, mark that—and handed him to the care of all dangeons. What he suffered there he must himself relate to you: for we, who have the happiness to walk about in the air of reason and liberty, are little able to realize the agony of mind endured by a sane man confined among the insane. But he would endeavor to prove his sanity to the very hour of his incarceration; and also that he was quite sane at the time when a brutal attempt to recapture him by violence was made under the defendant's order, and defeated by his own resolute determination to remain free. Along with the facts the true reason why he was imprisoned would probably come out. But I am not going to prejudge motives. It is for the defendant to prove, if he can, that he had lawful motives for a lawless act; and that he exercised the powers given him by the law with moderation, and not recklessly to the dark designs of others. If he succeed in this, that may go in mitigation of damages, but it can not affect the verdict. One principal object is the verdict, which will remove the foul stain cast on my client's character, and restore him to society. And to this verdict we are entitled, unless the other side can prove the plaintiff was insane. Call Alfred Hardie.

And with this he sat down.

An official called Alfred Hardie very loud; he also called Julia rose from her seat with dismay painted on her countenance. Compton's, Garrow's, and Colt's heads clutched their hair.

Mr. Colt jumped up again, and said, "My Lord, I must protest against the gross legal accusation of insanity is just being examined for high honors in the University of Oxford." "Aside to Compton, "and if he doesn't come, you may give them the verdict."

"Well," said the judge, "I suppose he will be here when you close your case."

On the the three heads clashed again, and Sanders said, "For the defendant I opposed it and said with great politeness, and affectation of sympathy, "My Lud I can quite understand my learned friend's hesitation to produce his principal witness."

"You understand nothing about the matter," said Colt, sulkily. "Call Mr. Harrington."

Mr. Harrington was Alfred's tutor at Eton, and deposed to his sanity there: he was not cross-examined. After him they went on step by step with a fresh witness for every six months, from Eton upward, in close order to the day of incarceration: then they put in one of Julia's witnesses, Peterson, who swore Alfred had taken to him like a sane person that very morning; and repeated what had passed. Cross-examination only elicited that he and Alfred were no longer good friends, which rather strengthened the evidence. Then Giles and Hannah, now man and wife, were called, and swore he was sane all the time he was at Silverton House. This evidence produced the last effect by eliciting that they had left on bad terms with Baker, and that Alfred had given them money since.

proclaimed fugitive, as though the brand of Cain had been upon him. He went straight to the first house on which he came. A hazel-eyed, pleasant-faced girl answered his knock.

"I am a runaway Federal officer," he said, bluntly. "I spent last night in the woods yonder. I am chilled to the bone, starved for food, and dying for sleep. You can tie my hands with the ribbon on your hair, if you like, and take me to Richmond yourself."

"Guess you came to the right place, then," said pleasant face, with a laugh. "We are all Union folks here, and the Union pickets are not half a mile off."

And so Louis was saved, and I read of him the other day in some skirmish, a dashing affair where he deserved and got honorable mention, and only yesterday I met him on Broadway mixed an arm, the left one, but with a blushing, happy-looking little person on the other, whom he introduced as Mrs. Bayfour. How she got here (and perhaps he) only knows; but here she is, installed in his mother's house, and I hear there is a wedding soon to be forthcoming.

MR. BLUEIT'S CHRISTMAS DINNER.

IT was a gusty night that year, the evening of the 24th of December. A whistling, raw, bleak, shivering night—the sort being filled with wet, sharp flakes of snow, which whirled up in feathery-looking sprays of drift round the corners and smote one viciously in the face on encountering the blasts. A night when men instinctively cocked their heads to windward as they passed cross streets where the wild wind was playing its malicious frolic.

Mr. Blueit had been all through the pellings of the pitiless storm that day, had faithfully attended to his business, eaten a huge dinner, and now on the edge of bedtime sat, with evening paper in one hand and cigar in the hot mouth at his elbow, toasting his slippered feet before a glowing fire, reposing them, of course, upon a supplementary chair. He had had, any decent man of a large purse, which he had paid very well; he had lately moved into his handsome house on the Avenue in the Fifties; and his wife was amiable; his furnace operated well; his cook was skillful and amenable to reason—could mortal man ask more? To be sure, Mr. Blueit was not the wisest woman in the world, but she knew enough to appreciate the advantages of her present comfortable position. She had not always been wealthy, consequently she despised poor people with an unction refreshing to behold. On the present occasion the lady had retired early, being overcome of the drowsy god, leaving her lord in undisturbed possession of the cozy sitting-room, with its cheerful fire and lights. Mr. Blueit sat there under the impression that he was reading, but his stories absorbed with equal fascination all his burly head fairly drooped into his capacious breast, and Mr. Blueit slept.

Then a gust of all the hardware in the house by common consent were holding high carnival below stairs, a sort of exaggerated Dunyhroke it seemed. Mr. Blueit started to his feet, and left the room, down stairs.

The kitchen was ablaze with lights, and the range glowed with intense hospitality, as from its gleaming orifices ascended savory odors of dainties in bath—and baking and roasting, frying and frying, turning spits, and the tenderest nurgling of the trough and sty had not been withheld from that sacrifice—while eager cooks jostled under the chimney scullions, while delicate Ariels compounded fairylike confections, and jolliest Ducks relishingly basted the crisping fowls, while the brown bread sent forth its sweet and nourishing fragrance, and lubantly pigs were lying their eyes out, to be eaten with their own gravies, while high upon the rack of the sideboard, within the dining-room, yet in full view of all the complicated preparations, sat the ruler of the storm. Burly of figure, huge of limb, ruticund of nose, shaggy of beard, and jovial of wink and leer, with curving icicles, despite the torpid heat of the kitchen, depending from cap and beard, sat Saint Nicholas, issuing his orders and marshaling his forces as if he had been commander of all the cooks from Paris to the Feejee Islands, and Minister Plenipotentiary of the Indian Ocean here to Abyssinia. And while the astonished Blueit stood surveying the remarkable scene delighted to find his bewildered vision in his fat jolliety laughed, and shook, and nodded, and winked, and finally, with a blow of his hand, struck on Mr. Blueit's back, seated him more suddenly than courteously in one of his own leather-cushioned chairs.

"Glad to see you, Blueit, at last!" cried the Saint; "we've been busy here for hours. All Cole began to fear you weren't coming down at all. Cole, for the wonder, was sure you think in a hotel?"

Mr. Blueit muttered something about the peculiar coolness of the presence of a man's business story to raise the dash in, and hinted something about turning the whole pack out of doors.

"Turn us out, Blueit! Shut the door, pray! Why, we've only made a beginning here. This is going to be a Christmas-eve to be remembered in the annals of Blueit & Co. When the poor and desolate of Centreville shall rise up and call you blessed, Blueit."

Mr. Blueit was convinced that the gentleman in fors, with whom he was holding this extraordinary conversation, was enormously drunk.

"I've a deal on hand to do, you see, about this time of year," remarked the Saint. "What with taking boxes to the soldiers, with seeing that all the Christmas books and stories are properly written, with filling stockings, and furnishing trees, and seeing that mothers and sisters, and aunts and cousins, do their duty by the little folks, and having a general oversight that poor children are not forgotten, I've about all I can attend to. But this big supper of Blueit & Co.—"

"What!"

"Why, yes, you see Blueit & Co. are going to entertain all their employés Christmas-day; and I concluded that, with such a splendid range as this, we might do part of the work here. Don't be concerned about the cook in the morning, I've a battalion of brownies waiting to clean up and leave every thing in the best of order. An excellently-appointed kitchen, Blueit; very few ranges work as well—hearty as good as my own in Heela—though we rather excel you on the hot-water arrangements, Blueit!"

A tall, thin, wiry creature, in a cook's cap and apron, whom Blueit had watched with much interest for some time, as he whirled the roast fowls out of the range and into platters with a celerity that defied calculation, now approached the jovial Saint.

"Is your work finished, Blazius?"

"It is; there only remains what the brownies can safely finish."

"Then take care of Mr. Blueit while he goes to give out his invitations. Mr. Blueit, allow me to introduce Mr. Blazius: you will accompany Blazius. I'd be glad to be of the party, but I have a large quantity of German toys to look over, and must be excused."

So there was no choice but for Mr. Blueit to clasp the warm leathery hand of his guide, cook, and follow him out into the gusty night. He did take time to catch his heavy coat from its peg in the basement entry and his overshoes, but, all frantically snatching on a huge pair of boots which he found standing there, he was ready and ready to accompany Blazius, who now appeared in the guise of a thin gentlemanly fellow in a brown overcoat and soft hat, and with a large, heavy tenor-ling ready-made-clothing merchant out of the street-door.

The long plumy whirls of snow came dancing down the street like ghosts, but the gaslights were all aglow, and the shops were brightly illuminated, and the shops were gay with holiday goods and gear, and the sidewalks were still full of busy people, that looks agreeable and kind in spite of snow, and the sleigh-bells were filling the frosty air with their jingling cadences. Of all the throng, Mr. Blueit became aware that they were following only two, a woman and a boy, who hurried along hand in hand, taking little heed of the busy shops with their tempting wares, or the lively throng, and intent only on gaining shelter from the biting wind. Blazius, with a few dramatic flourishes, stair they followed—Blueit and his phantom guide. The door yielded to their touch, and our two friends followed them into the room. It was all cold and dark, and if it had not been, Blueit felt with a shiver that they would not have heeded them. The boy was a poor, ragged, dirty child, and his fingers trembled so that he could scarcely hold the match; but he did light it. First a smudgy sputter of sulphur and phosphorus, and a sputter—then a jet of flame, a glow, a smell of tallow-candle, and the room was full of light and warmth. They then kindled a fire in the cracked stove of some bits of tiny laths and a scrap of wood or two, evidently saved for the purpose, for Jodge Handsaw, and had duly taken them home this night; but the lady had not had the change in her, so that little of the fire-wood in the Blueit attic that night. Mr. Blueit heard her tell the boy, and remembered that his own wife had hidden a purse in the attic of her house, very nicely to go away and come again at a more convenient season.

Dear, dear! how the poor thing did cough! as the woman and child lay down together on the crazy bedstead covered with a few tattered rags. But there was of warmth and life between the two.

"Joey?" said the woman, "did you try again if Mr. Jones would n bumble-bee to-day?"

"Yes, mother," answers the little fellow; "but he wants genteel kids. I wouldn't be nagged. I said I was needed up pretty well, and I would soon buy good clothes if he would hire me; and he laughed awful ugly, and said, 'Oh, you're needy! I'll engage; and too soon too:' and I went off and bagged an old broom and swept crossings, but nobody gave me a penny, and I'm afraid I wouldn't trust me with any papers to tell to-night, either."

"I wish Mrs. Handsaw would pay me what she owes me," sighed Mrs. Blazius. "I'm sure one's took home she was out of town, and I had to wait for weeks for my pay; and I'm afraid I've taken cold, Joey. I almost wish she knew how poor we are, but I'm afraid if she did she wouldn't trust me any more. Poor Jem, Joey, how he fought this bitter winter!" and the racking cough showed that something was helping her rapidly through her short lease of life.

Joey rolled a billet of wood in his little jacket, and put it under her head to relax it and ease the cough, and presently they slept.

There stole into the room a sharper chill and a thin wreath of frosty vapor, which came creeping itself through the cobwebbed panes. There was no coughing now, as Joey rubbed his eyes open. Ah, poor Joey—it's no use, child—she won't have to wait on Mrs. Handsaw's pleasure. The widow's Friend is righting all of her wrongs. There are no dawdling delays there. Oh, Joe! how could you ever forget those sharpened features, those emaciated limbs, that fleshly chill of touch overmastering the December morning?

"Oh my God, for all my sins have thou mercy on me!" groaned Blueit, and shuddered through forty years of his existence, back to those days which were passing before him.

And the vision faded like a cloud, and the strange pair were once more in the street. It was still evening out of doors, and Blueit descried his own porter, honest fellow! with his toes sticking out of his boots, as he passed them hurrying home, hugging a basket of potatoes with a bit of meat wrapped in a brown paper stuck in a corner of it. Blueit remembered that he had picked up and restored to him that morning a ten-dollar greenback, for which Blueit had thanked him. Really, now, it was too bad—and his wife with a young baby at home too! But Bill never complained, and how was he to know how things were on at home with all of his men? He would never have known about the baby if he had not just happened to have heard him tell the fact to Freeman, of it.

Then they passed a milliner's shop in Millinette Place. A pretty, delicate girl was at the counter weaving a chenille net, and a fast young fellow lounged against the counter, sucking his cane and asking the price as she worked. Presently she pricked her finger, and the exquisite dropped his cane to caress the delicate injured digit, unmindful of a big-whiskered fellow who had entered the shop and stood watching them both. Not that he had much business to transact there either, for the next instant Mr. Leroy Fayneant crawled on the floor beneath the substantial fist of the big-whiskered fellow, in whom Blueit recognized himself once more.

"Served him right!" was Blueit's mature verdict on this little social escapade, as the vision passed before him of the fair coquette, who, now safely nestled under his matrimonial wing, was pointed out on the Avenue there as the "beautiful Mrs. Blueit with her two-thousand-dollar horses and carriage."

Blueit saw a great many things in that gusty walk with his slender and gentlemanly, but mysterious guide. At the cashier go-down into a lively looking doorway, and be and Blazius crept after him; and the way the gnarchens piled the tables, and the little girls presented their mites of evil fee away with more than a quarter's salary at a sweep was a caution and a surprise to the uninitiated. His entire confusion, the same out at the private room door of the theatre, and drove away to a palace upon the wings for dramatic friends. He saintly youth who would not so much as hear the nigger minstrels but his influence in Sabbath-school should be lost. But that was later in the day of the evening. Now the streets were full of people, warmly and handsomely clad, going in and out of the groceries, the pastrycooks, and the fruiterers, pinching fat turkeys, selecting rich clusters of grapes, ordering groceries and good things enough to satisfy an army. Blueit wondered how the streets was blown, hither and yonder at the mercy of the mercy of the fierce gusts of the bitter, black and pine boughs with which the shops were decked for the festal season. Evergreens every where. Some poor creatures hurrying home with the Christ-child might hang them full of gifts. Refuse greens from churches and public halls, ground underfoot. Here and there, just, like faithful Christmas, giving forth the most precious odor under the vilest usage. No one could get glimpses of rich fat wreaths around bright pictures on lofty walls of stately houses as you passed. You could breathe the incense of the "fir-tree, and the pine, and the cedar together," as you passed a church, and the poor children dragged home branches of the refuse to their wretched lodgings gay with such a bit of Christmas. There went Blueit's sweeper now with a Bologna sausage and a pretzel in a paper under his arm, a bunch of pink roses over his window; and the cheap shop is hung with pipes and tobacco, and the cheap carcasses at the door wear them. There is much good in your pins and hemlock tree, however considered. There are poor women and children now children peering in at the windows of the toy-shop, where richly-dressed dolls, swinging to and fro in the warm light, mock with their fair and costly finery, the bald whistle of the wintry wind as it flapped about the thin garments of these wretched ones.

"Good stranger, spirit, guide, or whatever you are," moaned out poor Blueit, "who are these? and why are they here? Look! look! look! Behold, the line stretching out! And who are you—you are so terrible, and after all so kindly too—"

"These children, Blueit," replied the spirit, "why, the most of them are your own employés, and a few of your humbler friends, that from time to time I have gathered in, and my servants of the magnificent Christmas-dinner which you propose to give in your great packing-room on Christmas afternoon. Blueit, don't look as if they'll be worse of a hearty meal, d'ye think? And there's a few regular customers, and a few that I've called for, eh? and some of their wives and little folks too, maybe. It's a good while since they had a taste of turkey, I'm myself, I suppose myself, per diferently in different times and places. Sometimes I appear as the Scotch brownie, and work in the night to the astonishment of my lord, and a portion of cream—under the stair duly set for me at night—is considered my service. I've been reported in the character of Asmodeus at one time, and the Germans have another odd name for me too. But now I am Blueit, head cook and sub-major-domo to the excellent St. Nicholas—also Mr. Blueit's most humble servant. And with a smile of grotesque benevolence distorting his leathery jaws, the brownie bowed low to the bewildered Blueit, who could not decide whether he was properly proceeding behind him. There were poor women who hovered near a poor maimed figure in a faded blue uniform, with perhaps an empty sleeve or leg, or some other dreadful mutilation to cover as best they might. And pale, thin, hungry-eyed women, with pricked and blackened forefingers, with hollow cheeks and white lips, and some had a poor bit of black and white baby, and great dark circles, rat-stained—under the eyes, showing that no helpless living wreck was making their lives precious to them by its dependence and weakness, and revealing how strong a habit mere existence had become, that it still clutched its hold with the dead weight dragging the other way. There were aged people, leaning on the arm of their children, who were feding to shadows trying to keep the Great Shadow from the venerated forms beside them. And some whose tawdry finery and mocking laughter showed that the bottle was over, the sharp struggle for bread past, and the free, savage life of the street fairly reasserting its claims.

And Mr. Blueit began to wonder if six cents apiece for making shirts, and sixpence apiece out of imperfect work, wasn't rather a tight fit, with flour at nine dollars a barrel, and coal eleven dollars a ton.

"Shall I ask 'em?' inquired Blazius, jerking his long thumb backward.

"Yes—no—I—" Blueit answered. "Poor things!" He began to understand what this long night journey meant.

They were all following them—poor sewing women, shivering little children, porters out at the elbows; smart clerks, handling themselves in attics, to keep one decent suit in which to serve the counter; thin, pale fellows, with hard coughs. Not a very festally-appearing crowd, though the poor merchant. As they filed along, Blueit had an odd impression that the dinner was to have come off upon Christmas-day, and he was late. He felt late all account of time since he had started out with Blazius. But here they were, in front of the great warehouse—the whole building lighted; gas-jets dimmed from every cornice; the great doors stood open, and the air was warm in it. The great room, with its counters doing duty as royally-spread tables, was all a tremble with gay banners, bright merry flags, with evergreen garlands quivering in the glorious music of the band at the end of the hall. And just as the dais rose and the band began to come that ruddy saint, beloved of all children and true-hearted Manhattoes, St. Nicholas, Blazius and Blueit saw the saint bowing, waving, withdrew to his own duties, which, judging by the wolfish looks of the guests as they disposed themselves about the room, promised to be no sinecure.

"Friends," said the venerable Santa Claus, "in the name of Him who has bidden us welcome to his everlasting feast do I bid you welcome to this which your friend has provided for you."

Like the feast of July among shipowners, like Egypt under the locusts, the tables were cleared, and again and again from unseen sources replenished, till every human appetite was satisfied.

"Blueit! Blueit! A speech! a speech!"

A speech!—poor Blueit!

"You must!"

"I can't"

"Just try."

"I won't."

"Just a word, you know, and I'll help you if you stick," whispered Blazius.

Blueit struggled to his feet.

"Friends and fellow-citizens, he began," and gentlemen of the jury—no, I don't mean that—and gentlemen—on this painful—no, confound it!—Friends, I've a word to say, and I must talk on in my own humble way. I've been in trade for many years. Men and women, I've worked you hard; sometimes I have ground you down. I'm not a poor. I wanted to be rich. I'd known harder poverty than any of you, and it made me a brute. I'm ashamed of it. I'm sorry I worked you so night. I know that sixpence apiece for making shirts don't make honest poverty. It makes some of you desperate, and some of you starve. I don't like to say more. The boss is going to be your friend. Wages—" [Applause.] "wages shall be living wages, not starvation wages. And I've a word more to say: I've always been a Union man, and I gave ten thousand to raise men, and ten more for the commissions, and I hope it all did good. I'm no speech-maker, and dull at talking; but I am going to give some more money to the sanitary cause; I'm going to help the soldiers' widows and orphans till the country gets ready to do something for them. That is what was the preference, to bring hands at fair wages; and if any poor soul has got a wounded father or husband, I've got work for him to die; but I want to know it, and shake his fist, if he has got one left, with a ten-dollar bill in it, maybe; and, if he has not, I've a strong sympath of his breast left to cover his heart, it'll do to lay something on. It is a hard world, men, and there's many work going wrong, but the merchant of all ways is forgetting the poor, and that we were once poor ourselves. I don't want to be rich to-night. Our friend in the fars did it all; but, please God, we shall go on better hereafter."

And Blueit sat down amid a perfect storm of applause, which certainly was deserved, for I don't believe a worthy, stout, middle-aged gentleman in the ready-made line ever did make a more extraordinary speech since I began to record the marvelous exploits of the Blueit family. On one I have chronicled above; and the effect of the applause was as wonderful as the speech itself, for with the last cheer Blueit found himself awake! Seated upon his hearth-rug, crowned with his own large chair, the cozy whose sweet understanding had seemed upward having incontinently retired upon its castors in good order to the other side of the room. Otherwise, the gas was out, the fire out, the brandy-and-water all drank up, and the clock at 2 a.m. December 25.

Blueit gathered himself up and replaced his chair, lighted his candle, and shivered up stairs.

"Thank Heaven! it is only two days before Christmas yet, and plenty of time," yawned Blueit, as he deposited his ivy bald between the blankets, and proceeded to finish his Dream.

"Mrs. Blueit," remarked that gentleman at breakfast next morning, "did Mary Kirby bring home my new shirts last night?"

"Yes—Mr. B. this roll is cold, another please! —and something reminded me that I owed her five dollars too, but Lizzie & Marrieson has just opened my purse. A bit of the steak, if you please."

"Sorry you should not let it happen; touch the bell, Jessie."

"John!"

"Yes, Sir."

"Get ready and take this five to Mrs. Mary Kirby; tell her Mrs. Blueit has more work for her; and John—"

"Yes, Sir."

"Stop at M'Vicars, and see if he has any nice turkeys; pick out a hen turkey, a nice fat yearling, and take it to her; and tell M'Vicar—d'ye hear?—to send three to the house."

"Yes, Sir."

"And other fowls and things, and all the rest to my wareroom by ten, and bring me the bill."

"Ye–es, Sir."

"Mr. Blueit, I think you are crazy! What upon earth do you want of several hundred fowls at the warehouse? I shall send for your friends. You are losing your wits! You are wasting your property! Oh dear! oh dear!"

And poor little Mrs. Blueit wrung her jeweled fingers, and actually cried behind her two inches of cambric.

"Not a bit of it. John, you stop at Dunsheimer's, and buy Katy Kirby a nice big doll. Here's another five, and tell her Mrs. Blueit sent it."

"Yes, Sir." And it's my belief that if Dr. Agnew could have seen John's optics dilate he would forever eschew belladonna, and employ unexpected benevolence, the reaction being so much more comfortable. So John departed, imparting his belief to Mary, whom he met going up with the clean towels, that "Something was wrong o' the old man; but 's longs my money's safe, and I guess it be, it's none of my business if he does throw fives in the street."

The moment John was out of the room Mrs. Blueit began to pace the floor and bewail the mental decay and overthrow of her poor husband.

Mr. Blueit finished his breakfast, put on his over-coat, and came back with hat and gloves in hand, not liking to leave Jessie feeling so badly, when it suddenly occurred to him that he had not told her a word of his wonderful Dream, and how it had wrought upon him.

So Blueit, who was not a bad husband, sat down and drew his pretty, weeping wife on his knee, told her of the marvelous vision, and especially did he dwell upon the glimpses of his past and early life of his forsaken childhood, his dead mother, the poor people in the streets the Christmas-eve, and, not least, the pretty girl in Millinette Place, down to his sudden awakening under the capsized chair before the cold and ashy grate.

"And now, Jessie," said Blueit, "dreams come to a man for good sometimes. I'm going to serve my country now to some purpose. I've given before this for pride and vain glory. I'm going to give now for—for—for what folks go to church for, you know." And Blueit bolted off.

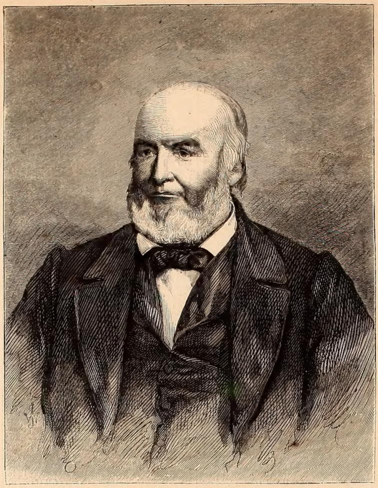
When Blueit's people went home that night they carried each a fat fowl for dinner on Christmas, and the boys had books or money, and even the little children at home, too little to work, had candy and toys, cheap to be sure, but sufficient. And, best of all, the workmen were each held worthy of their hire—good, sufficient hire—thereafter.

"And to think," said little Mrs. Blueit, "that Joe should remember, after so many years, that it was Christmas-eve that he knocked down Mr. Leroy Fayneant for kissing my hand, and dream of it at this late day. I must have been pretty then."

And the little figure, in its dainty blue wrapper and pretty slippers, refreshed itself by a look in the pier glass. "How oddly dreams do affect some men! Women ain't so silly." And Mrs. Blueit studied her splendid solitaire on the left forefinger. "But now—wasn't that odd about kissing my hand?"

MY VISION.

THE night was dark; the wild, wet wind was sighing
 In fitful gusts, and scattering drops of rain,
From the low clouds that southward fast were flying,
 Pattered against the roof; and I, in pain
 And weakness, lay and listened, while each vein
Thrilled with a boding sense of coming ill,
 And something I could feel, but ne'er explain—
A strange, mysterious awe—o'ercame my will,
And hushed my throbbing heart, and made my blood run chill.



The very air seemed full of unseen evil;
 And I could fancy, 'mid the gathering gloom,
Each deeper shade was but some lurking devil
 On dark designs intent. Some awful doom
 Seemed just impending. Were the demons come
Up from their torments to prepare new woes
 For guilty man? "How soon, alas! shall some,
Unthinking now, ere e'en this night shall close,
New anguish feel, or seek their long, their last repose!"

I slept at last, worn out by anxious fears,
 But sudden seemed to waken, with a scream
Of piercing horror ringing in my ears,
 And calling me, too, did its accent seem.
 Then, with the quick transition of a dream,
A late-deserted battle-field I trod
 In search of him. The moon's pale, pitying gleam
Cast sickly radiance on the blood-stained sod
Where thousands, unprepared, had gone to meet their God.

At last, 'neath a low willow's drooping shade,
 I found him—my dear, only brother—lying
In a dark pool his own life-blood had made.
 Wildly I called him: "Brother, are you dying?"
 No answer, but the low, convulsive sighing
And gasp for breath. O God! And then I tried
 To rouse him; and at last he, too, seemed trying.
And then his strange, wild eyes were opened wide,
And his hand harder pressed upon his bleeding side.

* * * * * * *

But ere he died he knew me—grasped my hand,
 And whispered, "Brother!"—faintly, sweetly smiled,
And looked toward Heaven. And in that better land
 I hope to meet him, and am reconciled
 To sorrow here. Say not my vision wild
Was but a feverish dream; for soon there came
 News of the "Glorious Victory"—so 'twas styled;
But I saw only my dead brother's name.
And one sad joy alone remains to me—
He knew that I was with him in his agony.

HON. JOHN BROUGH, GOVERNOR-ELECT OF OHIO.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY O. H. WILLARD.]

HON. JOHN BROUGH.

WE give on this page a Portrait, from a photograph by Mr. O. H. Willard, of the Hon. JOHN BROUGH, Governor-elect of Ohio. Mr. Brough was born at Marietta, Ohio, in 1811. He was brought up in a printing-office; he became at length editor of a local paper in Marietta, entered into politics, and for several years held the office of Auditor of the State. He afterward became editor of the Cincinnati Enquirer, long before that journal had its present notoriety. He had in Ohio the reputation of being a great stump speaker; in 1840 he and Corwin were considered the first political speakers in the State. For the past fifteen years he has been connected neither with politics nor the press, having been engaged in various railroad enterprises in the West. He was for a while President of the Cincinnati and Indianapolis Railroad; and he is at this time President of the Cleveland, Bellefont, and Indianapolis Railroad. He is a popular man, and has peculiar talent for finance. He re-entered the political world again last year after an absence of fifteen years, and although originally, like Dickinson and others, a member of the old Democratic Party, gave a hearty support to the Administration. It was his great speech at Marietta for the war and the Union that probably secured his nomination as Governor of the State, upon the duties of which office he will enter the first of January next. His majority over Vallandigham was the largest Ohio ever gave, being about one hundred thousand.

THE ARMY OF THE CUMBERLAND.

WE publish on pages 820, 821, and 829 several sketches representing THE STORMING AND CAPTURE OF LOOKOUT MOUNTAIN by General Hooker, on November 24, 1863. Our correspondent writes:

"There has not during the war been a more gallant fight than the assault by General Hooker's column upon the rebel works on Lookout Mountain. The men, climbing the steep mountain-side under a severe fire from the many rifle-pits, were never checked. Whitaker's brigade, sweeping over the ridge and taking in rear the works by the White House, is the subject of the sketch on page 820, the skirmishers of Geary's division being in the fore-ground. The line of battle, as it swept over the ridge, was composed of the divisions of Generals Cruft, Geary, and Osterhaus, the other divisions of Hooker's column being disposed on the flanks and as supports. The picture on page 829 illustrates further the same affair.

"The centre picture on page 821 represents the brigades of General Whitaker and Colonel Ireland, of Cruft's and Geary divisions—Whitaker's brigade stretching to the rocks that from the crest of the mountain swept over the ridge on which the rebel rifle-pits were located. At this place the fight was short and severe.

"The other drawings on the same page show the rebel work on the crest of the mountain, from which the rebels did not remove the guns (two light pieces) until after night-fall; and the sketch of the crest of the mountain will explain why we did not get up there in time to capture them. On the morning of the 25th Captain Wilson, Sergeants Wagers, Davis, and Woods, and Privates Hill and Bradley, of the Eighth Kentucky regiment, Colonel Barnes, volunteered to place the colors of the regiment on the rocks forming the top of the mountain. Up they went, gaining the top by a route such that a single rebel might have disposed of the party. As the sun rose the next morning its first ray brightened the old flag on the very top of Lookout Mountain, as represented in one of the small drawings."

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

HOMEOPATHIC SOUP.

TAKE a robin's leg,
 Mind, the drumstick merely;
Put it in a tub,
 Filled with water nearly.

Set it out of doors,
 In a place that's shady;
Let it stand a week
 (Three days for a lady).

Put a spoonful in
 To a five-quart kettle,
It should be of tin,
 Or perhaps bell-metal.

Fill the kettle up,
 Put it on a boiling;
Skim the liquor well
 To prevent its oiling.

Let the liquor boil
 Half-an-hour or longer
(If 'tis for a man
 You may make it stronger).

Should you now desire
 That the soup be flavory,
Stir it once around
 With a stalk of savory.

When the soup is done,
 Set it by to jell it;
Then three times a day
 Let the patient smell it.

If he chance to die,
 Say 'twas Nature did it;
But should he get well,
 Give the Soup the credit.

MOTHER WIT.

FIRST COSTER. "I say, Bill, wot's the meanin' o' Congress?"

SECOND COSTER. "A shoe heel. Female of Conger."

POLITICAL ECONOMY.—Splitting your Vote.

Where does Neptune stable his horses?—Why, wherever the Sea-Mews may be, of course.

SOCIAL SCIENCE.—Mixing Whisky-toddy.

An Irishman who was at the celebrated battle of Bull Run was somewhat startled when the head of his companion on the left was taken off by a cannon-ball. In a few minutes, however, a spent ball broke off the finger of his comrade on the other side. The latter threw down his gun and howled with pain, when the Irishman rushed upon him, exclaiming, "You owld woman, stop cryin'! You are making more noise about it than the man who just lost his head."

"John, can you tell me the difference between attraction of gravitation and attraction of cohesion?" "Yes, Sir," said John. "Attraction of gravitation pulls a drunken man to the ground, and the attraction of cohesion prevents his getting up again."

SEEING DOUBLE.—An old miser, who was notoriously parsimonious, being ill, was obliged reluctantly to consult a doctor. "What shall I do with my head?" said the old man; "it's so dizzy I seem to see double." The doctor wrote a prescription and retired: the recipe ran thus; "When you see double, you will find relief if you count your money."

A BEAUTIFUL WOMAN.—An old writer says that to make an entirely beautiful woman it would be necessary to take the head from Greece, the bust from Austria, the feet from Hindostan, the shoulders from Italy, the walk from Spain, and the complexion from England. At that rate she would be a Mosaic, and the man who married her might well be said to have "taken up a collection."

Mrs. Macaulay having published her "Loose Thoughts," Mr. Sheridan was asked whether he did not think it a strange title for a lady to choose. "By no means," replied he; "the sooner a woman gets rid of such thoughts the better."

"Be content with what you have," as the rat said to the trap when he left his tail in it.

A lady who wears a pretty little slipper is often loved by the foot.

The busiest coopers in these times are those that hoop the ladies.

Why is an unwelcome visitor like a shady tree?—Because we are glad when he leaves.

A player, performing the Ghost in Hamlet very badly, was hissed; after bearing it a good while, he put the audience in good humor, by stepping forward and saying, "Ladies and gentlemen, I am extremely sorry that my humble endeavors to please are unsuccessful; but if you are not satisfied, I must give up the ghost."

A person in public company accusing the Irish nation with being the most unpolished in the world, was mildly answered by an Irish gentleman, "that it ought to be otherwise, for the Irish met with hard rubs enough to polish any nation upon earth."

Parker, bishop of Oxford, being asked by an acquaintance, what was the best body of divinity, replied, "That which can help a man to keep a coach and six horses."

A recruiting sergeant lately accosted an honest hind in Northumberland, saying, "Come, my lad, you'll fight for your Queen, won't you?" "Fight for t' Queen?" answered Andrew; "why, hez she fall'n out wi' ony body?"

When Jemima went to school she was asked why the noun "bachelor" was singular. "Because," she replied, "it is so very singular they don't get married."

Upon the failure of a publican, at the sign of the "Robin Hood," an opposite neighbor obtained a license, and called his house "The Little John;" underneath which he wrote:

 Now "Robin Hood" is dead and gone—
 Come in and drink with "Little John."

A Chinese boy, who was learning English, coming across the passage in his Testament, "We have piped unto you, and ye have not danced," rendered it thus: "We have toot, toot to you—what's the matter you no jump?"

Patrick Macfinigan, with a wheel-barrow, ran a race with a locomotive; as the latter went out of sight Mac observed, "Aff wid ye, ye roaring blackguard, or I'll be after running into yees!"

A SCOTCH DINNER.—The noon-day meal.

The musician who can make his hearers forget time may be excused for not keeping it.

When you are running from a mad bull, to be slow isn't to be sure."

Why are authors who treat of physiognomy like soldiers?—Because they write about face.

What's the use of a seat of war to a standing army?

An urchin, suffering from the application of the birch, said, "Forty rods are said to be a furlong. I know better: let any body get such a licking as I've had, and he'll find out that one rod makes an acher!"

"My son, haven't I told you three times to go and shut that gate?" said a father to a four-year-old. "Yes, and haven't I told you three times that I wouldn't do it. You must be stupid."

"Ah, William, home from the wars? Where is the brother who went with you?" "Ah me! we left our mother together. One of us was killed. How can I bear to tell her which one it was!"

An Irishman was employed to trim some fruit trees. He went in the morning, and, on returning at noon, was asked if he had completed his work. "No," was the reply, "but I have cut them all down, and am going to trim them in the afternoon."

"All bitters have a heating tendency or effect," said a doctor to a lady. "You will except a bitter cold morning, won't you, doctor?" inquired the lady.

The English are a heavy people, and most like a stone of all others. The French are a lively people, and more like a feather.

There are many pickpockets about town just now. So he that would keep his watch, "this let him do—pocket his watch, and watch his pocket, too."

"You are ill, my friend." "Yes, my eye is inflamed, and very painful. Do you know of any remedy?" "Do as I did last week with a tooth—have it out."

Mr. Brown lately went into the country for the first time in his life, and records it as a singular coincidence in nature that every pond he saw—"and there were many of 'em"—had land round it. Mr. Brown is evidently a "natural" philosopher.

Here is what we consider a manifest improvement on the old story of the "Friend in Need:"

 A friend in need's a friend indeed,
  And this I've found most true;
 But mine is such a needy friend
  He sticks to me like glue.

Some time since, two young ladies near Newmarket fell into company with a gipsy, who, for a trifling sum, proposed showing them their future husbands' faces in a pail of water. The water being procured, they were desired to look. They did so; when, discovering nothing strange, they exclaimed, "We see only our own faces." "Well," replied the gipsy, "those will be your husbands' faces when you're married."

TAIL-BEARER.—Naturalists have remarked that the squirrel is continually chatting to his fellow-squirrels in the woods. This, we have every reason to suppose, arises from that animal's love of gossip, as he is notoriously one of the greatest tail-bearers among his tribe.

A French bishop, in a sermon, recently administered a philippic to crinoline wearers: "Let women beware (said he) while putting on their profuse and expansive attire, how narrow are the gates of Paradise."

A widow, occupying a large house in a fashionable quarter of London, sent for a wealthy solicitor to make her will, by which she disposed of between fifty and sixty thousand pounds. He proposed soon after, was accepted, and found himself the happy husband of a penniless adventuress.

"What are you doing?" said a father to his son, who was tinkering an old watch. "Improving my time," was the rejoinder.

THE CAPTURE OF LOOKOUT MOUNTAIN—GENERAL HOOKER FIGHTING AMONG THE CLOUDS.—[SEE PAGE 826.]

ADVERTISEMENTS

MORTON'S GOLD PENS are now sold at the same prices as before the commencement of the war; this is entirely owing to the Manufacturer's improvements in machinery, his present large Retail Business and Cash-in-Advance System; for, until he commenced advertising, he business was done on Credit and strictly with the Trade.

The Morton Gold Pens are the only ones sold at old prices, as the makers of all other gold pens charge the Premium on the Gold, Government Tax, &c.; but Morton has in no case changed his prices, Wholesale or Retail.

Of the great numbers sent by mail to all parts of the world during the past few years, not in the least one has failed to reach its destination in safety; showing that the Morton Gold Pen can be obtained by any one, in every part of the world, at the same prices, and no more.

Reader, you can have an enduring, always ready, and reliable Gold Pen, exactly adapted to your hand and style of writing, which will do your writing vastly cheaper than Steel Pens; and at the present almost universal High-Pressure Price of everything, you can have a Morton Gold Pen cheaper, in proportion to the labor spent upon it and material used, than any other Gold Pen in the World. If you want one, ask "The Pen is Mightier than the Sword," in next column.

Family Medicine

By having the BRANDRETH PILLS on hand, should a sudden attack of sickness occur, they can be given at once, and often will have effected a cure before the physician arrives.

As a Blood remedy, and for costiveness, they have no equal.

PRINCIPAL OFFICE, 294 Canal Street.

Sold also at No. 4 UNION SQUARE, and by dealers.

Presents! SEWING MACHINES FOR $5.
☞ Use the Common Hand Needle.
☞ Make the Common Hand Stitch.
☞ Gather, Ruffle, Skirr, Tuck, Run up Breadths. Each Machine is put up in a mahogany-veneered workbox, with full directions, 35 of BARTLETT'S Beautiful Needles, and sent anywhere safely on receipt of Five Dollars, addressed to care "Bartlett's Needle and Sewing Machine Establishment," 447 Broome St., N. Y.
☞ 19 Machines sent to one address.....$56
☞ 4 " " .....$12.

A BEAUTIFUL, USEFUL, AND PERFECTUAL PRESENT. THE PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL AND LIFE ILLUSTRATED, for 1864. Published the first of each month, at $1 50 a year. The new YEAR'S VOLUME contained more than 300 engraved Illustrations, and is one of the most entertaining works now published. Order it by a year, for your nearest, dearest, and most valued friend. Best (cheapest) by any address, by FOWLER & WELLS, No. 308 Broadway, N. Y.

10 for One Dollar.

The Finest Portraits

At the Lowest Price.

Card Photographs of
President Lincoln and each of his Cabinet.—Sentiment—Statesmen—All Generals of our country, Navy, and other noted officers of our Army and Navy, living and dead.
Eminent Men of all ages.
AUTHORS, ARTISTS,
ACTORS, ACTRESSES,
and all prominent persons, male and female.
Fancy and Miscellaneous Pictures, &c., &c.
Catalogue sent free.

Original Gift-Book Store,
for all Pictures for Albums, and they will be sent free per return mail, Ten for $1. Single copies 15 cents.
Address
G. G. EVANS, Publisher,
Philadelphia, Penn.

N. B. A Classified Catalogue of over 2000 different books, especially adapted to Army and Navy reading, sent on receipt of Five Cents. SEND FOR IT. Photographic artists of my new enterprises of Watches, Jewelry, Vest Chains, &c., &c., sent on receipt of Ten Cents.

$80 per Month.—Agents wanted in every Town. It is something new and of real value. For particulars apdress, with stamp,
J. S. PARDEE, Binghampton, N. Y.

DREAMS—Their Significance, Space, and Time Annihilated, Poetry and Music in Sleep, Premonitory Dreams, and Happy Dreams—Are Dreams Prophetic—Read Dreams of Others, etc., The Science of the Soul, in Jan. Double No. PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL. Only 15 cts. —$1 50 a year. Address FOWLER & WELLS, 308 Broadway, N. Y.

COMPETITION DEFIED!

We offer to sell our WATCH, which is of the MOST SUBSTANTIAL MANUFACTURE, AN ACCURATE TIME-KEEPER, and in addition to the Running Pattern, at the low price of TEN DOLLARS.

We therefore recommend all wanting either an ELEGANT, GOOD WATCH, with a Solid Hunting Case, to remit us $10, when they will receive a Handsome Watch, selected by ourselves, such as we would present to our nearest friends.

You can, if you choose, have one of all those who have sent us. Its beauty and cheapness cannot be surpassed. ONLY TWO DOLLARS.

☞ Recollect, the OLD ESTABLISHED AND RELIABLE AGENCY, where all orders are attended to with the utmost promptitude, exactness and accuracy, and forwarded to their destination in the most compact, reliable and economical manner.

Address
THOMAS ORMSBY,
General Purchasing Agent, 86 Nassau St., N.Y.

"THE PEN IS MIGHTIER THAN THE SWORD."
THE GOLD PEN.—THE BEST OF ALL PENS,
MORTON'S GOLD PENS,
THE BEST PENS IN THE WORLD.

On receipt of any of the following sums in Cash, the Subscriber will send by return mail, or otherwise, as directed, a Gold Pen or Pens—selecting the same according to description, viz.:

THE GOLD PENS WITHOUT CASES.

For 25 cents, the Magic Pen; for 38 cents, the Lucky Pen; for 50 cents, the Always Reliable Pen; for 75 cents, the Elegant Pen; and for $1, the Excelsior Pen.—These Pens are all numbered, and adapted to all sizes to numbers 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6 respectively.

THE SAME PENS IN SILVER-PLATED EXTENSION PENCIL CASES.

For 50 cents, the Magic Pen; for 75 cents, the Lucky Pen; for $1, the Always-Reliable Pen; for $1 50, the Elegant Pen; and for $1 50, the Excelsior Pen.

These are all numbered, and have Solid Gold Pens, with Iridosmia Points, the average wear of every one of which will far outlast a dozen Steel Pens.—All quality, although they are unwarranted, and, therefore, not exchangeable.

MORTON'S WARRANTED PENS.

The name "A. Morton," "Number," and "Quality," are stamped on the following Pens, and the points are warranted for six months, except against accident.

The Numbers indicate size only: No. 1 being the smallest, No 6 the largest, adapted for the pocket; No. 4 the medium, and No. 10 the largest manufactured, for the desk.

Long and Medium Nibs of all sizes and qualities. Short Nibs of Numbers 4, 5, 6, and 7, and made only of first quality.

The Long and Short Nibs are fine pointed; the Medium Nibs are Broad. Coarse Business Pens. The engravings are fac-similes of the sizes and styles.

GOLD PENS, WITH SILVER CASES.

For $0 75 a No. 1 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 3 Pen, 3d quality.

For $1 00 a No. 2 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 3 Pen, 3d quality; or a No. 4 Pen, 4th quality.

For $1 25, a No. 3 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 4 Pen, 2d quality; or a No. 5 Pen, 3d quality.

For $1 50, a No. 4 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 5 Pen, 2d quality; or a No. 6 Pen, 3d quality.

For $1 75, a No. 5 Pen, 1st quality; or a No. 6 Pen, 2d quality.

For $2 00, a No. 6 Pen, 1st quality.

THE SAME GOLD PENS, IN SILVER EXTENSION PENCIL CASES, WITH QUALITY, IN SILVER, MOUNTED DESK HOLDERS.

For $2 00 a No. 4 Pen; for $2 25 a No. 5 Pen; for $2 75 a No. 6 Pen; for $3 50 a No. 7 Pen.

For $4 00 a No. 3 Pen; for $4 50 a No. 4 Pen; for $5 a No. 10 Pen.

The "1st Quality" are pointed with the very best Iridosmin Points, carefully selected, and none of this quality are sold with the slightest defect, and are worth twice the closest sorting can detect.

The "2d Quality" are superior to any Pens made by him previous to the year 1860.

The "3d Quality" he stands shall equal in respect to Durability, Elasticity and Good Writing Qualities (the only true standards to say such Pens are Superior) any Pens sold in this country, at whatever price.

Parties ordering must in all instances specify the "Name" or the "Number" and "Quality" of the Pens they desire, and in writing for Pens, state whether they are—whether stiff or limber, coarse or fine.

All remittances must be post paid, and all letters are at my risk: and to all who send twenty cents (the charge for registering), in addition to the price of goods ordered, I will guaranty their safe delivery.

The following Gold or Silver will be allowed the full premium on the day received.

TO GUARD.—Hundred of 10 per cent. will be allowed on sums of $15, if 15 per cent on $24, and of 20 per cent. on $40, if want to use additional Gold or Silver.

Address,
A. MORTON,
No. 25 Maiden Lane, New York.

$50 for $20.

SOLDIERS IN THE ARMY.

For $20 we will forward by mail or express, pre-paid, the Solid Silver and Gilt Plated Jewelry—a Vest Chain, 12 Gent's Seal Rings, 3 Gold Pens and Extension Pencil Case, 1 Ladies' Gilt Heart Watch Key, 12 Brooch or Scarf Pins, 4 pair Sleeve Buttons, 3 Box and Glass Pins for Soldiers' Letters, 1 Double Ink-stand, and 3 Cluster Stone Pins. Address THOMAS CAFFERTEY & CO., Providence, R. I.

Portable Printing Offices.

For the Army and Navy Hospitals, Merchants, Druggists, and all who wish to notify, quickly, cheaply, and expeditiously. Circular sent free. Sheets of Type, Cuts, &c., on sale. Press Co., 31 Park Row, N. Y., and 36 Lincoln St., Boston.

Attention, Soldiers!

Every soldier should have a Solid Silver Ring with NAME MARKED ON IT. PRINCIPAL OFFICE. Subscribers will forward to any soldier in the Army a solid Silver Badge, with his name, Company, and Regiment engraved upon it, on receipt of Fifty Cents. The above out represents size and style of Badge ordered. It can be fastened to the garment. Address

DROWNE & MOORE,
Manufacturing Jewelers, 208 Broadway, New York.
N. B.—All kinds of Jewelry made to order, Enameled, in Red, White, and Blue, by the one, 100, or 1000.

DO YOU WANT LUXURIANT WHISKERS OR MUSTACHES?—My Garment will force them to grow heavily in six weeks upon the smoothest face without stain or injury to the skin. Price $1—sent by mail, post free, to any address, on receipt of order. R. G. GRAHAM, No. 109 Nassau Street, N. Y.

Salesmen Wanted.

$75 a month, or commission allowed on sales. Apply to HALE & CO., Newburyport, Mass.

Presents! Presents!

Soldier's Head-Quarters.

NO MONEY NEEDED.

Rare Chance for AGENTS.

Head-Quarters for Army Corps Pins.

Any one wishing to become my Agents, or wishing to purchase anything in the Jewelry or Gold Pen and Pencil lines, I will send a sample, on the receipt of $1, together with my wholesale circular which gives full instructions and Premiums to Agents either a fine Gold Pen, with Extension Pencil, Gilt Case, Gilt-bow engraved Spring Locket or Bracelet, or Californian Diamond Seal Stone Ring, or a new style Vest Chain or Watch Chain, or Pencil-Case of Jewelry. Also a Solid Silver Shield, or either Army Corps, Division, or Co. Pin, or the Kearney Crest Pin, with your Name, Regiment, and Co. handsomely engraved upon it. 15 per ct. allowed Agents on Corps Pins.

D. T. HAYWARD,
Manufacturing Jeweler, 208 Broadway, N. Y.

Queen Mab.

D. APPLETON & CO.
443 and 445 Broadway, New York.
HAVE JUST PUBLISHED

QUEEN MAB.

WITH
By Julia Kavanagh.
1 vol. Tlmo. Cloth, $1 50.

Miss Kavanagh is one of the most charming novel writers of the day.—Evening Post.

Sold by booksellers, or sent, post-paid, on receipt of price.

BEAUTIFUL WOMEN.—For PORTRAITS, with the Secret of Beauty, and "How to be Beautiful," see PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL. The January Double No. has more than 40 portraits. Only 15 cts. by first post, or $1 50 a year. New YOL. FOWLER & WELLS, 308 Broadway, N. Y.

Round the Block.

D. APPLETON & CO.,
443 and 445 Broadway, New York.
PUBLISH

ROUND THE BLOCK:

An American Novel. With Illustrations. 1 vol. 8mo, Cloth, $1 50.

This book which is pronounced the best novel that has been written for many years.

Sent free by mail on receipt of price.

THE "RIDGEWOOD" PATENT
SMOKING CASE.

A Beautiful Holiday Gift.

Most ingenious in its combination of the Metallic Case, consisting of Pipe, Stem, Mouthpiece and Pipe Cleaners, with a handsome Tobacco Pouch attached, filling the Pipe in a valve, without use of the fingers, and out of Tobacco, the whole securing freedom from all odor, and portable as a Cigar Case. It is made for exertion, of various styles, at $1 25, $2 00, $2 25, $2 50, and $3 00 to $3 75 and $5 00; the two latter richly gilded and engraved. Nothing can excel its Comfort, Utility, and Economy for all Smokers, at Home or Abroad, in Camp, Field and NAVY. As a Present to Friends, as a GIFT FROM THE LABOR, nothing could be more acceptable. GIFT OF RIDGEWOOD TO ALL SOLDIERS, in Camp or on the March, IT IS INVALUABLE. Sent by mail, post-paid, on receipt of price. Liberal to the Army, daily rates this fact.

Also, the Celebrated Ridgewood Smoking Tobacco, Of superior quality and flavor, in packages to fill the pouch (about a week's smoking), $1 25 per doz.), and larger sizes for the General Trade. SNUFFS, DELANEY, and ESTERS invited to call and examine these Goods. Circulars sent on order. A LIBERAL DISCOUNT to Dealers. Single Cases sent by mail, post-paid, on receipt of price and $1 25.

RIDGEWOOD MANUFACTURING CO.,
OFFICE 429 BROADWAY, cor. Howard Street, N. Y.

H. A. HARVEY, 64 Maiden Lane, N. Y., TWINES, CORDAGE, BAGGING, BUNTING, CARPET WARP, Fish Lines, Blocking Cord, Lasso Cord, Tarpaulin, Tent Cord, Packing and Wrapping PAPER. Envelopes, and Paper Bags.

Sportsmen, Tourists, and Army and Navy Officers.

Powerful and Brilliant Double Glasses.

Portability combined with great power in Field, Marine, Tourists', Opera, and general out-door use. Achromatic double perspective glasses, will show distinctly a person to know him at from 9 to 6 miles. Spectacles of the greatest transparent power to strengthen and improve the sight, without the distressing result of frequent change. Catalogues sent by enclosing stamp.

SEMMONDS, Oculists—Optician,
No. 416 Broadway, corner Walker street.

"TIP TOP."—THE JAN. PICTORIAL DOUBLE

NUMBER, PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL is the best ever issued, and has Elegant and Fine Engravings, including MAY-GOT BASIN, LORD LYNDHURST, and many BEAUTIFUL WOMEN. Only 15 cents. Or $1 50 a year. New YOL. FOWLER & WELLS, N. Y.

For the Holidays.

PATENT SPRING ROCKING CHAIRS, Unrivalled Patent, gives a healthy exercise. Invalids, Children of both sexes from 1½ to 15 years of age. Fastens the child to sit erect, and expands the chest. Is a certain cure for round shoulders. Also Walking Dolls, Sleighs, Velocipedes, and a general variety of toys. Send stamp for Illustrated Circular and Price List. LEWIS TIBBALS, 511 Broadway, N. Y.

Printing-Press for Sale.

One Taylor Double Cylinder, five Rollers, Table Distribution, feed 2500. Price $1000.
Apply to HARPER & BROTHERS, 329 Pearl St., N.Y.

Duff's College

Founded in 1840, and Incorporated by Legislative Charter.

The only institution of the kind in the Union conducted by a practical merchant. Competent business authorities have pronounced the system of Book-keeping unequaled; comprehending every department of business, and yet so skilfully condensed, that every learner will master it before the whole is six or eight weeks. They include STOCK BOOKS, closed once with a loss and once with a gain, exhibiting, by three different methods, the transfer of old to new Books. PARTNERSHIP Accounts are conducted by three different methods, exhibiting the transfer of old to new Books, with the admission of a new partner. Also STEAMBOAT, RAILROAD, and PRIVATE BANK BOOK-KEEPING.

12 First Premiums

For best business and Ornamental Penmanship were awarded to WM. H. DUFF by the United States Fair, at Cincinnati, in.....1859.

Pennsylvania State Fair, at Wyoming.....1860.
Western Pennsylvania Fair, at Pittsburgh.....1861.
Western Virginia Fair, at Wheeling.....1861.
And the Ohio State Fair, at Cleveland.....1862.

All of which are exhibited at our office.

"Perfect specimens of the fine art."—Pittsburgh Post.

"These performances can only be excelled by the author."—Pittsburgh Gazette.

"All his ornamental designs are new and remarkable for gracefulness and originality."—Ohio State Journal.

HARPER'S ENLARGED EDITION OF

Duff's Kook-keeping

Awarded Four Silver Medals.

Sold by Booksellers generally. Mailed, post-paid, by the Publishers, on receipt of the price, $1 75.

The following are a few notices of the character of this work:

"No other work upon Book-keeping explains the subject with so much clearness and simplicity."—F. W. EDMONDS, Commercial Bank, Wall St., N. Y.

"It gives a clear insight into all departments of the business."—JOHN HAVEMEYER, Sugar Refiner, Wall St., N. Y.

"It contains much matter important to the merchant."—C. O. HALSTEAD, President Manhattan Bank, N. Y.

"The most full and complete of any work we ever saw."—JAS. B. MURRAY, President Exchange Bank, Pittsburgh.

"The most clear and comprehensive that I have met with."—JOHN F. DELANEY, Assistant Assessor, N. Y.

"You have put your own long experience as a merchant to good use in this work."—RUSSELL ARMEY, Merchant, No. 98 Front St., N. Y.

"As an ordinary Owner, American and European Merchant, Bank Director, &c., he has borne the reputation of the highest order of business men."—DAVID W. BURHAM, Merchant, No. 8 South St., N. Y.

"Mr. Duff is a man of unquestionable business."—JOHN H. TAYLOR, Merchant, Union St., New Orleans.

"I am glad to see the merchant of the future."—J. LANMAN, Merchant, New Orleans.

"I could not have Duff's Book for half the time I expended. Standard system includes nothing superfluous, nor leaves anything out of place."—W. B. DOWNS, Cashier Chicago Bank, Jan. 1863, N. Y.

"The favorable opinions already expressed by gentlemen of competent authority are well deserved, and very properly bestowed."

CHARLES M. LEUPP,
LEOPOLD BERNHEIM,
ROBERT SELLS,
Special Committee of the Chamber of Commerce, N. Y.

Address
PROSPER M. WETMORE, Secretary.

"Your Commercial College is the result of the application of the utility of the improved method of Mr. Duff."—GUS. C. LEGER, Esq., Banking Secretary Louisiana Seceding Institute, N. Y.

The full principles need for our new Circular, pp. 63, with samples of our penman's business and ornamental penmanship, including 10 cards for postage, to

F. DUFF & SON, Pittsburgh, Pa.

Presents! SEWING MACHINES FOR $5.
☞ Use no Shuttle.
☞ Use the Self Sewer.....
☞ Sew, Tuck, and Gather in the Most Perfect Manner.
☞ Needle Rocks and 350 Bartlett's Needles.....75c.
☞ Thread Winder and Tidy Holder.....25c.
☞ Silver Hemmers and Finger Shields.....25c.
☞ Hemming Gauge Screw Driver and Wrench.....25c.
At Bartlett's Needle & Sewing Machine Furnishing Depot, 447 Broadway, N. Y.

$200! $150! $100! $50!

PREMIUMS.

To Editors and Others!

I will pay the above named amounts for the best four articles on either my Soap, Saleratus, or Concentrated Potash.

The article must state the writer's experience in using the goods, and must be not less than ten lines, and be published in the editorial columns of any good family newspaper.

Any party wishing to compete for the above, and desiring further information, may address the undersigned. Each person will publish his articles as above, and mail a marked copy of the paper containing the notice to me, and as soon as he may daily fill address.

The Premiums will be awarded on the fourth day of July, 1864.

T. B. BABBITT,
64 to 74 Washington Street, New York.

Just what every Family wants. Have a SEWING MACHINE Fitted for Hand Lamps and Lanterns, burns Kerosene Oil. Can be carried in the hand without chimney. Odorless. Safe. Saves 25 per cent. Agents wanted. Address, as above, for circular. Sample sent free for 50 cts. American Patent awarded 1st Premium and Medal, 1863.

When the Boys Come Home. "Mother would comfort Me." "Two songs by composer of "When this Cruel War is over," each 25 cts. "Eagle Call," 30 new patriotic songs and marches, 30 c. Silk and Italian violin strings, 25 c. each.
FREDERICK BLUME, 288 Bowery, N. Y.

$75 A MONTH! I want to hire Agents in every County at $75 a month and expenses, to sell my new cheap Family Sewing Machines. Address
S. MADISON, Alfred, Maine.

Holiday Presents.

J. H. Winslow & Co.,

100,000

WATCHES, CHAINS, &c., &c.

Worth $500,000.

To be sold for One Dollar each, without regard to value, and not to be paid for till you know what you are to get.

SPLENDID LIST!!

OF ARTICLES TO BE SOLD FOR ONE DOLLAR EACH.

200 Gold Hunting Cased Watches	$100 00 each.
100 Gold Watches	50 00 each.
200 Ladies' Gold Watches	25 00 each.
800 Ladies' and Gent's Silver Watches	10 00 each.
2000 Vest and Neck Chains	5 00 to 10 00 each.
2000 Gold Band Bracelets	5 00 to 10 00 each.
3000 " "	3 00 to 5 00 each.
3000 Cameo Brooches	3 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Mosaic and Jet Brooches	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Lava and Florentine Brooches	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Coral, Opal, and Ren. Brooches	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Cameo Ear Drops	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Mosaic and Jet Ear Drops	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Lava and Florentine Ear Drops	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Coral, Em., and Opal Ear Drops	4 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Gent's Breast Pins	3 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Watch Keys	3 00 to 6 00 each.
3000 Ivory Ribbon Slides	3 00 to 6 00 each.
5000 Sets of Room Studs	2 50 to 6 00 each.
4000 Sleeve Buttons	2 50 to 6 00 each.
6000 Plain Rings	2 50 to 6 00 each.
6000 Stone Rings	2 50 to 6 00 each.
5000 Lockets	3 00 to 10 00 each.
5000 Ladies' Jewelry	5 00 to 10 00 each.
7000 Gold Pens, Silver M'td Holders	4 00 to 8 00 each.
10000 Gold Pens, with Silver Extension Cases and Pencils	4 00 to 6 00 each.

All of the above list of Goods will be sold for one dollar each. Certificates of all the various articles, naming to each one can have, are first put into envelopes, sealed up, and mixed; and when ordered, are taken out without regard to choice, and sent by mail, thus giving all a fair chance. On receipt of the Certificate, you will see what you can have, and then it is at your option to send one dollar and take the article or not.

In all transactions by mail, we shall charge for forwarding the Certificate, paying postage, and doing the business, 25 cents each, which must be inclosed when the Certificate is sent for. Five Certificates will be sent for $1; eleven for $2; thirty for $5; sixty-five for $10; and a hundred for $15.

AGENTS.—Those setting as Agents will be allowed ten cents on every Certificate ordered by them, provided their remittance amounts to one dollar. Agents will collect 25 cents for every Certificate, and remit 10 cents to us, either in cash or postage stamps. Great caution should be used by our correspondents in regard to giving their correct address, Town, County, and State. Address

J. H. WINSLOW & CO.,

208 Broadway, New York.

American Card Company's New Union Playing Cards.

National Emblems.

Major of Eagles

The suits are EAGLES, SHIELDS, STARS, and FLAGS. Colonel in place of KING; Goddess of Liberty for Queen; Major for Jack.

The Union Playing Cards are the first and only genuine American Cards ever produced, and as they are entered according to Act of Congress, they can be manufactured only by the American Card Company.

The Cards are rapidly taking the place of Cards bearing Foreign emblems. The demand for them is unprecedented in the Card Trade, and they will soon become the Leading Card in the American market.

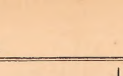
In placing your Orders for Cards, they are to be called by the names the emblems represent, and as the emblems are as familiar as household words everywhere among the people of the American Republic, they can be used as readily the first session as cards bearing Foreign emblems.

The Union Cards are the most pleasing and attractive card ever made. They are produced in the highest style of the art, and each pack is put up in an elegant Card Case, suitable to keep them in when not in use, and which is handsome ornament for the room.

Two Sample Packs in Card Cases sent, post-paid, on receipt of $1.

Address AMERICAN CARD COMPANY,

485 Broadway, or 165 William St., N. Y.



Elliot's New Repeaters

Are now ready. The most safe, compact, durable, effective, sure, and reliable Revolvers made. Carry large balls (No. 32 calibre), are rapidly loaded and fired—conveniently carried in the vest—take length five inches—four barrels—each rifled pair twist. The Trade supplied.

ELLIOT ARMS CO., 463 Broadway, N. Y.

AGENTS WANTED—Call and examine, or 10 samples sent free by mail for 20 cents, that retail for $2, urgently needed by every person, by

R. L. WOLCOTT, 160 Chatham Square, N. Y.

Meeks' Cabinet and Furniture Warehouse,

No. 699 BROADWAY, and 333 and 335 Fourth Street.

New and elegant Designs, of superior Workmanship, at reasonable prices, manufactured of the very best well-seasoned and selected materials, under the supervision of the firm, whose reputation has been established seventy years. Every description of Furniture manufactured to order and executed promptly.

Goods packed and shipped to all parts of the world.

Cavalry Badges

Constantly on hand and Engraved to Order, and sent free on receipt of Price.

Terms Cash in advance. Send for a Catalogue. Address C. L. BALCH & CO., 208 Broadway, New York.

1851 a year pays Board and Tuition at Hedden River Institute, Hedden, N. Y. Superior English, Classical, French, Musical, Painting, Military and Commercial Department. Both sexes. Each Term opens 18 Instructors. Rev. ALONZO FLACK, A.M., Principal.

American Watches

For Soldiers

AT REDUCED PRICES.

American Watches for Americans

THE AMERICAN WATCH COMPANY give notice that they have lately issued a new style of Watch, expressly designed for Soldiers and others who desire a good watch at a moderate price. These watches are intended to displace the worthless, cheap watches of British and Swiss manufacture with which the country is flooded, and which were never expected to keep time when they were made, being refuse manufactures sent to this country because unsalable at home, and used here only for pocketing and swindling purposes.

We offer to sell our Watch, which is of the most substantial manufacture, as accurate and reliable time-keepers, and in Sterling Silver Cases, Hunting pattern, at nearly as low a price as is asked for the fancy-named Arrows and Eagles of which we have recently referred to.

We have named the new series of Watches, WM. FULLER, BOSTON, MASS., which name will be found on the plate of every watch of this manufacture, and is one of our trade-marks.

Sold by all respectable watch dealers in the loyal states. Wholesale orders should be addressed to

ROBBINS & APPLETON,

Agents of the American Watch Company,

182 BROADWAY, N. Y.

Cloaks and Mantillas.

BRODIE

The Leader of Fashions!

Opened his Fall Stock on Thursday, 24th inst.,

And as usual stands unrivaled for Style, Quality, AND VARIETY.

300 Canal Street, New York.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

AGENTS, male or female, SOLDIERS, and all having time to spare, are particularly requested, as a favor, to send us their address, and we will send in return, free, information for which they will be HANDSOMELY. We offer EXTRA INDUCEMENTS. From $6 to $25 per day made by recipients. We want addresses from EVERY COUNTY in the U. S., and from EVERY SOLDIER in the Army. Address in full, RICHARDS & CO., 37 and 39 NASSAU STREET, Box 3121, N. Y.

RHEUMATISM.

USE THE ELECTRO-METALLIC INSOLES, BELTS, AND ANKLETS. They are an INFALLIBLE REMEDY for RHEUMATISM, CHRONIC PAINS, &c. SIMPSON & CO., No. 629 Broadway, N. Y.

Insoles, $1 per pair; Belts, $3; Anklets, $1 50 each. Sent by mail for 30 cents additional.

India Rubber Gloves

Are a certain cure for Chapped Hands, Salt Rheum, &c., and an excellent protection for the hands in all kinds of Housework, Gardening, &c. Sent by mail. Gents', $1 25. Mailed on receipt of price by

GOODYEAR'S I. R. GLOVE MF'G CO.,

205 Broadway, New York.

Manufacturers and Dealers in all kinds of Rubber Goods.

STERLING'S AMBROSIA

DR. STERLING'S AMBROSIA is a stimulating ally extract of roots, barks, and herbs. It will cure all diseases of the scalp and hair, except where entirely eradicated or destroyed, prevents the hair from falling out or from turning prematurely gray, causing it to grow thick and long. It is entirely different from all other preparations, and can be relied on.

PRICE $1 00 PER BOX, containing two bottles. DR. H. H. STERLING, Sole Proprietor. Depot No. 403 Broadway. For sale by all druggists.

Opera and Field-Glasses

Of great power, from $3 50 to $25. Spectacles and Eye Glasses. Also HERBERT GOODS in great variety. R. H. HOEN, Manufacturing Optician, 712 Broadway, up stairs. Send for circulars.

SPLENDID HOLIDAY PRESENTS.

Superbly finished watches, the beauty of which is only equaled by their chronometer. — N. Y. Evening Post.

Particularly valuable for officers in the army, and travelers.—Frank Leslie's, Illustrated Paper.

Prettiest, best and cheapest watch in the market.—N. Y. Illustrated News, Jan. 10.

Magic Time Observers,

The Perfection of Mechanism!

Being a Hunting, or Open Face, or Lady's or Gentleman's Watch combined, with Patent Self-winding Improvement.

A most pleasing novelty. One of the prettiest, most convenient, and decidedly the best and cheapest timepieces for general and reliable use ever offered. It has within it and connected with its machinery its own winding attachment, rendering a key entirely unnecessary. The excuse of late Watches are composed of so metals, or cutor one being fine 16 and the other 18 carat, reserved expiration level movement, and in various styles of hunting case piece. Price, superbly engraved, per case of half dozen, $264. Female watches in new, beautiful form. Sent by mail, the postage is 36 cents; registering, 20 cents.

Silver Watches!

First-Class Hunting Time-Pieces.

FOR ACCURACY OF MOVEMENT, BEAUTY OF MATERIAL, AND, ABOVE ALL, CHEAPNESS IN PRICE, THESE WATCHES ARE UNSURPASSED.

UNIVERSAL APPROBATION!

An imitation so faultless that it can hardly be detected by the most experienced. LARGE, substantial forms of two metals, the outer one first quality Silver and the inner one German Silver, in case not to be affected by cutting or heavy engraving, making it not only in appearance, but in durability, the best watch ever offered.

Sterling Silver in existence.

In the case of these watches, the army is a source of enormous profit, retailing, as they very readily do, at $25 each upward. Many hundred dollars can be made in a single pay-day by any one of ordinary business tact!

AT WHOLESALE ONLY! Heavy hunting cases, beautifully engraved, white enamel dial, and fancy cut hands, in case containing one watch, per by the half dozen, $15; per dozen, $28; registering, 20 cts. Sold only by the case. Can be safely sent by mail.

☞ TERMS CASH, INVARIABLY IN ADVANCE. No agents employed; buyers must deal directly with us. If money is sent us by express or mail in a registered letter, it is at our risk. Orders will meet the best attention and fulfilled with dispatch.

HUBBARD BROS., Sole Importers,

Broadway, cor. Courtlandt St., New York.

ALL ARTICLES FOR SOLDIERS

At Baltimore, Washington, and all places occupied by the troops, will be sent by HARDENBURGH'S EXPRESS, No. 74 Broadway. Sutlers charged low rates.

6000 AGENTS wanted, to sell SIX NEW INVENTIONS that sell on sight, and of great value to the families; all pay great profits to Agents. Send 4 stamps and get 60 pages particulars. EVERADE BROWN, Lowell, Mass.

The Bond, &c.

If 75, the one, for a short time, of the Tennessee Swamp Shrub Balsam stimulates the Beard, Moustache, &c., to an exceedingly fine and vigorous growth. Has been thoroughly tried and found infallible. A small sample box and the interesting history of this Balsam will be sent sealed on receipt of 25 cents. Address

JOHN RAWLINS, 707 Broadway, N. Y.

Exterminates Catarrh, Rose and Branch, fourteen. Price $1. Send stamp for pamphlet. Depot, 419 Broadway, N. Y. NORTON & CO., Sole Agents.

$60 A MONTH! We want Agents at $60 a month, expenses paid, to sell our New Enchanting Pearls, Oriental Burners, and 13 other articles. 15 circulars sent free. SHAW & CLARK, Biddeford, Maine.

BILLIARD BALLS.

Patent compressed Ivory Billiard Balls, 9-1 and 9-8 in., $10 per set. 2 in. Bagatelle, $3 per set. 1½ in. Bagatelle, $2 per set. 1¼ Inch Ball, $30 set. Send for circular. Ohio Centre St., New York, sign of the Golden Elephant.

Commencement of the Twenty-Eighth Volume.

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE

For December, 1863.

TERMS.

One Copy for one Year $3 00
Two Copies for One Year 5 00
An Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of Ten. SUBSCRIBERS, at $2 50 each, or 11 Copies for $25 00.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE and HARPER'S WEEKLY, together, one year, $5 00.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS.

Circulation over 100,000.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

Single Copies Six Cents.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year $3 00
One Copy for Two Years 5 00
And an Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of Ten Subscribers at $2 00 each, or 11 Copies for $20.

TERMS TO ADVERTISERS.—Seventy-five Cents per line for inside, and One Dollar per line for outside Advertisements.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS.

Hostetter's Celebrated Stomach Bitters

HABITUAL CONSTIPATION.—HOW TO EFFECT A CERTAIN AND PERMANENT CURE.—Some constipations of life predispose to costiveness, especially those which allow but little exercise. Persons who encounter this unfortunate habit of body, under such circumstances, might possibly be relieved by regulating their sedentary employments for others of a more active kind; but this is by no means certain. Habitual constipation is a very obstinate disorder. All the ordinary so-called remedies invariably aggravate it. Nothing can be more injurious than the continued use of strong aperients. They at first irritate, and finally almost paralyze the bowels—rendering them so torpid that enormous doses of cathartic medicines have no effect upon them. A mild aperient, combined with a gentle stimulant, is the true remedy; and a combination in the happiest proportion, of these ingredients, is found in HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS. This famous stomachic invigorates the whole intestinal canal, while quietly removing from its convolutions all impediments to a free passage through them. No mere purgative has this double operation. No ordinary stimulant affects the desired object. Cases of constipation, diagnosed as hopeless by distinguished medical men, have been cured in a few weeks by the Bitters. To those who have tried all the medicines of the dispensary in vain, we say try this veritable vegetable aperient. There is no sufficient reason why constipation should be the consequence of sedentary habits. HOSTETTER'S BITTERS, by supplying the vigor which would otherwise be derived from exercise, will at all times enable the system to perform its excretory functions regularly and healthily. Few physicians even make the necessary allowance for the existence in some cases, and the gloom almost amounting to despair, in which the victims of habitual constipation languish in the darkness of females. The truth is, that ladies affected with this complaint are, as a class, more to be commiserated than any. And yet few of them are aware that the chief source of the tender sympathy and a feeder care.

Sold by all Druggists and Dealers.

Hostetter's Stomach Bitters,

PREPARED AND SOLD BY

HOSTETTER & SMITH, PITTSBURGH, PA.

DEPOT FOR NEW YORK, 470 BROADWAY.

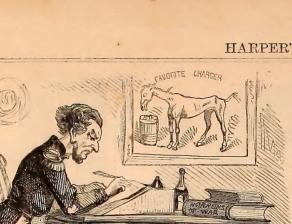
STERLING GOODS FOR THE HOLIDAYS

(And all time).

Gold and Silver Watches,

And fine Gold Jewelry of every description. Staple Goods for the Holidays, and Lasting Tokens,

AT LOW PRICES.



T. B. SYNNOTT, Importer and Dealer in Watches and Jewelry, No. 175 BROADWAY, N. Y., UP STAIRS.

Cristadoro's Hair Dye.

THE BEST IN THE WORLD.

Cristadoro's Hair Preservative

Unequaled as a dressing. Both for sale everywhere, and applied at No. 6 Astor House, N. Y.

CONDITION OF THE "MINING BUREAU" OVER WHICH JEFF DAVIS IS SITTING.

"The Reports from the Ordnance and Mining Bureaus are very gratifying." —(Vide JEFF DAVIS's Message.)

FISK & HATCH,

Bankers and Dealers in Government Securities, AND

AGENTS FOR THE UNITED STATES FIVE-TWENTY LOAN,

No. 38 Wall Street, New York.

A Gold Watch Free!

To all who act as Agents for our splendid STATIONERY PRIZE PACKETS, which contain Fine Writing Materials, Paper, Envelopes, Handsome Jewelry, Novelties for the Holidays, &c. Retail for only 25 cts. Worth five times as much. These Packets contain better Stationery and more than any others put up. They are in great demand; sales quick; the profits immense; and in addition, receive as a present from us a splendid Gold or Solid Silver Watch, warranted a perfect time-keeper, worth ten times as much as the Competition Watches given with the trash sold by other parties. Please call or send for our New Circular.

C. S. HASKINS & CO., 30 Beekman Street, N. Y.

VERMILYE & CO.,

Bankers, No. 44 Wall Street,

WILL CONTINUE TO FURNISH

U. S. FIVE-TWENTY BONDS

As long as issued by Government at Par and Interest.

To BANKS and BANKERS the usual commission allowed.

We also buy and sell at market rates,

U. S. One Year CERTIFICATES OF INDEBTEDNESS.

U. S. 7-30 LOAN OF 1861.

U. S. 1-20 TREASURY NOTES.

U. S. QUARTERMASTER CHECKS.

Maturing Certificates of Indebtedness collected on favorable terms.

VERMILYE & CO.,
BANKERS, No. 44 Wall Street, N. Y.

WELLING'S DYSPEPSIA TABLETS. For sale by Druggists. Send free for 60 cents. Depot 207 Centre St., N. Y.

The Parlor Ghost.

NOTICE TO THE TRADE.—Now is the time to send in your orders for the greatest sensation of the day.

Every body wants it, and it is just the thing for the Holidays.

THE GREAT NEW HOLIDAY PRIZE PACKET, or,

Santa Claus Christmas Casket.

PRICE ONLY TWENTY-FIVE CENTS.

It contains something for all, both old and young.

And is Useful, Novel, and Amusing.

In addition to the numerous articles, it contains the recipe for producing, at trifling expense,

THE WONDERFUL PARLOR GHOST.

For sale by all the Wholesale and Retail Stationery and News Dealers throughout the country. Circulars sent free.

THIELE & CO., 199 Nassau St., N. Y.

THE ROWEN MICROSCOPE.

Magnifies the small objects 9,000 times. Mailed to any receiver for $2 00. Cards, Five of different powers for $4 00. Address E. G. ROWEN, Box 230, Boston, Mass.

A Beautiful Complexion free from Tan,

Pimples and Freckles, may easily be secured by using the "BALM OF THOUSAND FLOWERS." For thoroughly it is unsurpassed. It is composed of pure oil, honey, and other valuable articles, highly perfumed by its own ingredients, and when used for washing, night and morning, renders the skin soft and white, and free from blemish. Price 50 cents.

The Trade supplied by HOWARD, SANGER & CO., 208 and 207 Chatham Street, N. Y., and for sale by all Druggists.

Paris Tool Chests, fitted with complete sets of Tools, sharpened and set ready for use, and packed in cases for shipping.

Prices from $3 to $75 each, and containing from 8 to 92 Tools, according to size.

Shipped on receipt of price. Send for descriptive circular to the manufacturer.

GEO. PARR, Buffalo, N. Y.

Lands. To all Wanting Farms.

LANDS.—TO ALL WANTING FARMS.—Large and thriving settlement, mild and healthful climate, 30 miles south of Philadelphia by railroad. Rich soil, produces large crops, which can now be seen growing. Twenty and fifty acre tracts, at from $15 to $25 per acre, payable within four years. Good business opening for MANUFACTURERS and MECHANICS, with steam and good society. It is now the most improving place East or West. Hundreds are settling there. Any person desiring with which the place is laid out in village lots can be answered. Persons containing reports and giving full information will be sent free. Address CHAS. K. LANDIS, Vineland Post Office, Cumberland County, New Jersey.

From Report of Solon Robinson, Agricultural Editor of the Tribune:—It is one of the most extensive fertile tracts, in an almost level position and healthy condition for pleasant farming that we know of this side of the Western prairies.

FOR

Holiday Presents,

SEE

J. H. Winslow & Co.'s

Advertisement on page 831.

Learn to Skate in One Hour by using The American Parlor Or Floor Skate, Hard Rubber Rollers, Anti-friction Axles. Frederick Stevens, 215 Pearl Street, New York; 63 Kilby Street, Boston.

Davis Collamore & Co.,

479 Broadway, below Broome Street.

Are now Opening HOLIDAY GOODS in great VARIETY and of very beautiful styles.

ALSO DRESSING, TEA, and TOILET SETS. GLASS WARE, ENGRAVED with CREST or INITIAL.

HIGH CANTON COPPER URNS, &c., &c.

CHEMICS FOR DRESS.

$15 Per Day Easy $15 And a Watch Free.

Agents should be careful in directing their orders to us, as several small unprincipled imitators of our styles have sprung into existence lately, who copy our advertisements, and "promise" the same Premiums that we have "given away" for years. Those parties can not fulfill those promises; consequently, agents can not be dealt with honorably by them. Those parties who advertise those Premiums require agents to send them from $40 to $50 in cash for their first imitations before they can receive any thing. We do as we have done for years, viz.: send a Watch and a Box of Beautiful Gold or Silver "Hunting Case Watch" on a spec, or send it with their "first order." No delay. Orders will be filled, and guarantee all our watches as perfect time-keepers. WE FUND THE MONEY AND PRESENT THE GOODS. Agents will notice that our Prize Packages must be of extra quality, and meet with a ready sale, or they could not be instituted. We are the sole importers of the beautiful watch, so we present to agents, and no other Houses have them. Look at the list of articles contained in each one of our popular, unscrolled, and valuable extra large size STATIONERY, RECIPES, and YANKEE NOTION PRIZE PACKAGES. Fine Writing Materials, such as Paper, Pens, Pencils, Envelopes, Blotters, Beautiful Emblems, Ladies' Fashion Plates, Designs for Needlework, Cottage Keepsakes, Household Companions, Camp Companions (for Soldiers), Parlor Amusements, Letter Writer's Guide, Medical Preparations, Many Ways to Get Rich, Likenesses of Military Heroes, Union Designs, Gents' Pocket Calendars for 1864, YANKEE NOTIONS of all kinds, rich and costly Presents of Fashionable Jewelry, Rare Recipes, Gents' Jewelry, &c., &c., &c., the whole worth, if bought separately, many dollars. Prize each Package only 25 cents each. Wholesale rate to agents very low, from 100 TO 200 PER CENT. PROFIT ALLOWED. Our Packages stand alone as ever, alone, and above all competitors, and have long been acknowledged 'as the leading and only real valuable and standard Articles of the kind now manufactured. Packages of all descriptions put up by the 1000 for Sellers, Peddlers, Wholesale Dealers, &c. Goods sent by EXPRESS safe to ALL PARTS of the army South or Southwest. We want agents in every town and camp, who can easily make $15 per day, and obtain with their first order a Beautiful and Correct Timekeeper free. A single one of our Prize Packages contains more valuable articles than any half-dozen others. Send for our Great New Circulars for 1864, containing Rates Terms, testimonials, &c., &c., &c. RICHARDS & CO., 102 Nassau St., N. Y. The Great Original, Largest, and Oldest Prize Package House in the World.

Perry Davis' Pain Killer.

This great public benefactor, we are happy to learn, is still fulfilling its mission of relief, and alleviating many of the thousand ills that flesh is heir to. Its domain is the wide, wide world; and wherever a Yankee has set his foot, may be found doing its work. It relieves them speedily, safely, and thoroughly. But it needs no lengthy recommendation to entitle it to the confidence. It is regularly a household remedy; and, if kept in hand and used in season, may save the lives of much suffering, besides very sensibly diminishing the expenses for medical attendance.—Providence, R. I., Weekly Press.

SOLDIER'S GIFT.

A PRESENT

For his Friends at Home.

THE MOST POPULAR HOLIDAY PRESENT.

Beautiful Photograph Albums.

BY PERUSING AT A DISTANCE, MAY HAVE THE FOLLOWING BEAUTIFUL STYLES OF

PHOTOGRAPH ALBUMS

Sent by mail or express, receipt of the price annexed.

Plain Albums, Morocco, 12 Portraits, $1 50; by mail, $1 75
Plain Albums, Morocco, 24 Portraits, $1 75; by mail, $2 00
Plain Albums, Morocco, 20 Portraits, $2 25; by mail, $2 50
Plain Albums, Morocco, 104 Portraits, $6 00; by mail, $6 50
Photo Albums, Turkey gilt, 40 Port., $3 00; by mail, $3 50
Photo Albums, Morocco, 40 Port., $2 00; by mail, $2 50
Photo Albums, Turk gilt, 50 Port., $4 00; by mail, $4 50
Photo Albums, Morocco, 50 Port., $3 00; by mail, $3 50
Photo Albums, beautiful, 50 Port., $5 00; by mail, $11 00
Plain Albums, Morocco, oblong, 80 Port., $5 00; by mail, $6 00
Photo Albums, Alto Relief, 80 Port., $7 75; by mail, $10 00
Photograph Albums, magnificently ornamented, 100 Portraits, $9 25; by mail, $10 00.

Albums sent 100 miles, on Express routes, at the prices in "first column, free" at a greater distance, 25 cents per 100 additional $50 portraits.

WILLIAM W. HARDING,
MANUFACTURER OF ALBUMS, AND PUBLISHER OF FAMILY AND PRIVATE BIBLES,
No. 370 CHESTNUT Street, Philadelphia.

FURS.

C. C. GUNTHER & SONS.

FUR WAREHOUSE.

46 Maiden Lane. New York.

Importers, Manufacturers and Shippers of Raw Furs and Skins.

Invite attention to their extensive Assortment of Ladies' and Gents'

Musical Boxes,

Playing 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 8, 10, 12, 16, 24, and 36 tunes, and costing from $2 75 to $500 each. A beautiful article for HOLIDAY PRESENTS. My stock of Musical Boxes is the largest importation and sales found in this country. M. J. GAILLARD, Importer, No. 21 Maiden Lane (up stairs), New York.

For Holiday Presents

Be sure and read B. T. HAYWARD'S Notice on page 839.

ARTIFICIAL LEGS

PATENT SELPHO'S PATENT

The best Substitutes for Natural Limbs ever invented. (Described 24 pages.) 310 Broadway.

STAMMERING

And Stuttering cured by Bates's Patent Scientific Appliances. For (New Edition of) descriptive Pamphlets and Drawings, address H. G. BATES, 371 W. 23d St., N. Y.

HOLIDAY GOODS.

Schuyler, Hartley & Graham,

19 Maiden Lane AND 22 John Street,

31 Rue du Chateau d'Eau, Paris, Sands St., Birmingham, England.

French and English Fancy Goods.

PORCELAIN VASES. MANTEL ORNAMENTS. MARBLE CLOCKS. BRONZES. CARD RECEIVERS. PHOTOGRAPH ALBUMS. RICH CUTLERY AND BRONZES. CARPETS FOR FOOT STEPS. LIQUOR CASES. OPERA GLASSES. FANS. LADIES' DRESSING CASES. GOLD AND CORAL JEWELRY. DIAMONDS, WATCHES, &c. NECESSAIRES.

HEILIGE GOODS. PISTOLS.—CUTLERY, &c.

FINE ENGLISH SKATES.

$35 WATCHES. $35

Genuine Full-Jeweled American Lever Watches, in 4 Ounce Coin Silver Hunting Cases, Gold Joints, for $35.

Also every variety of good Watches at equally low rates. All orders from the Army must be pre-paid, as the Express Companies will not take bills for collection on soldiers.

J. L. FERGUSON, Importer of Watches,

209 Broadway New York.

$7. WATCHES. $7.

A Beautiful Engraved Gold-Plated Watch, Lever Cap, small size, English Movements, perfect time-keeper. Sent free by mail, in neat case, for only $7. A Solid Silver, same as above, $9. Specially adopted to the ARMY. Sent by mail, with directions for use. Agents Wanted.

J. FRANK LEROY & CO., Wholesale and Retail, 21 Nassau Street, NORTON & CO. have received two very desirable things in a watch,—cheapness and reliability. When it is known that for $7 a person can have an excellent timekeeper, there will be greater punctuality in all the offices of life."

FINE DRESS SHIRTS TO ORDER. UNRIVALED

In Manufacture, Fitting, and Material.

At UNION ADAMS, No. 637 Broadway.

HAINES'S LEGAL ADVISER

For Lawyers, Business Men, Public Officers, and others. Gives all decisions and regulations concerning the Conscription Act. Price 25 cts. Published monthly. Terms $1 00 a year. Address

E. M. HAINES, Chicago, Ills.

Remington's

ARMY AND NAVY

REVOLVER.

Approved by the Government.

Warranted superior to any other Pistol of the kind. Also Pocket and Belt Revolvers. Sold by the Trade generally.

E. REMINGTON & SONS,

Ilion N. Y.

A Household Word.—Buy your Housekeeping Articles at BASSFORD'S, Cooper Institute, New York.

PREPARE FOR THE HOLIDAYS.

There is no Gift, or Present, which compares with the Genuine Stereoscope and Stereoscopic Objects. As a source of amusement and instruction they are unsurpassed. The Stereoscope will be mailed, postage paid, for $2 25; or with 6 fine Stereoscopic objects, for $3; or with 24 objects, for $5.

HENRY ANSCHUTZ,

835 Broadway, New York.

A liberal discount to the trade.

The only enameled "Turn-over" Collar made in metal. Send $1 for a "Turn-over" or 75 cents for a "Choker," to Box 5175, and receive it by return mail. American enameled Metallic Collar Co., 94 Fulton St., N. Y.

AGENTS WANTED.—$5 positively made from 20 cts. I supply the Goods. Every person wants a pocket pencil case, or ten samples sent free by mail for 20 cts.; retails for $1. T. R. WOLCOTT, 71 Chatham Square, N. Y.

IVORY SLEEVE BUTTONS

Engraved with initials, 75c. per pair, sent free on receipt of the price. Fresh $1 00 per set each. WM. J. WELLING, manufacturer of Jewelry goods, 207 Centre St., N. Y., sign of the Golden Elephant.

Pegg's Double-Action Patent Lever SKATE BUCKLE,

Manufactured and for sale on Straps, at wholesale, by F. STEVENS, Manufacturer of Skates, Straps, and Leather Goods, 215 Pearl St., New York. 66 Kilby St., Boston.

MUNN & CO.,

Solicitors of American and Foreign Patents,

And Publishers of the ILLUSTRATED SCIENTIFIC AMERICAN, 37 Park Row, N. Y. Invaluable information concerning Patents, free. Specimens of the Paper, free.